The Cadence of Part-time Poets
Posted originally on the Archive of Our Own at https://archiveofourown.org/works/30652973.

Rating: Mature

Archive Warning:
No Archive Warnings Apply

Category:
M/M

Fandom:
Harry Potter - J. K. Rowling

Relationships:
Sirius Black/Remus Lupin, James Potter/Lily Evans Potter

Characters:
Remus Lupin, Sirius Black, James Potter, Peter Pettigrew, Lily Evans Potter, Mary Macdonald, Marlene McKinnon, Minerva McGonagall, Lyall Lupin, Severus Snape, Regulus Black, Dorcas Meadowes, Original Characters

Additional Tags:
Alternate Universe - Boarding School, Alternate Universe - Rock Band, Band Fic, Marauders Era (Harry Potter), Marauders, wolfstar, jily, POV Remus Lupin, Muggle AU, Recreational Drug Use, Bisexual Remus Lupin, Gay Sirius Black, Lesbian Marlene McKinnon, Hurt/Comfort, Angst with a Happy Ending, Alternate Universe - Muggle, Boarding School, Aromantic Mary Macdonald, Mental Health Issues, Coming of Age, Remus has undiagnosed BPD/Bipolar II Disorder, And experiences intrusive thoughts, But it does not take over the entire fic, Slow Burn, It's a slow burn. Slow fucking burn. Please take this to heart I mean it, But Remus is taller

Language: English

Series:
Part 1 of The Cadence Opus

Collections:
fav wolfstar fics of all time, Marauder ff, best wolfstar, International Fanworks Day 2022 - Classic Fic Recs, Ongoing fic, wolfstar fics but like also any other fic that sounds mildly interesting, i am lonely and sad: a colection of fics that could cure my depression, do i wanna be them or do i wanna be with them? wolfstar edition, Reading, wolfstar and other marauders, wolfstar fics that are good soup (may include other ships), always crying about wolfstar, marauders <3, marauders favorites, All about those gay wizards from the 70s, dryadisque's absolute favourites, ficsreadin2022, wolfstar >>>, A Collection of my Favorite Fics, ForeverFavesThatMakeMeGoArgh, Fics I would read in Alexandria, these fics are better than literally anything in the universe, moony wormtail padfoot and prongs :), my marauders era tbr, Favwolfstar, To read when completed or when I have more mental stability Wolfstar and Jily edition, Finished Fics, Best Music Fics, maraudersfics, Harry Potter Fics!

Stats:

Published: 2021-04-13 Completed: 2023-02-24 Words: 979,792 Chapters: 108/108

The Cadence of Part-time Poets

by motswolo

Summary

“They’re… chaos,” Remus said firmly. “And chaos is—”
“Rock and roll.”
He looked at Sirius sharply, and for once, matched his grin.
“Yeah.”
“Maybe that’s my excuse then,” Sirius said. “I cause a bit of chaos now, and maybe one day, it’ll turn into rock and roll.”

After losing his mother at age eleven, Remus has spent the better part of the last four years bouncing from school to school or else running around London and pretending as though he wasn't the kind of well-bred boy his father brought him up to be. Now, with his chances all run out, Remus is sent to Hawkings Independent School as a last-ditch effort to clean up his act. There he meets the very people who will set up the rest of his life, and is forced to confront the pieces of himself he'd long thought had been lost.

(genuinely not apologising for the slow-burn in this fic anymore. You've been warned <3)

- Translation into Português brasileiro available: The Cadence of Part-time Poets [tradução] by r_moonpie
- Translation into suomi available: The Cadence of Part-time Poets (käännös) by tundrapersikka
- Translation into Русский available: The Cadence of Part-time Poets [перевод] by chillihug
- Translation into Magyar available: The Cadence of Part-time Poets (fordítás) by Rinnna
- Translation into Italiano available: The Cadence of Part-Time Poets (traduzione) by daisymoony
- Translation into Polski available: The Cadence of Part-time Poets by slow_burning_stars
- Translation into Español available: The Cadence of Part-time Poets (traducción) by Valenstarrrrrrrrrrrr
- Translation into Español available: The Cadence of Part-time Poets (traducción al español) by madystar
- Translation into Français available: The Cadence of Part-time Poets by peopleswatchers

Chapter 1: Tomny and His Boys

Chapter Summary

Please be mindful of any tags that might be triggering for you. All Content Warnings will come at the beginning of each chapter. I do not endorse JKR or her transphobic views and wholly support the entirety of the LGBT+ community. Please be kind to yourself and others.
C/W for this chapter: Mentions of drug-use, smoking, and 'f' slur, though used in a smoking context. There is also quite a bit of slang speech used in this first chapter (forgive my early writing), but that does not persist throughout the fic.

My username on tumblr and tiktok is also @motswolo. I'd love to chat about all things Marauders and Wolfstar <3

Final note: this fic is a life story, not a quick look in on one. Characters age, change, and learn new things about themselves and the world around them. They make mistakes, learn from them, and love so much that it hurts. Please keep this in mind while reading. I cannot wait to go on this journey with you.

Chapter Notes

We have a Cadence podfic now! Huge thanks to Lana @imsiriuslyreading for putting it together. All hail Lana x

Spotify Playlist for Year 11 here.
Playlist for Year 12 here .
Playlist for Year 13 here .
Playlist for Gap Year here.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Magically bored,
On a quiet street corner;
Free frustration,
In our minds and our toes;

Quiet storm water,
M-m-my generation;
Uppers and downers,
Either way blood flows;

Inside outside, leave me alone,
Inside outside, nowhere is home;
Inside outside, where have I been?
Out of my brain on the five fifteen!

- "5.15" The Who, 1973

Monday 1st September 1975

The flat only had two bedrooms and certainly housed more than two bodies, but somehow Remus still woke up alone. It wasn't his room of course, but he felt more at home there than he had anywhere else in a long time.

Like most summer nights in the flat, he'd been sweating in his sleep and his t-shirt was plastered to his back, outlining a skinny frame and a boney spine in the mirror that leaned up against the closet doors. At some point during the summer a small crack had unceremoniously appeared in the corner of the mirror. No one had said anything about the crack, probably because there was nothing to be said; even if the mirror had bestowed a curse of seven years of bad luck upon one of them, it wouldn't matter. The boys would just split the bad luck between them until it was nothing more than a few rainy days, and those were common enough in London.

Remus blinked in the bright morning light that peeked through the broken blinds. He'd fallen asleep with one shoe on, apparently, and came to the conclusion that he'd lost the other somewhere in the flat as he collected his belt and remaining sock from the floor. Both the flat and the bed he'd woken up in belonged to Tomny, which should've been a cause for alarm, but really only meant that the older boy had most likely followed some bird elsewhere for sleep and other machinations. Probably Cheryl or Donna. Just because Tomny was always inviting people over didn't mean they had to stick around his place.

He found his other shoe tucked up under Doss' head in the flat's shabby living room. It was still early hours as far as the London East End boys were concerned, but Remus had other issues to contend with apart from the lateness of the morning and the nauseous feeling in his gut. Lyall was going to kill him, if Giles didn't beat him to the punch.

The only other person up with the larks was Seesaw, so named because he was blind in one eye. It was thanks to that, that he didn't notice Remus until he'd stepped right in front of him in the kitchen.

"Mornin'," said Seesaw, as he nursed his cup of coffee-and-whisky.

"Mornin'," Remus mumbled, almost wishing he'd had time for a mugful himself. He and Seesaw had never been particularly close, but had lent each other a few quid or a spliff here and there and they'd always been good for it. "Tomny around?"

Seesaw shook his head. "Had summink to do early. Said he would be back soon to see yeh off though."

Remus ran his tongue across his teeth. His mouth tasted terrible. "He don't need to. He saw me off last night."

"Headin' out then?"

"Yeah, got sumwhere to be." Should've been there last night, really.

"Well," Seesaw said, raising his mug, "cheers."

"Cheers," Remus said, before shoving his hands in his trousers and walking out the front door of the dodgy little flat.

He didn't regret not saying goodbye—they'd said plenty of goodbyes the night before while hopped up on God knows what. Generally it was just a lot of messing around while they dared each other to do stupid things like dangle from the third floor balcony by their thumbs or play a round of chicken that involved setting an apple atop one's head and letting your mate throw a dart at it. Remus almost always got off easy thanks to Tomny, but even he wasn't immune to shotgunning a beer or getting pantsed. Sometimes it wasn't all that bad to be fifteen.

The closest phone to Tomny's flat was three streets away and more often than not had a bum sleeping inside. Laces still untied, Remus made the trek on his own as he always did, though he was lucky this morning; no bums. He put the change in the meter, trying not to wince when the dial tone made his already present headache throb even harder. Remus always carried enough shrapnel on him to make a call or two, and more than once he'd been jumped for the couple of quid. That had stopped happening since others had started to notice him hanging around Tomny. Going along with a group like his meant he didn't have to worry about anyone eyeing him up in the street like a bag of meat. That would change though—East End reputations were only maintained as long as people saw you out and about. By the time he returned next June, he'd be bottom of the barrel again. Less, if Tomny didn't welcome him back.

Though, Remus couldn't imagine why he wouldn't.

Giles always picked up on the third ring, except this time the phone clicked and hovered over open air. He might've thought that the call had been dropped completely if he didn't hear the shallow breathing on the other end.

"Alright, where are you?"

"Mornin' to you too, Gil," Remus mumbled, still rubbing the sleep from his eyes. "Come pick me up?"

"You've really gone and done it this time, lad."

"Yes, what time is it?"

"Just tell me where you are, little buggar."

"Meet me at the usual." Remus hung up the receiver and rubbed his face, letting out a shallow moan. It was bleeding hot in the booth and he still felt sick from the night before but a quick check of his pockets told him that he still had his cigarettes at least. He'd just lit one of the fags off his last match when a slam came from the booth's door behind him. Nearly dropping the cig, he spun around, ready to give whatever dickhead hell for picking a fight so early in the morning, but when he saw just who's ugly gob was staring back at him, his shoulders relaxed.

"Orright, Lu?" Tomny called, squinting at him through the scuffed glass.

Remus waved him back and pushed the door open, stepping out onto the street corner. "You're such a wanker."

Tomny grinned back at him, blue eyes squinted in the early sun. He reached out and plucked the cigarette from between Remus' lips and took a deep drag, even though he already had one of his own tucked behind his ear.

"Where's it ya think yer goin'?" Tomny said, speaking around the smoke.

Nibbling on his bottom lip, Remus looked down and pulled out another cigarette. Before he could even check his empty matchbox Tomny produced his own metal zippo and clicked the flame to life, holding it out for him. Remus inhaled and let the smoke drift up between them before he spoke.

“You know where. I got to go home. Should’a been back already.”

Tomny nodded casually. “But yer not.”

“Only because I listened to you.”

“All the best stories start out like that anyway,” Tomny said, grinning. “Doesn’a mean you could jus’ up and leave without sayin' goodbye.”

Remus raised his eyebrows pointedly. “You weren’t at the flat when I woke up. And we already said goodbye yesterday.”

“Pish. Who was on the phone?”

“No one. Jus’ home. The usual.”

Tomny just eyed him. “Hm.”

Remus returned the look. “Hm.”

That earned him another smile, and after breathing a bit of smoke out of his nose, Tomny turned away and crossed the pavement to a low retaining wall. He turned and perched himself on the edge and after a moment of staring, Remus joined him.

“Awful hot today, innit?” Tomny said, squinting up at the August (now September, Remus realised) sky. A few dirty-blonde curls dropped across his eyes as he looked up, and he brushed them away before itching his nose.

“I don’t got no dosh on me,” Remus said.

Tomny looked back to him, smirking. “What’s that?”

“You always turn to the weather when you’re tweaking, ya nob.”

Tomny smirked, crinkling the corners of his eyes. “Gotten predictable, 'ave I?”

“Nah,” Remus waved, “s'jus' me.”

“That’s right,” Tomny said, pointing at him with his cigarette, “can’t get nothin' past you. S'because you see things, Remus Lupin. You see people. Must be the height, I swear's you grew half a foot in the last month."

Unable to argue with that, Remus just took another drag of his cigarette, the familiar taste of the cheap tobacco burning his throat as he smiled to himself. He couldn't help being a tall, lanky git, and seeing people was easier than knowing them, but it wasn't hard to know Tomny Armstrong.

Born 'Thonas Daniel Armstrong', after his own mum misspelt 'Thomas' on his birth certificate whilst strung-out on oxy's, Tomny lived everyday like it was his best friend. Barely a man and already with a terrible candy habit himself—not that it ever seemed to slow him down—he made the East End his palace, and every one of the bums there, his subjects. He made trouble when it suited him, and good when it didn't, and he took care of his own.

"The boys were glad you came last night," Tomny said around his cigarette, flipping up the collar of his jacket to keep the sun off the back of his neck.

"Oh yeah?" Remus said, looking down at his lap as he swung his scuffed trainers against the wall until they bumped into the cement. "S'pose you were livid, then."

"My cheeky Lu," Tomny said wryly. " 'Course I was happy. This mornin' I practically ran out of Burrin's to see yeh off, little git. I was lucky to catch yeh as yeh snuck off."

Burrin was a patron—a boss Tomny considered closer than blood after all the years spent running around the East End for him before any of the boys had even known him. It had been Burrin who bought the flat in the first place, though it had been in Tomny's name for years now.

"I wasn't sneaking," Remus pointed out, " 'cause of you I missed my train. I'm likely to get skinned when I get home."

"Might help with your lip. But I s'pose that's the swot school's job. I know yer excited." He wiggled his eyebrows cheekily.

"I'm not!" Remus snapped. "And I'm not goin' 'cause I wanna. Dad jus' got this work-out. It's this or he'll really have me done up. After last time's run-in with the cops I thought he'd actually leave me on ice." And Lyall might have, if the thought of 'Minister's Son Lands Himself in the Bin' or 'Lupin Serving Her Majesty's Pleasure' plastered across the front of The Daily didn't sound so unappealing.

"I don' blame yeh none, Lu," Tomny said, briefly slipping into the Scottish-brogue he'd used in his early youth, before his mother had brought him from Dunoon to London. Sometimes he switched between that and his usual East End slang just to pick up girls.

"Not jus' everyone gets a ticket out of this place, ya know?" Tomny continued. "I understand. Though I admit, it helps some to think of one of my own boys, heading to some poncy place." Tomny clapped Remus on the back and he nearly dropped his fag between his legs. "What'cha say the place's name was again?"

Remus' stomach clenched. "I didn't. Just some toff's school s'all."

"Well, I'm sure you'll like it soon 'nuff."

Doubt it. "Got nothin' in common with toffs."

"You speak like 'em."

"I do not!"

"You do!" Tomny laughed. "When you're tired, or drunk, or high, you always slip back into that gentry-posh. You might be able to fool the rest of the lads, but not me, Lupin ol' John. You've got good RP, bet yer mum's real proud."

"I should've never told you my middle name," Remus grumbled. "You sound ridiculous."

Tomny's eyes glittered. "You called Doss, 'pet' last night."

"I did not!"

"Did! You's were making fun of 'im but still. And then Cheryl got yeh to kiss 'er hand."

Remus groaned and covered his face, embarrassed. That was the trouble with alley juice, that real cheap sort of liquor. One second you were completely coherent, entirely in control of your actions, and the next you were plastered and face-first in someone's lap.

"It really was very charming," Tomny said, shouldering Remus lightly until he dropped his hands. "Cher wanted to give you a kiss in return, but then you threw up in the bin."

Remus grimaced. “Yeah, charming.”

Tomny turned his smile toward the other side of the street, past the dingy phone booth. The retaining wall where they were sitting faced west and left their backs open to the sun. People shambled past, heads down, collars up, withdrawn completely. It was bad business, making eye-contact with strangers on streets like these. Not that he had to worry much when he was with Tomny. While together, Remus could afford to be distracted by things like the way the summer sun lit Tomny’s dirty-blonde curls up a golden colour. His own hair didn’t do that—it was too much of a muted brown—and he stared as Tomny knocked his heels against the cement wall and began humming a tune out of the corner of his mouth. Remus recognised it immediately; “Hello, Goodbye”, by The Beatles.

He could’ve socked him.

They sat there for a good, long while, just side by side—Tomny humming, Remus sulking—each taking their time. Giles wouldn’t be at the regular spot for a while anyway. Like an average cabbie, he refused to go most places in the End out of fear that some chav might so much as breathe on his precious Rolls-Royce.

While they sat Tomny just kept humming, content to sit in peace against the background of the slum’s noise. That was the nice thing about Tomny: he never hurried. Never let others hurry either. Tomny was a ‘stop and smell each and every rose’ sort of guy, and if there weren’t any roses, Tomny would smell the rubbish on the street corner and tell you that it smelt of sunshine and bloody rainbows. If anyone had tried telling Remus a year ago that he’d still be running with the biggest walking-contradiction of an eighteen year-old possible, he’d have probably pressed a cigarette between their eyes for trying to take the piss. Back then Remus had thought that to be hard you had to be the worst one on the block, the biggest and meanest; but that wasn’t Tomny. Kind and ruthless, stony and soft all at once; Tomny wore his heart on his sleeve like a banner of pride. If he had any faults at all, it was the drugs and the way he got rattled both while on and off them. But Remus could hardly blame him for that.

Born on it, with a mum barely conscious for most of his childhood, there was little for boys like Tomny aside from the streets. After leaving school at ten he’d spent his childhood running for the other dogs of the End until he’d saved up enough favours to warrant his own tiny spot at the top, and he was never not generous. Tomny offered his past up like party favours; one secret for you, a sob story for you—but if you pity me even a little I'll knock you one.

If Remus had been given his own choice of story-favour, he'd have asked how Tomny got that scar on his upper lip. The one that made him look like a Bond villain in low light rather than a greaser. A fight, he imagined, but with who—and was it just a split lip that had healed badly, or was there some slashing involved? What did it feel like to run his fingers over the little ridge there? Or to kiss a girl? Would she feel it? Would she find it mysterious and intriguing and spend as much time thinking about it as he—

"Got summink on my face, Lupin?"

Straightening up suddenly, Remus looked away and fumbled for his cigarette; but he'd let it burn down to nothing while daydreaming.

"Fuckin' waste," he grumbled, flicking the stub away and reaching for his pack. Tomny held out his hand, and Remus stuck another tab between two of his fingers without a second thought before tucking another one between his teeth.

"Here."

Tomny reached over with his own lighter and cupped his hand around Remus' cigarette. His own was already lit, and he puffed smoke out of the corner of his mouth as he concentrated on getting Remus' to come to life. They were close enough now that Remus could smell the sour scent of left-over liquor on his clothes. There was a mole too, he noticed, just below Tomny's right ear, on the edge of his hairline.

"C'mon, Lupin. Suck in!"

"Sorry!" Remus squeaked, inhaling deeply as the cigarette came alight. He pinched it with two fingers to get a good draw and Tomny leaned away, his zippo snapping shut with a satisfying click.

"You seem wound up, Lu," Tomny observed.

Remus blew out and shook his shoulders, trying to loosen them up as he watched a gent move down the street opposite to them, wearing a suit that had more patches than material. "Jus' thinking about having to leave."

"Don't think too hard. You'll get used to being gone soon 'nuff."

"Don't wanna get used to it," Remus muttered. He felt a knock to his elbow, and turned to find Tomny staring at him with that familiar wry expression.

“You’ll do fine.”

“S'not about that.”

Shrugging, Tomny kicked his feet out in front of him before letting his heels knock back against the wall. “Well, if you really struggle, you’s could always find yerself a lady. Then you can whinge and whine to her about how unfair it all is.”

Remus snorted. “Tosser.”

Tomny leaned in very close and Remus felt something in his throat flutter. “I hear those private school girls are actually all closet freaks.”

“And just who did you hear that from?”

“I got my sources.”

“Hm.”

“All’s I’m saying is there must be a good part—what’s it they call it? A silver—”

“A ‘silver lining’.”

“Ha! You are posh.”

“Oh, shove off, wanker.”

Tomny chuckled and shook his curls, clutching the edge of the wall between his legs and leaning back to stare at the blue sky. “A ‘silver lining’,” he mused finally. “Sounds like a good thing, don’t it?”

Remus followed his gaze upwards. “Should, I s’pose.”

“Do me a favour, Lu? Don’t forget this.”

Remus’ eyes snapped back to Tomny, but the other boy was still looking up.

“This place,” he said, softly, “the scum and slime—the bums and bleeders. The smokes and the boys and the bends and the cracks. The weeds and dust and dinge and…” Tomny trailed off like he’d run out of words, but Remus understood.

“I won’t, Tom.”

Tomny’s soft expression broadened into a contented smile, then a grin. Finally he looked back down. “You're a good’un, Lupin.”

“Git.”

“Yeah, that’s me, Tomny the Git! And you're Lu, all knobby knees and lanky limbs and posh-talk. You’ll remember. You—”

“LU! TOM!”

Turning their heads at the same time, they spotted a small group of boys, waving as they made their way up the street. Tomny’s face sank back into an easy smile as he lifted a hand to his brow to squint in the mid-morning sun.

“Here’s some of the tossers now,” he said, before calling out to them. “Orright, boys?”

“Orright, Tom!” They called back in unison.

“That Flacky wit’chu?”

“ ‘Course!” Flacky called, waving his short arms as he and the other boys approached; Doss beside him in his bovver boots with Lee bringing up the rear, hands in his pockets.

“Thought your mum iced you for liftin' from Bailey’s shop again?” Tomny asked with a pleased smile.

Flacky grinned, showing a missing front tooth. He was only thirteen, younger than Remus, but he’d been running with Tomny for just as long. “She jus’ boxed my ears a bit,” he said. “I escaped out the window!”

“Good lad.”

“What you lot doing up so early?” Remus asked, nodding at Doss. “You were passed out on top of my shoe this mornin'. Wagered you were dead, actually.”

“Seesaw woke us,” Doss said. “And I’m not dead yet, wanker.”

Tomny pushed off the wall beside Remus and clapped his hands together. “Then you’ve arrived just in time, my friends,” their leader said, audaciously, “to wish our lil' John a tearful goodbye. 'Course though, we won't be the ones cryin'."

Hand shooting up to the sky, Tomny whirled around and pointed directly at Remus. His eyes were happy, his expression cheeky. "Lads, sick 'im."

With grins like devils, both Lee and Doss ran forward, and before Remus could so much as turn back to the phone booth, they had him by the arms, hauling him off the wall to hold him between themselves.

"Let go, you nobs!" Remus shouted, but he was laughing because it was all good fun anyway, just Tomny's idea of a show.

"Our boy, Lupin 'ere, is leavin' us!" Tomny exclaimed. "He's being sent far, far from our kindly corners. Yes, awaitin' him is nothin' but green pastures, bleedin' narks, and—I'm sure—several fine poshy mares."

"Boo!" Flacky yelled.

"He would leave us for them! For the poncy, well-heeled, upmarket—"

"Careful Tom, or you'll run out of adjectives," Remus said pertly, still pinned between his two friends.

"He'll leave us for them's who knows what an 'adjective' is!" Tomny cried, stifling laughter.

Remus twisted the arm Lee was holding and flourished his cigarette. "S'not my choice! You know my dad—"

"Excuses," Tomny cut in. "It's nearly heresy."

"Treason!" Doss shouted in his ear.

"Sedition!" Lee added, which surprised Remus, who would've assumed that the boy had no idea what the word meant.

"It's an offence of the highest degree, leaving behind grimy ol' London to become some Fat Cat swot." Tomny popped his own cigarette into the corner of his mouth, smoke puffing out his nose like a dragon. Remus dropped his head, fighting the small smile on his lips.

"Then what," he asked, wrenching his body around in Lee and Doss' grip for good measure, "would you have me do? Give you a kiss goodbye?"

Tomny's smile widened. "No, nothin' so sweet. We're not here to impede your education, Lu. We're jus' gonna teach you a lil' lesson s'all. Doss, give him a taste of the ol' barley-sugar, eh?"

"Oh f—no!" Remus wailed, but Doss simply twisted his arm behind his back, nearly popping out his shoulder. A moment later and Lee was wringing his other arm out like a dishcloth, burning and pinching his skin while he cackled.

"Rest assured Lu, that this is only a small taste of the pain we feel knowing we're about to let you go forever," Tomny called, before finally stepping up and ushering both boys away, freeing Remus from his school-yard torture. He was tempted to point out that a single school year was hardly forever—and that was only as long as he didn't get himself tossed out like all the rest— but instead he just shoved both of his friends away for good measure and made to swat at the older boy. Tomny caught him by the wrist with a smug expression and gave it a slight squeeze. Held in place, Remus returned the smile and Tomny pulled him in for a sudden hug, patting his back and locking both arms around him with enough force that he was nearly lifted onto his toes. Over his shoulder, Remus got a good look at the other boys' faces, each one marred with dirt, freckles, or little white scars, but happy anyway.

It was going to be hell to be without them. He would miss these boys no matter where he was going and he was going toward a future nothing like the summer they'd shared, a realisation that made it all the worse.

"Orright," Tomny sighed, pulling away but keeping a strong hold on the back of Remus' neck. His fingers felt warm, and when Remus met his gaze, something in his stomach flipped. "You're gonna do good," he said, firmly. "You're gonna show those swots what a dirty London boy can do."

"You're smart, Lu," Doss called.

"Yeah, and if they're smarter, jus' set their homework on fire," Lee added, helpfully.

Tomny chuckled, squeezing the back of Remus' neck a bit. "That's not a bad idea." From his pocket, Tomny pulled out his zippo and held it up between their faces. "To remember," he said, before tucking it into the front of Remus' t-shirt. He patted the pocket a bit, right over his heart, before finally dropping his hand and stepping back to join the other boys on the pavement, leaving the cracks in the cement to divide them.

“I’ll be back,” Remus said, feeling a lump rise in his throat. “They’ll probably have me out on my rear by Halloween.”

“That’d be a new record,” Tomny said, in that way that could’ve made anyone think he was holding all the cards, "but don’t rush it.”

Lee shrugged. “Or do.” Doss shouldered him for it.

“We’ll still be here,” Flacky added, as he reached up to pluck the cigarette from behind Tomny’s ear. He let him of course, and pat the top of the boy’s head fondly. When Tomny finally looked back to Remus, he gestured sharply with his head; go on, and winked.

It wouldn’t have mattered if Remus was late for his own funeral, he would take this moment to look his friends up and down and imprint their bittersweet smiles into his memory. When he’d run out of smiles, Remus slowly nodded his head and turned away. The walk to the next corner felt unbearably long, but he forced himself not to look back. A small voice said that if he did they might already be gone, and he couldn’t handle that, so he forced himself to keep going until he’d turned a corner. After a summer of running up and down the dirty city streets his trainers were barely more than a bit of rubber and the glue that held them together, but never had his feet felt so heavy.

Chapter End Notes

Hello friends! This is an idea I've been working on for a while and I'm so very excited to share it with you. The fic features a lot of OC's of mine, including Tomny, and when finished it will be quite long, though for now I am unsure how many chapters it will be. For now, please feel free to hit me up in the comments and enjoy Remus' journey from year 11 and beyond.

And of course, rock on.

Slang notes:
'Spliff' is slang for marijuana cigarette.
'Shrapnel' is slang for loose change.
'Swot' is slang for nerd/teacher’s pet.
'Dosh' is slang for money.
'Zippo' is another word for pocket lighter.
'RP' [received pronunciation]—the 'Queen's English', a “posh” British accent typically correlated with good education.

Chapter 2: A Man's Word

Chapter Summary

Remus returns home to the Lupin Estate.

Chapter Notes

CW for 'f' slur used in a smoking context. Other than that, it's mostly just a complicated father/son relationship.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

In restless dreams I walked alone,
Narrow streets of cobblestone;
'Neath the halo of a street lamp,
I turned my collar to the cold and damp;
When my eyes were stabbed by the flash of a neon light,
That split the night,
And touched the sound of silence...

- "The Sound of Silence" Simon & Garfunkel, 1964

It was customary that Remus meet Giles at the junction between Fenchurch and Leadenhall in Aldgate, the symbolic start of London's East End. Even if the old chauffeur had been less adverse to navigating the slums, Remus would've still insisted on the long walk to the boundary line. The further away the better, really, as long as he wanted to keep the conditions of his birth a secret from the rest of his friends, something he'd somehow miraculously managed to do for the better part of three years. Remus might've bragged of the feat, had he had anyone to brag to, but that was part of the game; keep both lives separate so no toes would be crushed apart from his own.

By the time he was finally approaching the historic Aldgate Pump, Giles was already parked on the curb, drumming his fingers along the '67 Rolls-Royce Silver Shadow's steering wheel. Remus had just lit his third cigarette of the morning, and feeling it a waste to throw it away, he paused to grind out its tip on the bottom of his shoe and tuck it back in the carton.

"Have I not waited on your sorry arse long enough?"

When he glanced up, Remus found Giles standing on the road, dressed up in the same black suit he always wore, though the buttons had been looking more strained around the middle in recent years.

“Sorry, Gil,” Remus said casually. Apologising was easier than explaining just why he’d been dragging his heels all the way from the end of the End.

Sighing heavily, Giles came around the car’s boot and opened the door for him. “You smoke any more of those a day and you’ll pop your clogs early.”

Remus shrugged indifferently and ducked into the back seat as the door fell shut behind him. The driver returned to his seat in front, turning the engine over and pulling away from the curb.

“Where is it you reckon you’re going to be able to get those once you’re away at school?” Giles asked, looking at him in the rearview mirror. He liked to nag about the cigarettes and the alcohol, but Remus never paid much attention. You’d have to be completely frigid to run with lads like Tomny and resist those kinds of highs.

“You worry too much, Mum,” Remus drawled, staring out the window as the car pulled past a trolley full of early-morning Londoners. Beyond that, a milk float wheeled past, off on its morning deliveries. It had taken some time, but he now had a decent stockpile of Embassy cigarettes, his personal favourite among middle-class tobacco for weeks. Players No. 6 were good too, but secretly Remus disliked how common they were among other teens.

The stockpile might’ve been enough for someone else, but—as Giles pointed out—at the rate he smoked, he’d most likely be running low before Halloween. Alcohol and the rest he could probably live without, but the cigarettes were a deal-breaker. The habit started when he began using them as a crutch to get his foot in the door with Tomny and the rest, who tended to smoke communally or else use them like currency. One smoke was a favour owed until you returned it with interest.

“Your father is livid,” Giles said.

“So he’s home?” He’d be in his office then. If the British Minister for Agricultural Welfare wasn’t at the office, he was in it.

“Home and livid.”

“When is he ever not livid?” Remus said, leaning his head back against the seat. Wisps of whitening hair escaped from beneath the driver’s cap, resting on the rolls at the back of his neck. Remus could still remember when the driver’s entire head was as stark-raving red as his nose and cheeks, but that had been some years ago now.

“He let you run around London with those barmy boys all summer because you agreed to go. Now you’ve missed the train and your first day.”

“It’s just move-in,” Remus replied indignantly.

“There’s an expectation, lad. I’m not always going to be around to bail you out.”

“Am I to take this as your resignation then? Guess it was about time you retired.”

Remus couldn’t see the smile in the mirror, but the corners of Giles’ eyes crinkled and he shook his head. “Never. Couldn’t leave ya. Don’t have a son of my own to badger anyway.”

Remus looked down at his hands. His nails were chipped and dirty, and his clothes were worse off. It was a miracle Giles had let him in the Rolls at all, looking as filthy as he did.

“I don’t want to go, Gil.”

“Don’t matter. You should’a thought about that when you socked that science teacher of yours last term.”

“He deserved it.”

“They always do, don’t they Remus?”

Turning his shoulder to the driver, Remus set his head against the edge of the window. London flew past, bright and busy and full. “So when do I leave?”

“Tonight. I’m taking you to the station myself.”

“You’re going to see me off then? Knew you loved me.”

“No, I’m going to make sure your arse bloody well gets there. Though if you want a fat kiss goodbye I could always ask one of the kitchen ladies to come with us.”

Remus bit the inside of his cheek to stave off a smile. “Oh, shove off.”

* * *

Homo homini lupus est.

A man is wolf to his fellow man.

Remus had always hated seeing those words on the wrought-iron front gates of his family’s estate. They taunted them every time he came home and every time he snuck away. If the gates could say more, they would’ve said, Vos non lupus es.

You are not a wolf.

Coming or going, Remus always flipped the gate the bird for good measure.

After Giles pulled up along the front drive of the manor-house, Remus opened the door and started up the stone steps. As he went the sound of barking dogs carried across the estate’s acreage from the ‘dog house’, where his father housed, bred, and trained his precious coonhounds. Not a single raccoon to be found along the entirety of the British Isles, and yet there they were, a foreign breed kept as little more than a pastime. It was almost laughable that the head of department for the Ministry of Agriculture and Animal Welfare—both farm and wild alike—raised hunting dogs for sport.

Remus passed the great columns he’d hated less than the gates but more than the gaudy front doors, and stepped inside, half-herded by a butler he didn’t recognise. The sounds of the dogs were drowned out the moment the doors closed behind him, and he paused to take in the silence. That was the thing about Lupin Manor, it was always deadly still. No chatting, no singing, no music. No noise at all. It was a dead, empty husk of a home, made with gilded railings and marble steps.

When Lyall Lupin’s only son and heir walked into the manor office he still looked and smelled like a dingy London alleyway. In contrast, the office was immaculate, with luxurious velvet curtains drawn back over the windows that looked over the estate’s immaculate front lawn, and paintings of various bits of landscape and scenery decorating each wall. Framed certificates and diplomas were scattered about the room, showcasing Lyall’s various achievements, ones Remus was expected to live up to. It might’ve been a more unreasonable proposition if Remus didn't actually enjoy learning. The problem wasn't with his brain—that was perfectly capable when he tried—it was his attitude.

That and his aversion to doing anything his father asked of him.

"You've missed the train," Lyall said in that aloof, pragmatic voice of his, not even so much as bothering to look up as he scribbled across some document with a gold-plated biro. One of those pens could buy at least a month's worth of fags, but Remus wanted nothing from his father on a good day. He could keep his bloody golden pens.

"So I've heard," Remus said, rubbing the sole of his trainer into the floor to pass the time.

"Don't scuff the floor."

Rolling his eyes, Remus looked up at his father. They didn't look all that alike, even if they shared the same taupe-coloured curls. The single similarity was pure coincidence; where Remus' hair was unruly and in constant disarray, Lyall's was perfectly manicured and slicked back against his skull.

"You're to take the next available train this evening," Lyall continued. "Your things have already been packed and sent ahead."

"Without me?"

"You would've been joining them, had you arrived home when ordered."

Lyall drew an aggressive line across the paper he was scribbling on, as though he were crossing something out. Finally, he set down the pen and looked up. Remus straightened a bit, if only to make himself appear bigger in the shoulders. He was at least five feet from the front of his father's grand oak writing desk, but Lyall Lupin remained larger than life.

Like a beast, he'd had once heard some stuffy politician's wife whisper to another, when they thought no one was listening. A bear of a man, always so gruff and forthright. How he wooed a woman so delicate I'll never understand.

"This was the last one, Remus," Lyall said, lowly. "You've exhausted every school of premier quality in London. You've run about the city making a mockery of yourself and a fool of me. I told you to make this one work."

Remus felt his lips purse sourly. “Are we not jumping the gun a bit, Dad? They haven’t tossed me out yet.”

“And they won’t,” Lyall spat. “Because you gave your word. I’ve had enough of the whiney, miserable brat act. You’re a Lupin, act like it.”

“That’s a tired line,” Remus said cynically, “I think the threat of it wore off when I was twelve.”

“Then you’re duller than I thought.”

Remus’ next thoughts mirrored the words he’d heard his mother shout when he was barely old enough to understand what they meant. They’d been arguing, Hope and Lyall, in the same office he was standing in now, and he’d been left to cower outside the door as his mother screamed and threw things about the room. You should’ve put me in a home then! Anyone else would have, but not you. If you had, who would be left to share in your fucking misery?

Remus clicked his tongue. “What’s that they say about the apple and the tree?”

Lyall’s eyes narrowed. “Watch your mouth.”

“Funny that’s what sets you off.”

“You’re a child.”

“Your child?”

“Enough!” As Lyall rose very suddenly from behind his desk, Remus had to fight the urge to step back. He was very tall, taller than Remus, with shoulders like a boxer and a disposition meaner than any dog’s. “You gave your word, and then broke it when you failed to show up. Without his word a man has nothing. And since you broke your word, you must have nothing.”

If Lyall Lupin could see through people, he might’ve noticed the way his son’s hands fisted behind his back. If he could read minds he might’ve known how Remus pictured putting those same fists through the nearest window. But he could not and Remus did not. Instead Remus stayed quiet, glowering at his father as his mirror image.

If there is a silver lining in any of this, he thought*, it’s that I’ll be far, far from you.*

Satisfied with the fright he knew he'd given him, Lyall slowly dropped himself back down behind the desk. "You will be on the train tonight. Giles will take you. Until then, I have no need of you."

No need.

No need of a rebellious teenager who had no interest in behaving like the well-to-do son of a good house; of a boy who behaved worse than an untrained dog. At least dogs knew to fear their masters.

"So we're done then?" Remus drawled. His father kept that sharp, measuring gaze on him before finally dropping his head back to his papers. He waved, the signal for Remus to clear out and leave him in his stewing peace, and that was it.

Slamming the office door, Remus set off for the foyer as fast as his legs could carry him. His mangled shoes banged on the oak floors like thunder and every portrait, plant, rug—every bleeding piece of furniture—mocked him as he went. The manor was endless; it went on forever, built upon several acres of land and boasting a vast array of outbuildings including two garages, a tack house, full stables, and a greenhouse. All his life Remus had lived there—he'd been born there—and yet for months all he could picture was some beast just waiting to open its great, gaping maw and swallow him whole.

He passed by the piano room, shut up and quiet as always. Remus had no memory of actually seeing his mother play—he'd been too small and then she'd gotten too sick—but he sometimes thought he remembered whispers. Never a full song, but maybe a melody, or a few sad notes. Recalling her voice was getting hard these days, but the memories were still there;

Oh what did you see, my blue-eyed son?
And what did you see, my darling young one?

That was a poor memory, one of the worst. It always followed with his own squeaky voice;

"I don't have blue eyes, Mummy."

Then Hope would chime in, as kind and as gentle as always;

"You did when you were born. You were my perfect little blue-eyed angel."

And now his eyes were brown.

Remus made it to the grand entryway, nearly shouldering a maid he didn't recognise carrying fresh towels—his father must've rehired again. Nodding at her in apology, he swallowed a scowl and swung himself up onto the stairs, taking them two at a time until he'd come upon the second level. By the time he made it to his bedroom Remus' hands were shaking, and he had to shut the door with both hands before collapsing back against it. Not even two years ago the door had dwarfed him by more than half, but since then he'd shot up like a weed. Even still, it felt safest to lean against the bedroom door, guarding it against entry; not that anyone would attempt to follow him.

Breathing heavily, Remus tried to force the music room memory from his mind. Thankfully, he didn't have to try too hard; a great weight socked him in the stomach and he doubled over as a full-grown Bluetick coonhound threw itself at his middle.

"Oof! Bloody hell, Dusty," Remus gasped, before his face split into a wide-set grin. The speckled dog leapt up again, slobbering across the front of his shirt and Remus shoved him down, laughing.

"Eugh, c'moaaaan, Dusty," he moaned. "What? That bastard keep you locked up in here all day again?"

Remus knelt down in front of his dog and began to rub the soft folds of his face before moving to scratch in the crook of Dusty's neck the way he knew the dog liked. Dusty let his long pink tongue drop down happily, and Remus found himself thanking his stars for a friendly face. Though no one would know it now thanks to his size, Dusty had been born just one of the unfortunate runts of his father's litters. The puppy might've been put down, had a seven year-old Remus not begged his mother to let him keep him and raise him in the house. He'd even named the dog 'Dusty Rider' after a racehorse, like his father did for every dog, though Dusty Rider had never actually won a respectable race.

It hadn't taken much to appeal to his mother's kind nature, but she'd at least been stern enough about it; He'd be your responsibility. You'd have to look after him. Feed him, clean up after him, make sure he is well cared for.

As he continued petting Dusty up and down, Remus suddenly felt very guilty. He'd spent most of the summer running amuck around London, and now he had a count-down to a departure he couldn't avoid. The dog deserved better, and he'd given his word then too.

“I’ll ask Giles to look after you,” Remus told him. “I’ll be back at Christmas. Maybe earlier…”

Dusty gave him that same dopey look he’d been giving him for the better part of the last six years and Remus sighed, shaking his head.

“Right. Good boy.”

Dusty barked.

Pushing to his feet, Remus moved away from the door with the friendly hound trailing closely behind him. His childhood room at the estate had never felt particularly ‘homey’ or full, more like a showcase for another smarter—better son, but the last few months had made for a distinct emptiness as Lyall prepared to ship him off for the school year.

Remus had tried to add to the decorum since coming home from his last boys school half a term early, but the maids always took down any posters he hung and he could never keep the place dirty enough for it to feel as comfortable as the London hovels Tomny sometimes took him to. Instead the room was just big—with a huge four-poster bed, heavy emerald curtains, and a lone porcelain bathroom that opened up just off the far end. There were several wardrobes lining the walls, each of them packed with formal overcoats and fine slacks. Most were untouched, as walking around the East End in a velvet frock and shining Oxfords wasn't much different from plastering a sign on your back that screamed ‘mug me’.

Now the wardrobes were empty. Any clothes that had not been chosen to accompany him to Scotland had been most likely packed away. Remus' desk had been emptied too, along with several of the bookshelves that lined the walls beyond it. The vacant room had become emptier than empty; it'd become a shell.

There was one thing though, that Remus knew his father’s maids wouldn’t have dared touch.

Abandoning the desk and wardrobes, Remus approached his bed and dropped to his knees beside it, pulling back the heavy bedskirt. Dusty immediately tried to fit himself underneath, curious, and Remus had to haul him back before he could reach for what it was he was looking for. It took a moment of fumbling before his fingers brushed that familiar surface, but with a short grunt and sharp tug, he managed to pull out a single white-leather trunk, complete with pretty brass accents tarnished from age and lack of care. It was only about half the size of a normal travelling trunk and was covered in a fine layer of dust that seeped into the cracks in the leather like disease. Secretly, Remus was pleased. At least this way he knew the maids hadn't been bothering with it.

Spinning the trunk around, Remus slid his fingers along the smooth brass fastenings, then the lock. It was the only thing within the entirety of the Lupin Estate that no one else ever touched, but Remus never kid himself. If his father let him keep it, it was only because he couldn't be bothered to remember that he had it in the first place.

Jumping up from his knees, Remus returned to his desk, opening the bottom drawer and feeling for the false bottom. It was something he'd discovered when his father brought the desk home from another estate sale—apparently it had belonged to a nearby baron, who had obviously coveted a few secrets of his own.

Feeling for the tiny ledge with his fingernails, Remus tugged the plank up and revealed his stash of cigarettes, stowed along with a few precious spliffs Seesaw had lovingly rolled for him as a going-away present. Pushing the cigarettes aside, he began feeling around the bottom of the drawer until his pinky finger brushed a single brass luggage key. It twinkled across the bottom of the drawer before Remus was able to fish it out and return to the trunk, and by then Dusty had already busied himself with gently gnawing on one of the trunk's edges.

"Dusty, it's not food!" Remus hissed, shooing the dog off. After fitting the key into the lock, he turned until the trunk popped its top. The sound made something in the pit of his stomach squirm. It was the first time in months he'd even let himself begin think about the contents, but these were precious. They couldn't just be left behind. Even if he resented her—even if he hated her—that didn't mean he wanted to forget. And for whatever else, these were memories.

Remus lifted the trunk's lid. Inside he found records; just a handful of the ones his mother had saved for him. Everything from Miles Davis to the Byrds. There was country, doo-wap, American jazz, Latin pop music—and of course the Beatles. Hope Lupin had loved the Beatles.

Gingerly—like he was disturbing a dead body—Remus started sifting through the albums, trying to recall his favourite track off of each. It was harder than he remembered. The records hadn't been played since he was eleven, when his mother's continuously poor health had rapidly started to decline. Back then Hope would have him play music while she laid motionless in bed, too exhausted to even hum along. After she was moved to the hospital permanently the turntable had miraculously vanished. Fearing the worst, Remus had shut the records away and told himself they could play them when she came home again. Only, she hadn't.

Hope had loved the Beatles. Remus too, but... he had his own favourites. The Who were paramount. Together he and his mother would sit together, listening and singing along until the record had run out of words to play. Remus could still remember the day they'd moved that little television set into her bedroom. He'd never seen music on TV before, and from then on it was all over for Remus.

The television gave him the chance to see music really come alive on stage. There he could see more bands than just what was played on their British radio. In the beginning it was The Rolling Stones and The Beach Boys, then The Kinks and Dusty Springfield—even a bit of Jimi Hendrix when Hope was feeling wild enough. Later it became darker; moodier. Remus had lost it over bands like Black Sabbath and Pink Floyd, while Led Zeppelin and Deep Purple dominated the air waves. By the time he was ten, America had invaded with acts like such as the likes of Iggy Pop and Bob Dylan, but through it all The Who remained on top.

The first time Remus had seen Pete Townshend smash his guitar and Keith Moon knock over his drum kit, he knew he was in love.

Hope appreciated all of the bands—any band—perhaps just because music was about the only thing they could share between her ever-revolving doctors' visits. She wasn't perfect—she was still a mum—and couldn't seem to understand why musicians like Townshend would destroy their instruments for a few cheap laughs. Should they not have been sacred? Was the stage not consecrated ground, meant to be blessed and revered?

But Remus understood. He understood perfectly.

This—was rock and roll.

Now, in his bedroom shell, Remus thumbed through the rest of the records, counting them off on his fingers as though he were going down a list. Blue Hawaii, Highway 61 Revisited, A Quick One, Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club, Pet Sounds—each one was a memory. A piece of her he'd forgotten; and that might stay forgotten otherwise.

Inside something ached.

Oh, don’t be sad, darling.

Shall Mummy sing to you?

Oh, where have you been, my blue-eyed son?

Oh, where have you been, my darling young one?

Remus pulled his hands back and shut the little trunk with a click.

Chapter End Notes

The song Remus is remembering is Bob Dylan's "A Hard Rain's Gonna Fall" (1963).
Slang/Dictionary:
A milk-float is a dairy delivery truck.
A biro is just another word for pen.

Chapter 3: Chocolate and Train Stops

Chapter Summary

> Remus arrives at Hawkings after taking the over-night train to meet a friendly face.

Chapter Notes

> CW: 'f' slur used in smoking context.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Don't do this and don't do that,
What are they trying to do?
Make a good boy of you;
Do they know where it's at?
Don't criticise, they're old and wise;
Do as they tell you to,
Don't want the devil to,
Come and put out your eyes…

- "School" Supertramp, 1974

Remus slept badly. The train carriage was dim and his head kept knocking against the window. It wasn't until he thought to ball up his jacket and use it as a pillow that he was able to make himself comfortable enough to try for a lick of sleep, but even then the train felt like a furnace. Sweat was running down his back and past his belt, and he couldn't so much as crack the window for a bit of breezy relief—the latch was broken. He was stuck in coach, surrounded by many more unhappy overnight travellers, including the man to his right who was currently grumbling about burning a Sunday roast in his sleep. If he had made his train the morning before Remus would've probably had his own carriage, but that was a privilege better off forgotten under current circumstances.

Giles had been quiet most of the way to the station, but once they'd got there he'd preened over his charge—making sure he had all his school papers, reminding him to shave downwards and not up, and not to spend every lesson with his nose stuck in a book—until Remus had finally had to snap at him to stop.

“You call if you need anything,” Giles ordered. “And no more punching teachers or I’ll have to drive up to the Highlands to whoop you one myself.”

“Not sure how the Rolls would do on dirt roads, Gil,” Remus had teased. It made Giles smile, and he sighed a bit before clapping him on both shoulders affectionately.

“Be good,” he said, “and if you can’t be good then be smart.”

They’d separated on the station platform just before midnight, and Remus had taken the last train to Scotland alone and feeling distinctly sorry for himself. Now, several hours later, he spent the morning’s wee hours awake and wishing he could’ve had a cig, but the train car didn’t allow smoking and his trunk was tucked up above him on the shelf along with his fags, a few books, and his mother’s small collection of albums. Even if he could’ve had one without facing retribution from the attendant or other passengers, Mr. Sunday-roast was so thick round the middle that even as skinny as he was, Remus doubted he would've been able to fit past without saying something first. And that of course would require conversation, which he was too irritated to consider.

So sleep didn’t come, and Remus was forced to watch as the great English countryside rolled by in the dark. He’d be at his new school in the Scottish Highlands soon, where supposedly, countless rich and well-to-do British families sent their youth to grow and flourish under the finest education money could buy. For those looking to get into a good university, Hawkings Independent School was step one; for Remus, it might as well have been another prison. The closest village to the school’s grounds was four kilometres away, and even then the Scottish township of Craigtyre had little to offer, if the school’s guidebook was anything to go by.

After a near half hour of biting his fingernails down to the quick, a heavy jostling from the tracks awoke Remus’ seat partner with a start. The man snorted rather grotesquely, and blinked around himself as though he couldn’t remember where he was. Remus avoided eye contact, turning his chest toward the window, confident that the low-light of the carriage would discourage any conversation, but that didn’t seem to matter much to the man. He reached over and tapped Remus on the shoulder.

“Coffee cart come by?”

Remus shook his head, thumb nail still stuck between his teeth. The man sighed and rubbed his eyes. “Just as well, really. Makes me awfully gassy on cross country.”

At Remus’ expression of horror the man chuckled.

“Just having a laugh. Nervous traveller?” He gestured to Remus’ fingers, now red and bleeding in some places.

“Not really,” Remus muttered, tucking his hands under his legs and turning back to the window, just hoping that the guy would take the hint.

“Ah, but rail's still better than flying,” the man said jovially. “I got on my first aeroplane two years ago—me and my ex-wife, we were heading to Ibiza. Nearly thought I was gonna pass out during lift-off. Friendly island though. You ever been?”

Remus scrunched a little lower in his seat. “No.”

“Ah well, you’re young. I’m sure you’ll go lots of places in your time. Life’s like a train, you know. All about stops, it is. Sometimes people—like my ex-wife—get off, and others get on. S'all about deciding where tis’ you wanna go. Though, I bet that advice's cheap coming from some old codger on a business trip.”

The man chuckled and Remus let his head fall against the window. His fingers hurt, and he was chewing on the inside of his cheek now. If the sodding oaf didn’t shut up soon he was positively sure he’d shred himself to pieces.

“I can tell you’re not feeling so good,” the man continued, keeping his voice low so as to not wake any other passengers who had been lucky enough to be able to fall asleep. “Might have something here for it.”

Before Remus could assure him that he didn’t want anything he could offer, he’d ruffled through his jacket pockets and produced a full bar of chocolate. He smiled, and snapped the bar clean down the middle, offering a half to Remus. “It’ll make you feel better,” he promised, peeling back the sweet's wrapping and snapping off a square with his teeth.

Remus might’ve asked just how long the chocolate had been sitting in the stranger’s breast pocket, but at the moment, the urge to busy his hands and mouth was too great. Biting into the chocolate, his shameless sweet tooth was instantly comforted. He’d spent too long smoking cigarettes, which were almost cheaper than chocolate on the street. It had to be at least twenty-five degrees in the carriage so the chocolate was soft, but it was comforting.

His seat partner smiled at him as he relaxed back into his chair. Remus returned the gaze, eyebrows up. “Got the time?” He asked, between chewing.

The man glanced down at the watch strapped to his barrel-wrist. “Half past three in the morning.”

Remus fought a grimace.

“Cheers.”

* * *

Hawkings Private School might’ve been nice, if Remus could just find his way around. The school was a bloody maze, and he hadn’t even made it inside a building yet.

After a driver had met him at the train station they’d embarked on an hour-long car journey to Hawkings’ grounds. There was no smoking permitted in the car so Remus had made the driver wait until he’d smoked at least one cigarette down to pure ash. The driver seemed annoyed with the waiting and grumbled something under his breath in a thick Scottish-brogue, but Remus was in no hurry to get back into another vehicle after a nine-hour train ride anyway.

They drove in silence, which Remus was grateful for, with only the scratchy radio for noise. The disc jockey had some taste, so Remus couldn’t complain; even if the radio did cut out during the Doors’ “Light My Fire”, making him miss the last half of the song. The car puttered along on mostly dirt roads, with Remus staring at the Scottish countryside and humming along to the music until its signal finally cut out and left only static.

Near the end of the drive, the man pointed to a small cluster of buildings off in the distance from the road. Craigtyre, he explained, where the school got most of its supplies including food and shopping. The village had a post office, a tailors, a market, a pub, and a single corner-shop. Had its own school too, for the local kids, but not much else.

Remus had only grunted in response, and the man chuckled darkly.

“Not in London anymore, laddie.”

And he wasn’t. Hawkings School was anything but. In London—or at least east of Aldgate Pump—people would’ve given him a wider birth. They would’ve been wary of meeting his eye, and he wouldn’t have met theirs at all. At Hawkings, Remus couldn’t get people to stop staring. And that wasn’t even the biggest problem. Out of his entire audience, not a single one came up any higher than his ribs.

He was surrounded by children. Everywhere he looked some kiddie popped out to get a look at him. Most were dressed in normal, every-day shirts and slacks, but some were dressed in smart little maroon and grey uniforms. Remus, still wearing his favourite trousers with the hole in the left knee and dirty steel-toes (though he had changed his shirt), probably looked like a complete yob. Though, he suspected, that just made him strange in the world of well-to-do kiddies, not scary. He trudged along carrying his trunk with a small line of six year-olds following him like a train, and was almost resolved to let them until one of the little shits got ballsy and ran up to wipe something on the back of his shirt.

“Oi!” Remus barked, as the kid squealed and took off out of his reach. He turned his eyes on the others, maybe a dozen of them, but the kids only took a few steps back and snickered.

After walking up to the wrong building for the third time, Remus was becoming especially frustrated. Finally, he turned back to the kids and dropped his case onto the stone walkway with a loud thud. “Anyone know where Godric House is?” He snapped.

The kids scattered, either not expecting Remus to actually say something to them, or frightened off by his irritated expression. Remus watched them go, stifling a groan.

“Doesn’t work as well when you yell at them,” a voice called from behind him.

Spinning around, Remus came face-to-face with a girl. She was at least a head shorter than him, with a face full of freckles and some of the reddest hair he’d ever seen. Her arms were crossed over her chest, though she had a friendly expression. He might’ve mistaken her for another kid if it weren’t for the tone of authority in her voice.

“I didn’t yell,” Remus said.

“Well, you didn’t ask very nicely, now did you?” She uncrossed her arms, flapping a fistful of documents she was carrying. She was also wearing a uniform, though hers was distinctly more grown-up, with a smart-looking navy blue vest over a dress shirt and a grey skirt and leggings. It was almost applause worthy to be dressed in full uniform in such heat.

“You lost then?”

Remus blinked. “Er… yeah.”

She raised her eyebrows and gave him the once-over. “Where are you heading?”

“Godric House,” he answered, and she smiled.

“Yeah, I already heard.”

“Then why ask?”

She shrugged. “Just making conversation. Godric is one of the secondary dorms, on the Eastern half of campus. You’re on the Western side right now—the primary half?”

That explained all the kids. Damn driver, he’d dropped him off on the wrong side.

Fighting to keep his face from heating up, Remus bit down on the inside of his cheek before speaking. “I’m new.”

She smiled broadly this time. “I gathered that too. I’m Lily. Lily Evans.”

Lily stepped forward and extended her hand, palm open wide.

“Remus Lupin,” he said, dropping the handshake after a single up-and-down and pressing both hands into his pockets.

“I can take you to Godric House, if you like,” Lily offered. "My dorm’s only a few doors down—Rowena House. All the dorms are named after a Hawkings founder or scholar. The same goes for most of the buildings actually. Is there a reason you’re so far from—”

“Lily!”

Looking up beyond Lily, which wasn’t hard at all considering how short she was, Remus watched as another boy rushed up to them. He was red-faced, with a long nose and matching hair that fell down over his head like a limp rag. Unlike Lily's, his expression was sour, and he looked at Remus like he was old gum he'd just scraped off the bottom of his shoe.

"Sev," Lily said happily, "this is Remus. Remus, this is Severus."

Severus glanced at Remus once more, before deciding to ignore his presence all together. "Your brats are out of control again," he said, jabbing a thumb over his shoulder behind him. "You need to come straighten them out."

The corners of Lily's mouth dipped like she'd heard the same thing many times before. "I told you not to call them brats, Sev. How are you ever going to get them to listen to you if you're just putting them out?"

Severus looked indignant. "I have you to do it for me."

"Well," Lily started, suddenly enthusiastic again, "not today. Sorry, but I've offered to show Remus to his dorm. He's new."

Lily spoke like he was a shiny new toy, but Severus' gaze made Remus think that he'd rather have him tossed under a trolley than play with him. "But—" he tried, but Lily just shook her head, pressing her fist full of papers into his chest and stepping back toward Remus.

"Sorry Sev, just ask Hannah for help! I'll see you later for dinner, okay?"

Raising his head back out of a hunch, Severus huffed and shot a nasty look in Remus' direction before finally stalking away, presumably back to the kids he had failed to round up the first time.

Lily turned to Remus. "Shall we be off?"

Chapter End Notes

A 'disc jockey' is just the term where 'radio DJ' is derived from.

Chapter 4: Room 4A

Chapter Summary

Lily escorts the newly-arrived Remus to his dorm, where he has his first introductions with his new roommates.

Chapter Notes

No trigger warnings for this chapter!

NOTE: There is an alternate POV (Sirius) of this chapter available here .

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I'll be there if you want me to,
No one else that could ever do,
Got to get some peace in my mind;
Monday morning you sure look fine,
Friday I got travelin' on my mind...

- "Monday Morning" Fleetwood Mac, 1975

"You used me to escape."

"No," Lily scoffed dismissively, leading him away from the primary buildings where she'd found him. She walked briskly, as though she enjoyed burning holes in her shoes. "You were lost, I couldn't just leave you. Unless you'd rather Sev take you to the dorms?"

She raised her red eyebrows at him and Remus thought back to the scowling boy. He doubted they'd have made it more than ten paces before one of them took a swing at the other.

Satisfied with his silence, Lily smiled. "Where are you from, Remus?"

"London."

She looked him up and down. "And did your parents send you here? Or was it something else…?"

"What else would it be?"

“Oh, never mind,” she said quickly, before pointing down. “You have a hole in your shoe, you know.”

Remus looked down and wiggled his big toe, which poked through the top of his trainer. He shrugged, nonchalant;

“Yeah, I know.”

Lily looked amused, and eyed the small white case. “Is that all you brought with you?” She had already tried to make a grab for it before they’d set off, surely just to be helpful, but Remus had swiped up the handle before she could reach it. Lily, to her credit, hadn’t flinched, only rose back to her full height and smiled innocently. Remus couldn’t imagine a girl like her would appreciate finding out what was inside and he couldn’t afford to lose his stash on the first day.

“No,” he answered, sheepishly. “Most got sent ahead. S'just some other stuff.”

“Ah, guess that makes sense if you missed move-in. Well, trolley’s this way.” She put a little skip into her step as they rounded one of the primary buildings. Remus blinked after her; trolley?

There was, in fact, a trolley. Hawkings’ grounds were so vast—over two hundred acres, he remembered—that it only seemed to make sense to have a small tram to make sure students got to their lessons and meals on time. There were also bikes available to be taken around, according to Lily, but those had to be signed out at head office. The trolley itself was a nice ride. The windows were dropped open to allow a nice summer breeze to pass through and the driver was a young guy Lily just called ‘Stan’, who had acne that could’ve rivalled Lee’s but was definitely older than nineteen or twenty. He said nothing as they got on despite Lily’s cheerful hello, only tipping his head as he tugged the trolley’s doors closed behind them, several coffee stains on the front of his uniform and a cigarette poking out of the side of his mouth.

“We’re allowed to smoke in the cab?” Remus asked, following Lily to one of the middle rows and sitting down.

“No, never,” Lily said, appalled. “But if you rat on Stan he’ll purposely drive past you next time you’re late for lessons.”

Looking back to the front of the bus, only six or so rows ahead, Remus found Stan staring back at them in his mirror and quickly busied himself by looking out the window. A few other kids turned their noses up to stare, but Remus did his best to ignore them too. As they went Lily continued to ramble, pointing out each different building and giving them a name;

“That’s the Atrium, and there’s Le Fay Hall, the drama building—it’s got the amphitheatre. Down that path there you’ll find the gardens and greenhouses. Scamander Garden is where the year twelves and thirteens get to apply their botany lessons—it’s an elective. The Agrippan Block has the language arts classrooms, and just behind that is Flamel Block, for modern languages. And of course there’s the Priori Block…”

On and on she went. Remus forgot most of it instantly, too aware of how close Lily got while trying to reach over him to point out the buildings. Eventually she sat back in her seat, swinging her feet out ahead of her and pointing her toes, which were bound up in her shiny new school shoes. They had the trolley to themselves, but Lily had waved to a few people as they drove down the lane. Plenty of other students were out and about enjoying the last precious hours before school started the next morning. Some were in uniform, others not, but none looked as rough as Remus’ preferred garb.

Glancing at Lily while she called out to a couple students walking on the pavement, Remus briefly let himself wonder what kind of money the Evans family came from. Surely something fine and posh like politics or finance; Lily had that smartly-air about her. Or maybe she had a great-uncle who was a Lord or something.

When they finally reached their stop, Stan rang a short bell and Lily hopped up from her seat to make her way off the bus. Trunk bumping along the sides of the trolley’s seats, Remus stepped down the pram stairs after her.

“Thanks, Stan,” Lily called, before the driver rang his bell again and pulled the trolley away from the curb.

“This way,” she told him, moving up the road ahead of him. He followed, too lost to be anything but obedient. The Eastern side of the college appeared much like its primary counterpart, but with more rolling hills and trees. Great brick buildings rose up on one side of the street, emblazoned with various House crests, and a thicket of trees along the other.

“This is House Lane," Lily explained. "That's Dorset House, a girls dorm, and next door is Crowley House—boys. Piaget's the white one on the very end, but you said you were in Godric House, yes?"

"Yeah," Remus said, switching his trunk to the other hand. Walking along, following Lily's prima shoes and up-beat attitude, Remus suddenly felt himself getting antsy seeing all the buildings up close. Up until that moment he'd allowed himself to believe that all of it was just temporary—that he'd be back with Tomny and the boys by Halloween. Despite the nearly eleven hour journey and the horrible knot that had sat in the base of his stomach the entire way, it had felt like all the other schools. Now, Remus realised, he really was stuck. He'd lived on campus before, but nowhere he couldn't escape from. In London all it took was one open window and he was running amuck again. At a school with its own tram-system, far, far beyond any other hint of civilization, where was there to go? No smokes, no yobbo-boys, just uniforms, lessons, and prissy brick buildings.

"I don't much like the look of Finch House myself," Lily was saying, "reminds me too much of—"

"Why are you helping me?" Remus blurted, rudely.

She paused and turned around. He was behind her a ways, having lagged behind while he'd sunk deeper and deeper into his own head. "Oh," she popped, "it's my job."

"Your job?"

"Yeah, I'm a prefect. One of a prefect's responsibilities is to help new students settle in. You should've seen me yesterday. Must've clocked a million steps getting everyone to their places."

Remus felt like he'd been socked in the gut. She wasn't showing him around because she wanted to, but because it was her job . Instantly he was bombarded with images of past professors, teachers' aids, school counsellors, all the people who'd 'helped' not because they wanted to know him, but because they were paid to do it. Lily definitely didn't earn anything of monetary value for picking up strays, but the principle was the same.

"That's what I was doing when we met," Lily continued, walking back down the path toward him. "The primary kids take a little more settling in than the older kids, and there's always more of them. We don't usually get new kids as old as you—oh! I never asked what year you were in. I'm in year eleven, but I came to Hawkings in year seven, so you don't have to be worried about coming in late. Lots of people __"

Remus stepped past her, tossing his trunk up over his shoulder, elbow to the sky. “I’m fine from here, thanks."

Lily blinked, but recovered quickly, rushing up from behind until she was next to him, nearly skipping just to keep up with his full strides. “If I said something rude I’m really sorry,” she tried. “I still can show you to Godric.”

“No need.”

“Remus…”

“I got it.”

Lily sighed, pressing her lips into a thin line. “Just let me walk with you then? I promise to clear out after!”

Clearly she took her role as prefect seriously. Remus turned to her, before nearly flinching and stopping dead in the road. Lily was looking at him with an expression so akin to a kicked puppy that she could’ve played a starved orphan in one of those BBC adverts.

“Bloody—alright!” Remus said, immediately looking away.

“Great,” Lily said, pleased. She seemed to recover instantly, and fell into step with him properly, leading the way once more. Albeit grudgingly, Remus lessened his strides. Lily swung her arms as she walked, and eventually began to hum a cheery tune. By the time they made it to Godric House, he was sure she’d composed an entire song in her head.

“It’s a griffin,” Lily said when Remus stopped in front of the dorm’s plaque. “It’s your House animal—like a mascot. Seems perfectly ridiculous to me, having a mythical creature as your subject of House pride. Rowena’s animal is a raven.”

“Sensible,” Remus muttered, which Lily seemed pleased about. She nodded her head and continued up the rest of the dorm’s stone drive. The outside of the building was just as fine as any of the others at Hawkings, with bright red brick and grey trimmings. Lily, clearly not one to stand on ceremony, Remus was realizing, walked straight up the last of the steps to the dorm’s front door and opened it, pausing on the threshold to wait for him.

“Are you coming?”

Remus tipped his head and dropped his case off his shoulder, following her in. “Didn’t think a girl could go into a boys dorm.”

“Oh, we can, just no boys in the girls dorms. And besides, I’m a prefect.”

“Right…”

Remus looked around himself. If the outside of the dorm was grand, the inside was truly posh-tacular. The front door let off into a common area, which was outfitted with leather sofas and scattered rugs. A massive, unlit hearth sat in the far corner with a couple of students already scattered around it playing cards. Light trickled in through open windows, supplemented by lamps placed amongst the sofas on desks and tables. Half of the room was covered in oak shelves, stuffed to the brim with books of all shapes and sizes. Like at home, paintings covered every wall, but unlike the dull, grey-toned still-lifes that decorated the Lupin Estate, the paintings in Godric House were filled with rich colour and life. From flowers and beaches to beautiful goddesses and dirty martyrs, the paintings were piled on top of each other from floor to ceiling, and each seemed to move on its own in the warm light of the common room.

But it was none of this that caught Remus’ eye. Opposite to the fireplace was a single television set with a group of boys sat before it, watching some comedy sketch show and laughing with one another. Next to that, quiet and unassuming, was a turntable, outfitted on its own table. A stack of records were piled up lazily besides it, nothing of substance—mostly just church hymns and orchestral symphonies, even a few Christmas records. Still, it made Remus a bit giddy.

“Cosy enough for a boys dorm,” Lily supplied, after she’d caught Remus staring. “Though rarely quiet.” She said this last bit with a hint of distaste. “There’s a small kitchenette too, just through there. In case you want to make tea or something.”

Remus pulled himself from his daze and nodded.

“We only get television privileges on the weekends and holidays,” Lily explained.

“Mhm,” Remus nodded, "and the turntable?”

“Oh, they let us play music, but not after nine.”

Remus resisted a shudder. Curfew.

“What was your dorm number again?” Lily asked, chirpily, waving at another student from across the room. She seemed to know everyone.

“Oh, um…” Remus set his trunk down and reached beneath the coat at his waist, into his back pocket. He felt the cool shape of Tomny’s lighter, but beyond that, a folded scrap of paper. He’d gotten it out of the folder Giles had handed him before he’d boarded the train in London. The folder had everything; a copy of his school records (decent marks, piss-poor attendance), known health concerns (none, unless you counted the occasional bouts of insomnia, but all of his doctors agreed that was self-imposed, the bastards), past records with authority (nothing official, thanks to Dad, just a few ‘disagreements’ here and there), his timetable, instructions for meal times and extracurriculars, and of course, his enrolment papers and a letter from the Headmistress welcoming him to Hawkings. No map though, go figure.

One of the papers had the dorm’s address and his room number, along with the initials of his supposed roommates; S. Black, P. Pettigrew, and J. Potter .

“Room 4A,” Remus said, re-reading the bit that explained how students could earn and lose House privileges. The phone, the telly, afters—it was like a bloody prison. They’d probably revoke shower rights too if they didn’t think teenage boys would just stop bathing all together.

A little stunned that Lily had gone longer than thirty seconds without saying anything, Remus looked up from the paper to find a very queer look on the ginger girl’s face; like she was trying to serve tea to guests with a pin stabbing into the bottom of her foot.

“Lily?”

“Yes? Oh, your room. Well—er… you said 4A, so that’ll be the fourth floor, last door on your right. The stairs are just down that hallway. You’ve got your key, yeah?”

Remus felt for his other pocket. “Yeah.”

“Brilliant, well I actually better be off now. Gotta make sure the kiddies didn’t ruin poor Sev. It was so nice to meet you, Remus!”

Lily turned and walked very quickly out the front door of the dorm, her school shoes squeaking loudly as she went. Only slightly bewildered, Remus hefted up his trunk and headed for the stairs. It was a little discouraging to find out his room was up four flights of stairs, but perhaps that just meant more privacy. Or at least as much privacy that could be had while sharing a room with three other blokes. He still had ill memories from the last live-in school, where his cigarettes always went missing, along with his socks and the postage stamps Giles sent him to write to Lyall. Not that he'd ever missed those much.

The top of the stairs emptied out between dorms '4E' and '4F', meaning that his room would be on the end just as Lily had said. Remus walked down the hall, which was trimmed with fancy yellow lights, gold and maroon wallpaper, and a carpet that was certainly more pristine than it should've been in a boys dorm. Each room had its own door plate with a room number and beside it, four other plaques detailing its inhabitants' names.

Standing outside dorm '4A', Remus was more than disgruntled to read 'R. J. Lupin' on the wall. It felt silly, but now he knew for sure that the other three knew he was coming. How long had they been discussing him? Been staring at his delivered luggage and wondering who was going to walk through the door? And now he was walking through the door late.

Wanting rather to rip off the bandage than stew in the hallway where anyone could pop out of a doorway and see him, Remus reached for his key and opened the door. Inside, he was immediately met with the strong scent of spices. Despite the assault to his nose, Remus' stomach rumbled. He hadn't had breakfast.

"That you, Black? You better have not bollixed it all up."

As Remus stood on the threshold a handsome boy came around another doorway, cleaning a pair of round-rimmed glasses on the front of his shirt. He stopped and put the glasses on, eyes widening. "Oh, you must be—"

"You're huge!"

Remus' head snapped to his right where he found another boy he'd scarcely had time to notice sitting on a four-poster with a spoon of dripping, orange curry halfway to his lips.

"Pete, what happened to 'hello'?"

The boy called Pete puckered, before shoving his spoon into his mouth. Giving Remus a tight smile, the other turned and ushered him further into the room.

“Sorry about that. Don’t think he meant you were huge, huge, just you know—tall.”

"I get it," Remus said, letting the heavy door fall shut behind him.

“We were wondering when you were going to show up,” the boy confessed. He had warm brown skin and matching eyes, and his hair seemed to stand up in every direction like he’d spent his childhood sticking forks into wall sockets, whereas Pete was more slight and fair-haired, with blue eyes the colour of the sky after it rained.

“Mix-up with arrival,” Remus muttered.

He nodded, as if it happened all the time. “Well, I’m James, and that’s Peter.”

Peter waved his hand in the air.

“Remus Lupin.”

“Right,” James nodded. He was flexing his hand like he wasn’t sure if they should shake or not, but seemed to decide against it. “Well, that’s your bed over there.” He pointed to the empty bed closest to the doorway he’d just come out of. “Normally we give Pete the bed closest to the bathroom, but figured we’d be gracious since you’re new and all.”

“S'not my fault all liquid goes right through me,” Peter said, clearly put out.

“Maybe try a few less fizzy drinks right before bed then.”

“Doesn’t matter to me what bed,” Remus said, and Peter leapt up from his current spot on the corner bed.

“Brilliant! Trade ya then!” Peter rushed over to the other bed and sat down, still carrying his lunch. Remus watched him before glancing at the bed Peter had been sitting on and tossing his case on top.

“Rest of your stuff is there,” James said, pointing behind him to the stack of cases next to Peter’s new bed. “So… where are you from?”

“London,” Remus said, his back to James as he let his fingers trail over the case’s edge.

“Us too! Do you play any football? Got a favourite team?”

Remus’ hands paused on the sides of the trunk. That was by far one of his least favourite questions, mostly because he didn’t have an answer. Lee and Doss talked plenty about football back home but he’d never paid enough attention. Tomny didn’t care much for sports (it was one of the things Remus loved best about him) but no one ragged on him for it. Lee had a favourite team though, it was…

“Southampton?”

“Oh yeah?” James asked, leaning against one of Remus’ bedposts. “They’re quite good. Channon was the league’s top scorer last year. My dad thinks they’re in the running for the Cup this time around.”

Remus nodded along. “That right…”

“So you play? I’m a forward.”

“James is captain of the school team this year!” Peter added, making James smile bashfully.

“We’re having try-outs soon. You should come out! I bet you’d be great with those legs.”

Remus flexed his hands at his sides stiffly. “Well, no I—”

The bedroom door burst open, nearly taking out poor James who fell back a few paces as another body flew into the room.

“JAMES!”

“Bloody—what?!”

The other boy, slightly shorter and outfitted with a full-head of raven-black hair, stepped over the threshold teeming with enough energy to kill a jackrabbit. He reached for James with one hand, the other crossed over his chest as he bent forward and laughed.

“Those gits—those stupid bloody tossers! You should’a seen them, the way they—”

Remus, still standing tall over his traded bed and trunk, fell eerily still when those grey eyes found him. The face they belonged to went quiet instantly as the boy dropped his arm to his side, losing his eager smile after realising that his friends were not alone. He pressed full lips into a thin line and arched a single perfect eyebrow, looking him up and down. There was only one word to describe a person like this; pretty . Pretty in that damned, un-trying, but knowing, sort of way. He was wearing a uniform, or half of one, with his dress shirt tucked in on only one side, his tie pulled loose around his neck. He had a gold hoop in his right ear that Remus only noticed because his long hair was tucked up behind it with a pencil as though he'd forgotten about it. This boy was the kind of person who could draw anyone to them like a magnet; people would hang off their every word and fall over themselves for even the slightest bit of attention. Remus had only witnessed it a few times himself—Tomny had had some pretty girlfriends—but every time he'd tried to understand the way Tomny had looked at them he'd only grow more and more envious. Pretty people were the worst, but damned if they weren't the best to look at.

The boy kept looking Remus up and down like he was taking stock, then clicked his tongue like he'd found his answer.

"Well fuck me," the pretty one said, bitterly.

Remus blinked, but before he could react James dropped a heavy hand down on his friend's shoulder, nearly tugging him to the floor.

"Sirius," he offered, "meet Remus."

Chapter End Notes

> And we now have all four Marauders together—though it'll be a while before anyone is calling them that :')
>
> Year 11 is the UK equivalent of grade 10 respectively. The kids will be aged 15-16 this year, 16-17 in Year 12, and 17-18 in Year 13.

Chapter 5: Warm Welcome

Chapter Summary

Thus begins a very stilted first day in the dorm of 4A. Remus is a bit of a home-sick sop in this one.

Chapter Notes

CW: Smoking and the 'f' slur used in a smoking context.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Maybe I'll be there to shake your hand,
Maybe I'll be there to share the land;
That they'll be givin' away,
When we all live together, we're talkin' 'bout together, now…

- "Share the Land" The Guess Who, 1970

Sirius Black, did in fact, know who he was. Or rather, Remus got the feeling that he knew a lot more about him than just what could be pried out of the 'R. Lupin' plaque outside the door. James, seemingly the eternal gentleman, had swooped in easily to introduce the both of them, but Sirius just looked Remus up and down with tight eyes and nodded his head. It was the same look you got walking around the East End on your own; it said, 'I see you, and if you try anything I'll gut ya', only on Sirius, with his swooping black hair, untucked dress shirt, and shined shoes, Remus saw more of a conceited prince than a scrappy alley-boy.

"Don't normally get new kids in year eleven," Sirius said, like an observation. He seemed to end every sentence with a brow-raise. It made Remus think of the stuffy ministers that visited the Estate all the time on business with his father.

"So I've heard," Remus answered. He stepped back and gave the boys an open stance with his shoulders back—the way Tomny used to do when he and the group used to stare down trouble. It was a display of dominance, but it had always worked for Tomny. To Remus' surprise, a corner of Sirius' mouth quirked up, though he still hadn't moved any further into the room. James kept his eyebrows knitted together in the centre of his forehead while Peter fit his spoon back into his mouth.

“Where you from?” Sirius asked.

“He’s from London,” James supplied for him.

“London,” Sirius said without much enthusiasm. “Champion. Three out of four now. Must feel so lucky.”

So not him, Remus thought. He didn’t have the vibe of it anyway. Remus had known Sirius Black for less than two minutes, and already he was already pretty sure he’d placed him. Most likely old money with familial pride, maybe even a distant cousin to the crown a few times removed. That’s what schools like Hawkings were filled with, right?

You see people, Tomny’s voice echoed in his head. It made him want to ring the older boy by phone or by the neck; both of which were equally as unrealistic when Remus considered the fact that he was hours from London and Tomny didn’t have a telephone.

“And you?” He asked, drumming his fingers across the top of his trunk. “Where’s your family from?”

Sirius dropped his smirk, and Remus saw a tendon in his neck flex. James, sensing the sudden mood shift in his friend, grabbed Sirius by the shoulder and nudged him gently. “C’mon, Sirius, tell me what happened with Reg and his lot.”

“Yeah…” Sirius started, still staring at Remus.

“We’ll leave you to get settled in, Remus,” James said, helpfully. “You coming Pete?”

Peter scrambled up off of his bed, setting the empty bowl of curry aside. “Coming!”

James turned his friend toward the door, and Sirius shoved his hands into his trouser pockets, tossing his dark locks out of his eyes with the flip of his head. “Pleased to meet you, Remus,” James called, opening the door and walking out with Sirius ahead of him.

Peter reached for the door handle after the two boys and smiled. “Feel free to just shove my stuff aside, Remus. I’ll trade you bed covers later. See you!”

Remus waved goodbye to be polite before the door shut with a heavy click and he was finally left alone. The room itself was spacious enough and made up of a large rectangular shape with four dark walls and hardwood floor. The beds were set up across from each other in a square, with red rugs spanning the aisles between. The bathroom was decent too, with all white fixings and clean tile, though the only two windows in the entire space were on the far wall, away from his and Peter's beds.

The room itself was already scattered with various things belonging to the boys; a robe on the floor, new textbooks left in piles, trainers thrown haphazardly under the beds, pens and paper scattered about on side tables. It wasn't complete chaos, just the kind of organised mess that came with move-ins; the little upset that happened before everything found its place. One of the boys had already hung up a few football posters between the posts of his bed. Remus only vaguely recognised the name 'Arsenal Club', but the fit man displayed on the poster, caught mid-kick with a football, was completely unknown to him. He guessed the bed was James', which meant the other had to belong to Sirius.

Deciding that it was best to stake his claim before he completely lost out to his new roommates, Remus tugged his trunks (both generously labelled, 'R. J. Lupin' in gold embossing) over to his bed in the corner and began replacing them with Peter's things. Luckily it seemed as though the other boy hadn't much interest in unpacking, as the only things pulled out of his trunks were a pair of (hopefully clean) socks, a school timetable, an old bomber jacket that even Remus had to admit looked pretty wicked, and a half-eaten bag of crisps.

Tossing all of this into Peter's opened trunk, Remus dragged it and the others back across the room. The third one was particularly heavy, and he briefly found himself wondering if Peter had a rock collection he'd yet to unpack and put on display.

When the trunks were all righted, Remus crossed the room to the nearest open window and flipped the latch, sliding it upwards. The window didn't stick like the last dorm he'd been in, but that room hadn't been even half the size of this one, and its windows had only stuck because they weren't supposed to open. Not that that kept the boys from prying the glued edges up for a quick fag or an easy escape.

Remus stuck a cigarette between his teeth and lit it, feeling the smoke fill his lungs as he finally got his first moment of peace since leaving London. The room faced the dorm's front lawn and drive and as he smoked he got more than an eyeful of a couple who were sitting on the grass next to one of the stone griffins. He watched innocently enough until their affectionate cuddling turned more serious and he had to turn the other shoulder to avoid staring right at them, opting to glue his eyes on the trees across the road. When he'd smoked the tab down to ash, he reached around to the edge of the window and tapped it out lightly on the building's brick before going to the bathroom to flush the evidence. A quick glance in the bathroom mirror afterwards told him that he'd been walking around the entire day with half his hair pressed completely flat to his skull. It was probably a side-effect of those few hours he'd managed to sleep on the train.

Wetting his hair lightly, Remus combed his fingers through his tan curls before sighing. All he could think about was the textbooks he'd had all summer but hadn't touched, or the brand new pair of Oxfords that would surely be a bitch to break-in, or the fact that he'd have to stand next to James or Sirius' bed every time he had a cig or a breather. The only real clothes he had were a sporting grey and cardinal red uniform (Godric's 'House colour', meant to 'promote school and House pride while connecting students across years and levels in an uplifting show of fellowship'). According to school regulations he was to keep his trousers pressed and his marks up, and if not his father would hear of it. The new reality was that he'd traded dingy London street corners and old men who acted more like mothers than chauffeurs for arithmetic and curfews, and unless he found a way to get himself out of it he was going to spend the next ten months well and truly sorry. But for now at least, feeling sorry for himself was about all Remus could do.

Bending over the sink again, he splashed water over his face, wincing at the cold before pushing his hands back over his head and squeezing tightly on his neck. Maybe, he thought sarcastically, if he pinched hard enough he'd wake up in Tomny's flat to find it was all a bad dream.

In the end, all Remus ended up with was a bruise.

* * *

The other boys returned the same way Sirius had appeared; quickly and with much enthusiasm. It was nearly half past six when they did, each of them with their shirts rolled up to their elbows and grass stains on their trousers like they'd been tossing about in a field. Remus sat up quickly on his bed when the door was thrown open, trying to make himself appear busy by fiddling with the papers he'd left on his bedside table.

"Pete, mate, you gotta take your dishes out," James said. "It smells like my mum's undhiyu in here."

"I'll do it," Peter promised, walking in with a tray between both hands. He smiled when he saw Remus, and turned toward him. "Hi ya Remus, brought you some dinner."

"We thought you might be hungry," James said, kindly, walking backward to his bed. It was indeed the one covered in football posters. Sirius entered last, his hair tousled like the rest of them with a smug and contented smile on his face.

"Thanks," Remus said as he swung his legs over the side of his bed and Peter set the tray down on his side table.

"No problem," Peter nodded, returning to his bed and only glancing at his stained curry bowl before scooping up a small toiletries bag and disappearing into the bathroom.

Dinner was bangers and mash with tiramisu for afters and a coke to drink. Remus gently lifted the tray up off the side table and onto his lap, digging in as the boys went about the rest of their unpacking. Seemingly already sorted himself, Sirius opted to cross to James' bed and tug one of his trunks open. Remus watched silently, popping the tab on his drink and half-wondering if Sirius was about to start folding his friend's underwear for him. The inside of the trunk was stuffed to the brim with school clothes and shoes, all of which Sirius pushed aside to uncover a large black box. He smacked its top eagerly, earning himself a metallic thrum as though it were hollow.

"Hey Pete, you got them?" Sirius called, sounding almost giddy.

Peter answered from the bathroom; "Yeah I got 'em, just hold on."

"You didn't damage any of them did you?"

"No, I didn't damage any of them."

"Good." Reaching past the metal box, Sirius pulled some sort of briefcase out of James' trunk and lifted it up and onto the top of his wardrobe hutch before returning to the trunk. "Blimey James, did you have to pack it with your football boots? Bloody reeks."

“Not my fault the thing weighs half a ton,” James said from his bed, where he was casually flipping through a football magazine. “You’re lucky I brought it back at all.”

Scoffing, Sirius lifted the box out of his friend’s trunk and spun around to his hutch again. As he did, Remus caught sight of several dials and knobs and finally caught on. Unable to help himself, he swallowed his mouthful of mash and called out to him; “That a stereo?”

Sirius stopped halfway to his bed, holding the hi-fi to his chest and staring at Remus as though he’d completely forgotten he was there. “Yeah,” he answered tonelessly, before turning his back and placing the stereo onto the hutch along with the small case, which turned out to be a turntable he’d outfit as a small trunk. There was some rustling, and then Sirius began sorting out several wires, connecting the hi-fi’s speakers to the turner and looping each chord behind the hutch to the wall outlet.

“You’re going to start a fire one day,” James commented, pushing his bed curtains aside so Sirius could plug-in.

“We’ll blame it on the ancient bedside lamps,” Sirius quipped. “You got the posters?”

“Yup.” Tossing the sports rag aside, James slipped off of his bed and reached into the pocket on the roof of his trunk, pulling out several sheets of folded paper. Most were dingy—stained yellow on the back and tattered at the corners like they’d been torn down and tacked up again countless times—but Sirius just took them and sorted through, biting his bottom lip over a grin. Tucking most of them under one arm, he dropped open the biggest one, revealing the black and white image of Mick Jagger wailing into a microphone.

“Missed ya, Mick,” Sirius sighed wistfully.

“Just snog him why don’t you,” Peter said, emerging from the bathroom.

Sirius dropped the top of the poster down to fold in half. “You’d like that wouldn’t you Pete? Sorry to say you gotta pay for the full show.”

Peter snorted good-naturedly and reached for his trunks, tipping the heaviest onto its side and cracking it open. “Come get ‘em then, Black,” he called, and setting the posters aside, Sirius streaked over to his corner and began digging through the trunk.

Remus stared in his curiosity, before his eyes slid to James, who was also watching with a small smile. Catching his eye, James winked before lifting up his leg and resting his chin on his knee. A little unnerved, Remus looked back to their other roommates and then, before his very eyes, Sirius began pulling out album after album after album. He dragged an entire collection out of Pete's trunk—just a whole stack of records, right there in the open, some so clean they might as well have been straight out of the wrappings. It was none of the drab violin melodies or doo-wap that had been down in the common room, but bands like The Animals, Pink Floyd, The Sweet, Led Zeppelin, some Remus hadn't heard of. Sirius was almost vibrating with glee, and this time he took Peter's advice—planting huge smooches right over albums like Transformer and Physical Graffiti.

"An addict with his fix," James observed and Sirius fanned himself with another LP.

"It's ecstasy for the soul, Potter."

Remus was almost gnawing on his fork out of jealousy by the time Peter caught him staring. He sauntered over, quite content to let Sirius have free-reign of his trunk, and sat on the foot of Remus' bed as though they'd known each other for years.

"They always do bangers and mash every Tuesday," Peter said, gesturing to Remus' dinner. Casually, Remus sat up a little straighter in bed, jutting his chin toward Sirius and speaking quietly so only Peter would hear.

"Didn't think they'd let you have a set up in the rooms."

"Oh we're not supposed to, but no one snitches on us. Last one who did got every pair of knickers displayed on the school's flag post."

Remus raised a brow. "You strung some bloke's underwear up a flag post?"

"Yeah. It's all good fun, but most of the lads like Sirius' music anyway, and he really only plays it loud the first week."

"Why just the first week?"

"Stop gossiping back there, you jessies," Sirius called. He'd carried a fat stack of albums over to his bed and was now taking stock. Peter shot Sirius a rude gesture and turned back to Remus.

“Between you and me, it’s pretty intolerable, but just put up with it for a few days and things’ll level out.”

“Put up with w—”

Suddenly the room was filled with an immense scream of reverb as Sirius’ hi-fi began belting out a fervid guitar riff. The music was loud enough to have raddled every door from Brick Lane to Whitechapel. Peter clapped his hands over his ears and James leapt about a foot off his bed, but Sirius only grinned as he dropped his head back toward the ceiling as the the lead singer screamed;

'1—2—3—4!'

Raising his arms like he was holding a guitar, Sirius air-strummed along to every note in the opening riff.

“WELCOME TO HAWKINGS!” Peter shouted, as symbols crashed and Slade began what had to have been their loudest in-dorm performance ever.

'I don’t want to drink my whisky like you do,
I don’t need to spend my money but still do,
Don’t stop now a c'mon—
Another drop now c'mon—
I wanna lot now so c’mon—
That’s right, that’s right!
I said Mama but we’re all crazy now!'

Still half-stunned, stuck between appreciating the song—it's Slade! It's bloody Slade in our bedroom—and horrified by its volume, Remus looked down to find that he’d up-ended his tiramisu across his dinner tray.

Chapter End Notes

> Undhiyu is a vegetable dish from the region of Gujarat, India. 'Hi-fi' is just another term for a stereo.
>
> The albums mentioned are Lou Reed's 'Transformers' (1972) and Led Zeppelin's 'Physical Graffiti' (1975). The song at the end is Slade's "Mama Weer All Crazee Now" (1972).

Chapter 6: Day One

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Life's the same and it always will be;
Hey! Hey! Hey!
Easy picking foxes from a tree;
Hey! Hey! Hey!
I can't get no satisfaction,
All I want is easy action, baby!

- "Solid Gold Easy Action" T. Rex, 1972

Wednesday 3rd September 1975

Remus fell asleep to the Doors and woke up to T. Rex. The record player had barely stopped spinning since it had been unpacked the night before and it seemed as though Sirius was determined to play every single album he'd pulled out of Peter's trunk before he was satisfied. It might've been nice, had Sirius known there was a different level of volume other than LOUD.

More surprisingly, James and Peter didn't seem to mind. Remus had figured that after the third replay of In Rock one of the boys would've cracked; but nothing. They all went about their evening like there wasn't a rock concert in the centre of their bedroom. They showered, cleared out their dishes (or rather, Peter did), and continued shovelling books and clothes away into their respective homes before climbing into bed. It was as though not acknowledging the music was the key, but Remus was so bewildered by the whole thing that for the first several hours he'd actually forgotten to be angry about it. Sirius did have good taste—even if his affinity for Bowie had started to make Ziggy Stardust and Aladdin Sane feel like a fifth and sixth roommate.

The music had plunged on and on even as the summer sun dropped below the trees outside their window and disappeared. Remus mostly kept to himself on his bed, fiddling with his history text and letting his head bob along to the songs that he knew. Sirius never so much as spared him a glance when he knew Remus was watching, but more than once he'd had caught the other boy peeking over the tops of his knees as he laid back in bed. Each time their eyes met Sirius would turn away sharply, and usually the next song that played would be slightly louder than the last.

To his credit Sirius did turn the hi-fi down a few notches just before ten. The boys had all changed and washed by then, Remus making sure to take his turn during a particularly rough acoustic pop-rock number just so he could put a closed door between himself and the music. When he'd emerged from the bathroom, wearing his standard-issue Hawkings night pants and a grey t-shirt, James was putting in ear plugs. He caught Remus staring and flashed a sorry smile, before twisting away to reach for something on his nightstand. Looking back, James mouthed 'catch' over the music and tossed him his own pair of rubber ear plugs before flashing a thumbs up, taking off his glasses and clicking off his bedside lamp.

Making his way back to his own bed, Remus glanced at Sirius who was still in his day clothes, laying half-on and half-off his bed as he sang along to the album. He was off, lost in the song the way music could do to you. Peter padded past in his pyjamas to get the lights, sandy hair still damp from the shower, wearing winter earmuffs to block the noise. "Night, Remus," Remus thought he said, before the light was gone and the dorm was left in noisy darkness.

The earplugs didn't stifle all of the noise, but they were better than nothing. Remus had always considered himself to be a bit of a night owl, but after spending a night out with Tomny and the rest and the following on a cross-country train, he was ruined. Tomorrow he'd be expected to wake up and attend his first day of lessons, which meant uniforms and timetables and professors he'd have chewed up for a midday snack not six months prior. Just as he'd resigned himself to get up and toss the bloody stereo out the window—he couldn't listen to another round of Slayed? again, he couldn't—the record clicked off, and the dorm finally fell into a staggered silence. Remus squinted up at the top of his bed's roofing, waiting for the creaking sound of floorboards that signalled Sirius' changing—or even worse, replaying—of the album, but nothing came. Sirius had fallen asleep, still in his clothes, just after 2AM.

He'd been foolish enough to take the ear plugs out after that, which left him shooting up in bed at 7AM to the sound of T. Rex shouting 'HEY! HEY! HEY!' across their dorm room. A record was spinning on the turntable but Sirius' bed was empty and James was already dressed, sorting through a bag of football equipment while Peter remained little more than a lump beneath his covers. Remus groaned and rubbed his eyes, which burned from that familiar lack of sleep. Irritated because—damn it, he liked this song—he snatched up his pillow and tossed it at James' feet, making the boy jump and look up.

"WHERE IS HE?" Remus shouted, over the noise.

"BATHROOM!"

He wasn't even in the room to listen and still he tortured them?

Tossing back his covers and crossing the room, Remus lifted the needle from the spinning record and instantly the blaring rock music was cut off.

Peter sat up from his bed, rubbing his eyes, ear muffs askew. "Is it over?"

"Yeah," Remus said, "it's bloody over."

James gave Remus an uneasy look, which he ignored, but Peter only beamed. "It's a new record."

He might've asked what he meant, if the bathroom door hadn't opened revealing Sirius, hair combed and all done up in his full Hawkings' uniform. He stalked out and stopped right in front of Remus, staring him down with those grey eyes. Sirius was shorter, obviously, but Remus got the distinct impression that his height wasn't much of a deterring factor. Sirius was like a panther—or maybe a cobra; taunt and ready to strike. Remus thought he might do it too, and prepared to knock him back if the other boy decided this would be more than just a stare-down. But Sirius didn't hit him. Instead he only looked from Remus' face to the record player, to his four-poster.

"That's my bed," Sirius said, his eyes falling back to Remus.

Remus glanced back briefly without moving his head. "Yeah."

"You're in the way."

"Sorry," Remus shrugged, not moving.

Sirius' long mouth lifted, but it wasn't a smile. "Then move."

Remus pressed his tongue to the inside of his cheek, before relenting. He was too knackered to have a go at him, even if Sirius deserved it. He stepped aside and Sirius stalked past. He went to the player, but mercifully turned the hi-fi off rather than reset the needle.

The tense mood was broken by James, who clapped his hands together while grinning like a maniac, probably just relieved that none of them had started throwing fists on their first morning together.

“So, breakfast?” He asked, as a plug fell out of his ear.

* * *

Remus walked to the dining hall next to Peter, a good distance away from James and Sirius, who were whispering furiously back and forth. A trolley existed to shuttle students to breakfast and back again before lessons, but it ran on a set schedule and by the time Peter had found his dress pants at the bottom of one of his trunks they were running late. The walk wasn’t bad; they followed a path that cut through the small crop of trees separating the street of upper-secondary dorms from the rest of the campus, probably created after countless years of students coming and going long before their time.

Peter was chittering away about his summer—he and his family had been visiting cousins in America, and apparently New York was much more interesting than dreary old London—a conversation that continued through breakfast. Sirius made no objections when the four of them sat down together—Sirius and James on one side, Peter and Remus on the other—though Remus still had the feeling that he had yet to say everything he’d wanted to.

Well, tough, Remus thought. I didn’t want to be here either. It really was just his luck to get stuck in a room with a git more wound up than Tomny after a bad trip. No one had bothered them over the noise just as Peter had said, though Remus was pretty sure there wasn’t a corner of the whole dorm where you weren’t able to hear the music.

The boys compared timetables over breakfast with the dull roar of the endless dining hall behind them. Peter was disappointed to find out he did not have forms and registration with James, but it was only the first day of lessons anyway, so forms were passed up in favour of letting students settle into their new schedules, giving them an extra hour for breakfast. Hawkings’ kept to their own sort of timetable, Remus was realizing. Five periods a day instead of the usual six, thanks to forms or Tuesday and Thursday’s Holy Communion taking up the first hour of each morning.

As they were eating, Peter leaned over to get an eyeful of Remus' schedule. "Who you got for forms, Remus?"

"Buchanan," Remus said over a mouthful of porridge.

"Oh, same as Sirius."

Both boys made eye contact from across the table. Sirius looked as though he might snap his spoon in half. Remus felt similar. Luckily, before their second staring contest of the day could come to a head, a voice chimed next to their table.

"Alright, boys?"

Remus looked up to find a pretty girl standing next to him. She was looking at Sirius, but as Remus leaned back her dark eyes shifted to him and she smiled a little, reaching up to finger one of her tight, black curls.

"Alright, Macdonald," Sirius said, brazenly. He was smirking, a thumb to his mouth as he looked her up and down. All sense of animosity for Remus was gone.

"It's Mary Macdonald to you, Sirius Black," she warned, looking however pleased. "I see the brotherhood has reformed."

"You know it." James clapped a hand on Sirius' back while Mary crossed her arms.

"Good summers, then?"

"Pete went to Florida," Sirius offered, pointing at his friend with his spoon.

"New York."

"Brilliant," she surmised. "And yourself, Black?"

"Robbed a bank. Just the usual, really."

She giggled quite hard, but Remus didn't really think the joke was that funny.

"So... heard from Evans much this summer, Macdonald?" James asked, in what was probably meant to be an innocent voice. It earned him a stern wave of the finger and even a 'tsk'.

“Nice try, Potter, but you know Lily’s not interested.”

James instantly deflated, while Sirius clasped him over the shoulder loyally. “Aw, don’t you think this game is getting a bit old, Macdonald?” He cooed. “I mean, whatever you gals think Potter did, it really couldn’t have been that bad, could it?”

“Lily disagrees.”

James threw his hands out. “Well, if she’d just tell me—”

“Shouldn’t have to. Just because you’re a bloke doesn’t mean you have a pass on being thick.”

“Aw, come on, Macdonald!”

”Yeah, you’re breaking the poor man’s heart,” Peter added. “You’d think Evans would’ve cooled off by now.”

“Yeah!” James exclaimed. “It’s been a whole summer. What could we have—”

Mary silenced James with a simple wave of her hand. “My lips are sealed.”

After locking the corner of her mouth with an imaginary key, she turned to Remus, who had been mostly picking at his breakfast while keeping to himself.

“You’re new,” Mary said. “I would know you, if you weren’t.”

“You mean you’d have snogged him already,” Sirius sniggered. Mary pinched him for it.

“Ow!”

“Nose out, Black.”

Remus lifted his cup of orange juice to his lips. “Yeah, I’m new.”

“Fun.” She leaned one hip onto the edge of the cafeteria table. “Feels like we never get new kids anymore.”

“Yeah, he knows,” Sirius drawled, locking eyes with Remus again. Across from them, Mary sighed.

“Well—gotta have something interesting pop up once in a while. You four are getting horribly boring."

"Liar. You love us."

"I love Peter," she corrected, blowing Peter a kiss that turned his face into a cherry tomato. "Potter here is on the outs by default—sorry, love—and you, Black, are officially on my 'do not—"

"Mary!"

They all craned their necks to find a group of girls, Lily and two blondes, waving Mary over. Lily looked furious, but when her eyes found Remus she softened and flashed a sympathetic smile and a little wave.

"My ladies await," Mary said. Then she turned to Remus and grinned. "Bye, new boy."

After ensuring that he was suitably uncomfortable, Mary turned and flounced off to join her friends. Ready gossips, the three girls quickly gathered round her to whisper, shooting the occasional glance toward their table, before promptly leaving the hall arm in arm.

"Jesus. I can't believe you're still on Evans' black-list," Sirius said to James, who looked crestfallen as he stabbed his fork into a bowl of mixed fruit.

"I tried talking to her during move-in, but she just ignored me and went off with the other prefects. Hell, how am I supposed to apologise for whatever it is I did if she won't even talk to me?"

Like a scorned bachelor, Peter sighed; "Women."

Sirius swallowed a mouthful of toast and clapped James on the back for the second time that morning. "Chin-up, mate. She's just playing hard to get."

Peter raised his mug. "Since when did 'playing hard to get' mean the same thing as 'hating your guts'?"

Without pretense, Sirius delivered a sharp kick under the table and Peter spluttered, spraying his face with orange juice. James instantly began to laugh, which made Sirius snort too—and soon enough they were all laughing, even Peter.

Head down, Remus finished his porridge.

* * *

No forms first thing meant period one began at nine-thirty. As students starting year eleven they'd be expected to complete several exams at the end of the year, making forms invaluable study time. Not that it mattered much to Remus. Somewhere between listening to Peter go on about how the Statue of Liberty "really wasn't all that tall" and making his way to his period one class—Geography—he had steeled himself that he was not going to last longer than Halloween.

Plotting an escape kept his mind busy at least. Maybe he could just make a run for it in the middle of the night and find a way to hail a car, or else tell Giles he'd been kidnapped by his driver. It didn't matter if he left behind his things, let the others have them. All that was needed was his mother's trunk and a train ticket back to London. Selling his stash of Embassys might garner him enough cash, but how long would that take? The only people Remus knew were Lily and his barmy roommates. He supposed he could just walk off into the woods —there were plenty of that around Hawkings—but that was probably just the cynic in him talking.

Peter did not have Geography, and instead was taking supplementary maths courses—his worst subject, supposedly. This left Remus with no choice but to follow James and Sirius to first period, his leather rucksack banging into his knees broodingly. It was still summer outside, which meant he was sweating under his collar again. The whole Hawkings uniform felt unbearably stuffy, but because it was the first day everyone was dressed in formal wear as per regulation. Sirius, of course, looked every bit the gentleman in his school jacket and grey slacks. Remus hadn't seen anyone else with hair as long as his, but he supposed that was just another rule Sirius bloody Black was immune to.

James looked good in his uniform as well, with the shoulders of an athlete and legs to match. Remus tried not to stare, but it was hard when he insisted on lagging behind. The handsome pair could've been on the cover of Popswap, what with their spiffing collars and silver cufflinks. James had indicated with his head more than once for Remus to catch-up and join, but he'd stayed back, content with following rather than swap glares with Sirius. Besides, from this angle Remus was able to pretend that his uniform fit him in the same way it did them, rather than falling short at the wrists and ankles by several inches. Clearly whoever had put in the order for his school clothes hadn't taken in account his summer growth spurt.

"Remus!"

He'd barely made it into the door of the geography classroom before Lily appeared at his elbow.

"You've got Geography first too?" She asked hopefully.

"Er—yeah," Remus answered, feeling gangly and awkward in the doorway. Meanwhile Sirius had already strode to the back of the class, dropping his bag on an empty desk with a dramatic flourish. James though, had stilled when Lily called out Remus' name. Clearly stunned, he'd spun around to stare at them while Lily pretended not to notice. The obvious exchange made Remus feel instantly guilty, despite not having done anything wrong.

"Sit with me?" Lily offered. "Professor Durrin doesn't assign seats."

Remus glanced dubiously between the two, wishing for a way out that didn't involve him choosing. Across the classroom, Sirius was watching like he'd just discovered a new favourite primetime drama.

Finally, Remus relented.

"Sure, Lily."

Exstatic—though perhaps laying it on a bit thick—Lily took his arm and guided him down the row of desks, right past James.

"You're pretty tall, so it's probably best we don't sit at the very front," she said, as they strode toward a pair seats in the centre of the room.

Already the classroom was filling up with other students, eager to claim their spots for the term. Sirius and James ended up near the back by the windows. Remus could feel their eyes boring into the back of his skull as he pulled out his school things.

"… Shit."

"What's wrong?" Lily asked, flipping open an organizer.

"Forgot my textbooks." He'd been flipping through each while trying to drown out Sirius' music the night before, and left them in a pile at the foot of his bed.

“Oh. Well, you can always share mine.” She reached into her rucksack and pulled out her geography text, resting it on the desk between them. Then she scooted her chair closer, and Remus imagined James banging a gavel and announcing him guilty of betraying the brotherhood.

“Er… Might not need them anyway. ‘S first day and all…”

“Well, it is exams this year,” Lily said. “And Professor Durrin is a—” she leaned in, smiling; “bit of a hard-ass.”

Remus felt the corners of his mouth tug upwards. “Right.”

“I am sorry by the way,” she sighed.

“For what?”

“For you having to room with… them.” Lily avoided looking backward, only straightening up in her seat, but Remus understood. The air suddenly felt more stuffy; clearly something was going on between Lily, her friends, and the boys of 4A that he had not been privy to.

“Yeah…” Remus drawled awkwardly.

“They’re all just so—” Lily scowled before letting out a breath. “I still don’t know how Miles put up with it.”

“Miles?”

“Their roommate before you.”

Oh.

“He leave?”

Lily looked down at her agenda, tapping her pencil against its page. “Yeah, a few months shy of end of term, last year. I think he got sick, but I dunno for sure. Miles was nice though, kinda like you, Remus.”

“I’m not nice,” Remus rebuffed.

“Well, that’s an odd thing to brag about. I only meant Miles liked books and things too.” She gestured to the novel Remus had left on the corner of his desk and he grabbed it, sliding the book back into his bag pointedly.

“Don’t worry,” Lily said. “The similarities end there, I think. Miles also kept his hair combed rather than looking like an unwashed paintbrush.”

Remus fought a small smile. It was almost like getting hustled by Tomny. “You’re actually quite mean, aren’t you, Evans?”

“Only to keep people on their toes,” Lily said, smirking down at her agenda. “Anyway, don’t let them rope you into anything you don’t want to do. I know how they are.”

“Hm.” That made one of them.

Not long after that Professor Durrin appeared and launched into what he surely thought was a riveting first lesson on the environmental geography of the British Isles. Remus was kept at attention only because of the fact that Lily’s elbow would occasionally graze his—she was left-handed—making a shiver run up his shoulder.

“Remus,” Lily whispered eventually, “you’re bobbing your leg.”

“Oh.” He forced himself to stop, turning to teeth-grinding instead. Their schedule allowed for ten minutes travel time in between lessons. If Lily could direct him to his next lesson, he might have time to sneak a smoke.

Of course though, Sod’s Law always won out.

Just a few minutes shy of the end of the lesson a knock came on the classroom door, and each student sat up a little straighter as Professor Durrin poked his round face out into the hall. A moment later he reappeared and crossed back to his chalkboard.

“Remus Lupin,” he called lazily, “you’re wanted in the Headmistress’s office.”

It took another elbow (this one on purpose) from Lily to get him moving. Gingerly, he collected his things and stood up, walking past the rest of the class. Just before walking out the door, Remus glanced back to find James staring at him with the rest while Sirius balanced a pencil on his upper lip, ignoring the whole affair.

Chapter End Notes

The albums referenced in this chapter are Deep Purple's 'In Rock' (1970) and Slade's 'Slayed?' (1972).

'Sod's Law' is just the British slang equivalent for 'Murphy's Law'.

Chapter 7: Lost Causes

Chapter Summary

Remus meets the Headmistress and night two in the dorm begins.

Chapter Notes

CW: References to smoking/cigarettes.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Hey hung up old Mr. Normal,
Don't try to gain my trust;
'Cause you ain't gonna follow me any of those ways,
Although you think you must;
We're not gonna take it…

- "We're Not Gonna Take It" The Who, 1969

The secretary who'd been sent to fetch him led Remus across the grounds between the buildings, her stumpy heels slipping across the cobblestones until they'd made it to what had to be the oldest, finest building on the entire campus.

"This is Castle Hall," she said, indicating the great round drive that went right past the building's front steps and connected down to the road below. It was probably the place where the driver who'd picked him up from the train station should've dropped him off.

"The Great Hall is just behind," she added. "You'll be having all your examinations there."

Walking up Castle Hall's front steps, she held the door for Remus. Inside the floors were made of stone like an actual castle, with walls of deep wood decorated with black and white photos presumably of the campus buildings in their prime.

"The Headmistress' office is up on the third floor," the secretary said, "now you go on."

Remus resisted the urge to roll his eyes and simply nodded his head, turning to the grand staircase just ahead of him. The second and third floors of Castle Hall were much like the rest, vast hallways filled with decorative furniture that looked so delicate they'd likely disintegrate if anyone so much as sat down in one of the chairs. No one was around, it being the middle of the first day of lessons, but once he'd made it to the third floor Remus was able to see out across the front berm where students were trickling out of their respective school buildings, each heading to their next lesson of the day.

Luckily, the hall was easier to navigate than the rest of Hawkings, and he found the Headmistress' office easily, thanks to the decorative plaque that read; Headmistress Minerva McGonagall, O.M. First Class. The front of the door was carved in the image of a golden lion paused mid-roar with a single decorative knocker inset above the lion's head. Remus gripped the knocker and banged it hard.

"Come in," a voice called, and he turned the door handle, walking inside. He stepped into a vast sitting area with vaulted ceilings and rich burgundy wallpaper. A fire was burning in the fireplace grate, making him instantly too warm, and the room was made up with a velvet sofa and a few scattered arm chairs all decorated with the rich maroon patterning of Hawkings' colours. Luxurious paintings hung on every wall and a statue of a grey tabby cat sat on the fireplace's mantle, staring at him with yellow eyes like a watchful guardian.

Beyond the sitting area was an office filled up by a great oak desk and walls lined with books and various other items that looked like they were either very old or very rare, and in the middle of the office, sitting behind the large desk, was a stern-looking woman with a mouth drawn as thin as a pin. She had black hair streaked with grey, tied up into a severe bun on the top of her head, and wore a set of green robes that made her look more like a wizard than a teacher.

"Mr. Lupin," she said, looking up from the neat pile of papers she had in front of her, "please, come sit."

Remus had never liked being called 'Mr. Lupin', it was a title reserved for his father or scoldings, but since he suspected the incoming conversation to involve both, he approached the Headmistress' desk and sat down in one of the cushioned chairs across from her, school-bag across his lap.

Headmistress McGonagall set down the paper she had been reading, face-down, and sat back in her chair with her arms across her lap. "Hello Remus," she started, "I am Headmistress McGonagall. Firstly, I would like to welcome you to Hawkings School."

She paused, as if waiting for a reaction, and Remus nodded. Seemingly satisfied, she continued. “I’m sorry I couldn’t welcome you yesterday.”

“I was late to move-in,” Remus answered flatly. His gaze drifted upward, where a stag’s head was mounted on the wall behind her. McGonagall cleared her throat to get his attention, and Remus snapped his eyes back to her.

“Yes, your father contacted me and said that you would be arriving on the second. He also agreed that you would attend a meeting with me in my office though I regret to say though that the second was yesterday, and now it is the third, today.”

Remus ground his teeth together. No one had bothered to tell him he was supposed to meet the bloody Headmistress first thing. “Sorry,” he forced out between his teeth, “I didn’t know.”

McGonagall nodded placidly, though he had the feeling she was most definitely not satisfied. “We don’t get many new students as old as you at Hawkings. Generally it is believed by the parents and faculty that students benefit most from ongoing, structured education. It was a personal favour to your father that we enrolled you, and of course your late mother, a graduate from Hawkings.”

Remus felt his insides turn to ice. His mother?

“You can imagine our concern when you did not turn up for your meeting yesterday,” the Headmistress continued. “If you hadn’t been marked as present by your dorm monitor at last night’s evening curfew, we would’ve had to contact the authorities over your whereabouts. It’s not in the school’s best interests to lose a student.”

The icy feeling turned to a boil. Already he was on the outs, and he’d scarcely even started at the school. “Sorry,” he said again, though he didn’t mean it.

McGonagall reached for a folder she’d separated from the rest and opened it, taking a moment to read its contents. Remus had no doubt of what she'd find; five different schools since he was eleven, various incidents with the police, all worked out amicably or [off the record] under the table. There was probably something in there about Mr. Wright too, the chemistry teacher Remus had sucker-punched after he'd spent an entire period shaming another kid, Darby Williams, for his intellectual shortcomings. Remus hadn’t been particularly close to Darby, (he’d only been at the school for half of year ten and spent most of it skiving off,) but if there was anything worse than a teenage bully, it was an adult one. He'd moved before thinking, perhaps his fatalist of flaws, and sent Mr. Wright to the floor with a bloody nose. Not that the damn teacher didn't have the last laugh. Remus was expelled, and Mr. Wright got a particularly fat cheque courtesy of the Lupin Estate in exchange for his word to never speak of the incident again.

McGonagall lowered the folder and Remus looked up at her from under his brow, waiting for the rest of the lecture.

"A few of your teachers reported that you were an avid reader."

Remus blinked. "Huh?"

"You have several comments on your transcripts regarding reading," the Headmistress explained. "This teacher—Mrs. Bradshaw? She seemed to think that you were quite the bright, young boy. She mentioned that you were reading well above the level of your fellow classmates, and that your maths were decent as well."

Remus thought back. Mrs. Bradshaw had been one of his year nine teachers, but there had been two schools that year, and he couldn't remember which she'd taught at.

"Do you like to read, Remus?" Professor McGonagall asked.

"Not really." A lie.

"Hm… Well, you do know Hawkings boasts one of the best Upper-Secondary English programs in the country, yes?"

"Er—sure?"

McGonagall flicked the folder, straightening its contents. "You didn't attempt any O-Levels in your tenth year did you, Remus?"

Remus busied himself by examining his bag strap. "No."

"Well then, I suppose you'll have to work extra hard to achieve passing marks by the end of the year. In order for you to go on to A-Levels and university, at least two of your classes must be passed with an A mark, you understand."

"Mm…"

"Mr. Lupin."

Remus forced his gaze up. Across from him, Professor McGonagall had set the folder down in front of her, face-up, revealing a piece of blank paper without a single note on his record or marks despite all her ramblings. A small smile, he noticed, was playing at the corners of her thin mouth.

“Mr. Lupin,” she repeated, “I shall make myself very clear: Hawkings School does not take on lost causes. You were enrolled because of your successes, not your failures. That being said, the school has rules, and those rules must be followed. Do you understand?”

She waited until he’d nodded.

“Good. For now we’ll leave the focus on getting you caught up with your classes. Until then, you’ll be expected to attend each and every lesson, get along with your classmates, and live within the parameters of the school’s regulations. I believe they call it 'the bare minimum'. Can you do that for me?”

No, he thought.

“Yes,” he said.

“Good. I should let you know that your father has arranged a regular stipend for school things throughout the term should you need them—to be doled out at the discretion of various school representatives, of course.”

“Of course,” Remus added, sarcastically.

“You’ll be able to access it from the school’s commissary whenever you should have need of it. On that note, I believe I’ve taken up more than enough of your time for today. If you don’t have any questions, take this pass and give it to your next teacher to excuse your tardiness.”

She passed a yellow slip across the table. It had her great swirling signature at the bottom. Remus pocketed the slip and stood up, ready to be dismissed. He had just turned away from her desk when she stopped him.

“Oh, and Mr. Lupin, just one more thing. Please turn out your pockets.”

* * *

Remus returned to class with his pockets lighter and his patience severely short. He'd avoided losing Tomny's zippo due to a quick sleight of hand, but McGonagall had confiscated his cigarettes and promptly gave him a sharp warning about underage smoking. He'd have to be more careful if he didn't want to lose his entire stash to a teacher that would surely just pocket them to smoke later themselves.

Maths was next, with Peter and Sirius (poor Peter had a double-block), but the teacher Dr. Becker had assigned seats anyway. He ended up on the left side of the classroom just behind the girl from earlier, Mary, who spent the better part of the lesson making eyes at Sirius from across the room. The rest of the day passed with little interruption, apart from the fact that Remus was starting to realise he had very few lessons away from Sirius. Each time they arrived in the same room they did their best to ignore one another, and at lunch when Peter dragged him to their joint picnic table on one of the berms Remus ate with his back facing the rest of them. His leg bobbed incessantly, but he didn't have a spare moment to get all the way back to the dorms to the rest of his cigarettes without being late for another lesson.

By the time they'd finished the school day and had dinner Remus felt as though he might implode with even the weakest prodding. He took the trolley back to his room alone and, finding that the boys hadn't made it back yet, dove immediately for his mother's trunk. Just as he'd shut the thing the dorm room doors opened and the other three boys spilled in like romping puppies. Remus groaned inwardly, nearly crushing his carton of cigarettes as he shoved them beneath his pillow and threw himself down on the bed.

"Good first day, Lupin?" James asked, crossing to his own bed and sitting down.

"Good enough," he answered with a shrug, tapping his fingers on the spine of his geography text.

"My day was just fine," Peter said. "Moira sought me out." He added this bit with a cheeky glance in James' direction, and James returned the look.

"Oh yeah? Thought you guys finished that last term."

"We may have rung each other a few times over summer."

“Pete, you dog.”

Clearly unused to being the subject of gossip, Peter snickered as his cheeks turned red. A moment later, Sirius had emerged from the steaming bathroom, fully clothed with a towel around his shoulders to catch the water that was dripping off the ends of his black hair. Making his way to his bed, he pulled the towel off his neck and rubbed his head with it once more before hanging it on the peg next to one of his bed posts. Then he shook out his hair, the same way a dog might, and reached for his stack of records.

Remus was on his feet in a second. In a few quick strides he’d crossed the bedroom and smacked his hand down on top of the turntable so Sirius would be unable to lift its top.

“No,” he said sternly. "You had your fun yesterday. Other people live here too.”

Sirius looked up at Remus with big eyes, but his expression read as incredulous. “And just who do you think you are?”

“Someone who lives here.”

Sirius scoffed lightly and looked to James. “One day and he thinks he’s king of the castle.”

“Well, I’m no bloody subject,” Remus snarled.

Peter looked as though he were ready to dive for cover, and James leaned forward on his bed, clearly uncomfortable.

“What if he just plays it a little lower, Remus?”

“I’ll play it however bloody loud I want to,” Sirius griped.

“Where do you get off being such a prick?” Remus demanded. “Who are you—the bloody Queen?”

“Only if you want to call me ‘Your Majesty’.”

Bristling, Remus made to step forward but James got between them first.

“Lads, it’s just a bit of music. C’mon Sirius, now it’s only seven o'clock, we can play it in the common room.”

Sirius reeled back. “No way! This is our room, not his. We’ve lived here for four years. If he don't like it, then he can sod off."

"Well, it's technically Remus' room now too—"

"Shut your gob, Pete!"

"You must be real popular if that's how you talk to your own mates," Remus mocked.

Sirius' nostrils flared like a bull's. "And just what do you know about us mates, huh? You're just new blood."

"What the fuck you just call me?"

James threw his arms up, pushing both Remus and Sirius away by the shoulder. "That is enough! Christ, it's like dealing with a couple 'a bloody birds going at each other. If you can't get along in the same room then you're just gonna have to separate. So c'mon, Black, we're leaving."

Before Sirius could protest any further, James bent down and grabbed a fat stack of the records piled up at the foot of the bed and shoved them into his arms, turning his best friend by the shoulders and marching him straight out of the room.

"Leave the door unlocked, Pete," James said, before letting the door fall closed behind them. Just before it did, Remus heard Sirius grumble;

"You forgot Led Zeppelin."

Remus let out a sharp breath as he staggered back to his bed. The same throbbing from that morning had begun just behind his eyes and Sirius hadn't even played any music. Sitting down on the bed's edge, he squeezed his forehead with both hands.

"Glad that's over," Peter sighed. "Feel like a round of cards, Remus?"

Chapter End Notes

UK Slang/Definitions:
'Skiving off' means to skip or not attend to responsibilities.
'O-levels' are exams taken by year ten and eleven students in the UK, fully-replaced by the GCSE's in 1988.
'A-levels' are similar but more advanced, taken by year 13 students.

'Sixth form' is just another term for year 12 & 13 (also referred to as lower-sixth and upper-sixth, respectively.)

Chapter 8: Forms

Chapter Summary

First day of forms and Remus and Sirius remain at odds.

Chapter Notes

I cover a lot in this chapter. Hope it makes sense, lol.
CW: Smoking.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Heartbreaker, soul shaker,
I've been told about you;
Steamroller, midnight stroller,
What they've been saying must be true;
Red-hot mama, velvet charmer,
Time's come to pay your dues…

- "Hair of the Dog" Nazareth, 1975

Thursday morning's Holy Communion was, as expected, a very dull affair. Remus might've tried to skive off all together had James not told him they took attendance and wrote letters to the families of students who skipped out, especially if you were daring enough to do so the first week. He reasoned that if he was going to make his escape from Hawkings appear genuine—or at least moderately surprising—letting his father know that he'd been out to lunch on the second day of school probably wasn't the best course of action. So, like the rest of his roommates, Remus hauled himself out of bed at 7AM that Thursday morning to listen to the priests drone on and on with their rites and prayers.

The hymns felt awkward and Remus couldn't remember any of them from the Sunday Eucharists he'd attended as a child. The other boys had no problem of course, apart from Peter who spent most of the time trying not to nod off on his feet. James and Sirius both seemed bored, occasionally whispering to one another behind boyish smirks or thumb-wrestling in the middle of the pew, but still they chanted and sung like everyone else. It was easy to pick out Sirius' voice during the singing and the Latin bits, but then he'd caught him staring during a reading of one of the Gospels and Remus spent the last half hour with his eyes trained on his shoes.

Avoiding Sirius might've proved more difficult due to their similar school schedules had Peter and James not appointed themselves as peacekeepers. Everywhere Remus went he was head-off by Peter, who had a better nose for tracking than his father's hounds. Despite Peter's best efforts, Remus managed to shake him off between Modern Foreign Languages and lunch, after he'd snuck off to have the fastest fag of his life. He told himself it was just to keep hold of the Remus he'd been back home in London, but Tomny, the cheeky bastard, would've called it nerves. Remus might've silently agreed. He'd never really smoked much on his own before that summer, but now having a cigarette between his fingers just felt calming. It meant he could shut up for a while and tune everything out, and everyone else around was expected to do the same.

No one seemed to have told James Potter that though.

He came around the side of the Flamel Building with his book bag tucked under one arm, his glasses lopsided on his face like they usually were, looking as friendly as ever. "There you are!" He cried, as Remus fumbled to drop his cigarette and crush it under his shoe. "Armie Bell told me he'd seen you crossing here after class."

As James approached Remus hacked a cough into his closed fist. He'd been so surprised by his sudden appearance that he'd inhaled straight into his lungs, burning a hole in his esophagus and making his eyes water.

"You really missed some funny stuff in chemistry. Slughorn made a lava lamp out of a coke bottle and then Sirius—" James paused, a funny look crossing his face as his nose wrinkled. "Remus are you smoking?"

Remus coughed into his fist again and obstinately shook his head.

"You are!" James said in a mixture of light shock and awe.

"So what," he snapped, hacking a few more times, "you gonna tell?"

"No," James started, almost laughing, "Pete's brother sneaks cigarettes in all the time from the village. Other stuff too, but he won't share that."

Finally able to breathe again, Remus suddenly felt more optimistic as he pressed his hands into his pockets and thumbed Tomny's zippo.

“You smoke then?”

“A few times,” James confessed shyly, "but not really. Sirius would love to—thinks it looks cool—but Miles hated it.”

There was that name again; Miles.

“He was your roommate before.” Before me.

James nodded. “Yup. We’ve known Miles since year four.”

“And he just left?”

“Well, it was a little more complicated than that, I think.” James rubbed the back of his neck like he regretted bringing the subject up, but Remus could already feel his curiosity getting the better of him. If James was to find out one of his secrets there was no reason why he couldn’t find out one of his.

“Miles left really quickly last year,” he explained. “Just super sudden. We got a letter from him just before the end of term saying his grandparents wanted him to transfer to a school closer to home. He’s from Newcastle though so it’s not exactly easy to visit.”

“Lily said he got sick. What happened?”

James looked down at the ground, at Remus’ discarded cigarette butt. “Dunno. We didn’t even know he was ill, he never said anything. Then he left and we couldn’t even ring him. Sirius is still touchy over it so Pete and I figured it was best to… not talk about it? I dunno… Reckon he blames himself for not realising. Might blame all of us a bit—I mean we lived with him and we didn’t even notice anything was wrong.”

“It wasn’t your fault,” Remus said before he could stop himself. James looked up hopefully, like he’d been waiting to hear those same words for a while, and Remus didn't have the heart to take them back.

“It’s not your fault he got sick,” he repeated as a lump rose in his throat. “People just get sick sometimes. It’s life.”

James gave him a doleful smile. “I guess so. Life’s a real bitch.”

"And then you die." Matching his expression, Remus drew his hands out of his pockets. As he did, Tomny’s lighter fell to the ground with a clink and he froze up, but James only raised an eyebrow at him before leaning down to pick it up.

“C’mon,” he said, passing the zippo back very casually, “it’s lunch now and I’m starving. It’s just us too. Pete’s eating with his sister and Sirius has detention.”

Remus pocketed the lighter quickly and scooped up his book bag before he paused, its strap half-way over his head. “It’s the second day.”

James just smirked back at him. “Never underestimate a Black.”

* * *

Lunch with James was fine, even if he had tried to convince Remus to try out for football.

“I’m team captain this year since Dennis graduated,” he’d explained over a mouthful of sandwich, “so we could practice whenever we wanted! Try-outs are on the twelfth. You’re so tall I bet you’d just fly across the field.”

Remus danced around the subject with about as much grace as a three-legged giraffe until the school bell mercifully rang. He’d expected that to put James’ lecture about try-outs and team stats to rest, but they both had PE next—the only classes at Hawkings that were divided by gender—with Sirius and Peter. They all met up outside Hawkings’ large gym before heading inside to change into their gym kits (Remus was grateful for the private stalls, his last school had boys strip in one big changing room). Afterwards their gym teacher, Ms. Hooch, ordered them on a perimeter run of the school grounds, including the lake.

“There’s a lake?” Remus asked James, who had immediately started stretching out his muscles.

“Yeah, where do you think the rowing team practices?”

Remus groaned inwardly.

After dinner they retired to their dorm room—or more accurately, James, Sirius, and Peter retired while Remus camped out in the common room by himself with a book until he was sleepy enough to drag his sorry arse back up to bed. The next morning went much like the last, and apart from the very unnatural state of noise they always woke up to, he was beginning to sense that everyone at Hawkings operated at a very particular pace. After breakfast Lily successfully intercepted him on his way to forms, only slightly disappointed that they were not heading in the same direction. Her forms teacher was a Classics professor named Professor Bilshin, who Remus happened to know was James' as well. Thinking better than to throw himself in front of the metaphorical train that was James and Lily's relationship, he said goodbye and made a beeline for his building.

Forms with 'Mrs. Buchanan' was to be in Music Room #2, located in the Bellchant Building, according to the school map Remus had swiped from the common room last night. The map's paper was horribly rumbled like it'd gotten wet far too many times, and a cup of tea had left a ring across the front. But after being too daft to ask for one at Castle Hall (and he didn't have any plans to go back there any time soon) he'd taken the unsightly map as his own and quickly set to reminding himself where he'd been so far, comparing the image of the school's grounds to the route his gym class had taken the day before and marking down all of the spots that seemed the most private and promising.

Sirius was already there by the time Remus arrived, having left breakfast before him with James. Unlike the rest of the kids, most of whom were hopping around the small orchestral platforms and talking to one another at the top of their lungs, Sirius was tucked away near the back, lounging on the bench of a grand piano. The fallboard was closed and Sirius was leaning back against it, propped up his elbows as he chatted up a pretty brunette girl. She had a purple shirt tucked into her grey skirt, but Remus couldn't remember which dorm had purple as its House colour.

Shrugging out of his coat, Remus took a seat opposite to the piano and kicked his long legs out ahead of him, stretching until his school shoes pressed up against the chair in front.

"Psst," came a voice from over his shoulder, making him nearly jump out of his chair before whirling around. He came face-to-face with a boy who had an expression rather like that of a pinched toad, with flat, yellow-brown hair and mud coloured eyes. He appeared younger, probably a year below or more, considering forms mixed students from all upper secondary years. He looked at Remus expectantly, with the gaze of a crow trying to decide if it would have enough time to swipe that last mini-muffin from the picnic basket.

“Yeah...?” Remus grunted, leaning away.

“You're the new replacement."

"Excuse me?"

"You know, the one who showed up first day with holes in his trousers. Where you from then?”

Remus’ expression sharpened. There was no way he'd have forgotten running into such a sour git on his first day, which could only mean that Hawkings' rumour mill was more formidable than those he'd faced at the other London schools.

“What do you want?” He sighed.

The boy smirked, revealing a rather unappealing smile. “Didn’t know Hawkings was letting in common oiks now. What corner they find you on? And who did your hair? Or did you take hedge-cutters to it yourself just to save a few quid?”

“Okay, you little shit—”

“I’ll bet you’re one of those charity cases they let in every now and then, yeah?” The toad continued. “So who’s your sponsor, a group home? Some church?”

Remus’ temper flared—this kid would be his Mr. Wright of the new school year, his ticket back to London—but before he could jump up from his seat to have a swing, the back leg of the boy’s seat was met with a sharp kick, surprising him enough that the chair skidded a few feet in the other direction. Sirius stood next to them, hands in his pockets, no pretty brunette in sight.

“Piss off, Crouch, before I make you regret it,” he warned, and the boy —Crouch—now recovered from his sudden comeuppance, turned to grin at Sirius with that ugly smile.

“Forms with Buchanan again, Black?”

“Hope you didn’t miss me too much over summer, you slimy git.”

Raising his hands innocently, Crouch stood up from his chair and got up onto a higher riser. On the raised platform he just matched Sirius' height, but only barely. “Careful, church-boy,” he said to Remus, “this is a class for no-goods, and he’s the worst of them all.”

“Beat it,” Sirius said, lower this time.

“I’ll tell Reg you said hi.” Looking cheery, Crouch skipped his way back across to his side of the classroom, making sure to give Sirius a wide berth.

“Don’t let shits like Barty Crouch talk to you like that.”

Remus snapped his gaze to Sirius, who was staring him down now. “Wasn’t gonna,” he shot back.

“Good. It’d ruin our reputation.”

“What reputation?”

“Mine and James’. If stupid sods like Crouch think they can get away with talking to you like that then they’ll try it with us. Really it’s just a hassle, and dragging you around is enough.”

Remus felt his mouth pinch together. “You don’t drag me around.”

“You follow us then.”

“Wasn’t my idea. Peter was the one—”

A sharp, rhythmic ticking suddenly started at the front of the room. Remus turned in his chair to find a woman with ferocious brown curls standing just ahead of them at the base of the risers, waiting for the students to settle in. She had placed a metronome on the podium at the front of the oval-shaped classroom and was beaming back at the class with a friendly smile. Without a word Sirius spun around and returned to his piano bench. The girl from earlier had moved a chair beside him, joined by another boy with a slap of auburn hair.

“Good morning, class,” the teacher announced. She had flecks of silver at her temples but seemed younger than the professors Remus had met so far, dressed in a lime-green frock and white Beatle boots that made her appear as though she were about to go on an afternoon picnic with The Mamas and the Papas.

The class responded together with fervid energy, “Good morning, Mrs. Buchanan!” All except for Sirius who crowed from his seat at the piano; “Morning, Sheila!”

Mrs. Buchanan turned her eyes to the piano and sighed through her smile. “Mr. Black, so happy have you back.” It felt like sarcasm, but Sirius only grinned.

“Yeah, happy to be back, Sheils.”

The rest of the students snickered, but Mrs. Buchanan remained unperturbed, only straightening her stack of papers on the podium.

“Right, registration then?” She announced, before starting down her class list. “No need to ask if Mr. Black has arrived on time.” She said this out of the corner of her mouth, and Sirius opened the piano’s fall-board to play several deep notes; Duh-duh-dunn. The kids laughed again, and Mrs. Buchanan smiled despite herself.

“I saw Diana…” The music teacher continued, scanning her list. “Ralph Jones?”

“Present.”

“Good morning, Ralph… Pierce Walker?"

"Here."

"Hello, Pierce... George Kelley?”

“Good to see you, Mrs. Buchanan! Might I say, that you're looking as stunning as ever this year."

Another round of giggles went up, and George looked very pleased with himself as their teacher pinched her florescent-green dress in a curtsey and nodded at him.

“Good show, George, good show. Now let's see... oh. Is there a... 'Remus Lupin' in?”

Not about to bother with any flattery of his own, Remus raised his hand and mumbled a lazy ‘here’. Mrs. Buchanan looked up from her list, locating him easily before giving him a quizzical stare. Waiting for the new student speech, Remus prepared himself with the slightly-annoyed-but-necessary response, but Mrs. Buchanan only gave him that warm smile again and nodded her head.

“Hello, Remus,” she said, holding his gaze.

A moment passed, and everyone else turned to stare until Remus was sure his ears had gone red. He quickly nodded in return, grinding his teeth together until the teacher finally continued on with her list. When she’d reached the final name—Verity Wilkenson, the girl sitting next to Sirius—she stopped the metronome's ticking and came around the front of the podium.

"Some of you are familiar and friendly faces," she started, "and others I don't know! But I think you'll all come to like how we do forms in music room number two."

There was a whooping from the back from Sirius and the red-haired kid, and Mrs. Buchanan laughed. "Yes, studying and catch-up is important, but it's still first week. Nothing to catch-up with quite yet, and I know at least a few of you have music right after this, so I've prepared some fun and exciting things for you to warm up the morning with."

Mrs. Buchanan walked to the far side of the room and reached for a large wooden box set on wheels, pushing it to the centre of the classroom. "Come grab an instrument!" She called, and instantly everyone was on their feet. The kids young as eleven and old as seventeen rushed forward, reaching into the bin over top of one another and withdrawing various instruments; nothing so fancy as a real violin or flute, just simple little percussion instruments and noise makers.

Egged on by the pointed looks of his eager teacher, Remus ended up with a simple, flat hand-drum about a foot across, but nothing to bang it with. Barty Crouch grabbed a recorder, which he blew loudly and terribly until Mrs. Buchanan switched him for a more harmless tambourine. After finally abandoning his post at the piano Sirius found himself a harmonica and twirled it expertly between his fingers, bobbing his leg the same way Remus did when he was antsy or excited.

"Now most of you know how this goes!" Mrs. Buchanan said, wheeling the now-empty box away from the centre of the room. "Feel free to get up and move about the room. Join in and dance too, it's all good fun anyway."

The music teacher crossed the room and stopped next to a large hi-fi that had to have been older than any of her students and set to fiddling with its dials. "When the music starts, you start," she instructed, before slowly turning the stereo's volume dial. A moment later, the band room was filled with the sound of a trumpet, then accompanying drums, then piano, until finally the entire room was filled with energetic swing music—which was almost immediately joined by the sound of two dozen other instruments, each of them as loud and as happily-obnoxious as the other.

Remus might've been more disgruntled by the noise—it could hardly be called music, after all—had he not been so instantly enraptured by Sirius' playing. The ungodly clamour should've made it impossible for anyone to be heard over the thunderstorm of noise, but Sirius Black was a beast built for noise, it seemed. His harmonica cut right through until eventually, every boom and squeak and jangle was following his lead.

"Don't be shy, Remus!" Mrs. Buchanan threw her voice across the room and Remus realised that he'd just been sitting there, held hostage in his seat by his surprise and the class's enthusiasm. Coming to his senses, he spotted Sirius in the centre of a circle of other kids, lips rolling back in a triumphant smirk over the edge of his harmonica. Sirius pulled the instrument away from his mouth and jutted his chin in his direction.

"C'mon, Lupin. I know you hate music, but don't tell us you're frigid, too?"

The kids who'd heard him all laughed, and Remus, feeling extremely warm beneath the collar, stood up and approached his forms teacher and other classmates, who were still rattling their shrill noise-makers and pounding their plastic drums—one even had a washboard—all completely out of tune. He stopped by the hi-fi, where Sirius could see him and Mrs. Buchanan was clapping on tempo, and lifted his drum, bracing it against one arm and smacking it loudly with the other until his palm began to sting. Sirius' eyes never left him and finally he returned to his jaunty tune, head cocked to the side smugly like there was nothing he couldn't do.

In that moment, Remus wanted nothing more than to use Sirius Black's head as a drum instead.

Chapter End Notes

> I've taken liberties with the traditional format of forms class/ registration, only for story purposes. My reasoning is that because this is a fan-fiction based on a made-up magic school, my own non-magical made-up school can be a little different as well. Cheers.

Chapter 9: Long Haired Lover

Chapter Summary

It's a very eventful morning in church for the lads! Lots of music chat here.

Chapter Notes

No CW's this chapter, though Remus is suitably triggered by this song; https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YriPIujLtsA

You'll understand his mortification if you're brave enough to follow that link to the truly horrendous song that is Jimmy Osmond's "Long Haired Lover from Liverpool", but it's not necessary to understand the chapter. (The Youtube comments are pretty funny though.)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I borrowed Gypsy's Gibson just to show them,
And now I'm a rock and roll star, I don't want to know them;
If they want a stray they better go out and grow one,
I'm one of the boys,
One of the boys…

- "One of the Boys" Mott the Hoople, 1972

Sunday 19th October 1975

Sure that avoidance was the best policy when it came to making friends he didn't want, Remus had spent the first month and a half of school isolating himself in quiet corners and making use of the trolley as he went about the campus with his rumpled map, checking off each spot he deemed acceptable for a bit of peace. The astronomy building proved to be the perfect hide-away; the gate to the exterior fire escape was always left open and a few jiggles in the right direction with a paperclip had the observatory door practically falling open on its own.

If his roommates ever wondered where he was always disappearing to, they didn't ask, and steadily Remus' desire to disappear into the woods had ebbed. Sirius remained cool and aloof, playing his albums on a continuous loop whenever he was in the dorm room and without James and Peter around to force them to be civil, the two boys spent most classes at odds—which to Mrs. Buchanan had become an open invitation to pair them off whenever possible as though she were some satanic matchmaker.

“You honk that damn trumpet in my ear one more time and I’ll—”

WAA-WAAH! “Hold on, Lupin, I can’t quite hear you over the class's clamour and I prefer that any love confessions come across loud and clear!”

It was unbearable.

If Mrs. Buchanan weren't such an engaging teacher, music room #2 would’ve witnessed a full-out brawl at least two times a day. Outside of music class, there was always forms, and any student deemed too rowdy or too out of pocket was sent to the Bellchant building in hopes that a bit of musical therapy every other morning might straighten them out long enough to make it through the rest of their daily lessons. How Sheila Buchanan had the energy to wake up every morning, was beyond him. Luckily, it was hard for most people to object to any order she gave them, even Sirius. She was more popular and beloved than any teacher Remus had ever had, and many students appeared in her room before and after class just to say hello. By their fourth lesson every student in their class had picked a musical instrument to learn, and by a small sliver of luck in an otherwise ill-starred world, Remus was given the chance at the bass guitar.

It was a Fender ‘64 Jazz Bass, and it was beautiful. A few nicks and dents most-likely procured from past students and in good need of some new strings, but absolutely gorgeous. It was only the second rock and roll instrument he’d ever held in his life—Tomny knew a guy who’d pinched a music shop before getting put on ice—and he might’ve jumped up and down in in excitement, had he not known exactly who was sitting next to him, one perfect eyebrow raised in judgement.

“What?” Remus demanded, as he’d shot a sour look at Sirius. He himself was holding a Rickenbacker 400-series electric guitar. It was a little outdated, but Remus had still nearly fainted at the sight of it.

Sirius looked from Remus to the Fender and shrugged before reaching to adjust the pins he wore in his hair to keep it from falling into his face while he played. They were probably the same ones he was always plucking out of Mary's hair.

"Well, you're staring so what is it?"

Sirius shook his head haughtily. "Nothing."

"Tosser," Remus grumbled under his breath.

He could've sworn he'd seen Sirius smile at him; a rare occurrence, even on a beautiful Sunday morning in mid-fall. The leaves around Hawkings had just begun to blanket the ground, covering the grassy berm outside the school's church with a sea of brown, yellow, and red. Earlier that summer, if anyone had told him he'd last long enough at Hawkings College to see the leaves change colour, he'd have socked them one to knock those loose bolts back into place. But it was true, and was perhaps the longest Remus had gone without socking anyone at all. Lyall Lupin might've been jumping for joy back in London, had he not had such a rigid stick up his arse. Good thing he had Giles to jump for him.

The four of them had woken early for Sunday's Holy Communion—Beggars Banquet had been the chosen soundtrack of the morning—and were now discussing some sort of revenge plot against Sirius' younger brother, whom Remus had never so much as seen.

"Really, Sirius," Peter drawled, laying on the grass next to Remus and staring up at the blue morning sky, "I don't know why you don't just go and dump his things into the lake or something."

"Because he'd just get new ones! Although if he woke up floating in the lake…"

"You'd never be able to pull it off."

"Pete, all these years and you still have so little faith in me?"

"Faith and confidence are two different things, Black."

Sirius snickered and leaned back on his elbows. As he did, he tipped his head back and caught Remus staring. "Can I help you?"

"No, don't worry about me, maestro. I'm fine."

Sirius scowled instantly and Remus felt a little pang of satisfaction. Sirius had earned himself the nickname the week before after word of his impeccable talent with the piano had started circulating around their music class. While Remus had been practising, a girl named Jacqui finished a particularly horrible violin rendition of “Twinkle Twinkle Little Star” and sat back in her chair with a moan, only to seek guidance from their resident teenage virtuoso.

“Sirius, how do you do it?” She asked, and Davey Gudgeon, the unofficial president of the Sirius bloody Black fan-club immediately swooped in to answer her;

“He’s a prodigy!”

“Nah,” Sirius said, while fiddling with the Rickenbacker's tuning keys, “it’s just similar to piano, is all.”

“You play piano?” Jacqui had asked in awe.

“Used to.”

“Would you play some now? Mrs. Buchanan stepped out and the piano is—”

“No.”

The combination of Sirius’ tone and the fierce glare he’d given them had been enough to shut Jacqui and Davey’s mouths, but the fact of the matter was that with his guitar in hand, Sirius was already on his way to Top of the Pops. Remus hadn’t realised it that first day, but the show he’d put on with the harmonica was really just a snippet of his talent. Sirius played that Rickenbacker like it was made for him, and the rest of the class knew it too.

As he sat on the berm, Sirius rolled his eyes and finally looked away, cupping a hand to his mouth; “Oi, Potter, it’s time to go in.”

Across the grass, James expertly kicked his football up from the ground with the toe of his Oxford and knocked it toward Sirius with a quick bump of his chest. Remus quickly glanced down to the book he’d been reading before he could be caught staring again.

“I dunno why you’re so determined to make Reg’s life so miserable,” James said, walking back to where the boys were sitting beneath an oak tree.

“It’s just payback,” Sirius said, tossing the football back to James, who caught it easily and tucked it beneath his arm, the other hand on his hip like a disappointed housewife.

“You mean for the time he and Crouch signed that library book on human reproduction out under your name—last June? That was a weak attempt at a prank at best.”

“Weak attempt or not,” Sirius replied indignantly, “the little gits never returned the book and Pince’s been on my ass about it ever since I got back. She had me on shelving duty two weekends in a row!”

“Only because you tried to tell her you couldn’t possibly have it because you already knew everything you needed to know about female anatomy.”

“Okay but you should’ve seen her face though.”

James sighed. “And what about everything you’ve already done to them since term started? First you put glue in their dorm room lock, and then you put crickets in Reg’s school bag—”

“And don’t forget the birdseed he dumped across Salazar’s lawn,” Peter added, helpfully.

“And now Crouch’s hair is the colour of vomit,” James finished, pinching the bridge of his nose. Remus tried not to smile at that. It had been more than a little funny when Barty had shown up in forms with a head of murky green locks as though he were the Creature from the Black Lagoon’s less handsome cousin.

Never underestimate a Black.

“That birdseed bit was funny, don’t you lie,” Sirius said, getting to his feet. He had a few leaves in his hair from wrestling across the lawn with James earlier than morning. “Bird shit, everywhere.”

“You’re going to be expelled before Christmas.”

“Good. Think Andy fancies a visit? I know she’d find it funny, and she’s got better music taste than all of you lot put together.”

James shook his head and the church's bell began to chime. All around them upper-secondary kids in full uniform began shuffling toward the school’s church, most of them yawning and still blinking the sleep from their eyes. Lord’s Day or not, it was particularly cruel of the Holy Father to have them up before ten on an off-day.

“Salvation awaits,” Sirius said sarcastically, helping Peter to his feet.

“C’mon, Remus,” James called, running to the church’s door and stashing his football in a bush next to the stairs.

Remus snapped his book shut. It was a copy of Jacob’s Room by Virginia Woolf, which one of Lily’s roommates, Marlene, had lent him after they’d noticed him reading during private study period. He’d initially tried to dismiss their interest, but he was so desperate for something to fill his time besides homework, bickering with Sirius, and smoking, that he’d found himself returning to the same swot-like tendencies he’d been so determined to abandon after he’d met Tomny.

Pushing himself upright, Remus joined the boys on their way into the church, tucking his book into the inner pocket of his school jacket. After a secretary checked their names off a roster, they filed inside alongside a sea of their classmates and chose a pew about mid-way to the back with the rest of the year elevens. James went first down the row, then Peter, which meant Sirius and Remus were left to sit next to each other. Both boys glanced at each other at the end of the aisle, a little dumbfounded, before Remus nodded sharply and let Sirius go first He slid in after him, making sure to leave a bit of space between them.

Much to James’ delight, they quickly discovered that Lily and the other girls were sitting just ahead of them.

“Oi, Evans,” he whispered, “Evans!”

“Ginger!” Sirius said.

Lily whirled around, face a mask of instant anger. “Oh shut up, you horrible tramp,” she hissed.

“Now that’s a fine thing to say in church,” Sirius said cooly.

“If the shoe fits, Black.”

“Wasn’t I just saying how ginger’s my favourite colour?” James said to Peter, making Lily roll her eyes. He grinned dopily and looked back to her. "So, Evans, fancy a date tomorrow?”

Lily bristled. “I’d rather take a mud bath in Professor Kettleburn’s pig pen.”

“Brilliant. Pick you up at seven then? I’ll bring my swim trunks.”

“Sod off, Potter.”

“Sounds like you’ve got a chance, mate," Sirius said, tapping his knuckles against James’. "Make sure you bring the sun lotion."

With an extremely sour expression, Lily turned her back on a very unabashed James while Mary and Marlene spun around to face them along with their fourth roommate, Lottie, Peter’s twin sister and double in all things apart from her head of massive blonde curls.

“Don’t talk to us,” Mary said decisively, though smiling. “You’re not our friends.”

“You’re right,” Sirius said, “in the church we’re not friends, just children of God.”

“Far from you to ever be a child of God,” Marlene said quietly.

“More like ‘creature of God’,” Lottie added.

“Shut up, Lot,” Peter grunted, pudgy face turning red. Lottie stuck her tongue out at him.

“Remus if you’d ever like to hang out with a sweeter crowd you’re more than welcome to join us,” Mary said shamelessly, resting her chin on the back of her pew. Remus raised his eyebrows as she batted those dark lashes of hers. Mary was the only one of the girls who wore make-up and was regularly written up for it yet insisted on starting every morning with her same ostentatious eyeliner.

“You can come for tea,” Lottie offered, then catching Lily’s eye, she quickly added, “only Remus of course.”

“Careful Lupin,” James advised, “they’ll make you tea and when you’re not looking, paint your nails or curl your eyelashes.”

“I’ve painted Sirius’ nails before,” Mary shot back, lifting her head.

“When?”

“When we dated last year.”

Sirius rolled his eyes dramatically. “That was one time. And we only dated for three weeks.”

“Want to make it four?”

“Macdonald,” Sirius gasped, a hand over his heart.

“Shh! It’s starting,” Marlene hissed, turning her head back around. She was so tall she blocked most of Remus’ view with her icy-blonde plaits.

The other girls turned around while the boys settled back into their stiff pews and Communion started. Each of them stood when prompted, sang when requested, and chanted when asked. Remus, over the last few weeks, had gotten quite good at mouthing the words, robotically moving his mouth in time with the hymns and songs, clamping his teeth together during the chants. Those students who were caught daydreaming were often snapped at by teachers or watchful ministers, so he figured it was best to at least play along.

Halfway through what felt like their dozenth hymn of the morning, Sirius glanced over with a suspicious look. Remus immediately halted his pretend gibberish and returned his questioning look with a raised brow.

‘What are you doing?’ Sirius mouthed at him. Remus pressed his lips together tightly. He hadn’t realised he was being watched.

“I don’t know the words,” he confessed in a whisper.

Sirius pointed to the back of the pew ahead of them, where leather-bound books sat that held copies of each song and hymn—in English and Latin—but Remus silently rebuked him. Reading his expression, Sirius reached forward and grabbed one of the books, poking Remus in the arm with it until he snatched it away and shoved it back into the pew ahead of him. Sirius seemed unperturbed, and only cracked a cheeky smile as he straightened up and went back to ignoring his presence all together. It was a small mercy, and with an annoyed sigh, Remus returned his gaze to the front of the church, where Mrs. Buchanan was conducting the school’s choir and the ministers were leading the rest of them in the adjoining lyrics.

Sirius did not return to his singing and moments passed as Remus began to feel that familiar itch of curiosity grow until finally it won-out and he chanced another glance to his side, only to find that Sirius was now mouthing the words as he had done, a stupid grin on his face. Instantly irritated that he would go so far to mock him, Remus almost shoved him before he realised that Sirius wasn’t mouthing the hymn at all. In fact, it wasn’t even gibberish.

It was a song.

Blinking in confusion, Remus waited until Sirius looked up at him. He started bobbing his head, then swaying, and seemed about ready to start tapping his foot as well, before he slowly raised his voice into a whisper only loud enough for Remus to hear over the communion.

"I'll be your leprechaun and sit upon an old toad stool, I'll serenade you till I'm old and gray…"

Remus clapped a hand over his mouth to hide the laugh of disbelief that was bubbling up in his chest. Not that song.

"Black," he muttered from beneath his hand, lowering his head to get closer to him, "stop it."

After pausing for only a moment to hear Remus' hissing, Sirius decidedly ignored him, the corners of his mouth tilting further upwards as he recited the next line of the song;

"I'll be your long haired lover from Liverpool, You'll be my sunshine daisy from L.A …"

Remus turned straight forward and dropped his hand away from his mouth. Of course he recognised the song. It was a horrible novelty record that Jimmy Osmond, the tiniest shit of the Osmond clan, had put out a few years back that had stayed at the top of the music charts for weeks over an entire Christmas holiday. Anyone who had ears in 1972 would've recognised it—there had been no escaping the song on the TV or radio. Even Sirius' favourite, Bowie, had lost out on a top of the charts spot for "The Jean Genie" when Osmondmania had taken over the UK. It was a horrible song, one that was sure to get stuck in Remus' head while he lay awake at night staring at the roof of his four-poster—and that was positively the reason why Sirius had decided to sing it.

Remus reached over to give Sirius a quick jab in the ribs. "You're such a—"

"But all the other flowers hung their heads and cried—" Sirius crooned, grabbing onto Remus' wrist and pulling him in closer, "because the loveliest of all of them was you!"

Ripping his hand away, Remus stepped sideways to get away from Sirius, but the pew was crowded and the boy to his left only gave him a dirty look after he'd nearly stepped on his toes. Eventually Peter noticed and he elbowed James, leaving them both to turn their heads and stare at their best friend.

“But you were evidently the exception to the rule,
I picked you quickly then I ran away…”

Catching James’ eye, Remus silently pleaded for him to put an end to Sirius’ singing before anyone else noticed, but he only looked between the two of them; Remus, incredulous and mortified, and Sirius, merry and unbothered, and shrugged with an amused expression. Remus snorted again and covered his mouth, at least expecting the other boy to stand back and watch it unfold, but it seemed that James Potter was also not to be underestimated. When Sirius began his next verse, James and Peter both laughed and joined in, starting off quiet and mumbled until their own sense of recklessness took over, and they’d raised their voices to match his.

“I'll be your long haired lover from Liverpool,
And I'll do anything you ask;
I'll be your clown or your puppet or your April Fool,
Cut my hair, I'll even wear a mask...”

More kids turned to stare, and Remus, feeling eyes bore into the back of his head from others in the pews behind them, kept his head bowed as his roommates continued to sing. Sirius on his own had barely been loud enough to be heard over the Communion’s singing, but with all three of them there was no way for anyone to pretend it wasn’t happening.

Of the girls in front of them, it was Mary who turned around first, her big, brown eyes wide as she stared in disbelief. Then it was Marlene, who looked like she was deciding whether to throttle the boys or faint. Finally Lily turned, never without a stern warning on hand, and leaned over the back of her pew to scold them.

“What are you doing?” She hissed, but it only egged them on more—James in particular, who raised his voice for the next several lines. Lily balked, as did most of the students around them until finally, little chitters of laughter began to rise up. The other year elevens had begun to realise what they were up to, and several turned around in their pews to stare. Some even began to join in, recognising the tune. The more voices that joined in, the less people knew who had started it, but that didn’t matter to anyone. Everyone was rallying around the silly song simply because they were teenagers forced to sit in religious silence who’d finally been granted some merciful entertainment. To them, it was funny.

Remus could feel himself growing mighty close to Marlene’s train of thought, and his fingers itched to reach out and silence the other boys himself. The church song was ending, he could hear the filterings of it as the accompanying piano slowed and the sound of the insane school kids was starting to take over. Finally, as Sirius belted out, "I'll be your Valentine, and you'll be mine," over the final line of the hymn, Remus decided that he'd had enough. He reached down and grabbed Sirius' wrist in a tight grip as the other boy had done to him, earning him a sharp look as Sirius turned on him.

Remus shook his head, 'that's enough!', but Sirius wasn't glaring, he was grinning. After giving a quick nod, Sirius leapt up on the seat of the pew, hand still trapped by Remus' grip. There was no more hymn, no more piano or priestly singing, but there was noise. As Sirius stood up on his pew, egged on by his schoolmates as they belted out the final lines of the song, everyone turned to look. Remus could see the faculty's eyes widen all the way from his seat, but Sirius didn't so much as pause. All eyes were on him, and everyone knew the song. It was like watching a barrel go over a waterfall; inevitable.

"I'll be your long haired lover from Liverpool,
You'll be my sunshine daisy from L.A—
You'll be my sunshine daisy from L.AAAAAAAAAAA!"

As Sirius plowed through the rest of the song he was met with rapturous laughter and eager voices. Instantly the hall was more alive than Remus had ever seen it, with kids of all ages joining in. However, their glee was very much short-lived.

"MR. BLACK!" A voice hollered from the front of the church. Despite the smug way he'd treated Remus, Sirius froze and students turned around row-by-row as Headmistress McGonagall made her way down the centre aisle, stopping directly next to their pew. Remus tugged his hand back immediately, not wanting to be involved, and Sirius almost lost his balance on top of the bench before righting himself.

"Mr. Black," The Headmistress started again, her mouth drawn into that tight line. "I was wondering when we'd be having our first chat of the term." Every head in the room was craning its ears to hear what sort of punishment Sirius was going to get.

"It's just a little singing in church, Professor," he said, diplomatically, licking his lips to hide a cheeky smirk. "Isn't singing in church encouraged?"

"Indeed it is," Mrs. Buchanan said, appearing at the Headmistress' elbow with a smile of her own. She glanced at Remus and winked, and Remus thought he'd begun to see things.

"Since Mr. Black is so eager to share in the music today," she started, earning herself a smug bow from Sirius, who still hadn't come down from the pew, "how about we make use of his talents?"

The Headmistress raised her eyebrows, as if contemplating the offer. "What is it you had in mind, Mrs. Buchanan?" She asked casually, as though she weren't speaking in front of three hundred students and faculty.

"Let him sing," Buchanan said, as though it were the most obvious thing in the word. "At the front of the hall of course."

There was a loud snort—Peter—and Remus turned around to see a very different expression on Sirius' face. This one was sour, even a bit agitated. Perhaps that was just what Sirius looked after getting the rug pulled out from under him.

"C'mon, Sirius," Mrs. Buchanan said, holding out her hand, "let's sing the next hymn together, yeah?"

Remus saw that vein jump out in Sirius' neck as he slowly dropped down from the pew. James was currently hugging his middle, trying not to laugh, while Peter had replaced Remus as the one with his hand over his mouth to smother his amusement. Marlene still looked horrified, unable to see the humour in interrupting Communion, but Lily, Mary, and Lottie all looked as though they'd seen the best comeuppance imaginable. All of these reactions were only amplified when Mrs. Buchanan took Sirius' hand like a child and began leading him to the front of the church while the rest of the student body sniggered around them.

"Settle down, that's enough!" Their Headmistress ordered, gliding back up the aisle.

As he was lead, Sirius glanced back at Remus, his expression mostly unreadable but also very put-out. Remus swallowed, but didn't react. The lunatic had done it to himself, after all.

Other kids were still snickering by the time Mrs. Buchanan and Sirius joined the choir at the front of the church. Headmistress McGonagall ordered everyone to sit, and they did so, with a short bit of shuffling and the sound of many creaking pews. Remus watched as Mrs. Buchanan leaned in close and said something into Sirius' ear. He rolled his eyes and their teacher smiled, taking up her baton in front of the choir as the piano began to play.

Remus didn't know this hymn either, but it wouldn't have mattered either way; the moment Sirius Black opened his mouth he was transported. It had been easy, during "Long Haired Lover from Liverpool" to ignore Sirius' singing in lieu of his own embarrassment, but at the front of the hall, with every eye on him, it was impossible to ignore Sirius' voice. The choir sang with him, but Sirius was the star.

He was good, more than good. Remus wanted him on an album—Sirius could've been on an album. Between the hair and the guitar and the singing, he could've put Ricky Nelson himself to shame. Remus was entranced, and when he finally looked beside himself he found even James and Peter's grins gone.

They knew he could sing too, he realised. The guitar, the piano, they knew all of it. Even Mrs. Buchanan had known; she must have, or she'd never have invited Sirius up in front of the entire upper-secondary student body. Anyone else would've gotten detention, but the boys of dorm 4A abided by different laws. They played music late into the night, had reputations that spanned the entire school, and behaved like kings of a small country of fools. They had been best friends since they were children, knew everything about one another, and Remus was just their replacement roommate.

And so as Sirius' song came to a close, more beautiful and humbling than anything he had ever heard in a House of God, all Remus wanted to do was hop on a train back to London.

Chapter End Notes

The album referenced was 'Beggars Banquet' by The Rolling Stones (1968).
'Top of the Pops' is a BBC music television program that began in 1964.

Chapter 10: An Unwilling Accomplice

Chapter Summary

Sirius plots revenge, an occupational hazard for the boys of dorm 4A, while Remus hands him the key.

Chapter Notes

CW: Smoking references & 'f' slur in a smoking context.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I once had a dream,
So I packed up and split for the city;
I soon found out that my lonely life wasn't so pretty,
I'm glad I went now I'm that much more sure that we're ready…

- "That's Not Me" The Beach Boys, 1966

Sirius Black may have claimed to be a well-adjusted, gracious, young man with a decent head on his shoulders, but he held grudges like Lyall Lupin's hounds hunted prey; fiercely and with little mercy.

It had been several days since the Communion-concert incident and Sirius still hadn't let his humiliation go. He blamed Headmistress McGonagall of course, after she'd neglected to thank him for putting the "fun" back into "fundamentalism", and also Mrs. Buchanan, for her cruel and unusual punishments, which she tended to favour over a typical detention. This was evident by the fact that Remus had had to watch Sirius receive a reprimand from her twice more since Sunday, once in forms for locking Barty Crouch in the broom cupboard and again in music for taping Alexander Flutwarts' hands to his accordion after he wouldn't stop trying to use the instrument to imitate the sound of a dying cat. Between watching Sirius clean out the spit valves of every brass instrument in the music room and then singing once more in front of the entire class—with Alex's mediocre accordion-playing for back-up—Remus had steeled himself to stay on Sheila Buchanan's good side. He clearly hadn't the voice for her particular vein of punishment.

Perhaps the most startling revelation about the whole Holy affair—beyond Sirius' frustratingly good voice—was that Remus was also being blamed.

“It’s almost your fault, you know,” Sirius had said bitterly, as the four boys made their way back to the dorms after Communion.

“What?”

“It was. You’re the one who wasn’t singing the right song.”

“I wasn’t singing at all,” Remus snapped. “You’re the one who started bleating like the bloody Osmonds in church! And then you got up on the pew—did you really think you weren’t going to be caught?”

Sirius mimicked Remus with the shake of his head. “It’s like listening to my mother. I swear Londoners are about as exciting as sawdust.”

“Oh, because the great countryside of Bath is known for being so daringly anti-religious,” James said, coming between the two of them and slinging his arms around their shoulders and holding them tight. “Why don’t we just think about something else, hey? Like how we’re going to get them back?”

Though Remus was pretty sure James had been joking, Sirius seemed to take the suggestion to heart. His mischievous brain shifted instantly from tormenting his brother to how the four of them were going to stick it to those dusty priests and rhadamanthine teachers—Sirius had actually used this word—which left them pitching ideas to one another of how to best go about disrupting the Lord’s next Supper. It was decided that laxatives in the communal wine were too dangerous and, well, too gross; and not everyone drank the wine anyway, which turned Sirius off of the idea entirely. James had the suggestion to fill the priests’ bibles with images from dirty magazines, but that too had been dismissed.

“We’re not thinking big enough!” Sirius complained.

Remus did his best to keep mum around the others, filling his time with the books Lily and Marlene lent him or otherwise slipping away for some quiet. The common room wasn’t a bad place to be when he wanted a bit of peace, but the room tended to fill quickly, which made for bad reading and worse ignoring; so he continued making his way about the grounds, using his map to mark off the quietest and most secluded spots on campus. Sirius, it seemed, would not have it. It had grown harder to shake the other boy since Sunday, despite his continued aversion to Remus’ presence. It felt more like Sirius wanted him to get in equal amounts of trouble rather than be his friend, and was determined that Remus be an accomplice whether he wanted to join in on the antics or not.

“Where is it you’re always going?” Sirius had demanded one lunch-hour, after Remus had slipped off for a fifteen-minute fag. Remus slid into the bench next to Peter and managed to catch James’ eye across the table.

“The loo,” Remus said, taking a bite of his own lunch. He smirked at James, and Sirius glanced between them sharply.

“ ‘The loo’?”

“Yeah, tummy troubles. Best to stay clear.”

James snorted into his pot-pie.

Despite his attempts, Sirius did not let up. He became more nosey, more insistent that Remus accompany them on every affair and outing. By the end of the week he had been party to two toilet-paper defacings, stood-by as Sirius and James put rubber snakes in the year 12 gardens (where you got a rubber snake in northern Scotland, Remus had no idea) and had even been forced to break curfew to push the Hawkings rowing team’s boats into the centre of Lake Dubh. (When he'd asked why, the answer he'd been given was why not?)

They’d had a bit of explaining to do to the Godric dorm monitor, Benjy Fenwick, when they’d returned from the lake; but luckily James was able to distract the year 13 boy with talk of the latest win for Arsenal, of whom Benjy was also a fan. In the end it had been Peter and Remus who’d dragged Sirius back to bed, after he’d heard Benjy bad-mouth Chelsea, his favourite football team. Accustomed to running with the East End boys back home, who pinched pockets and set rubbish bins on fire for a bit of quick fun, Remus didn’t bother pretending as though he were that impressed by the stunts.

But as luck would have it, it turned out to be Remus who would light the fuse for the next big interruption of the Holy Spirit.

It was late in the night when the topic was broached again. James, like Peter, had had no problem inviting himself to sit on Remus’ bed while the two of them compared biology notes for an upcoming test. Peter sat nearby on his own bed, limping through his maths homework, though Sirius was still keeping his distance, pacing the entire length of their room with his toothbrush hanging out of one corner of his mouth.

“We’ve got to do something this Sunday,” he said, mumbling around the mouthful of toothpaste.

“Why the rush?” James asked. “We’re going to be in Communion for the rest of the year.” He reached over to correct a label on Remus’ diagram of the respiratory system and Remus let him, having already grown tired of labelling and was instead absent-mindedly skimming a chapter in his textbook.

“Because,” Sirius replied,”it has to be fresh!”

“No one even remembers it now,” Peter said. “Not that you weren’t good, Sirius. I'd almost missed hearing you sing.”

“Your nose is looking a little brown there, Pete,” Remus added, making Sirius smirk and cross his arms.

“Yeah, well, this morning Moira asked when my next performance was going to be,” he said smugly, and Peter made a sour face, like anyone might if their almost-girlfriend was giving their best friend eyes. Remus was quietly impressed though; out of the three of them he hadn’t expected Peter ‘I’ve lost my pants again’ Pettigrew to have potential with the opposite sex. Not that Remus hadn’t noticed the way girls made eyes at Sirius and James. Well, every girl but Lily.

“People’ll be expecting something,” Sirius continued, before spitting his toothpaste into the half-finished bowl of popcorn James had brought to bed. He only narrowly avoided spitting onto Peter’s hand as he reached for some, making the other boy wail in disgust as Sirius danced away, grinning maniacally.

Ignoring their antics, Remus sighed as he rhythmically tapped his pencil against his knee. “I still don’t understand the point of this. Why can’t you just sit quietly in church until it’s over like everyone else?”

“ ‘It is a far, far better thing that I do, than I have ever done’,” Sirius quoted, still waving his toothbrush around. “That’s Dickens, my dear Watson.”

“I’m not sure you’re using either of those quotes right,” Remus shot back. “And if people will be expecting you to pull something then isn’t the smarter thing to do nothing? Or do you want to sing another ‘Hail Mary’ in front of the entire school?”

“That would be the boring thing,” Sirius said, leaning against one of James’ bedposts. “But no. I’ll cut my own tongue out before I let that old crone Buchanan, make me sing another one of her hymns. And put the bloody book down for once, Lupin. You're still an accessory to all this."

Remus scoffed and snapped his book shut. He felt like 'crone' was rather a stretch for their music teacher, who couldn't have been older than thirty-five and had the patience of a saint. At any of the other schools he'd attended Sirius would've surely gotten the strap so often he could've entered it into his school timetable.

"At least you sounded good," Remus grumbled before it dawned on him that he'd just given Sirius Black a compliment, and he rushed to correct his mistake. "You knew the words, I mean."

"Of course I knew the words—been singing 'em since I was pissing my own pants."

"When was that, last week?" James quipped.

"Oh you want a go at it, Potter? Alright then!"

Sirius surged forward and swamped James on the bed, tumbling back and forth as they began to grapple each other, grunting and laughing. Remus jumped up immediately and pressed a hand to his forehead, suppressing a groan. It wasn't that he hadn't been around roughhousing before—but they were just so close. Why couldn't they wrestle on their own beds?

As Sirius and James went about trying to gather each other in a headlock, scattering notes and textbooks about the floor, Remus drifted toward Sirius' bedside hutch. He'd been playing Diamond Dogs, the album he'd begrudgingly started to enjoy the most out of Bowie's entire discography, even if the cover made him want to wince and close his eyes. "Sweet Thing" reminded Remus of that time over the summer when he'd taken those pills with Tomny and could've sworn he could hear in colour, but it was "Rebel Rebel" that made him want to listen.

Rebel rebel, you've torn your dress,
Rebel rebel, your face is a mess;
Rebel rebel, how could they know?
Hot tramp, I love you so!

Lifting the turntable's needle, Remus flipped the record and dropped the pin back down as the familiar crackling spilled out of the speakers. Bet Bowie would sound better in a cathedral than a dorm room, he thought to himself. And then he said it.

“Maybe you should just sing a decent song instead.”

There was a loud thump followed by a clatter from behind. Remus spun around to find Sirius lying on the ground beside his bed, surrounded by scattered textbooks, notes, and his own abandoned toothbrush. He was looking at Remus with the same big eyes the dogs back home gave him when they thought they were about to get a treat, while James leaned over him with his glasses askew. Before he could offer any apologies, Sirius was on his feet.

“What did you say, Lupin?” He demanded.

Remus balked. “Er—nothing."

"No, you said something. What was it?”

"It was just a joke. At least playing a half-decent song wouldn’t be as painful. You know, better than another bloody hymn.”

Sirius’ eyes were alight. He looked from Remus to the hi-fi and slowly a smile spread across his face. “Oh my god, the swot’s done it!”

“Oi—”

“We’ll just make it loud, no need for singing! We could use the school’s—there has to be one in the AV room. We can just take that and plug it in—but oh there's also—and then—”

“Care to impart some of that knowledge on your best mates?” James said, sounding as confused as Peter looked. “You sound like a rambling idiot.”

“We’ll play ‘em a song!” Sirius said, throwing his arms out. He did that a lot—punctuated every word with a hand gesture.

“Ah, got it. Clear as mud.”

“Oh, piss off, Potter. I mean we can use the stereo. They don’t want our singing, but who’s to say they won’t like someone else’s?”

Remus squinted at Sirius questioningly, but it was Peter who spoke first.

“You mean you’re going to play Bowie in church?”

“Bowie—Sabbath—The Stones—anyone, so long as it’s loud.”

Remus shook his head and stepped around Sirius, sitting on the edge of his bed and bending at the waist to collect his now very disorganised notes. As he set about getting them back into the right order, James swung his legs around beside Remus, knocking their knees together.

“Where will you even put this ‘very loud’ stereo?” He asked, adjusting his round glasses on his nose. “The priests are hardly going to let you waltz into Communion carrying the hi-fi in your lap.”

Sirius wiggled his eyebrows. Infuriatingly, he did not look like an idiot while doing it. “On the organ balcony.”

All three boys stared back. The Hawkings Church was one of the oldest buildings on the campus, and its organ was the size of a building all on its own. The balcony where it sat overlooked the rest of the church from behind. No one would be expecting a rock and roll concert to come from such an intricate and revered instrument.

“Just think about it,” Sirius continued, “that thing’s got like a million pipes, the back half of the balcony is just a maze of hallways with all of them. We could put a stereo in there, and it would take them at least a few songs to figure out what was happening. It’s genius.”

“And how do you expect to get away with that?” James countered. “We can’t leave our seats during the readings, and even if you manage it, they’ll know it was you.”

“We’ll set it up beforehand.”

“And who’s going to start the song?” Peter asked, sitting upright on his bed.

Sirius clicked his tongue, clearly not having thought that far ahead. “Think I could pay off Shunpike to do it?”

“You mean the trolley driver?” Asked Remus, glancing up from his notes.

“Yeah. Pretty sure Stan would do just about anything if you paid him.”

“I thought your parents cut you off for poor behaviour?” James asked.

With another ‘tsk’ Sirius rolled his eyes and spoke out of the corner of his mouth; “Didn’t want anything from them anyway.”

“Why don’t you just use a timer switch?” Remus said, and all three heads turned to look at him. Honestly, these rich prats.

“Like the ones they use on shop lights or window tellys?” He coaxed. "They got one in the common room. It’s what turns the lights off at curfew. Shops use 'em to keep thieves away at night."

"How do you know that?" Peter asked, and Remus puckered. Explaining how he knew that plenty of shop lights operated on a timer because he ran with the same crowd who broke the door in the moment those same lights clicked off felt a lot like shooting himself in the foot, but it didn’t matter, because Sirius was already looking at him like he could’ve kissed him.

“Lupin, I could bloody snog you!”

Remus’ eyes turned to saucers. “Please, don’t.”

Sirius grinned and shook his head lightly. “There then, that’s our plan. We’ve just got to get into the school’s stash of radio equipment.”

James shook his head, but was smiling. “And I suppose you have a plan for that too?”

Mercilessly, Sirius turned his gaze to Peter and lifted both brows. Peter immediately cringed and dropped his head down.

“Oh fuck.”

You’ve torn your dress, your face is a mess,
You can’t get enough, but enough ain’t the test;
You’ve got your transmission and your live wire,
You got your cue line and a handful of ludes,
You wanna be there when they count up the dudes,

And I love your dress,
You’re a juvenile success,
Because your face is a mess;
So how could they know?
I said, how could they know?

* * *

Saturday 25th October 1975

It was still almost a week till Halloween and yet already it seemed as though every student at Hawkings College was buzzing with unbridled excitement and energy. The spooky holiday fell on a Friday that year, meaning that the events were going to be spectacular, and certainly unsupervised. The girls dorms Rowena and Dorset House always organised an annual pumpkin carving contest, while Godric also kept up one of their own traditions, which involved just as many pumpkins (of the smashed variety) and a few dozen baseball bats that someone always managed to lift from the gymnasium's storage room. None of the Halloween events were organised or sanctioned by the school—strictly student-only happenings, which made for plenty of opportunity for mischief. Unable to curb every inkling for student rabble rousing, the Hawkings professors seemed to resign themselves to hand out the necessary detentions come November 1st.

Never ones to be outdone, the 4A boys were already talking about the sort of fun they had planned, but that was to come after Sirius' revenge, a plot each of them would be party to.

It was really Peter who turned out to be the crucial player in the plan. As a member of the small Audio Visual club since his ninth year and now its elected treasurer, he had access to a set of club room keys—a fact that made Sirius exceedingly giddy and Peter exceedingly nervous. Most of the time the club just met to read and exchange comics or watch shows on one of the school's tellys, and because of this Peter had the most up-to-date knowledge on what was going on in the world—and whichever celebrity was the last to make a fool of themselves on the Dick Cassidy Show.

"Don't touch anything!" Peter pleaded, as the four boys made their way into the dark clubroom late that Saturday night. Once the door was closed and locked behind them James hit the lights, revealing a small room no bigger than Remus' pantry back home. A table and chairs were organised in the centre with various boxes filled with wires or bulky electronics lining the shelves on every wall.

"You really spend every Tuesday and Thursday night in here, Pete?" James asked, peaking into a cardboard box that looked as though it was moulding on the bottom.

"Not everyone wants to be on the bloody football team, James," Peter said bitterly, before slapping his friend's hands away. "Francis is going to kill me if he finds out I brought you nobs in here."

"Sorry to say I'm not much afraid of your Swot Club president, Pete," Sirius said. He'd already abandoned the rest of them and made his way to the far side of the clubroom, digging around in a box of cabling. "We need a long extension lead—so that we can plug the stereo in from the balcony."

"You're not going to find it in there," Peter complained, joining Sirius across the clubroom.

Remus hung back by the door, feeling rather indifferent about the whole thing, despite the fact that half of the plan had been his idea. He was just letting them drag him around, he knew, but it was surprisingly hard to say no to Sirius Black when he actually paid you any attention.

"Alright, Lupin?" James asked, stepping up beside him.

Remus gnawed at the inside of his cheek. "I'm not a thief, you know."

James' expression turned concerned, then he smiled through it, as though Remus had just said something very odd. "I meant with the timer," Remus corrected. "I've never stolen anything."

"Oh, well it's not stealing, it's just a little bit of borrowing for some fun. No harm done."

Remus shrugged. It felt like stealing. There was that same knot in his stomach he got every time he'd followed one of the boys on an 'outing'. For Tomny and the others it was different, he knew. They stole things they didn't have or couldn't afford, but Remus had never gone without—not really—so for him, it felt needless; dishonourable. It'd be a lie though, to say that he'd never partaken in a few generous cigarettes from one of the others, despite the fact that those were almost always pinched from a pocket or corner shop.

"You act like we're about to turn you in to the bobbies, Lupin," James said with a chuckle, but Remus caught his eye and the laugh died instantly. James understood, he thought, through that thick, good-boy head of his. "We won't," he said quickly, "we wouldn't. It's against the code."

"There's a code?"

“Yeah, ‘all for one’ and the other bit. It means one of us goes down—we all go down.”

Remus swallowed a sardonic smile. “ 'One for all, and all for one’.”

“So you got what I meant!”

“Yeah, I got it.”

Sirius gave a wolf-whistle from the other side of the room loud enough that Peter had to cover his ears. “Oi, Potter, Lupin! Come help us carry this stuff!”

“Shhh!” Peter winced.

In the end the four of them loaded up a single AV cart with two stereos, three speakers double the size of a grown-man’s torso, and several yards of electrical wiring to power them. Back at the dorm, Sirius’ musical stash also included several cassette tapes which eliminated the need for a turntable. This was a plus, since Peter had nearly fainted by that point anyway, rambling on about how Francis was definitely going to notice two missing stereos.

“Why do we even need two in the first place?” He demanded as James opened the door.

Sirius only grinned. “Just trust me.”

As they made their way out of the clubroom with Peter checking ahead to make sure the hallway was clear and James and Sirius pushing the cart, Remus paused. A thought had occurred to him while he had been staring at the stacks of audio equipment. Really it was a little embarrassing that the idea had never occurred to the other three before then, but taking a moment to hang back by himself, Remus rifled around a few boxes until he’d found the answer to a very noisy problem. Blowing away the dust, he tucked his prize into the back waistband of his trousers, beneath his coat, before following the others out into the hall.

Chapter End Notes

Album referenced was David Bowie's 'Diamond Dogs' (1974). The song quoted in-chapter is "Rebel Rebel".
A 'swot' is the British term for 'nerd'.
I made 'The Dick Cassidy Show' up. Based on common celebrity talk-shows of the era.

'Bobbies' is slang for cops, specifically the London Metropolitan Police.

Can't wait to give you guys the next chapter! Pranking is hard without magic to help, but I figure I've got a decent hold on it now. Let me know any thoughts on how you think it's going to go for them. Cheers.

Chapter 11: Hear the Angels Sing

Chapter Summary

Time to raise the curtain on the first prank of 1975.

Chapter Notes

CW: References to sexual content, though it's only a plot gag.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

God gave rock and roll to you, gave rock and roll to you,
Put it in the soul of everyone;
God gave rock and roll to you, gave rock and roll to you,
Save rock and roll for everyone…

- "God Gave Rock and Roll to You" Argent, 1973

It was long past curfew by the time they had the AV cart rolling across the school grounds. They took the long way, twisting in between buildings to avoid the yellow street lamps that shone over the campus's main roads.

"Hey James," Remus grunted as he and Sirius lifted the cart up over a curb outside the church, "what are the odds that Benjy will let you talk more about Arsenal's chances at the FE Cup instead of giving us detention?"

"You mean the 'FA' Cup?"

"Er—yeah."

James shook his head hopelessly. "Best to try the back door first, mate."

"Who cares? Benjy can't keep us from church," Sirius beamed, wiping the sweat from his brow. He'd pushed the cart the entire way from the Design and Technologies building despite its substantial weight and rusty wheels, only letting James, Peter, and Remus trade off with one another.

"Some of us have lives beyond the Almighty," James said.

“And Halloween’s this week,” Peter moaned. “I told Moira I’d be the one to smash her pumpkin.”

“Was that a dirty euphemism, Pettigrew?” Sirius asked. Both he and James burst into laughter, Remus too.

“No! I meant after Dorset’s pumpkin carving—ugh—your mind, I swear.”

The boys managed to staunch their laughter as they rolled the cart toward the church's front doors, parking it at the foot of the steps as Sirius skipped up to the door.

“Shit,” he said, after jiggling the handle, “It’s locked.”

Remus’ jaw dropped. “You mean we lugged this crap halfway across campus and you don’t even have a way in?”

“Voice down, Lupin,” Sirius hissed, before giving the door a little frustrated kick. “The church is normally open all hours, in case anyone feels like a midnight confessional.”

“It’s Halloween week,” James said ruefully. “No way they’re going to leave the doors open for anyone to walk in and cause trouble.”

“Good thinking too,” Remus said sarcastically, glancing at the cart of audio equipment.

“Well we’re not just anyone,” Sirius snapped, turning back to the door.

Peter leaned over the front entrance railing to peer through one of the stained glass windows. “I bet this means that no one will be waiting around to catch us, though.”

“I wonder if I can…” Sirius began jiggling the doors of the church like the lock might magically open for him. “James, you grab the other handle.” Standing back, Remus watched as both Sirius and James began to tug on the door handles, setting their feet against the church walls to get better leverage.

“I can’t believe this was part of your brilliant plan.”

Sirius dropped back from the door with an irritated huff. “Well you bloody do something then, Lupin, if you’re so astute.”

“Fine.”

Advancing to the top of the steps, Remus plucked the pin from Sirius' dark fringe and pried it apart until it broke in two pieces. He normally found bent paper clips to be more springy and easier to work with, but the hairpin would have to do.

Ushering all three of them aside to give himself some space, Remus bent down in front of the church's lock and set to work, fussing with it the way Doss had taught him. He'd only ever fiddled with cheap things before, like the front door of Tomny's flat and the occasional fence lock to some poor sod's private property, but the church doors were old and therefore, not really up to snuff. It took some time, but eventually the lock clicked open, and when Remus stood up he found three gaping mouths, each of them staring back at him like he'd just won the Grand National.

Remus pulled one of the front doors open. "It's open."

"No shit," Peter said.

Sirius wrenched the other side of the door open. "Where did you learn to do that?"

"Just something I picked up, now are we setting up this plan of yours or are we going back to bed?"

"You're just full of surprises, Lupin," James said, clapping Remus on the shoulder as he skipped down to their idle cart. Sirius was still watching him like he couldn't decide if he should call his bluff. Before he could Remus flounced down the stairs to join James. It took all four of them to lift the rusty thing up the short stairway, and at the top Remus nearly got his foot crushed under a wheel when his and Peter's grip faltered on the one side. They shut the doors behind themselves and wheeled the AV cart through the vestibule, into the centre aisle of the church. The only light came from the street lamps peering through the windows from outside and it was certainly creepy. All the shadows between the pews and behind the confessional booths seemed to move on their own. Remus did his best not to make eye contact with the gaudy art deco statue of Christ standing at the front of the church.

"Who's gonna keep watch?" James asked.

"Pete can keep watch," Sirius supplied.

Peter drew his chin back toward his neck indignantly. "Why me?"

“You always keep watch.”

“That was last year, and only because you and Miles always made me.”

Sirius rolled his eyes. “Miles was like the brains, ‘course he couldn’t keep watch.”

“And James?”

“Potter’s the muscle, do you want to be the only one carrying the hi-fi up to the balcony?”

“I’ll keep watch,” Remus said, moving away from the group and back toward the front doors.

Sirius watched him go, before whipping his dark head back around to Peter. “Way to go, Pete. You made the new kid feel bad about himself.”

“Oh, you should talk!”

“Let’s just get on with it,” James interrupted, tugging one of the speakers off the bottom shelf of the cart. Remus watched them from a ways away, camped out next to one of the stain-glass windows. Looking through them made the church's dim courtyard appear as a million different colours, each of them reflecting off the lamps hanging on either side of the doors.

While taking turns watching the courtyard and watching the boys, Remus was reminded of early summer, when Lee and Flacky had appeared outside the flat with several boxes of old radio equipment they'd 'picked up'. He might’ve felt more guilty over how excited he was to set the thing up in Tomny’s living room, had the radio not crapped out after two songs. That was the only time Remus thought he might’ve been able to believe that the boys had gotten the stuff from an alley bin like they’d claimed and not busted it out of some poor bloke’s back seat.

Fiddling around in his pocket for Tomny’s lighter, Remus withdrew it and began to flick the thing open and closed to keep his fingers busy. He wasn’t tired, despite the fact that they’d had to wait an hour after curfew to sneak out, and he’d felt a quiet thrill getting to show off the lock-picking skills he’d picked up from Doss. If he was going to be forever known as the yob who’d shown up on the first day with holes in his trousers and scabs on his knuckles, then he might as well dedicate himself to the part. At least then there would be some truth to the rumours.

“Oi, Lupin, come help me with this.”

Remus looked up from his place next to the door, snapping the zippo’s lid shut with another crisp click, and found Sirius standing in the vestibule’s doorway expectantly. “Wasn’t I supposed to be keeping watch?”

“Well is the door locked?” Sirius asked.

“Yeah.”

“Then don’t be lazy. I can’t lift the stereo on my own anyway.”

Sirius turned and marched back into the church, and Remus almost wanted to blow him off, but that would require more arguing he didn’t feel like keeping up with. Pushing off the window’s ledge, he followed him. “Thought you had a muscle man for this?” He asked, taking his place on the other side of the AV cart.

“Potter’s got the speakers,” Sirius said, indicating with his head to the top of the balcony staircase, where James was indeed struggling under the weight of one of the large stereo amps.

“Alright, Potter?” Remus called, raising his voice enough so that it echoed around the empty church.

“Yeh! Jus’ fine!” James grunted as he finally made it onto the balcony and passed out of sight.

“Pete’s setting up the extension leads so we can plug everything in,” Sirius said, as he and Remus hooked their fingers beneath the bottom of the stereo. “I told him to bring the cord down through the maintenance hallway so no one will be able to spot it tomorrow.”

“Good thinking,” Remus said, and after one deep breath, they hoisted the heavy metal box up off the cart and swung it down between their bodies.

“I’ll go up backwards, since you’re taller,” Sirius said, as they hobbled toward the corner of the church, where the balcony’s staircase started. They took the stairs one at a time, quietly grunting with the shared weight.

“So you ever done this before?” Remus asked, looking down at his feet to make sure he didn’t miss any steps and send them crashing down to the bottom.

“Hide a stereo in a church organ?” Sirius smirked. “No, but other stuff.”

“With Miles?” Remus asked, gingerly.

There was a moment of silence before Sirius spoke again; “Yeah. Miles was really clever. He planned a lot of the gags last year.”

“Lily said he was quiet and liked books.”

“Yeah, well what would Evans know?”

“James said he hated smoking—sounds like a real swot."

Remus had barely gotten the words out before Sirius slammed to a stop on the staircase.

“You need to shut your mouth!"

“I was only teasing!” Remus said, nearly dropping his end of the stereo. “You’re always taking the piss—what, can’t handle it being turned around on you, Black?”

“You’re not supposed to have your friends on like that when they’re not around to defend themselves.”

“That sounds like a load of shit,” Remus said, grunting as he struggled to keep the stereo in the centre of his chest. “And he wasn’t my friend. I never even met him.”

“Well duh,” Sirius sneered, “someone give the genius a prize.”

“Look, can we have it out once we’ve put down the damn stereo? You’re breaking my back.”

With a haughty look, Sirius straightened up and they finally started up the stairs again. Miles was clearly a touchy subject, but so far none of the 4A boys had given away why. Perhaps they just missed their friend, that at least, Remus could relate to.

“Sorry, didn’t mean to insult your mate."

Sirius’ nostrils flared, though that could’ve just been the exertion.

“Just don’t talk about it. Miles left.”

“Fine,” Remus huffed.

“Fine.”

They were nearly at the top now, and he couldn’t wait to drop the stereo down and leave Sirius to his obvious sulking. If he didn’t want to talk, that was just fine with him, maybe it was even a saving grace. It only meant that he’d have an excuse not to explain the cigarettes or the lock-picking.

“Almost there,” Sirius said, glancing behind himself as they went. “At the top we can put it—”

Sirius’ foot came out from under him just before the top stair and he went down on his arse with a gasp, slamming the stereo back into Remus’ chest and nearly causing him to lose his balance completely. If Sirius hadn’t reached out at the last second and fisted the front of his shirt, Remus would’ve surely tumbled backward down the entire flight of stairs, the stereo on top of him.

“Don’t worry I got you!” Sirius yelped, eyes wide.

The air gone from his lungs, it was all Remus could do to nod, balancing the rest of the hi-fi’s weight on Sirius’ lap and knees.

“I’m gonna let go and grab it really quick,” Sirius said, nodding once before snatching his hand back and lifting the stereo off of his legs in one smooth motion. Remus exhaled and groaned, giving the other boy one final second to struggle to his feet before they finally lifted it over the last step and dropped the thing down on the balcony floor with a heavy metallic thud.

“This was a fucking terrible idea,” Remus moaned, a hand on his aching back.

“And it was almost the worst spill I’ve ever seen,” James said from across the balcony, where he and Peter were sticking their heads out of the tiny door that led into the internal guts of the church organ.

Sirius clapped his hands against his sides. “Well thanks for the help. Now you two lazy sods can carry the damn thing the rest of the way.”

Both James and Peter grumbled a bit at being called lazy, but they managed to get the stereo into place, dropping it down on the floor in the very heart of the ginormous instrument. James had done a good job separating the two speakers so the noise would reach the most pipes, and Peter had finished winding the extension leads up from one of the broom cupboards below them in the vestibule. The timer had been plugged in too, though it would be the last thing the boys set before they left for the night.

“You got the tape, Black?” James asked, after pushing the stereo back against the biggest pipe it could reach and making sure everything was plugged in and turned on.

“Right here,” Sirius said, pulling a small black cassette from his back pocket and squatting down in front of the hi-fi, hitting the eject button. Standing back in the doorway and feeling distinctly claustrophobic in the airless, little room (he had to haunch to keep his head from brushing the wood ceiling) Remus heard the click of the cassette door opening and then watched as Sirius perked up.

“It’s already got a tape in it.”

“Sometimes people forget to take them out when they return the stereos to the AV room,” Peter shrugged. “Usually the tapes just go into a lost and found bin unless they’re labelled, but we miss them sometimes.”

“Well this one’s labelled,” Sirius said, plucking the tape out and turning it over, “but only with a date. ‘February 14th 1972’.”

Remus snorted slightly. “Valentine’s Day?”

“You could test the sound out with it,” James prompted, clearly just as interested.

Scrunching his nose with a smile, Sirius pushed the tape back into the cassette dock and hit play. There was a bit of crackling, then the speakers hummed to life, projecting what sounded like a woman giggling.

“Nice of them to rewind it for us,” Sirius said, earning himself a sharp ‘shh’ from both Peter and James. There was more giggling, then a bit of indistinguishable whispering—two voices this time—each muffled consonant amplified by the high volume of the speakers and bouncing around the inside of the organ so severely that it made them all wince.

“Maybe turn it down for now,” Remus tried, earning himself his own ‘shh’, this time from Sirius, who’s back had gone arrow straight in front of the hi-fi.

“Do you hear that?”

James looked from Peter to Remus. “Yeah, but what—”

“I’m gonna fast-forward,” Sirius said, before pressing a button on the front of the stereo. There was a loud whirring sound, more akin to a tornado than a cassette tape, and when Sirius finally hit the play button, they all heard the familiar click of the tape settling into place, before the entire room erupted in what could’ve only been the sounds of two people shagging one another.

'Ohhhhhh—oh god! Ohhh my god!'

If their brains had been lightbulbs, all four of them would’ve lit up so brightly you’d have been able to see them from space. The realisation of just what it was that they were blasting across the entire church had Peter clapping his hands to his head with a shrill screech, as James inhaled so sharply it almost sounded like he’d swallowed his tongue. Remus, who had never heard such a sound apart from those raunchy movies you could sometimes catch on certain TV channels in the wee hours of the morning, stared up at the ceiling open-mouthed as though the moaning was coming from every direction—which it was.

'Mhmmnnn, ooohhhh!'

“Turn it off!” James wailed, as Sirius scrambled to hit the eject button, cutting off the panting just as the voices had begun to rise to another strenuous cacophony. He fell over the stereo, laughing like he didn’t know what else to do as the rest of the boys sank down to the floor of the tiny, musty-smelling organ room.

“I think your Swot Club president, Francis, has some explaining to do, Pete,” Sirius wheezed. “Oh god, imagine the faces on those ministers if we played this.”

“We are not playing that at Communion,” James snapped.

“Okay, okay,” Sirius agreed, “but I think it might be worth it to keep a hold of this.” Sirius scooped out the tape and pocketed it with a horrible grin on his face.

“At least we know the stereo works,” Peter said limply.

“And that it’s more than bloody loud enough,” Remus said, resisting a shudder. He didn’t really know what was being done to that woman to invoke such noises, but he was pretty sure they wouldn’t get away with putting it on TV.

* * *

The only reason they managed to avoid the wrath of their dorm monitor was because Benjy had fallen asleep on one of the sofas in the common room after attempting to stay up and catch them out after curfew.

“Can’t punish us if he didn’t see us come in,” Sirius whispered as they crept up the stairs.

It was past midnight by the time they were all washed and dressed for bed. James and Peter fell asleep the moment their heads hit the pillow, but Remus still felt wide awake. Being out in the night air had left his body humming. It was as close a feeling he’d had to his life in the East End since he’d left London nearly two months prior, and he could feel a familiar bout of his restlessness setting in. He’d just cracked a book—assigned reading for Modern Languages—when Sirius emerged from the bathroom dressed in his pyjamas.

“Bit late for reading, innit, Lupin?” Sirius asked in a low voice. It was a bit odd to hear a posh boy use words like 'innit', but if Sirius noticed the look Remus gave him, he ignored it. Both James and Peter had drawn the curtains around their beds to block out the light from Remus’ lamp, and Sirius gave a deep yawn.

“Can’t sleep.”

Nodding, Sirius crossed the room to his bed and paused before his stereo, slowly thumbing through the records he’d left on top. Watching him from his spot against his headboard, Remus thought back to the AV room, the answer to such an obvious problem, if only Sirius deserved it.

After a few moments Sirius stepped away from his wardrobe hutch and bent over his bed, gathering his covers back and slipping beneath them. It was restraint that he was showing, despite being just as obviously wound-up as Remus was. It was enough, and Remus sat up quickly. After they’d made it back from the church he’d stashed his prize beneath his bed and now he reached for them. A part of him did want to see Sirius walk around on his eggshells for a bit longer, but the music had really only been bad that first week, and eventually Sirius had taken to turning the music down or off completely whenever Remus entered the room; James' doing probably.

Fiddling with them a bit, Remus crossed the room to Sirius' bed just as the other boy was about to turn out his lamp. Halfway there, he became very aware of a burning heat in his ears. "Here," he said, holding out a pair of headphones, each earpiece slightly worn from use and time, but intact none-the-less.

Sirius, half-lying in bed, stared at the headphones, then at Remus, as though he expected him to pull his arm back the moment he reached for them. Remus had to wave his hand and nodded in a 'go-on' before Sirius finally took them.

"I know you like to listen before bed." That much was obvious.

Sirius nodded, untwisting the wires slowly. "Yeah…"

"I didn't steal them," Remus said, pointedly, "I just borrowed them. You're going to have to give them back eventually."

Sirius glanced up at him. "Okay."

Remus clicked his tongue, rocking back on his heels a bit. "They plug in there," he said, pointing to the hi-fi's audio jack.

"I know where they plug in."

"Good then." Remus turned and marched back to his bed, throwing himself down on top of the covers and picking up his book, trying to ignore the warmth that had spread from his ears to the rest of his face.

"Hey, Lupin?" Sirius called.

"Yeah?"

"Cheers."

Remus bit his lip. "Cheers, Black."

* * *

Hearing the alarm clock that morning felt more akin to sticking a fireplace poker into his ears than a simple wake-up call.

“Potter turn it off,” Remus moaned, before he realised that it was his own alarm and reached over to smack the clock to the floor.

“Poor, poor alarm clock,” James said, picking up the timepiece and replacing it on the bedside table. Already dressed and looking like the most devout son a parent could ask for, he nudged Remus’ shoulder over his covers. “C’mon, Lupin. You should be up with the larks. Don’t want to miss church.”

“No he does not!” A voice called—Sirius’. “Not after all that work we put in.”

Remus batted James’ hand away and turned over to face the wall never to his bed with a wordless groan.

“You’re as bad as Pete,” James laughed. “At least he’s in the shower already. What time did you go to bed?”

“Dunno…”

Already tugging his shoes on, Sirius let out a cheeky laugh. “He was up all night, serenading the moon, that Lupin. A-woooo! ”

Remus sat up at that. “That was you! I heard you singing The Moody Blues all night.”

“I couldn’t very well waste your gift.”

“Gift?” James echoed, and to Remus’ relief Sirius only shrugged.

“All I’m saying is that your ancestors must’ve been counting on having an insomniac in the family, naming themselves ‘Lupin’.”

“It just means ‘wolf’,” Remus bit back.

“One of nature’s fiercest nocturnal animals!”

“There aren’t even any wolves in the UK.”

Sirius shrugged again. “Guess that’s why they let you stay, gotta fill a quota.”

Shooting Sirius the bird, Remus grudgingly swung his legs over the side of his bed and rubbed his eyes, still raw from reading by lamplight. Shoulder to shoulder, James and Sirius headed for the door.

“We’re going down early to make sure no one's caught on,” James said. “You and Pete come down together when you’re ready.”

“And don’t be late, wolf-boy!” Sirius shouted. Remus picked up his shoe from beside his bed and threw it after them, letting it slam into the back of the door.

By the time he and Peter had finished breakfast and rushed down to the church, it was already twenty past and the bells were ringing. Sirius and James were waiting for them out front and all four of them filled in together, looking remarkably ordinary amongst the rest of the students and staff, and not at all like anyone who had any ulterior motives for showing up for the morning’s Holy Worship. They found seats along the centre aisle and sat down with varying degrees of enthusiasm.

“What cassette did you end up going with? You never did say,” Peter said, leaning over James to whisper. Sirius only lifted his chin.

“Guess you’ll have to wait and find out.”

Slumping back against the pew bench, Remus pulled his elbows in close to himself to keep from brushing up against Sirius, who was a constant fidgeter on an average day, but was now vibrating like a plucked guitar string.

“Keep moving like that, Black, and they’ll know it was you who did it,” Remus grumbled.

“Did what?”

Nearly jumping a foot off the pew, Remus turned to and came face to face with Mary, who dropped down on the bench next to him and leaned in close. Beyond her Lily, Marlene, and Lottie all slid in, with Lily looking like she’d swallowed a sour grape. Clearly she didn’t want to spend another Communion in such close quarters with the boys, and Remus could hardly blame her.

“Nose out, Macdonald,” Sirius said over Remus’ shoulder.

“Someone woke up on the wrong side of the bed today.”

“I assure you,” Sirius said, “I did not. Fine day, Sunday. Time to welcome the Lord in all His morning glory."

Mary and Remus rolled their eyes together before she knocked her shoulder into his. "You'd think he was actually devout or something. I, on the other hand, shouldn't even have to be here since I'm Buddhist and all."

Remus raised an eyebrow. "You're a Buddhist?"

"For two years now."

"Don't you have to be baptized to go to school here?"

Lily looked over, her green eyes bright. "She was baptized. She's just been saying she's Buddhist for two years."

"It's a sin to lie in church, you know," Marlene said from over Lily's shoulder.

Mary turned her nose up. "Rules need not apply."

"You know I did some reading on Buddhists over the summer," Marlene said. "And you don't act like one at all. They all talk about how enlightenment is attained through meditation and wisdom."

"That feels racist, Marls. They're my people."

Marlene sputtered. "What? No—I just mean that you never meditate. And Buddhism comes from India!"

"I've got cousins who are Buddhist," James offered, turning it into a pew-wide conversation.

"See?"

"McKinnon," Sirius interjected, "are you saying Macdonald can't be black and Buddhist?"

Mary snorted, and Marlene slammed her palms down on her lap. "No —ugh!"

"You could always take up Satanism, Macdonald," Sirius supplied. "Maybe then they'd really kick you out of the church."

"Why bother? It clearly didn't work for you."

He wiggled a finger at her. "Naughty, Macdonald. But, I wouldn't worry too much about having to fake your prayers today." Sirius learned back to share a knuckle bump with James, who turned and did the same with Peter.

"So you did do something then!" Mary said, at the same time that Lily moaned; "Good lord, you've done something haven't you?"

"I'm not sure what you're talking about," Sirius said, leaning back in his seat and looking very smug. Shaking her head, Lily glanced at Remus questioningly, but before he could even think about fessing up, James' words from the night before popped into his head; All for one and one for all.

Remus just shrugged.

As the priests called the Communion to attention, Mary nudged Marlene with her elbow. "You never lambaste Lily, and she took your Lord's name in vain."

"Shh!"

If Remus was being completely honest, he didn't know much about the details of the prank, aside from what he'd contributed directly. James and Sirius had plucked a timer switch off the Godric common room wall, meaning that that morning they'd woken up without any overhead light in their shared living space. Remus had no idea what time the music was supposed to start, or even what song Sirius had chosen. He only knew one thing for sure; if the plan worked, it was sure to be loud.

By the second reading Sirius was growing increasingly antsy. He bounced back and forth on his toes when they stood and tapped his leg incessantly when they sat. The kid just ahead of him might've just gone bald at the back of the head with the force of Sirius' glare. At one point he reached across James and yanked Peter by his wrist so he could see the time on his watch.

"I thought you said that the timer would work," Sirius hissed to Remus, very low.

"It would if you set it right," Remus replied, indignant.

Sirius gave an irritated 'tsk' and threw himself back into his pew.

"You reckon we buggered it up?" James murmured.

“There’s always next week,” Peter said, hopefully.

Sirius grunted and crossed his arms over his chest, looking rather childish. It was getting near the end now; an hour had passed without so much as a chime from the balcony.

“What’s wrong with him?” Mary asked after another reading wrapped up and the priests began to prepare the bread and wine—which really was real wine, not that anyone was given enough to get drunk off of, of course.

“Dunno,” Remus said, and she gave him a look that said, ‘you’re full of shit’.

It only took a few minutes for the church to begin moving. First the professors and staff present approached the priests and received their sacramental food and drink, then the year sevens, the year eights, and so on.

By the time it was their turn, Sirius was well and right pissed. They stood up from their pew and followed each other toward the priests’ altar in one great line, Sirius with his hands behind his head and dragging his feet.

“Can’t believe we got the time wrong,” he muttered.

“Don’t be so gutted, Black,” James tried, “maybe there’s just a delay.”

“Oh that’s it!”

Lily, who had ended up just ahead of Remus in line, spun around to face the four boys, her red brow deeply creased, lips were pinched. “This is a church, even you lot should have some sense of decorum!”

“Careful, Evans, or you’ll turn red all over,” Sirius said, making James and Peter snigger. Lily, beyond words, stepped forward so suddenly that Remus jumped back, slamming his heel down on Sirius’ foot. There was a sound between ‘OI!’ and ‘AUGH!’ but no one heard it, because at that very same moment, a booming voice echoed from the heavens above.

'HEY HEY MAMA SAID THE WAY YOU MOVE!
GONNA MAKE YOU SWEAT GONNA MAKE YOU GROOVE!'

Three hundred heads and open mouths looked up at the same time and Led Zeppelin delivered—blasting their lyrics from every direction.

'AH AH CHILD WAY YOU SHAKE THAT THING!
GONNA MAKE YOU BURN GONNA MAKE YOU STING!'

The sounds seemed to ricochet like they were hitting each organ pipe and reverberating through the very bones of the church. Every guitar strum made the walls thrum, and any and all thought of prayer was forgotten. People stood up, looked around in confusion, some even covered their ears. Sirius only beamed, grinning from ear to ear like a kid on Christmas. If James hadn't thrown an arm around his best friend's shoulders, Sirius probably would've launched himself into the air triumphantly right there in the aisle.

Remus, still in a state of shock that they'd done it—that he was actually listening to Led Zeppelin in bloody church—turned to the girls, taking in the range of emotion on their faces as they were continuously serenaded with the song's start and stop a capella. Each of them were, like Remus, utterly stupefied, but out of all of them Mary seemed the most amused, her mouth dropped open into awe. Marlene looked horrified as like with most things, she took Communion quite seriously, and had her hands clasped over her mouth. Lottie's head was shifting from left and right, like she couldn't decide what direction the sound was coming from. It was Lily that really surprised him though; unlike everyone else, she was looking down at the ground, her expression as equally dumbstruck as it was perturbed.

"We did it, wolf-man!" Sirius jeered next to Remus, grabbing onto his shoulder and shaking him as he rocked his head back and forth in time with the song.

"Don't call me wolf-man!" Remus snapped, as the song hit its second bridge.

'HEY BABY WHOA BABY—PRETTY BABY!
DARLIN' MAKES 'EM DO ME NOW!'

As though they'd finally realised that they indeed weren't hearing things, the faculty and ministers came to life, swarming the crowd of students from the front of the church, opposite to the balcony.

"TAKE YOUR SEATS! TAKE YOUR SEATS!" One of the department heads was shouting, though they could barely be heard over the swarm of talking and shouting that had begun alongside the music.

Eventually most of the students began to turn and shuffle back to their pews, some of them sitting with more enthusiasm than others. A considerable amount of people were still standing, and Remus watched as ministers rushed down the aisles in their robes, dodging students and being chased by teachers and staff alike.

Wanting to enjoy themselves but not draw any extra attention, Peter, James, Sirius, and Remus returned to their seats as the student body grew more excited and enlivened by the music.

“You’re going to be in so much trouble!” Lily called down the pew after them, but each of the boys were busy singing along or else tapping their foot, Remus included.

“Can’t hear you, nark!” Sirius shouted back. “Music’s too loud!”

Lily looked like she might pop like a balloon as Mary took her arm, cooing something into her ear while hiding a smile herself. Lottie had disappeared across the aisle and was now sitting in the lap of her boyfriend, another year eleven boy named Mickey Truman. A passing minister stopped to berate the two for their ungodly show of affection, but the pair paid no mind, pretending that they couldn’t hear over the noise. Marlene appeared utterly still in her seat next to Lily. Her eyes were closed as though she were meditating. Perhaps she was converting to Buddhism too.

Remus slid away from the girls as far as the pew would allow. As infuriatingly grandiose as Sirius Black could be, he had decent taste in music, and Remus wanted to listen. He wasn’t the only other one either; around the church other kids had started head-banging to the song or otherwise singing. None of it sounded good—most of the kids had resorted to just belting out or wailing along to whatever words they knew—but that didn’t matter. They had turned another dreary Sunday morning into a rock concert without the instruments, and everyone was connected by it, whether they wanted to be or not.

Sitting a few rows back with the rest of the year thirteens, he spotted Benjy Fenwick laughing at the incredulous scene before him. The amusement on his face made him wonder if he’d be as entertained knowing that it was four of the students he was responsible for that had set it all up while breaking curfew. Benjy was cool enough, he’d probably get a kick out of it before giving them detention as his role of dorm monitor decreed he must. Less cool than Benjy, but not any less amazed, Davey Gudgeon was elbowing the two boys sitting next to them, trying to shout something over the music. Remus had a sneaking suspicion that at least one of the words was ‘Sirius’ or ‘Black’, undoubtedly more infatuated with Sirius than Sirius was with himself. Even Ms. Hooch, one of the only teachers not on her feet and shouting at the rowdy upper-secondaries, was gently bobbing her head in one of the first few rows. Aside from the rest of the staff, everyone was having a good time.

Well, almost everyone.

Snape sat one row ahead of them on the opposite side of the aisle and turned to glare with those squinty eyes of his. James caught his gaze and used both hands to flip the miserable boy the bird, earning himself a sharp reprimand from a passing teacher who'd gotten caught in the crossfire and assumed that he'd been the one getting flipped off in the first place. Luckily for James there was too much chaos for the teacher to stick around and soon they were all back to grinning like victorious idiots in their pew. Remus scanned the room again, hoping to catch a reaction from Mrs. Buchanan, but every now and then the music teacher would be absent from church, and today the choir had been led by a year 13 student in her place. Without their normal melodies and without any real official to lead them, the choir stood awkwardly in their robes, exchanging glances like they expected someone to come up with an explanation for the sacrilegious music.

They probably would've preferred "Stairway to Heaven", Remus thought cheekily.

"This is so fucking cool," Sirius said from his spot next to Remus, head-banging and strumming his fingers in the air as though he were playing guitar.

"Yeah," Remus said, still looking around, "cool."

'ALL I ASK FOR WHEN I PRAY—
A STEADY ROLLIN' WOMAN WON'T COME MY WAY!
NEED A WOMAN GONNA HOLD MY HAND—
TELL ME NO LIES, MAKE ME A HAPPY MAN…'

Chapter End Notes

'The Grand National' is the biggest horse race in the UK.
A 'hi-fi' is just another term for stereo.

The song is "Black Dog" by Led Zeppelin (1971). The song at the beginning is also low-key one of my favourite rock ballads. KISS covered it in 1991 but nothing beats the original for me.

Chapter 12: Halloween, 1975

Chapter Summary

First Halloween at Hawkings! One of my favourites to write and really uplifting for the soul.

Chapter Notes

CW: References to smoking.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Say there's a girl,
Who's new in town;
Well you better watch out now,
Or she'll put you down;
'Cause she's an evil chick,
Say she's the witch!

- "The Witch" The Sonics, 1965

The interruption had only lasted for about three songs, as Sirius predicted, but it remained a topic of conversation throughout the upper-secondary students for much longer than that, and as a consequence the boys of dorm 4A had become silent celebrities. Everyone knew that Sirius and James had had a hand in the music, and by extension, Remus and Peter too; but without any proof none of the teachers were able to crack down on them. More than once in the following week Remus received high-fives from kids he didn't know while walking to and from his lessons. It was a funny feeling, being famous by association—though the word 'infamous' was probably more applicable.

Oddly enough, Sirius didn't seem disgruntled by losing his cassette when the hi-fi was eventually found and confiscated. He kept saying he'd get it back sometime, along with the rest of whatever he'd lost to the school over the years. Remus figured the list included several rubber snakes and enough gag toys to choke a whale.

The second hi-fi they'd borrowed remained in the corner of their dorm room over the weekend, covered by a towel. It hadn't taken the school long to discover that the set-up had come from the AV room, but luckily Peter was pretty good at playing dumb, and everyone just assumed that whoever had done it had jimmied the door to get in. They had to change the locks though, and Peter was pretty protective over his clubroom keys after that.

“Did you tell Francis we had his sex tape when he threatened to kick you out?” Sirius cackled while teasing Peter mercilessly over breakfast the following Monday morning.

“How do you know it belong to Francis? It could be anyone's!”

“We could always play it again and see if we can catch a name.”

James snorted and reached for his tea. “The tape said it was from 1972. I doubt Francis had much game at thirteen.”

“Maybe someone in the club had a dirty habit of leaving their tape recorders under their parents’ beds.”

“Please shut up,” Peter groaned, as Sirius and James shared an evil look. When Sirius turned back to his breakfast James brought his cup to his lips and took a sip before gagging spectacularly;

“Oh my god, what—”

“That’s my cup,” Remus said, snatching the mug back.

“What’d you do, Lupin, pour the entire sugar tin into your tea?”

“Keep it up and I’ll put salt in yours.”

“You’re going to end up with diabetes.”

Despite James’ distress over his rampant sweet tooth, the last week of October had came and gone with next to no fighting. Now that Sirius was no longer basting rock and roll all hours of the night, Remus had managed to settle in, though he did so reluctantly. Ever since the successful prank in church the boys had come to a quiet understanding (pun intended) and Sirius rarely played his music without making use of the headphones anymore. This led James and Peter to become quite comfortable leaving them in the same room alone together without the worry of WW3 breaking out. Apparently, playing Switzerland in your own bedroom was much more involved than one might think.

The real shock came when Remus realised he was almost disappointed by Sirius' willingness to use the headphones. Whether it be late in the night, when the others were fast asleep and Remus was only one awake, or during their free-time during the day, Sirius was always lying back in bed, eyes shut and ears covered, the only sound that of the turntable's crackling needle. It was finally James who broke the dorm's silence when he put a record on while the boys were sitting around playing a mock game of poker. They had nothing to bet with, so whoever won got to pick the next song. Remus, who had always been sort of shit at card games, managed to win twice and put on Who's Next both times, only slightly jealous that Sirius had the record. James ended up taking the most rounds, and Remus was surprised to find that the sportsy boy did have decent taste in music—he appreciated The Kinks a lot, and Bad Company as well. It was Peter who took the final round though, and they finished with his favourite, Cream's "Sunshine of Your Love", which Remus had never heard before but enjoyed immensely.

Missing Sirius' music might've been worse, if the Black family heir wasn't so intent on playing the part of the diabolical mastermind. Only a few hours into the Monday morning that followed Communion, the rest of Hawkings discovered why they'd taken a second stereo.

Remus was in Literacy with Sirius and Peter when Professor Flitwick's lecturing was interrupted by feedback from a speaker. It started just as an echo at first, distant and haunting, but as the volume rose, so did the heads of every kid in class. It was happy chaos after that, as their professor tried to keep order while Sweet's "Teenage Rampage" played overhead.

"They couldn't have picked a better song?" Remus' seat partner, Jodie Gagnon, said.

"It is a good song," he fired back.

Each day the music appeared in a different building. First it was the Agrippan Block, then the Galilei Block was assaulted by the soothing rock and roll of Alice Cooper, followed by Manfred Mann in Le Fay Hall, and finally ending with Thursday when the year 10 girls' gym lesson ran alongside a repeating tape of Tom Jones' "She's a Lady".

The most genius part, in Remus' opinion, was how they'd positioned the stereos. Utilising the school's extensive vent system, the boys left the hi-fi within the walls and ceilings, running a single extension lead to power it each time. Anyone just going about their day wouldn't notice the stray cable at all and being able to place the stereo within any vent on any given floor made things much easier to swap around.

Along with his roommates, Remus participated in every switch, the last one being Le Fay Hall to the gym, where the vents there were too high up for anyone but him to climb into even if they were standing on each other's backs. As entertaining as it was to listen to rock music when they were supposed to be learning, come Friday the joke had turned a bit stale, and they'd mostly lost interest in the thrill that came with secretly shuttling the heavy stereo from building to building. Really, Ms. Hooch's discovery of the hi-fi in the vent just outside the girls' change rooms was a welcome deterrent. Though Sirius did lose another cassette as a result.

After that, the boys were simply free to be excited for Halloween. The arts and design students had gone all out this year, commissioning huge batches of ghostly sheet costumes and furry werewolf get-ups as their first term project. That Friday, students walked around with painted faces, fake teeth, and varying levels of enthusiasm. In his Modern Biology class Remus had three vampires, four pussycats, a mime, the Lone Ranger, and two kids who'd cut holes in their bed sheets as an excuse to run around shouting 'boo' at everyone. Terry Webb had even come as Her Royal Majesty the Queen.

Remus had neglected to dress up, partly because he'd never had much interest in the spooky holiday, and partly because Sirius had teased him so incessantly about going as a werewolf. He'd been fully prepared to spend that evening on his own with a book and maybe a spliff; his roommates could do as they pleased. Unfortunately, he'd neglected to tell Lily Evans of his plans beforehand.

While Sirius and James had already disappeared after dinner with Peter in tow, chittering about something to do with Salazar House, Remus made his way back to his dorm where he found himself waylaid by the red-head as she cradled one very large pumpkin to her chest.

"Remus!" Lily cried, approaching him with her regular, chipper attitude—the one she tended to have when not around James or Sirius. Remus turned to her, almost impressed she was managing to hold herself upright with such a burden.

"Alright, Evans. What are you wearing?"

Lily looked down at herself, or more accurately, at the pumpkin. Below that she was dressed in a blue dress with red slippers and white tights. Her red hair was braided down either shoulder, ending with two big blue bows.

“It’s my Halloween costume. I’m Dorothy—from the ‘Wizard of Oz’.”

“Oh.”

“Are you not dressing up?” She asked, smiling, and Remus noticed the heavy blusher painted on her cheeks in big circles.

“No,” he said, “Halloween’s not really a favourite holiday of mine.”

“Oh. Does that mean you’re busy?”

“Er… no?”

“Brilliant! I need you to be my pumpkin partner.”

Remus tilted his head. “Your what?”

“My pumpkin partner!” Lily repeated, unperturbed. “Lottie and Marlene are already paired up, and which would normally leave me with Mary, but she’s already gone off with some year twelve boy named Johncy and left me without a partner.”

“A partner for…?”

“The pumpkin carving contest,” Lily said, rousing Remus’ memory. “Houses Dorset and Rowena do it every year. Anyone can join in. We use the pumpkins Professor Arbor grows over the summer.”

“Oh…” Remus said, scratching his head. “Well I was just going—”

“Please Remus?” Lily asked again, the heavy pumpkin not inhibiting her ability to shine those big green eyes at him. “There’s a prize,” she prompted, “enough sweets to last you until Christmas.”

Remus dropped his head back to squint at the sky. The sun had already gone, leaving them under that faint blue dusk you got right before nightfall in the autumn months.

“Fine.”

“Great!” Lily said. “Follow me!”

And Remus did, taking the pumpkin from her and only regretting it when he realised that Dorset House was at the very end of House Lane and the trolleys had stopped running for the evening.

“Why didn’t you ask Snape to be your partner?” He asked as they walked. “Isn’t he your friend?”

He'd seen the pair of them together on campus more than a handful of times. Most of the time Snape seemed content to let Lily chatter while glaring at anyone who got close enough to invade their bubble. More than once Lily had played the role of diffuser between him and Remus’ roommates, often opting to drag Severus away before any of the boys’ jeers got him too riled up. Remus only had two lessons with Snape, Modern Biology and History, and they sat on opposite sides of the classroom for both, much to his relief.

“Ha, Sev,” Lily chuckled, pumping her arms to keep up with Remus’ strides, “he’s not interested in things like this. Couldn’t get him to wear a white sheet even if I wanted to.”

Suppressing the urge to say that Snape might’ve looked better with a sheet over his head, Remus nodded with pursed lips. “So I guess you're just prefects together then?”

“Oh no, Sev's my oldest friend. We're neighbours back home so I've known him for years.”

So it was a friendship of convenience then. Remus couldn’t relate. He’d never held onto any friends he’d known growing up. They’d all been kids of government officials or public ministers, exactly the kind that he'd spent the last four years avoiding. There had been a few guys at the other schools, but no one he'd bothered to keep up with and nothing compared to Tomny.

“He’s sort of a prat, you know,” Remus said, offhandedly. “A real self-important nob.”

“He’s not really,” Lily retorted. “His dad only owns a shipping company back in Liverpool.”

“So he’s not well-off?”

“Well… no, he is.” Lily brushed a lock of red hair out of her face. “He’s just not like others.”

Remus raised an eyebrow. “You mean like Potter and Black.”

“Yes! God. They’re insufferable. I don’t know how Peter does it—and now you! Honestly, you should've just asked for a room change, Remus."

It would be a lie to say that he'd never entertained the idea during those first few weeks, but things were at least bearable now. "You don't think I'm like that?"

"Hm?"

"Like them. Rich—poncy."

"No," Lily said, honestly. "I mean… you don't exactly dress like them."

Remus looked down at his regulation Hawkings' uniform, grey slacks, a red polo, leather loafers. He'd never looked more like James and Sirius.

Lily caught his look. "I mean when you arrived," she amended. "Did you come here because of… with some help?"

Remus suddenly felt rather indignant. It was one thing to be labelled a yob in a room full of other yobs, and another to be one around the precious, minted few. And then he remembered her reaction the very first day they'd met, and it hit him.

"You think I'm poor."

"No!" Lily said quickly. "I just meant like, you're smart—was there some sort of arrangement with your marks or tuition or…?"

"My dad's a state Minister," Remus said. "He heads MAFF's department for animal welfare."

"Oh." Lily looked down at her shoes again, then back up. "I see. Sorry, Remus. I didn't mean to offend you or anything."

Remus felt a sudden surge of self-loathing rise in his gut. He never used Lyall's position to grandstand—and had never needed to, especially around his friends back in London—but two months at Hawkings and he was already feeling the sting. For so long he'd told himself the teasing he got after showing up in dirty clothes with a dusty old trunk was his reward. I'm nothing like you, he'd thought, as others whispered about him behind his back. Now, he felt like an idiot playing both sides.

“You didn’t,” he said guiltily, adjusting his grip on the pumpkin. “And don’t worry, even if you had, Black would still have you beat several dozen to one.”

Lily smiled shyly at his poor attempt at a joke and they continued on to Dorset House with only talk of the contest, which Lily did most of. The girls dorm, which was normally decorated in its House colours of yellow and brown, had been dressed up with the most vigorous Halloween decorum Remus had ever seen. Fake tombstones decorated the lawn, complete with paper-mache hands made to look like the living dead popping out of the grass like spring daisies. Cotton fluff was twisted into every tree and branch, and orange, black, and purple paper streamers covered every window and doorway. Real candles were scattered about the front steps and windowsills, leaving behind small waterfalls of wax while fake bats hung from the ceiling. Under normal circumstances the dorm wouldn’t have permitted any boys inside at all, but thanks to the holiday the lower floor was filled with students from every House, most dressed up in costumes. Though the Dorset dorm monitor was prowling the hallways and staircases, dressed in a Greek toga robe and making sure no one tried to sneak up the stairs for a bit of unsavoury fun.

Remus had grossly underestimated the turnout for the contest. There were over twenty teams, each pair with their own pumpkin to carve. Plenty of other students piled into the cosy common room to watch, surrounding the tables that had been set up for carving and walking across the tarps meant to protect the floors. Music was playing from a hi-fi across the room—Supertramp—and the room felt warm from the tightly crowded bodies, despite the ample amount of space.

Lily led Remus to the centre of the room, next to Marlene and Lottie, where he was finally able to drop off the heavy pumpkin.

“Hi ya, Remus,” Lottie said. She’d painted her face with orange and black stripes to look like a tiger. Next to her, Marlene waved over the chatter while wearing a red and white football jersey. Remus had no idea which team it belonged to, and he didn’t ask.

One of the Dorset girls eventually got up onto a couch in the centre of the common room to explain the contest. There were only three rules; no knives were to be used, instead the students were left to de-gut and carve their pumpkins with various other utensils raided from Rowena and Dorset’s kitchenettes. Any pumpkin gut throwing (at least inside the dorm) would be met with time penalizations. Finally, only one team member could be touching the pumpkin at a time, and they would be blindfolded while the other gave instructions on their behalf. Halfway through the pair would switch and when time was up the best pumpkin was declared the winner and awarded a prize.

Remus, horrified that he'd been tricked into a very non-traditional carving contest, rounded on Lily. "You can be blindfolded first!" She said through a guilty grin. "That way you're really only scooping the guts."

He groaned, but let Lily put the blindfold—a yellow Dorset House tie—around his head all the same. "Wait," he said, waving his hands out in front of him, "how am I supposed to get into the thing?"

Before Lily could answer him, a whistle was blown and the room dissolved into madness. There was instant laughing and squealing from every direction, and with only ten minutes before Lily was to switch with him, Remus fumbled to find his pumpkin.

"Here Remus!"

Lily shoved something into his hands and he ran his hands along it until he realised it was a double-pronged carving fork.

"Watch those fingers!" One of the judges shouted.

"Lily what the hell am I supposed to do with this?"

"Crack it open!" She cheered.

Remus grunted and began running his hands along the top of the pumpkin. He could still see light from around the edges of his blindfold, but he was going to lose a finger if he wasn't careful.

"I'm not sure this is any safer than a knife!" He moaned, answered only by Lily's gleeful laugh.

It took nearly half the allotted time, but Remus finally managed to skewer the pumpkin enough to crack open its top, using the rough stem to pry the lid off. Not a moment later he lost the carving fork, and Lily shoved him an ice cream scoop. It took him barely thirty seconds to abandon the utensil in lieu of his own hands, which he used to scoop out the guts and drop them on the table top. The music had gotten louder and it was now just a roar, making his heart rate rise until it was just slamming against his ribcage.

"One minute!"

“Remus hurry!”

The pumpkin guts slipped and squished around his fingers, but he was already too committed to the act to stop. When the whistle blew he was almost panting, his face flushed as Lily removed his blindfold for the partner switch.

“Tie it on me!” She squealed. Remus did so, getting a decent amount of pumpkin in her red plaits in the process.

As Lily and Lottie stepped up to the table for their turn the whistle blew again and Remus scrambled to get Lily something to carve with. He ended up choosing the same ice cream scoop, which at least had a sharp edge good for chiseling away the pumpkin’s surface.

“Do the eyes,” he shouted, “they’re just circles!”

Lily grinned, her head tilted upwards as she brought her fingers down across the pumpkin’s slippery surface.

Sight now returned, Remus looked down at himself to find his shirt and shoes were soaked with pumpkin innards, but he was hardly the only one; Marlene had a pumpkin seed stuck to her forehead and several in her hair.

Students started to get considerably more rowdy toward the end of the competition. Everyone was shouting at those blindfolded with various tips and tricks and a group of kids who had of course, started a pumpkin gut war, were being chased by the Dorset girls shouting in defence of their precious common room. Remus found that he was enjoying himself, especially when he noticed how Lily stuck her tongue out of the corner of her mouth when she concentrated. She managed to get two decent eye holes and a lopsided mouth which she fumbled with blindly until she managed to stick a piece of pumpkin in to look like a tooth.

Near the very end, while the blindfolded partners were scrambling to finish their masterpieces, the presiding judges called for candles to be lit. After lending Marlene his zippo, Remus lit his own candle and dropped it into the base of his and Lily’s pumpkin. It was definitely ugly, but they’d carved it blindfolded without so much as a proper knife, and neither of them had ever claimed to be an artist. As he stared at the messy face, an idea popped into Remus’ head, and he reached one grubby pumpkin-hand into his pocket.

“Lily, here,” he whispered, a single lighter click later, “take this.”

“What is it?” She asked, about to remove her blindfold.

“Just put it in the pumpkin’s mouth.”

Lily’s eyebrows knit together over the yellow tie, but she did as he asked and Remus smugly dropped the pumpkin’s horrible misshapen lid on top just as the final whistle blew.

“Hands off!” One of the Dorset girls shouted and the music quieted. “The judges will commence their judging!”

Standing back with his messy hands clasped innocently behind his back, Remus swallowed a smile as Lily pulled off her blindfold to inspect their pumpkin. Instantly her eyes bulged and she gasped. “Remus!”

“That’s brilliant!” Lottie laughed, as other students gathered around to inspect the messy table. Lily raised a fist and batted him on the shoulder, making him flinch back, a now more brazen grin on his face.

“Out of the way, judges coming through!”

Three year 13 girls appeared next to them and stared down at the lumpy pumpkin, covered in the remnants of mushy orange insides with two sorely misplaced eyes and a single lit cigarette held between its tooth and upper lip. They stared at first, before bursting into giggles and moving on, pointing at the cigarette while all the other students did the same.

“You nutter, we could’ve won!” Lily moaned.

“We might still,” Remus said, smugly.

“We’ll be lucky if they don’t tell a teacher what you did.”

“It’s Halloween, Lils,” Lottie crooned, “nothing wrong with a little special effects.”

“Thank you, Lottie.”

“It was kind of funny,” Marlene surmised.

“Not you too, Marls.” Lily covered her eyes. She was whinging, but when she finally looked up again she only shrugged. “Oh well, there’s always next year.”

After a few minutes of deliberation, the judges stepped up onto the common room sofa once more. Second place and the prize of several chocolate bars went to a pair of girls from Bronte House for their attempted rendition of a pumpkin clown.

“And first place goes to…” There was a slapping noise as the whole room gave a drum roll on whatever surface was closest. “The pumpkin with a nasty smoking habit!”

A cheer went up, and Lily joined in despite herself, throwing her hands into the air in celebration.

“Remus the genius!” Lottie shouted, grappling onto his arm. Kids were hooting and laughing, turning their spooky painted faces into masks of glee. Remus was passed a pillowcase that dragged the floor with enough sweets to feed the whole British Army, and as he moved about the room, others patted him on the back and asked him and Lily when they were going to share. At some point, while their backs were turned, the pumpkin’s cigarette vanished.

* * *

Apparently not much of a partier, Lily lasted about a half hour after the contest’s end before asking Remus to walk her back to her dorm. Marlene had already agreed to go off with Lottie in search of her boyfriend, Mickey, and the pairs went their separate ways on Dorset’s front steps.

Making his way down House Lane, Remus carried their pumpkin in front of him, grateful that its heavy insides had been replaced with a winner’s badge that read “Least Ugly Pumpkin, 1975”. Lily carried the pillowcase containing their winnings, rocking her head back and forth as though she had a song stuck in her head.

“Thanks for being my partner, Remus.”

“No problem. Felt sorta nice.”

“To win, you mean?”

“Yeah…” And it had. He’d already partaken in enough Halloween chocolate that he didn’t even mind that someone had pinched one of his cigarettes.

“Sorry if I interrupted some plans,” Lily said, though she sounded more happy than regretful.

“You didn’t,” Remus shook his head. “It was good.”

A moment of silence passed between them. Remus could hear more music far off, coming from one of the other dorms. It was joined by the odd far-away hoot from an excited student, and occasionally Lily would wave to others as they passed them in the road.

“You finish that history paper yet?” She asked.

“Not yet,” Remus sighed.

“You’ve still got time. Professor Binns is pretty kind when it comes to due dates.”

“Hm.”

“I could help you if you'd like. We could work on it together in the library tomorrow. Or any day really. Exam prep starts in November, and it’s always good to study with friends. We could quiz each other.”

“Yeah, maybe.”

“HI YA LUPIN!”

Remus nearly jumped out of his skin at the shout while Lily launched herself about three feet across the pavement. They both spun round to find James and Sirius standing there in black cloaks, a pair of ugly green masks drawn up on their heads.

“Jesus Christ,” Remus gasped. “You could’ve said someth—”

“SORRY LUPIN!” Sirius interrupted gleefully, dashing forward to snatch the carved pumpkin from his arms and sprint away with it. James followed waving a baseball bat over his head.

“Black, you horrible bastard!” Lily screeched, running a few paces after them before nearly tripping over the pillowcase.

“Can’t stay to chat, Evans!” Sirius called, his voice slightly muffled now that he had pulled his mask down over his face. “Got pumpkins to pulverise!”

“Gourds to gouge!” James supplied, hooting as he ran.

“Jack’s to crack!”

“Squashes to… To squash!”

Remus approached Lily as the two bolted away into the dark, shaking his head lightly.

“Those arseholes,” she huffed, crossing her arms. “They stole our winning pumpkin.”

“Oh well. S’just a pumpkin.”

“Remus, they’re going to ruin it!”

“They can’t make it any uglier,” he snorted. “At least we kept the sweets?”

Lily moaned something that sounded a lot like an exasperated ‘ugh, boys’, but as they started down the road again, carrying the pillowcase between them, Remus didn’t miss the smile tugging at the corners of her mouth.

Chapter End Notes

'Who’s Next' is an album by The Who, produced in 1971.
'MAFF' stands for "Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries, and Food". It was the UK department responsible for exactly what it entails and was replaced by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA) in 2002.

Note: For the sake of story, both Lily and Snape are from Liverpool and Sirius is from Bath, while the rest of our main characters hail from London. And for those of you who know your LGBT+ music history, don't look too deeply into James' love for the Kinks. (Or do, hehe.)

Author's Note: Thank you so much for reading this far! Comments mean the world to me and I love hearing what you think. It really propels me to keep writing. Cheers and love <3

Chapter 13: Spectacular Sweet Sixteen

Chapter Summary

Sirius' sixteen birthday begins somewhat modest and of course, ends with a bang.

Chapter Notes

CW: Brief references to smoking.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

People stared at the makeup on his face,
Laughed at his long black hair, his animal grace;
The boy in the bright blue jeans,
Jumped up on the stage;
And lady stardust sang his songs,
Of darkness and disgrace;

And he was alright, the band was altogether,
Yes he was alright, the song went on forever;
And he was awful nice,
Really quite out of sight,
And he sang all night long…

- "Lady Stardust" David Bowie, 1972

November 3rd was their first Monday back to school after a weekend of Halloween-related festivities (and clean up). Coincidentally, it was also Sirius Black's sixteenth birthday.

Woken up by James and Peter as they threw back his bed curtains, Sirius seemed perfectly delighted to be body-slammed into his mattress, returning their shouts of admiration and delight with laughter of his own. Remus rolled over and squinted in the light before sitting up on his bed; he'd stayed up late and forgotten to shut his own curtains again. Despite his generally poor disposition in the mornings, it was almost funny to watch them tussle, but when Sirius caught his gaze, Remus hid his interest with a yawn.

Sirius' birthday breakfast was fit for a king. James had talked one of the dining hall's cooks into whipping up a plate of Dutch cream waffles and they'd slathered them with every topping available in the kitchens. Half expecting Sirius to make a big show of it, Remus was surprised by how exceptionally modest he appeared throughout the meal, even after they'd gotten half the dining hall to sing him happy birthday. Thanks to their adjoining schedules, Remus spent his entire morning bearing witness to Sirius' exceptionally normal behaviour. He'd assumed that with an ego as big as his, Sirius would go around demanding everyone sing his praises, but apart from the occasional birthday wishes from other friendly students, things were remarkably standard. Mrs. Buchanan did get the entire forms class to sing but Sirius remained quiet and humble, thanking everyone apart from Crouch, who'd elected to serenade him with his armpit.

Remus didn't speak to Sirius much during their lessons. He'd wished him a quiet happy birthday over breakfast, which Sirius had accepted graciously, but still he remained sceptical. He'd always been indifferent to his own birthday, perhaps Sirius was the same?

By the time lessons let out that evening, Sirius had disappeared. Assuming it was just a result of his continuated aversion to private study hour, Remus thought nothing of it until supper when James informed him that Sirius had gone off for a scheduled phone call with his family.

"They make a big thing of it," he said, over a mouthful of peas. "Call McGongall's office and make her fetch him like she's his personal assistant. Honestly he's just lucky his parents don't make the trip themselves just to spite him. They haven't since Reg graduated out of primary anyway."

"If they're so terrible, why answer the call in the first place?" Remus grumbled, pushing his food around his plate. Both James and Peter shared a look.

"They're his family," Peter answered. "And it's his birthday. Expected, isn't it?"

Remus wouldn't know. He'd spent his last birthday in a different dorm room, plotting another escape. The incident with Mr. Wright had occurred only a few weeks later.

Later that evening Sirius returned to their room and was met with leftover dinner (roast chicken, mash, and beans) and a small lopsided chocolate cake James and Peter had whipped up in the dorm kitchenette.

“Sorry it’s not a big celebration,” James said, after they'd presented the cake.

“Don’t need a fancy party,” Sirius said, “just need my mates.” He planted himself down on the floor with his dinner box, back pressed up against the side of his bed. James sat across from him leaning up against his own bed with Peter next to him. Remus took a spot in the centre of the floor between the four beds, side-eyeing Sirius while picking at a sweets wrapper and tearing it into little pieces to keep his fingers busy.

“So, how’re Mum and Dad?” Asked James.

“Same old, same old,” Sirius mumbled, shovelling pieces of chicken into his mouth.

“They didn’t give you any crap?”

“Tried a‘course, but it wasn’t anything new. Mostly just blagged because I picked music again as a spare. They wanted me in Russian.”

Peter snorted. “What do you need Russian for? You already know French and German.”

Remus looked up from his shredded wrapper. “You speak French and German?”

“And some Italian,” Sirius said, slurping up a string bean. “Ancora stupito?”

Remus looked away again, surprised. Here he was, just trying to get a passing mark in Biology, and this tosser spoke four languages.

“Lotta good it does me in the Scottish countryside though.” Finished with his meal, Sirius wiped his mouth and set the dinner box aside. “Apparently Reg’s bringing my birthday present over.”

Both James and Peter raised their brows. Remus also listened keenly, as he always did when Sirius’ elusive brother was brought up.

“They got you a gift?" Peter asked. "Thought you were cut off still."

“I am. Doubt it’ll be anything good. Probably just something else that’ll make my life more miserable.”

Remus didn’t think Sirius Black had much of a miserable day-to-day, but he really had no idea what happened outside of the school’s grounds. Over his two months at Hawkings Remus had gathered that Sirius' family was very wealthy and that they'd provided extensive donations to the school every term since he and Reg had arrived—probably the reason why Sirius never got threatened with expulsion no matter what he pulled—but he'd also gleaned that he didn't like discussing his family much. Despite his apparent good fortune, Sirius ate the same things as the rest of the student body, opting out of the more expensive meal plans, wore regulation clothing and pyjamas even on off-days, and hardly ever visited the commissary. When he ran out of pens or lost his last rubber, he'd just borrow off of someone else. The band posters and music collection had all come out of James and Peter's trunks, and the only things he'd brought from home that he seemed to value were a few books (Shakespeare, Victor Hugo, William Blake—Sirius really leaned into the idea of the tortured romantic). Above all though, Sirius treasured his stereo and records, all of which had been gifts or else handed down from some cousin that was also estranged from the family.

As though Sirius had been reading his mind, he said; "Andy called me too."

James perked up. "She did?"

"Yeah, it was cool. She said my birthday present is going to be late though. Dora's been keeping her busy with colic and Ted's having trouble at the factory. She says they might strike soon."

"That's too bad. Sorry you gotta wait for your present."

Sirius just shrugged. "I don't mind."

"Andy always gives the best presents," Peter said, kindly.

"Yeah she does," Sirius agreed, "but she hasn't gotten out much because of Dora, so I don't mind waiting."

Dora was Andy's daughter, which made her Sirius' cousin once removed. After getting pregnant at twenty Andy married her factory worker boyfriend Ted, which effectively ejected her from the supremacist family. Their daughter was still just two, and apparently a real riot act of a kid.

"Well you don't have to wait for our gifts!" James said, before he and Peter got to their feet and dashed over to their respective trunks. They returned with two gifts; James' was obviously an album, wrapped perfectly with a slightly squashed red bow on top, while Peter's was more of a box shape and wrapped in his father's company's newspaper, The Daily London Local.

Sirius tore into the presents—several records from James, the highlight of which was absolutely Led Zeppelin's Houses of the Holy, and a new suede jacket from Peter, a bit oversized to leave some room for Sirius to fill it out as he grew.

"Thanks lads!" he said, jumping up to put on the Zeppelin album.

"I knew you were missing that one," James said eagerly, taking the vinyl's sleeve from Sirius to read-over.

Remus felt rather ruffled after that. He knew he shouldn't ought to feel guilty over not having prepared a gift, but it still felt poor to be left out. It took him until the b-side of Houses of the Holy before he'd worked up enough courage to drag his half of the Halloween winnings out from beneath his bed.

"Cheers, Lupin!" James and Peter cried, already digging into the sweets. Sirius smiled at him too, gently, before picking up a roll of Toffos for himself. As if to break the ice he tried ragging on him for joining the pumpkin competition, but it was hard for any of them to take him seriously with with his mouth half stuck together with toffee.

They ate sweets until they were going to be sick and followed that up with the cake, which deflated in the middle the moment James took a serving knife to it. They ate it anyway of course, and when they were done Sirius pulled out a bottle of whisky, courtesy of Peter's older brother, Simeon.

"You got Peter's brother to buy you booze?" Remus questioned.

"It's a birthday gift. Simeon's got all the best hook-ups," Sirius said, uncapping the bottle with his teeth. "Ain't that right, Pete?"

"Stuff it, Black. Just 'cause it's your birthday doesn't mean I gotta listen to you blag."

Peter's brother-issues aside, the whisky felt nice going down. Remus felt only slightly buzzed by the time they finished off the bottle, and while both Sirius and Peter seemed to be holding their liquor well enough it was clear the flimsy drinker among them was James. Potter was currently splayed out on Sirius' bed, upside down, school tie around his head (though he'd done that before they started drinking), giggling about how a knot in the wood of one of the bedposts looked like a nob.

“I’m never going to be able to unsee that now,” Sirius said, lying next to him.

A knock came from the door—only audible because the record had finished and no one had elected to turn it over yet—and Remus got up to answer it. Just as he twisted the door handle Sirius shot up and shouted; “No, don’t!”

But it was too late. Remus already had the door open and was staring down another boy, his hair every hint of raven black as Sirius’. He looked Remus up and down, raising a single eyebrow the way Sirius often did, only his gesture was somehow even more critical.

“I’m here for my brother,” he said, in a manner that was much too severe for a fourteen year-old.

Remus, head still swimming from the booze, stepped back and allowed him inside. Regulus Black was slighter in the shoulders and shorter than his brother, but that could just have been chalked up to age. His dark hair was combed immaculately, not long or tousled, but he had the same grey eyes and sharp cheekbones.

“Hi ya, Reg,” Peter said, currently sorting the leftover of Remus’ sweets into colour-coded piles.

When Sirius saw his brother enter he sat up on the bed, an expression of annoyance on his face. “Just when we were having such a good time.”

“I brought your gift,” Regulus said cooly, indicating the single present bag he was holding. It was entirely a muted grey and appeared distinctly un-celebratory. “Mum figured you’d never collect it if she sent it directly to you.”

“Oh well, she’s right about that,” Sirius said, standing while James turned over onto his stomach to get a better look. “But you know, Reggie, you should really stop playing errand boy for our dear mum and dad.”

Regulus rolled his eyes. “I just came to bring the gift.”

“I’m surprised they bothered to prepare anything in the first place.”

“Do what you want with it,” Regulus said, dropping the bag by Sirius’ bed. “I’m leaving.”

“You don’t want any cake, Reg?” James called and Sirius stepped forward, slinging an arm around Remus’ shoulders.

“Yeah, hold on baby brother, have you met Lupin yet? He’s our newest roommate, and as thus you must pay your respects. Elders and all that.”

“Funny, coming from you."

“Yeah," Remus said. "I don’t think I’ve ever seen you pay respects to anyone.”

“Ignore him,” Sirius told his brother, fumbling to push Remus away by the face. “Time to stick out that tongue and lick some boots!”

“Why? He’s just another roommate—the last one left suddenly enough, I’m sure he won’t last either.”

Despite his drunkenness, Sirius turned stoney and James got up from the bed, grabbing him by the arm before he could so much as take a step toward his brother. With a little more urgency, Regulus backed up to the door and yanked it open, glancing back at Sirius only once before disappearing out into the hall.

“Bah,” Sirius scoffed after he’d gone, shaking free of James’ grasp. “Holier-than-thou little git.”

Ignoring the bag, Sirius threw himself back onto his bed and tucked his hands behind his head. With no siblings himself, Remus didn’t really understand how the usual rows went, and stepped up to the side of the bag to peer inside. “You really don’t want to know what it is then?”

“It’s not going to be Zeppelin tickets, so I don’t care. You open it if you’re so curious.”

Remus shrugged and reached down into the bag. Sirius remained disinterested, and busied himself by flipping the record, but both James and Peter crowded in close. From inside the bag, he drew out a single black box, tied around the middle with a luxurious black ribbon. The box’s label read the name of an expensive department store and Remus was suddenly bombarded by the image of several pretty boxes piled high in his mother’s closet. The memory fled as quickly as it arrived, and he was left to open the box, pushing aside the fine tissue paper.

“It’s a suit,” he said, surprised. He’d hardly ever seen Sirius wear anything but his school uniform or Godric-red button-up pyjamas “What do you need with a suit at boarding school?”

“For yearly portraits maybe?” James suggested, peering over Remus’ shoulder to get a look at the fancy garb. “They usually take them just before winter holidays. They let us dress up, if we wanna.” James mumbled this last bit to Remus.

“I don’t need it,” Sirius said gruffly. “I told you it wasn’t going to be a good gift. I’m going to wear my uniform like everyone else. Might as well toss it into the fire in the common room.”

Turning back to his bed, Sirius crouched down to reach beneath it and began shuffling aside trunks and school things before withdrawing another box, this one made out of cardboard and considerably more shabby than the one gifted to him by his parents. Looking back down, Remus ran his fingers over the suit’s soft silk. The suit seemed perfectly fine—extravagant really. Sirius would probably look like some sort of Dorian Gray if he put it on. Pretty prick.

“Is that them, Sirius?” Peter asked. The other two, both probably used to Sirius’ family’s finery, had already lost interest in the gift and were currently crowded around the dingy shoebox, expectantly.

“Yeah. Little Bob-John delivered today, lads.”

“Isn’t Bobby Johnson in like year eight?” James asked, pushing his glasses up his nose.

“Yeah, and the kid’s a certifiable evil genius.” Sirius sat upright again with the shoebox between his hands. He lifted the lid to reveal several paper bog rolls, each one bound up at the end with a single black string sticking out one end. “Homemade firecrackers,” he grinned. “Just a few, nothing too wild. I say we take that crap present and use one of these to blow it to hell.”

“You are not blowing anything up in our bedroom,” James said, sobering up instantly.

“Not in here. We’ll go out into the woods a bit. ‘Least that way we can leg-it away after we set ‘em off.”

Remus leaned back, setting the suit box aside. “I’m starting to think you’re determined to break each and every curfew.”

“Oh c’mon,” Sirius groaned, “don’t try telling me you don’t want to go out and ‘blow off some steam’, Lupin?”

He winked, and Remus felt his toes curl as he inevitably caved.

* * *

“How long have you been planning this?” Asked Remus, as he lifted his leg over another tree root. They’d started first on the forest path that would’ve led to the dining hall, but then Sirius had taken a sharp dive into the trees and left his friends to scramble after him. They’d left the suit in the end, only after James had taken the time to explain that ‘blowing up clothing’ didn’t make a lick of sense.

“I wanted them for Halloween, actually,” Sirius said, “but Bob couldn’t get everything ready in time. Really it’s lucky that we have them tonight. One bottle of whisky just doesn’t seem like enough, does it?”

“So we turn to pyrotechnics?”

“Nothing so fancy, Lupin. These are just going to go boom.”

Once again Sirius Black was showcasing his love for anything and everything loud.

“Mickey thinks you’re right mental, Sirius,” Peter said, nearly tripping over his own feet in the darkness. Sirius whirled on him instantly, eyes wide.

“You told your sister’s boyfriend about our plan?”

“Mickey was my friend first!” Peter protested, truthfully. Lottie’s beau had been a member of the AV club with him for a number of years, but come year ten Mickey had returned to school with a considerable growth spurt and made good use of it on the pitch with James, trading his comics and telly privileges for a girlfriend and football boots.

“You’re going to lose your right to our evil schemes, Pete,” James said. He’d since removed the tie from his head, but had tripped or fallen over the most tree roots out of all of them.

“Reckon here’s good enough,” Sirius said, stopping in a shallow clearing and setting the box down on the forest floor. If Remus looked back he could just make the street lamps of House Lane through the trees, but it was still considerably dark.

“Bollocks,” Sirius snapped. “I forgot a light. James?”

“Lupin has a light,” James said, cheerily. “Don’t you, Remus?”

Scoffing, Remus shouldered James lightly and pulled Tomny’s zippo out of his back pocket, passing it along to Sirius. It occured to him as he did so that it had been over a full day since his last cigarette. It meant he was sorely due for another, but it also sort of felt good not to be thinking about smoking at all hours of the day. Maybe it was a good idea to cut back.

Withdrawing one of the firecrackers, Sirius held it aloft and pinched the homemade fuse, flicking the zippo's flame to life.

“How loud do you think it’s gonna be?” Peter asked anxiously.

“Dunno. Maybe cover your ears?”

James did so. “Just make sure you throw it away from us.”

“And here I thought we were going to play a round of hot potato. Get back, numpty.”

Sirius brought the flame toward the fuse and it sputtered to life immediately. Remus got a split-second shot of Sirius’ eyes widening in the orange glow before he hucked the explosive across the clearing and immediately jumped back toward the boys. As they began shouting in varying degrees of distress, Sirius grabbed hold of Remus and shoved him in front of himself, cackling. Remus grabbed him back, determined not to lose an eye to any possible flying shrapnel, but James and Peter had already joined in with the shoving, and soon they had hands all over one another, grappled in one big circle, wincing and waiting for the bang.

That did not come.

Sirius stood up, releasing Remus’ jacket and frowning. “Bugger. Bad batch. Bobby owes me twenty quid for that, the little shit.”

James opened both eyes again, straightening up to his full height next to Peter. “Reckon all of them are duds?”

Sirius went back to the middle of the clearing and pulled out a second firecracker. “Only one way to find out.” He lit it and chucked it after the first, rushing back to his friends, only this time he did not half-throttle Remus in the process.

They listened to the hiss of the fuse burning down, and then collectively released a breath. Sirius stomped his foot cartoonishly, moving forward. “Another d—”

BOOM!

Remus wasn’t sure which one of them gave the shrillest shriek. It could very well have been himself, after flinching back so violently he ended up on his butt in the dirt. The firecracker had gone off like a rifle round, only five times as loud and ten times as blinding, and they all had stars in their vision from the explosion’s bright flash.

“Blimey,” James breathed. “What did Bob put in those things—kryptonite?”

Sirius was beaming. “Dunno! It’s a secret recipe. C’mon lets light another!”

Significantly more interested now that they’d seen evidence of the homemade explosive’s firepower, the four boys crowded around this time when Sirius lit another firework. He passed it to James quickly, who flung the explosive a good distance into the trees. This time when it went off, they were all ready.

BOOM!

The boys whooped, egged on the chaos, and Remus was not immune to the contagion of it all. In the darkness he was grinning, reminded of how it had been to watch Tomny or one of the others toss cheap bottles of booze into already burning rubbish bins and watch as they went up with a great whoosh of orange flame.

“I wanna throw one!” Peter said.

“Okay!”

Remus watched as the boys rushed back to the box. On the third boom he didn’t even flinch, but he sure did scream when a hand came down on his shoulder.

“WHAT DO YOU THINK YER DOING?” A voice roared, followed by the blinding light of a flashlight torch that turned his roommates into deer in headlights. Snapping his head sideways, Remus found a very disgruntled-looking man, his stringy grey hair falling over a pair of hunched shoulders. When he shouted, spit flew from his mouth. He made to dash away, but the man held firm, keeping hold of him by the back of his collar despite being a good bit shorter than the fifteen year-old.

“It’s Filch,” Peter squeaked. Both Sirius and James moved closer together to hide the box of firecrackers behind their shoes. It was a good effort, but they all knew they were caught.

“Students out of bed after hours!” Filch barked, making Remus shrink down in his jacket. “Violating noise limits by setting off illegal explosives!”

“They were just little firecrackers,” Sirius said, but Filch only shook his flashlight at them.

“March!” Filch ordered, pointing back toward the road. He tossed Remus aside and strode right up to the boys, shoving them apart and picking up the box of fireworks, tucking them under one arm and pushing them all forward with his flashlight.

They trudged on together, each with sore and sour expressions. Filch walked behind them through the trees like an executioner marching prisoners toward the gallows. He was surprisingly quick despite the uneven terrain.

“Can’t believe he found us so quickly,” Sirius muttered bitterly under his breath.

“Think Bob could’ve ratted on us?” James asked.

"No point, he'd lose his whole enterprise. Had to be someone else."

There was a small gasp and they all turned to Peter, who was looking very guilty even in the low light. “I never mentioned it I guess… but someone might have overheard me talking to Mickey yesterday…”

“Pete!” Sirius exclaimed.

“No talking!” Filch spat from behind. The boys puckered again, but Sirius now knew he’d been wronged and that was cause enough to disobey.

“Who’d you tell?” He hissed.

“I didn’t tell, he just overheard us and made some snarky comments.”

“Who, Pete?”

“Snape.”

BOOM!

Somewhere behind them the dud firecracker went off—a delayed reaction. Filch gave a screech much louder than any of them and nearly took a tumble into the dirt. All four boys turned around, trying to suppress their snickers, and the caretaker blinded them with the light of his torch, lashing out a spit-fuelled snarl.

“You’ll be in detention for the rest of the school year if they don’t let me hang you from yer toes first!”

Their laughter dissipated instantly, replaced by sour frowns. Throwing a hand up to shield his eyes, Remus turned to Sirius next to him, who met his gaze, amusement gone. “I’m gonna kill him,” he snarled.

Remus wasn’t sure whether he meant Peter or Snape.

Chapter End Notes

'Bog rolls' are just another term for empty toilet paper rolls.

Happy (sorry) birthday, Sirius, haha!

Chapter 14: Snivellus Takes a Shower

Chapter Summary

The boys give new meaning to 'Slimy Snivellus'.

Chapter Notes

CW: References to smoking.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

And the man in the back said, “Everyone attack!”
And it turned into a ballroom blitz;
And the girl in the corner said, “Boy I want to warn you—
“It’ll turn into a ballroom blitz!”
Ballroom blitz! Ballroom blitz! Ballroom blitz! Ballroom blitz!

- “Ballroom Blitz” The Sweet, 1974

November 1975

The punishment for their rather loud indiscretion was three week’s worth of detentions, all of which were to be carried out before or after lessons and every Saturday morning. They were separated of course, so as to discourage any further insurrections. Sirius was sent back to Mrs. Pince, their prickly librarian, in hopes that the library’s quiet atmosphere might soothe his cutting tongue. James, half afraid he was going to lose his spot as football captain, personally volunteered to be Ms. Hooch’s faithful dog for the entirety of November and spent his detentions polishing the gymnasium floor or otherwise scrubbing the mildew off the undersides of every one of the rowing team's boats. Poor Peter, who nearly rivalled Remus when it came to being a horrible morning-person, was forced to wake up at the crack of dawn to help Professor Kettleburn—Hawkings’ Agricultural Department head and resident farmer—water, feed, and muck-out the school pens.

It was apparent to all of them, even him, that Remus was getting off easy with his punishment. Though his Saturdays were spent reshelving books in the library with Sirius, most of his detention hours were spent with his forms teacher, Mrs. Buchanan, doing whatever odd jobs she could think up the day of. According to Sirius, Sheila disappeared nearly every second weekend, though no one had the faintest idea as to where she went. It was Hawkings, so there were some rumours of course, the craziest of which was that she was British Intelligence and was only placed at the school to keep an eye on the next generation of politicians and title-owners. During the afternoons he organised music sheets or polished and restrung instruments Remus almost always entertained the idea of asking where it was that she was really going, but every time he got up the nerve to broach the subject, Mrs. Buchanan would direct his attention to scrubbing the dried saliva out of the tubas, and he learned to stop asking after that.

“You’re just in a glorified forms class,” Sirius complained, still nursing the sore ankle he'd gotten falling off one of the library ladders. It wouldn't have happened at all if he hadn't been trying to show-off to a group of sixth form girls who’d been sneaking glances at him over their homework.

“Well, they’ve got me doing real manual labour,” Peter moaned. “A goat bit me yesterday—I actually bled!”

“You’re lucky I didn’t make you bleed first, Pete,” Sirius growled. “It’s all your big mouth’s fault that we were caught in the first place. Really between you and Lupin I—”

“The firecrackers were not my idea,” Remus snapped. He’d been angry with Sirius ever since his birthday, and they’d spent most of their shared time between detention and lessons making subtle jabs or else ignoring each other entirely. This seemed like a great step back in progress to James, who Remus suspected had been secretly keeping tally of every moment he and Sirius had talked civilly with one another.

Well tough, Remus thought. Sirius was already a wanker, but now he’d gone and lost Tomny’s lighter too.

After marching the boys back to Castle Hall, Filch had made them turn out their pockets in case they were carrying any other illicit articles. Having left his cigarettes behind, Remus’ pockets were empty, but James lost a lucky Arsenal trading card and Peter had been forced to give up a few chocolates leftover from the Halloween stash, which he seemed pretty sorry to lose anyway.

When Filch made Sirius hand over the lighter, Remus had seen red. He’d spent several long seconds trying to picture what might happen if he just whacked the caretaker and took the zippo back. But in the end he did nothing and just let himself simmer in enraged silence while they waited for Headmistress McGonagall to arrive for their late-night lecture. A year ago, that kind of restraint would've been beyond him. Apparently Hawkings College was having an effect. Unfortunately, that restraint lasted only so long.

Remus' anger hit a new height when they returned to their dorm room and he'd attempted to give Sirius an earful for losing his only connection to his London life.

"Stop blaming Pete, it was your bloody idea in the first place!"

"You're just pissed that Filch took your cheap lighter!" Sirius shouted. "Well here, have mine if you're so pressed!" Sirius threw a silver-plated lighter down onto Remus' bed before storming back to his side of the room. Immediately Remus picked it up and hurled it back, hard, and it cracked against the wall only a few centimeters from Sirius' head, making them all flinch in shock.

"Bloody nutter!" Sirius exclaimed.

"Up yours, Black!"

In the end it was James 'ever-so-empathetic and yet still somehow completely out of touch' Potter, who came between the two of them, diffusing the argument as he always did by promising to get Remus a new lighter to make up for the one he'd lost. Unable to explain why the cheap zippo was so important, Remus threw himself down onto his bed and pulled his curtains across to block the rest of them out. It was late, but he wasn't tired, and he laid awake later, listening to James and Peter murmur quiet happy birthdays to Sirius from across the room.

Things didn't start looking up again for Sirius and Remus' relationship until the end of November. Detentions now finished with, the boys of dorm 4A found themselves with more free time than they had in several weeks, and quickly this turned into talks of how they were to get Snivelling Severus back for tattling to Filch and ruining Sirius' birthday. After his contributions with the Communion prank, the other boys were keen on including him in their talks of mischief, and Remus found that he didn't mind sitting around in a circle and talking about ways to inconvenience others.

The meetings reminded him of sitting on the floor of Tomny's place and listening to other hooligan boys regale the group with tales of running from the fuzz or causing panic or devastation elsewhere. For the most part he'd been content to sit back and listen, asking Tomny questions that always earned him either a cheeky answer or a flick on the forehead. Back then all the boys had seemed larger than life, but something about his roommates brought out a competitiveness in Remus that he hadn't known existed. The detentions had worn down his anger toward Sirius and they were almost amicable again, a fact that was only reinforced when they eagerly shared an opinion or idea for a prank. They were alike that way—both wanting to prove that they were the smartest person in the room.

It was easier for Remus to picture his life being so different than it had been back in London when they were like that; record on, old Halloween sweets spread out between the four of them, spitballing ways to turn Snape's sneer into a cry for help. Peter became the official note taker, scribbling each idea down on a scrap pad as the other boys said them. He filled the margins with little doodles of Snape in varying stages of distress, which Remus thought were actually quite good, a skill he practiced mostly while redrawing the characters in his comics.

"We could put worms in his food," Peter said, nibbling on the tip of his biro. "You know, because he's such a slimy git."

"Kid's stuff," Sirius rebuffed. "Might as well put a frog down his trousers and watch him dance."

"I think a frog would be pretty funny, actually."

Sirius shook his head. "Gotta be funnier. I want other people to laugh."

"At Snape," Remus drawled, quietly snapping his fingers in his lap. So far he'd managed to contain himself to one cigarette a day, but by the end of the night he was always itching to put something between his lips. There was chocolate; that seemed to curb some of the cravings, but one more Galaxy Bar and he'd lose his dinner to the toilet bowl. What did people even do with their hands without cigarettes?

"Of course at Snape," Sirius said. "Dickhead deserves it. Did you know I heard him bragging to Travers that he'd had a hand in 'putting us away'? He made sure I heard it too—cocky prick. Almost socked him one right then and there."

"We should ruin one of his precious science experiments," James offered brightly. "He's almost always got one going in Slughorn's room."

Remus nearly laughed. “Lily said he spends all summer shut up in a garage doing experiments.”

“Probably taking all the neighbourhood cats apart and putting them back together again, the freak,” Peter said, sarcastically.

The record finished and Sirius got up to flip it. When he turned around he was pinching his forehead and squinting as though he were trying immensely hard to concentrate.

“We must just be going about it wrong,” he continued. “What’s—Lupin quit that snapping! What’s something Snape needs above all else?”

“A good smack?”

“A girlfriend?”

Remus thought instantly of Snape’s greasy black hair. “A shower.”

“Yes!” Sirius said, pointing at him. “Imagine—Snivellus standing before a crowd, wet as a drowned rat.”

“Well how are you going to that? Snape’s not just going to walk into the lake because you told him too.”

“How ‘bout you work with me a little and we’ll figure it out!”

“The lake’s not a bad idea though,” James said, nearly the most eager out of all of them to teach Snivellus a lesson. For him, the dislike for Snape went beyond just a fowl attitude and nark-like tendencies; Lily Evans, the proper prefect girl and subject of James’ deepest affections, was also Snape’s childhood friend and confidant. How she put up with such a foul git was beyond Remus, but Lily would’ve said the same thing about putting up with James, who couldn’t help but stare whenever she and Snape walked by together. Despite his obvious interest in Lily, neither she nor any of the other girls had offered up just what it was that he’d done to evoke such hatred, and all three of the boys still seemed as lost as ever.

The group was quiet for a while and Remus settled himself back against the floor to stare up at the ceiling. Sometimes the prank-planning operations ended like this; without a conclusion, but it never took long for the boy’s interests to be piqued by another idea, promptly commencing another meeting.

Eventually the record ended once more, filling the room with the soft crackling of the needle as it skipped over bare plastic. Sirius dropped his head back off the edge of his bed, staring up at the ceiling as Remus was. From his spot on the floor, Remus could see him perfectly, though Sirius did not look at him. Instead he let his head rock back and forth as though he were entertaining a thought. “We know Snape loves seeing other people miserable—”

“Normally he’s the one making them miserable,” James grumbled from his own bed.

“He made Marlene cry the other day,” Peter said. “Started saying all that nasty stuff about her family again.”

James scowled bitterly and shook his head.

“What’s wrong with her family?” Asked Remus.

“Nothing,” James insisted, “but they’re… not exactly as well-off as Hawkings’ general consensus.”

“So she’s poor?”

“Well, middle class. She’s from Southwark. Her dad’s a steel worker and her mum runs a tailors shop.”

“How can she afford to go to school here then?”

“She had an aunt that left her money for school, so her tuition’s prepaid,” Peter explained. “Lottie visited her once and said their house was fine but Marlene was still embarrassed.”

Well, who could blame her? Remus thought. It must've felt horrible to grow up around kids used to such finery who always got everything they wanted while others teased you for being unable to join in? He was hardly an exception. Remus may have not had very present parents, but he had Giles and his friends. If anyone had tried to come at him over them he knew exactly how he’d react; no one could’ve blamed Marlene for crying.

“What I’m hearing is that it sounds like our civil duty at this point to give Snivellus a taste of his own medicine,” Sirius started. “Potter, you still in good with that old bird in the kitchens?”

“Her name is Norma, and she’s the one who made your wonderful birthday breakfast, you insensitive sod.”

“Oh, well, I bet it’s just wonderful when she leaves those wrinkled lip-prints on both of your cheeks.”

“You’re just jealous she doesn’t call you a ‘dashing prince with eyes like a fox’.”

“Definitely jealous, that.”

James and Sirius smirked at each other from across the aisle and Remus spotted that twin-like glint of mischief in their eyes. They always matched, Sirius and James. Couldn’t have looked more different; Sirius with his fair skin and grey eyes and James with his brown complexion and blinding smile, and yet they were like long lost brothers, able to understand one another so well it was as though they could see right into each other’s minds. Remus reckoned that they would be friends for a very long time.

“Okay then,” Sirius said, turning over and swinging his legs off the side of his bed. “I think I know what we need to do. Pete, get your pen ready.”

* * *

The set up had been the trickiest bit, and even that required only a bit of convincing from all of them. James had volunteered to do all of it, but Sirius was determined that they all play a part, including Remus, who was responsible for accompanying Sirius to the primary block and to, of course, fund the whole affair. That might’ve proved hard, had kids not been so easy to bribe with leftover Halloween chocolate.

It was the perfect circumstances for Sirius’ plan really. As a prefect, Snape would be expected to take the occasional weekend shift on the western half of campus, organising and overseeing activities for the younger primary kids who couldn’t be expected to spend a whole weekend looking after themselves. The teachers didn’t do it, as they only worked during the school week, and making use of the prefects meant that the primary caretakers got a break. It sounded a lot like unpaid labour to Remus, but apparently the job looked good on university applications.

It only took Sirius a few honeyed words to get the prefects’ schedule out of a twelfth year girl, and that told them that Snape’s next trip with the kiddies would be in the primary gymnasium, on the last Saturday of November. He’d be supervising alongside Lily, of course, a fact that seemed to both thrill and worry James. After that it had just taken a bit of careful planning the morning of.

That, and the bacon grease.

James showed up at the gym with a note from Ms. Hooch (lovingly penned by Peter) stating that he was to take those kids interested and run them through a few simple football drills on one side of the gym. Snape had thrown a fit of course, but Lily, unable to argue with an official note, left James to it and took to ignoring his existence all together. She supervised the left half of the play floor, which held an extensive climbing gym and even a trampoline. The third year kids they were watching screeched and hollered happily as they played, never going any higher on the ropes or bars than Lily would allow.

Staying in his corner obediently, James spent a good amount of time just showing the kids how he could get the football from the ground, to his head, to the back of his neck, and back down again whilst Snape elected to stay in the centre of the gymnasium to make sure James and Lily never got within twenty meters of each other. Conveniently, it also kept him far away from the kids, who clearly had as little love for him as he did for them.

When Sirius, Remus, and Peter showed up at the gym, it was all completely circumstantial. They'd just come to visit their friend and watch him give a lesson to the future stars of the Hawkings' football team; and, they'd brought drinks!

"Just take it, Severus!" Sirius said, holding out a canned fizzy pop toward Snape, who looked as though he'd just been asked to swallow a slug. They'd all been startlingly kind to Snape since appearing in the gym, but both he and Lily remained unconvinced.

"You probably poisoned it," Snape hissed, making Sirius laugh excessively.

"I didn't poison it, don't be so silly, Sev."

"Then you shook it to increase the pressure so it'll explode. I'm not touching anything you try to give me, Black."

Sirius shrugged, conceding defeat. "Suit yourself." He cracked the can himself (there was no explosion) and took a long sip.

Lily had initially declined the drink James offered, but took one from Remus after watching Sirius' display. "What are you guys doing here?"

She asked, clearly suspicious. “Potter was bad enough, did you really come all this way just to mess with Sev?”

“We’re just visiting a friend on a free-day,” Remus said innocently. “And personally I think I missed the kids. They make me feel so tall.”

“You’re already tall, Remus.”

Looking rather pale and puckered in Salazar green, Snape stormed up to them. “Lily, aren’t drinks prohibited in the gym?”

“Oh.” Lily looked down at her open can of fizzy drink, a look of immediate distress flashing across her face. “That’s right, only water in the gym.”

“Don’t be such a fuddy-duddy, Sev, it's not like we're going to spill them!” Sirius called, returning from the other side of the gym. James appeared behind him with several kids clinging to his arms and legs like he was a piece of the gymnastics equipment. Somewhere between the fizzy drinks and piggy-backing children around the monkey bars, Peter had disappeared, putting the rest of the prank in action while the two prefects were distracted.

“You aren’t even supposed to be here!” Snape snapped. “And don’t call me ‘Sev’!”

“Severus, then,” Sirius said, drawing out the ‘s’ and making Snape wrinkle his mouth in disgust.

“You probably faked that letter from Ms. Hooch just to come here and piss around.”

“You calling us liars?” James said, going to straighten up only to pulled back down as one of the year 3 boys grappled him by the neck.

“Let’s just ignore them, Sev,” Lily said quietly, peeking a glance at James. “They’ll leave eventually.”

Disregarding her, Snape scoffed. “Liars? No. You might actually have to be clever for that. You’re nothing but a bunch of mangy strays who exist only to bring down the school’s reputation.”

“Watch yourself, pisshead,” Remus bristled, crunching his drink can. Snape rounded on him, eyes wide in mockery as though it were the first time he’d realised he was there at all.

“Aren’t you the one who came in with holes in all your clothes and two black eyes?”

“Who said anything about black eyes?”

Snape gave a very ugly sneer. “Must’ve just seen some dirt on your face and assumed. Pick that up living in the gutter?”

“Sev!” Lily snapped. “That’s enough.”

“Yeah Sev,” Sirius cooed, “not making much of a role model for the kiddies, acting so nasty and uppidy.” He stuck his tongue out for good measure and several of the kids copied it while moaning and sneering at him. Snape glared back at Sirius but ignored the kids.

“You’re no better, Black. Four years now in ‘forms for fuck-ups’? Must be a new record. I’m sure Buchanan is just waiting for you to botch something in front of her so she can toss your arse. Guess not everyone can graduate out of being a waster.”

Both James and Lily stepped between them at the same time, Lily in defense and James looking like he might actually strangle Snape with several children hanging off his back, but before anyone could do anything, Peter’s voice called from across the gym;

“Oh no! Danny’s stuck!”

The whole group turned to look and found one of the third years at the very top of the climbing rope, nearly touching the gym’s rafters. The rope was hung next to the gym’s wall, where a ladder could be used to climb up and down when one got stuck, but Danny’s tiny arms would never have reached. He’d fall to the mat and if he was lucky, only break an ankle or two.

On cue, Danny began to wail his little heart out, really hamming it up —tears and sobbing—the whole. works In shock, Lily dropped her fizzy pop, letting it splash across the maple floor as she streaked across the gym.

“Danny—Danny! I-It’s okay! We’ll get you down!”

Danny cried harder while Peter gave his best horrified-face and Remus had to bite his cheek to keep from smiling.

“Care to help the poor lad, Potter?” Sirius asked.

“Love to, but I’m actually a little pinned down here,” James said, lifting an arm up so a little girl dangled off the floor and squealed. “How about you, Lupin?”

“Not so good with heights actually,” he said, coughing to cover a laugh. “Black?”

Sirius shrugged. “Not sure what help I’d be. I’m just a no-good waster.”

Unable to keep it in any longer, James dipped his head and was nearly taken to the ground by the weight of the kids as all three of them broke down in laughter.

“Looks like it’s up to you, Sev,” Sirius snickered. “Don’t want poor Lily to deal with it all by herself, do you? I mean, you are the prefect here.”

Snape scoffed, but Danny’s cries had only gotten louder. Across the gym, most of the kids had gathered around the mat, some looking horrified at the current state of their friend, others bouncing up and down like they couldn’t wait for their turn. Lily was halfway up the ladder, but appeared to be stuck, her knees shaking as she stared down at her feet. It didn’t take much observation to realise that she probably did have a very real fear of heights.

At the sight of Lily’s own distress, Snape huffed and started across the play floor, pushing past Peter as he came to join them.

“Little buggar got up there real fast,” he grinned.

"C'mon I want a front row seat," Sirius said, as they all followed Snape across the gym. They made it just as Lily was coming down the ladder, looking rather pale as Snape replaced her at the rungs.

“I’m coming, so stop crying!” He snapped, starting up the ladder at a fine pace—one skinny hand after the other.

“Yeah, Sev!” Sirius cried, fisting the air. “You go, bro!”

“Don’t slip!” James called, and Lily spun around to slap him in the shoulder.

“It’s not funny! If you hadn’t come and distracted us—”

“Distracted you? I stayed on my side of the gym!”

“Potter, I swear—!”

“Shut up,” Sirius hissed, swatting at the air between them, “you’re going to miss the best part!”

“What—” Lily whirled around, and Remus got a full view of the look of devastation on her face when she finally spotted the pièce de résistance to their evil plan, hanging just between little Danny Sharpe and the ladder. There was no time to warn anyone even if she wanted to; Snape had already grabbed hold of the climbing rope and ordered Danny to climb onto him. The six year-old reached out, reluctantly, but rather than grabbing onto him, Danny grasped a single white string, near-impossible to see from the gym floor, and yanked hard.

Snape looked up, and almost in slow-motion, the bucket rigged to the rafter above him turned over, dumping out fifteen litres of grey-brown bacon grease, now half solidified into the foulest sludge imaginable. The grease poured down like the world’s nastiest waterfall and hit Snape square in the face, arching out around him like a disgusting umbrella.

Down below, kids shrieked and scattered to avoid the remnants of Snape’s folly while the boys reeled back to avoid getting soaked. Poor Lily, who’d stared at the whole affair with more fear than she’d shown on the ladder, got splashed with grease up the front as it smacked into the floor, leaving her gaping with an expression that said she was only seconds away from losing her lunch—which was understandable, since the congealed grease smelt worse than a butcher’s house.

A few seconds later, while Lily was wordlessly mourning her dignity, little Danny Sharpe expertly shimmied down the rope and landed on the grease-covered mat, completely intact and grinning with a smile that was missing both front teeth. The kid deserved every last bit of Remus’ Halloween sweets for his performance and bravery.

“Someone get this kid an award!” Sirius cried, nearly falling over himself with laughter. James and Peter were just as done-for, and Remus was also bent over, unable to get the image of Snape dripping with grey ooze—his limp hair greasier than ever—out of his mind. The kids, a perfect audience sharing in the trick, sprinted around the room screaming and hooting with laughter, rubbing their fingers into the grease-coated floor or pointing at Snape, who’d yet to come down from his slippery ladder.

Recovering from her shock, Lily spun on them, her face a mask of fury. “You awful—” she shrieked, peeling her stained blouse away from her body, “loathsome—horrible—absolute messers!”

“That’s us!” Peter crowed from the floor. Sirius helped his best friends to their feet, wiping the corners of his eyes with the back of his hand and James looked to Lily, almost wincing at the state of her clothes.

“We didn’t mean to get you, Evans, we just—”

Unwilling to hear anymore, Lily advanced on him, shoving her finger so close to James’ face that he went cross-eyed through his glasses. He might’ve had more time to fear for his life, had the horrible squeaking of wet shoes not cut across the the kid’s chatter, followed by a gagging sound.

Snape had made his way down the ladder, dripping bacon grease down his back, shoes squelching on every rung until they finally met the floor. When he whirled around bacon fat flew out of his hair and spattered more of the wall.

“Disgusting!” He roared, before clapping a hand to his mouth and heaving again. “What the fuck is this?”

“The taste of sweet, sweet revenge,” Remus said, and Sirius beamed while Lily turned her shocked expression on him. Perhaps a small part of her had hoped that he’d agree with her forever, that he’d be the same sort of sensible person she'd thought Miles had been. Unfortunately for her, turns out their previous roommate had been just as much a messer as the rest of them.

All for one and one for all.

Glancing around like he wasn’t sure which one of them to blame more, Snape finally settled on Remus, who returned his nasty look with a glare of his own.

“It’s what you deserve,” he said, “nasty git.”

Storming the few feet across the gym, Snape fisted both hands in front of him, top lip lifted in a snarl. “I’m going to fucking k—”

A gob of fat hit Snape upside the head and exploded again, spattering the ground just ahead of Remus and making him jump back. Greasier than ever, Snape whirled to find Sirius, hand coated to the wrist with fat and running his tongue across his teeth. “Sorry Sev,” he mused, “hand slipped.”

With a horrible growl, Snape scooped up a handful off the floor himself and sent it across the room, but Sirius dodged easily and Snape only ended up splattering several of the kids, who blinked in confusion.

"Woah, Snape, the kids too? Geez." Sirius looked to the third years; "I think this guy needs to be taught another lesson, don't you guys?"

That was all it took for the kids to get the idea. Before Lily or anyone could stop them the grease began flying, and no one was safe.

“Stop! Stop! That’s enough!” Lily shouted, before taking a shot at the back of the head that sent her red hair up over her like a damp curtain. She turned away, hands over her face, before sprinting to the wall as every one of her students joined in on the chaos.

“Food fight…?” Peter asked dubiously, fat glob of grease in hand, and several kids screamed in response;

“FOOD FIGHT!”

There was no cover, only open gym, but the saving grace for the rest of them was that most of the kids were simply interested in punishing their most miserable prefect leader. Covering his head, Remus made to dash across the room to join his friends, but only succeeded in gaining a splat to the shoulder from James.

“Sorry, Lupin! Was aiming for the greasy toff!”

“S’oh—kay!" Feet coming out from under him on the slippery hardwood, Remus crashed to the floor and a cacophonous hoot of laughter went up from the third years who were still shrieking with glee as they covered the room in mess. A hand appeared over him—Sirius, who was stained with filth all over but looking as though he’d just won the lotto. He helped him up, and Remus cringed at the feeling of his sticky back, almost heaving at the smell (oh god, the smell) but all was forgotten when he turned to find Snape on the ground pinned under a dog pile of grease-covered children, slamming his fists on the ground.

“Get off of me, you miserable brats!”

But the kids did not move and little Danny Sharpe was left to sit on the very top like a king on his filthy throne. All four boys approached, covered in their own disgusting vengeance, but revelling in the sight of their enemy getting his just deserts. Over the sound of the kids laughter and Snape’s gripping, Sirius tutted;

“You’ll do well to remember, Snivellus, just what kind of messers you’re taking the piss with. Good luck with your shower, ya bloody nark.”

Chapter End Notes

A 'biro' is just another term for pen.

Pranks are fun to write but definitely challenging! Excited to go forward with more of them!

Chapter 15: Felix Felicis

Chapter Summary

Term 1 of Year 11 comes to a close and Remus learns something new about Sirius.

Chapter Notes

I'm putting this chapter out early because it's got some of my favourite scenes!

CW: Smoking.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Well in the middle of the night on the open road,
The heater don't work and it's oh, so cold;
You're gettin' tired baby, lookin' kinda beat,
The music off the street drive you off your feet…

- "Once Bitten, Twice Shy" Ian Hunter, 1975

November passed, and Snape didn't so much as whisper in any of their directions. He glared—Remus didn't think he was capable of any other expression—but they were silent glares, full of loathing and contempt. After discovering the doors to both of the gym's shower rooms had been inexplicably jammed, Snape's walk back to his dorm had been met with plenty of confused and disgusted stares. It would've been a more genius plan, had he not been the only one.

Rightful in her anger, Lily shunned them for the better part of the week that followed, and not even Remus was immune to her wrath. While Sirius and Peter remained indifferent, content to ride the wave of infamy they'd garnered after shaming Snape, James had only become more distraught over his and Lily's already frayed relationship. He sought her out before and after classes to apologise and even tried bringing her cups of tea at breakfast which were ignored or else thrown in the bin. Finally, when Lily's pencil kept breaking during quiet study, James slid down the table and offered his own. Lily took it silently before snapping the pencil in half and getting up to march across the room to the wall sharpener with her own. Her friends all stifled their shock and laughter behind tight smiles as James sadly slunk back to his seat. As he did, Sirius pushed a roll of sellotape in his direction with a hopeless shake of his head and James started taping his pencil back together in the middle.

"She hates me," he sighed.

"Nah, she already hated you, mate," Sirius pointed out. “Can’t get much worse than that."

"What about despised or repulsed?" Peter added.

"There's no way this is helping," Remus said.

"What I meant," Sirius drawled, "was that hate is a strong word, sure, but there are other more powerful emotions."

"Such as?"

"Desire, passion—lust."

"Dear god."

"Nothing to do with God, Lupin!" Sirius grinned, clapping a hand on James' shoulder next to him. "This is plain old animal magnetism, and clearly Evan's abhorrence is just a thinly veiled disguise for how badly she wants to shag our dear friend Mr. Potter."

Despite Sirius' confidence, James' luck with Lily did not improve. Remus didn't bother to ask if her invitation to study for end of term exams still stood, but it did feel rather odd to spend every geography lesson next to a seat partner who was so keen on pretending that he didn't exist. It wasn’t until several days later, when Remus discovered he’d forgotten his textbook that Lily finally broke her silence.

“Lily,” he whispered, “Lily, can I borrow your text? I forgot mine.”

She didn't answer at first, and Remus accepted that he'd just have to struggle through the worksheet without, but finally Lily's voice whispered back; “Generally people say sorry rather than pretending to leave their textbooks behind.”

“I didn’t—” Remus stopped, because he’d forgotten how good it felt to be snapped at. "I'm sorry," he tried, and Lily huffed lightly before sliding the textbook between their desks.

After class he apologised again—with more than just two words—and that was that. She never outrightly said it, but eventually he got the feeling that Lily did think the prank was funny, once she'd at least gotten the grease stains out of her uniform and they'd scrubbed the gym to a shine. She wouldn't come around the other boys, but Remus was allowed to join her and Marlene for exam prep, which he didn't really care for but didn't want to her offend her by refusing.

"Sev is still angry, you know," Lily said a few days later, while sipping hot chocolate out of a styrofoam cup. They were on break and had found a single corner bench in the dining hall to sit at. The window behind them overlooked the sloping hill that dipped down toward Castle Hall's front lawn, and dozens of kids were out in the winter air, throwing snowballs, tackling one another, and generally just being carefree idiots. Naturally Sirius, James, and Peter were among them, currently engrossed in a snowball war with Barty Crouch and a few other Salazar House boys. Remus thought he'd caught a glimpse of Regulus near the beginning, but when he'd looked up from his book next the youngest Black brother had vanished, his presence replaced by a small group of girls who were watching outside the line of fire, huddled close like a waddle of penguins.

"Snape's always angry," Remus said, dropping his arm over his knee, which he kept propped up on the bench between them. He'd finished his own hot chocolate already and wanted another, but couldn't be bothered to make his way back across the dining hall to get it.

"Not always."

"Well maybe he'd be less pissy if he could find joy in something other than the suffering of others and his chemistry set."

There was a short silence as Remus finished his chapter and started another.

"I don't really know why he does it," Lily said finally, her head turned to the window, watching the snowball fight. Looking up from his page, Remus watched as Peter took a nasty blow to the back of his head, knocking off his cap. Moira Thurnberg broke off from the group of girls to rush forward and kneel next to him in the snow, patting his head sympathetically. Despite the snow coating his neck and hair, Peter looked pleased as punch.

"Why he only takes pleasure in misery?" Asked Remus, as he thumbed the edge of his book.

"No—well, yes, but I was talking about the kids actually," Lily looked down at her hot chocolate, swirling it with a coffee straw. "Being a prefect isn't always just looking after the primaries, but it's a big part of it. And he's always so miserable when we go. The kids really don't like him either—I think he just does it because I wanted to."

Remus had read the same passage twice while listening to her. "You're saying he took on being a prefect just to stick to you?"

"I guess it does sound rather conceited when you put it like that."

That came out wrong, Remus thought, before sighing. "No, it makes sense. You clearly like it, and he likes you and… you like him." He paused, searching her face. "Don't you?"

"I do!" Lily said. "I-I mean I do like it—being a prefect. It's just… sometimes I wish he wouldn't insist on always doing everything together."

Remus tilted his head to the side pointedly and raised his brows. Lily caught the look and straightened up. "He doesn't always step on my toes though. Sometimes he's very helpful. I've known Sev since we were seven."

"Was he a git back then too?" Remus asked, snarkily. Lily looked down at her cup ruefully and Remus felt another small twinge of guilt.

"He has it rough at home," Lily said. "He's never actually said so, but his dad… I've only met him a few times, but he was always horrible to Sev."

Grinding his teeth together, Remus looked back to the window and squinted in the brightness of the sun reflecting off the snow. "So?"

"It's sad, Remus. I saw him hit Sev once."

Remus snapped his book shut. "So what if it's sad? There are plenty of horrible parents out there. Doesn't mean he gets to be rotten to every poor sod he comes across." Remus had never been hit—at least not at home—and he'd secretly wondered if things would be the same if Lyall had just boxed his ears a bit; but it was always as though he couldn't be bothered. Instead he regarded Remus like he was a germ, not to be touched or looked at. Ship it off, get it out of the house, make it as though anything he touched was wiped clean, and then maybe life would be bearable.

He'd done the same thing to Hope after she died. At least that was a real excuse; Lyall was stuck with Remus.

“I didn’t mean to be insensitive,” Lily said, and Remus snapped his eyes back to her.

“You weren’t,” he answered bitterly. “Anything but, actually.”

More deflated than before thanks to his little outburst, Lily sat back on the bench, uncharacteristically quiet and picking at the rim of her cup. As she looked back out the window Remus followed her gaze; James and Sirius were arm in arm, parading around the girls with stiff legs like army men. Snow covered them from head to toe, and Crouch and the others were long gone, though leaving in victory or defeat, Remus wasn’t sure.

Stopping just in front of the girls, James dipped Sirius like a dancer and then unceremoniously dropped him into the snow. Sirius retaliated by knocking his legs out from under him, and they went down in a pile.

“You can’t tell anyone I told you about Sev,” Lily said.

Remus looked from James and Sirius to the grey sky. It had started to snow again.

“I won’t.”

* * *

Friday 19th December 1975

With their revenge against Snape long since cooled, the only thing able to cheer Sirius up after school portraits was his birthday gift from Andy, which had arrived just as their last week before Christmas holidays was coming to a close. Over a rather loud and screechy phone call, Sirius (and most of Godric House) had been warned that if he didn’t wear the suit he’d been sent and look like a proper Black heir, he would be pulled out of his dorm to live in a private room for the remainder of the school year. So, Sirius wore the suit, because (according to James) Walburga Black tended to make good on her promises.

Sirius had returned to the common room, hair impeccable, wearing the fine suit, and looking like someone had just snapped one of his favourite albums in half in front of him. He was the only one of them that had his portrait that day, where Remus, James, and Peter would be forced to clean up for their photos the next afternoon.

“Don’t you look spiffing,” James said over his playing cards. Sirius gave him a nasty sneer and slumped down on the empty couch cushion next to Remus, who was busy playing a round of whist with Peter and James.

“Mum says hi,” Sirius said sarcastically. Walburga had called once more that morning just in case Sirius hadn’t gotten the message the first time. Maybe Remus did have it easier; at least his father would’ve never shouted loud enough for half the school to hear.

“Dunno why she calls just to yell,” James said, setting down a card on the coffee table between the two couches. Remus followed with a card of his own. The two of them were playing as a pair against Peter and were somehow still losing.

“Guess yelling at dad gets boring after a while,” Sirius said, nonchalant.

Peter tutted. “Remus you can’t play that card, we’re playing with diamonds.”

Remus snatched the card back. “I thought clubs was trump?”

“No spades is trump,” James said.

“I thought you said this game would be easy.”

A few turns later they’d lost and James threw down his hand as Peter began to reshuffle. Beside him, Sirius was bouncing his leg and staring out the window as he twisted the end of his dark hair between his fingers. Trust Black to have enough energy at all times that not just one nervous tick sufficed.

“Mail came today,” James said finally, sipping a cup of tea. All three boys looked to Sirius, who was still lost in thought. “Sirius?”

“Hm?”

“Mail came today.”

Glancing back, realisation dawned on Sirius’ face as James turned around to reach behind the couch, coming back with a brown envelope the length of his forearm. The address written across the front read out Sirius' name in elegant handwriting, and beside that was a single kiss mark in black lipstick and a small smear that looked a lot like creamed spinach. At least Remus hoped it was creamed spinach.

"It's from Andromeda," Sirius said after James had passed the gift over.

"Well go on then!" Peter chimed. "Open it!"

Wasting no time, Sirius ripped open the envelope's end and dumped its contents out onto the table in front of them. Out of it poured an album—just a little 45 LP—several sets of guitar strings, and a folded up letter. Before Sirius even had touched the gifts he snatched up the paper and unfolded it. He smiled, reading it over, and then passed it along to Remus as though it were second nature.

Surprised, Remus looked to Sirius, but he'd already moved on to the gifts, leaving him to flip the letter over to read;

Sirius,

Sorry for the wait on your birthday gift, but Bowie didn't drop this LP until the end of November anyway and trust me it was worth the wait. Also, I hope those guitar strings work. Ted says that Tony Iommi, the lead guitarist from Black Sabbath uses the same ones. Maybe I'll have to give you some lessons next time, huh? Sorry I don't know when 'next time' will be, but in the meantime have fun jamming out, little cuz.
Make sure you sing a song for me.

Much love,
Andy, Ted, and Dora

Another kiss mark had been left at the bottom of the letter. Remus looked up from it to find Sirius reading the back of the LP, Golden Years. When he flipped it over to reveal the front cover, even Remus had to admit that Bowie looked good.

Reaching for his tea, Remus set the letter down and James immediately snapped it up, glancing it over before passing it along to Peter. There were no secrets among the boys of 4A, that was for sure.

"I miss Andy," Sirius said, glancing between the strings and the LP.

"She always knew what to get me."

“I didn’t even know that Andy could play the guitar,” Peter said, glancing up from the letter.

“Yeah! Really well too. Ted used to be in a band—he was the drummer—but he stopped when he got that job at the auto factory.”

“Wish I had cool cousins,” Peter said, and James elbowed him.

“Want some of mine?” He teased. “I'll even trade you for Sim.”

“Simeon is not cool."

Remus automatically disagreed. Tall, blonde—but not in the same helpless, cherub-like way as Peter—Simeon Pettigrew would’ve been hard-pressed to not be a local celebrity at least. He’d only ever seen the oldest Pettigrew sibling a few times, the last being in mid-November, when he and Sirius had caught him snogging a pretty dark-haired girl behind the stacks of the reference section of the library. They’d almost stayed to watch but Mrs. Pince caught them slacking on their detention duties and had ordered them back to work.

“You’re right, Pete,” Sirius said, “your brother isn’t cool. He’s the coolest.”

“You lot have been licking his boots since last year!” Peter exclaimed. “One party in some ruddy field and suddenly he’s the best thing since sliced bread! I swear if Sim was our age you’d never talk to me again.”

James and Sirius exchanged a shared glance, eyebrows raised. Peter looked aghast, and both of them snorted, and dropped their heads down in laughter.

Peter slapped the deck of cards against the table and threw himself back against the sofa. “Bunch of bloody traitors...”

* * *

The next day Remus returned from getting his portrait taken feeling stuffy and irritated. They had to wear their full uniforms for the pictures and the formal school blazer always made him feel like a ponce. He’d tried to rebel slightly by not bothering to comb his hair, which since summer had grown into a mess of pale brown curls, but one of the secretary ladies organising the show had pulled him aside and slicked it back from his face with a comb until Remus was sure he looked downright horrible. Tomny and the others would have killed themselves laughing if they saw him now.

He'd been thinking about the London boys a lot these days—or at least, more than usual, which was almost impressive. Exams were over with, and though Remus was pretty sure he'd failed both Biology and Foreign Languages, all he could think about was taking the train back to London and heading straight to the East End. Maybe he'd just stay there. He couldn't be sent back to Hawkings if no one could find him.

Feeling fidgety, Remus tossed the blazer onto his bed. It caught on one of his fingernails and he hissed, looking over the raw skin he'd been chewing down to the quick since the start of exams. Smoking only once a day had worked in November, mostly due to the fact that he'd hardly ever had the time to sneak off between lessons, church, and detention, but since the start of December he'd been particularly antsy. The early snow of the Scottish Highlands made him feel trapped inside, and though he'd never admit it, he actually missed the pissing rain that came with London winters.

Caving, Remus slid the window between James and Sirius' beds open and lit a cigarette. He'd only done it a few times inside the dorm, but James and Peter were still getting their photos taken, and Sirius had detention again—or at least that's what he'd been told.

The dark-haired boy came out of the bathroom just as Remus had taken his first drag. They both froze when they spotted each other, Remus next to the open window, a burning cigarette between his lips, and Sirius, looking staunchly surprised to see him.

"Sorry," Remus murmured, straightening up. "I'll put it out."

"No, it's okay." Sirius came forward and stopped next to him to fiddle with the stereo. His wardrobe hutch and music setup sat just in front of the window, and Remus had always had to bend over it to blow the smoke outside. They were so close he could see the little dot of orange from the tip of his burning cigarette reflected in the gold of Sirius' earring. Luckily, Sirius picked an album quickly and set it under the needle before sliding onto his bed. Propping himself up on his pillows, he tucked his hands behind his head and closed his eyes, one foot bobbing to the music as he held it against the other knee.

Remus watched him, licking his lip to taste the cigarette tang, before looking back out the window. Fine, have it your way then, weirdo.

The December air floating through the window was cold, but Remus was unbothered by it after Sirius' sudden entrance had left him feeling very warm and embarrassed. For a long time the only sound came from the stereo and his own hammering heart echoing in his ears. Sirius had put on Abbey Road and John Lennon's voice drifted around the room at a low volume.

'I want you,
I want you so bad;
I want you,
I want you so bad,
I want you so bad it's driving me mad…'

Keeping his eyes closed, Sirius just rocked his head back and forth as he lay there. It was hard not to let his eyes drift toward the fidgeting, and despite the music, Remus felt the growing need to fill the silence between them. He had no intention to say what he did, hardly thinking much at all, but the words he'd been suppressing since the beginning of the year spilled out anyway.

"I like music, you know." Remus immediately winced at how lame he sounded.

Sirius popped open one grey eye and yawned. "Oh yeah?"

"Mhm."

"So I guess Sheila's classes are having an effect? She'll be so pleased."

"I liked music before that."

"Then it was just good luck you got dropped in our laps," Sirius said cheekily. "Got a favourite band?"

"The Who," Remus said, too quickly. "The Who…"

"Ah, yeah, they're good. Got a mad man for a drummer."

"I know, right?!" Remus exclaimed, before clearing his throat and taking a drag.

"Andy saw them live once."

"She did? Oh god..."

“Yeah, front row in London. The guitar player smashed his Les Paul and tossed her the tangled strings.”

Remus could’ve melted on the spot. He cleared his throat again to calm down. “What's your favourite band then?”

“Don't got one.”

Remus blinked. “Really?”

“Really,” Sirius said, closing both eyes again.

Rolling his cigarette between his fingers, Remus struggled to respond. He’d expected Sirius to say Led Zeppelin, or The Sweet, T. Rex, The Doors, Bowie—something that could've prolonged the conversation. Between all the music he listened to, he'd thought Sirius was bound to have a favourite. He had everything memorised by heart, too. You could’ve picked up any album from his collection and Sirius would’ve been able to tell you what number a track was, who wrote it, and every damn lyric in the entire song.

It was insane that he didn’t have a favourite.

“So why’s that?” Remus asked finally. “You listen to so much music.” More than anyone he’d ever met. “Why don’t you have a favourite band?”

“ ‘Cause it’s gonna be mine.”

“Yours?”

“Yeah,” Sirius opened his eyes to smirk up at him, “my favourite’s gonna be me and my band. Because my band's gonna be the best.”

“You don’t have a band.”

“Not yet.”

“Well who’s even gonna be in it? Or are you just gonna recruit our entire class to be your backup orchestra.”

“Maybe. Why, you wanna join?”

Remus shook his head and turned back to the window for a deep drag. “Tosser.”

Sitting up on his bed very quickly, Sirius’ response was so sharp that Remus nearly flinched. “I’m serious, you know.”

“About starting a band?”

“Okay you missed the perfect opportunity to make the ‘yes, you’re Sirius’ pun—but yeah! If Elvis could do it why can't we?”

"Did you actually just compare us to Elvis?"

"You gotta dream big to be big, Lupin. So whadda say?"

“I can’t.”

Sirius frowned. “Why not?”

“I can barely play a whole song!”

“You’ll learn.”

“No, you’re crazy—completely mental.”

“Good,” Sirius said, “mental makes art. Just look at Van Gogh or Iggy Pop.”

Remus looked away again. “So that’s the plan then? You're gonna be a musician?”

“Yup.” Sirius popped the ‘p’.

“Jesus fuck.”

Sirius’ smirk spread as he swung his legs over the side of the bed. “Okay fine, you don’t have to say yes right now—learn your craft first and then we’ll talk.” Standing up, he knocked his hip into Remus’, making him drop ash on top of the stereo.

“Oi! That was your fault,” he said, wiping it away.

“Can I have one?”

Remus glanced over to find Sirius watching him through those long eyelashes. “You ever smoked before?”

“A few times at school, and Andy would always let me bum one when we snuck away at family things. She gave it up when she got pregnant, but I didn’t see her much after that anyway.”

Straightening up, Remus reached into his back pocket and withdrew his carton of Embassys, Sirius watching his every move with silent interest. When he held out the cigarette Sirius took it and tucked it between his lips before leaning in, touching the tip of it to Remus' own cigarette. Eyes shot wide at the sudden closeness, Remus reeled back so quickly his hand hit the record making it skip. "What are you doing?"

"Uh, lighting it?"

"I have matches."

Reaching into his other pocket, Remus passed the matchbox over before awkwardly turning back to the window, trying not to grind his teeth over the cigarette. Sirius gave him a pointed look but struck up a match, and Remus noticed the purple nail polish on his left hand; probably Mary's doing. He remembered her saying the pair of them used to date, but that couldn't have meant much in year 10, could it?

Licking his fingers, Sirius smothered the match with a satisfied smirk and dropped it out the open window before taking a long drag, glancing up to Remus out of the corner of his eye. Remus met his look and something in his gut squirmed.

"I fucking hate Christmas," Sirius said, breathing out the smoke. "I'd cancel the whole thing and stay here if I could."

Remus nodded quickly, agreeing with him. "Why don't you? Lily said some kids stay to study." Outside the window the winter sun was just disappearing over the trees.

"It's mostly the year thirteens, and besides Mum would hang me." He made a similar gesture while holding his cigarette between two fingers. "Too many guests come over at Christmas, makes me want to tear my hair out. What about you?"

"Huh?"

"Does your dad throw massive parties around the holidays?"

"What? Er... no."

"Lucky. So it's just you and your dad then?"

"Sorta. He works a lot... but I've got Giles and the dogs."

"My mum hates animals," Sirius said, stifling a yawn. "Reg has a dog—Kreacher, don't ask about the name. Got him as a birthday present when he turned eight, after that Mum swore them off. Good thing too, he's a miserable little thing. Bet yours are better."

He glanced at him, smiling handsomely, and Remus quickly turned to the window. He'd been stuck staring at Sirius' hands ever since he'd put out the match; long and slender, perfect for guitar plucking. Pretty, really... If boys' hands were supposed to be pretty.

"This is what you've been doing, right?" Sirius asked, indicating to the cigarette. "When you disappear."

"Yeah."

"You been smoking for long?"

"Two years or so." Almost an exaggeration.

"But you're like, fifteen."

Remus frowned, annoyed to be called on his bluff. "And you're sixteen and a bloody 'heir'. What's your excuse for acting like such an oik?"

"Touché," Sirius smirked, unfazed, flicking ash out the window. "You know, I didn't actually think you'd last."

"What's that supposed to mean?"

"Don't get your knickers in a twist, Lupin. I only meant here—at Hawkings. You were so bloody determined to hate everything I assumed you'd just punch someone and get yourself tossed out on your sorry rear. For a while there I thought that someone might've been me, to be honest."

"Well someone didn't exactly make it an easy transition."

"Fair enough."

"You mean 'touché'."

Sirius knocked Remus with his hip again. "So he's funny, too?"

" 'Too'?"

Sirius shook his head. "Why the Who?"

“Hm?”

“Why are they your favourite? What makes them the best?”

“Oh… well… They’re just…” Remus almost bit down on the end of his cigarette again. No one had ever asked him why he liked the Who; really he was just lucky if anyone knew enough about music to recognise the name. When he thought about why he liked the band, the memory of sitting in his mother’s room, watching them play for the first time—that was what came to mind. Normally Remus hated the memories, but that one was a high he’d secretly been chasing ever since.

“They’re… chaos,” Remus said firmly. “And chaos is—”

“Rock and roll.”

He looked at Sirius sharply, and for once, matched his grin. “Yeah.”

“Maybe that’s my excuse then,” Sirius said. “I cause a bit of chaos now, and maybe one day, it’ll turn into rock and roll.”

Remus pressed his tongue to the inside of his cheek. “That’s some goal, Black.”

“Well? Aren’t you going to wish me luck? Might be a rougher transition than you just switching schools, you know.”

Still leaned over the hutch, Remus let out a breath and looked down at his own hands; a cigarette pinched in his right hand while he fiddled with his thumbs. Sirius was next to him, stretched out almost to the window sill over the stereo, lightly tapping in time with the music while holding onto his own cigarette. He doubted he even realised he was doing it, but his timing was perfect, and Remus was already enraptured.

“No,” he said finally, “you don’t need luck.”

Chapter End Notes

'Whist' is a trick-taking card game. It’s usually played in pairs, unless you're as good as Peter, haha.
The term 'ponce' just refers to a pretentious or effete man.
The song Sirius plays is "I Want You (She's So Heavy)" from The Beatles' 1969 album 'Abbey Road'.

Now that this first term officially over, I wanted to thank you for sticking around this far! If you couldn't already tell this story is going to be pretty long, but I'm excited to go on the journey with you. Let me know if you have any constructive criticism or ideas in the comments, I'd love to hear them or else just chat! Also, my tumblr and tiktok is the same username @motswolo. I'd love to chat more Harry Potter and wolfstar there if you're so inclined!

And enjoy my wolfstar crumbs :)

Chapter 16: After the Storm Blows

Chapter Summary

Remus returns home to London for the holidays and meets up with some old friends.

Chapter Notes

CW: References to illicit drugs and drug-use.

We delve back into oc's this chapter. I hope you enjoy <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Bright lights, Soho, Wardour Street,
You hope you make friends with the guys that you meet;
Somebody shows you round,
Now you've met the London boys,
Things seem good again, someone cares about you…

- "The London Boys" David Bowie, 1966

Walking out of Kings Cross station on the evening of December 21st, Remus found Giles and the Rolls parked and waiting for him. The old driver opened his arms like he was going to give him a hug, but only side-stepped him to grab his trunk instead. Remus almost smiled. He'd secretly missed the little game they had; the old man would play at getting too close but would always swerve past him at the last second. Giles was good with boundaries when he wanted to be.

"I wouldn't believe it if you weren't standing in front of me right now," the driver said, wheeling the trunk to the car's boot. "Four months, and the only word we got was about a few lacking marks. There was something about illegal fireworks, but nothing fatal, right? Hell, I'd almost started to wonder if they had the right Lupin."

Remus rolled his eyes, but didn't bother correcting him as he stepped over a puddle just outside the station. "You should really try and make this comedy act of yours into a living, Gil."

"And leave you behind? Never. That school must be something. It's almost cause for celebration."

“Yeah, not like it’s Christmas or anything.”

Remus opened the back door of the Rolls and got inside, joined a moment later by Giles in the front. It was a familiar scene, sitting behind the driver and staring at the wisps of red hair that peaked out from beneath his cap.

As they drove back to Blackheath, Remus watched the city roll by. He, James, and Peter had all left Sirius at Kings Cross, where he’d be joining his darling baby brother for their train west to Bath. The train ride would probably feel endless, especially since Sirius could hardly keep still in the weeks leading up to Christmas holidays. They’d spent their last few days at Hawkings finishing off the last of Remus’ cigarettes and sharing stories of holidays’ past. Sirius had more to share, having more family, and some of them were downright awful while others were quite funny.

It was during one of these conversations while Sirius regaled him with his Uncle Alphard’s last Christmas at his parents’ manor—the old man had given a swift exit after toasting Christmas dinner with a vivid story of the time he’d promised his brother-in-arms that his wife would never be lonely and then went on to sleep with the old lady after his buddy’s untimely death—that James slammed the bedroom window shut and ordered the two smokers from the room so that he could clean for the holiday room-inspections.

Afterwards Remus had taken Sirius to one of his hiding spots, a small tool shed behind the Agricultural building, where they took their time and shared a spliff. He’d almost considered taking him to the astronomy building, but decided at the last moment to keep his favourite spot to himself a bit longer, just in case he ever needed a private place to escape to.

They continued sharing, and Remus learned that Alphard had died in ‘73, and had apparently left money aside for his favourite nephew rather than let his family get their hands on it. Walburga had been livid, of course, but there was nothing to be done about it. Sirius only knew about the money because Alphard’s other favourite family member, Andromeda, had received a good sum, which had allowed her and her new husband to buy a house in London. Sirius wouldn’t have access to the money until he was eighteen, but because he was born the year before the rest of them, he’d be of age before their first term in year 13 was up.

“Why are you older?” Remus had asked stupidly, taking his turn with the spliff and then passing it along to Sirius, who still had a goofy look on his face after talking about Andy and the time she spent three months on the road as a groupie for T. Rex. “Shouldn’t you be a year above the rest of us?”

“Mum kept me home with private tutors until I was ten,” Sirius said. “Hated it a‘course, but didn’t really think there was much else to be done at the time. Then I overheard her and dad saying they were going to send Reg to this school—far away, in Scotland. So naturally, I threw a fit. Thought it was bollocks that Reg was getting to leave and they wanted to keep me there. Now I know it was all about being the heir. Mum wanted me close to make sure I was only getting taught useful things—but I was too smart for her damn tutors, and just ended up making their lives a living hell until they all quit, and she finally had to send me off. Reg and I started at Hawkings at the same time, but they put me in year five just in case I was secretly inept.”

"And are you?"

"Inept? Oh, obviously."

Remus chuckled took the spliff back after Sirius had had a pull. “So you’re like… 'smart' smart then?”

Sirius had only lifted those dark eyebrows and waited for his next turn with the hash. Remus regretted later not pushing him into revealing his marks, too curious over how he managed to skip every study hour and never do a lick of homework and still keep his spot at the esteemed college. It was probably the money.

When Giles pulled the Rolls into the estate driveway Remus hopped out, marching past the doorman who’d come to greet him and directly up to his room. Dusty was waiting for him of course, and despite the fact that his bedroom was at least four times as large as the one he shared at Hawkings, it felt distinctly cramped. He spent the entire next day roaming the estate’s grounds with Dusty by his side, visiting the other dogs and taking a few of them—Kelos, Seabiscuit, Padfoot, Zenyatta—out into the pastures and beyond. Padfoot, the most energetic of the pups, raced around Dusty like a rocket, his silky black coat catching the snow off the lawn and turning him into more of a dalmatian than a coonhound. Dusty got along well enough with the rest of the dogs, no longer the runty size he’d been at birth, but almost all of them were half his age now, and Remus could see the way his friend was slowing. He’d have to ask Giles to keep an extra good eye on him.

The first two days of Christmas break passed and Remus saw neither hide nor hair of Lyall Lupin. He'd only stayed home at all because he was knackered from the train ride, not because a butler had reiterated his father's poor that threat should he even think about venturing back into the city he'd be more than just sorry. Of course this had little effect on the Lupin heir, who only shot the manservant the bird and told him to sod off. If his father wanted him home he should be around to threaten him himself.

Lyall's absence didn't bother Remus. In fact it almost made him more willing to remain at home. Let him stay away; it only meant there was to be no discussion of any poor marks. He kept himself busy with the dogs or school-reading until he'd let himself grow suitably stir-crazy.

Unwilling to be miserable on Christmas Eve with only Dusty and Giles for company, Remus finally cut through the neighbouring yards and legged it the entire way to the nearest tube station. There he caught a train to East London where the winter rain collected in the potholes and cracked cobbled streets. He had to pull the collar of his jacket up around his neck to keep out the chill—it was a familiar feeling at least. He'd dressed himself in his old clothes including his steel-toes, but was surprised to find that they were tighter in the toes, almost pinching, and his jacket was horribly snug in the shoulders.

Every yob he passed watched him warily, their eyes squinted in the cold and their heads shaved almost to the scalp. Tomny had shaved Remus' head himself back in late June with a pair of rusty clippers, and he'd kept it short all summer, but now with his curls he just looked like any other lanky fifteen year-old who had no business walking around the End on his own.

The real shocker had been when Remus realised he'd walked a street too far and had to turn around. Tomny's building, which was almost always crowded out front with smokers and kids hanging out, was now quiet and deserted, and he'd walked right past it while engrossed in his own thoughts. From outside on the building's steps Remus could hear a radio chattering from an open window on the ground floor, but it felt too calm to be the same rowdy hang-out spot he remembered.

Remus walked up to the building's door buzzer—which only worked every now and then—and pressed the number to Tomny's flat. It sounded and a second later the intercom clicked on.

"Who's this?" A voice called, female.

“Lupin,” Remus said. “Looking for Tomny.”

There was silence, then a bit of muffled whispering over the intercom before the door next to him buzzed aggressively. Letting out a sigh of relief, Remus opened it and took the creaking stairs two at a time until he was banging his fist on the door of Tomny’s old flat, heart racing. The door was opened by a big guy with shoulders like a truck who glared up at Remus—he wasn’t a tall truck—through a heavy brow.

“I’m ‘ere to see Tomny,” he said, in what he hoped was his best bovver-accent. He hadn’t had to use it in a while.

The guy looked him up and down once, almost like he wanted to shut the door in his face, before a girl appeared behind him, smacking her hands into his shoulder.

“Get out of the way, Vint—Tomny says it’s fine.”

Vint stepped back to allow her past and she stopped next to him, her eyes opening wider when she got a full look at Remus. “Well aren’t you just a cutie,” she said, leaning on the door frame. Remus recognised her as the same voice over the intercom.

She was wearing a lot of makeup around her eyes, but rather than looking like those scrubber women you could see on the End’s street corners in the wee hours of the morning, she seemed to suit it. “Your name’s Remus, right?" She asked. "Where’d Tomny find a little string bean like you?”

“Uh…”

“Stop pestering and let ‘im in, Tonya.” a voice called. Tomny.

Tonya dropped her head to the other side and pressed her lips out into a pouty smile as both she and the truck stepped back to allow him past. Nodding briskly, Remus made his way down the familiar hall into the kitchen where the last person he’d spoken to was Seesaw, and then beyond that into the flat’s living room. Last time he’d seen it the room its floor had been covered with old mattresses and dingy couches, usually with a body occupying each one, but now all of that was gone, cleared out and leaving the place less like a cramped trap house.

He didn’t get the chance to take in much of the room beyond that though; the moment he stepped across the threshold Lee had him bent over in a headlock, grinding his knuckles into the top of his head.

“We was wonderin' when you were gonna show your face again, lil' git,” Lee said, but he was laughing, so Remus laughed too, trying to bat him away with his fists.

“Get off ‘a me, ya bastard!”

“You heard him, Lee!” It was Doss next, who pulled Remus from the headlock and crushed him to his barrel chest until he’d squeezed a groan out of him and nearly fractured a rib. There was a slap on his back from someone else, and though he couldn’t see who while being crushed, he could still hear the room’s laughter.

“That’s enough, let the poor plonker walk free.”

Doss dropped him and Remus stretched out his shoulders, turning around to find Tomny standing right there in front of him, one arm across his chest while the other was propped up against his lower lip, his entire face lit up with a smile. The sun-bleached golden waves that he’d sported during the summer were now gone thanks to the dreary London winter, leaving his hair a muted brown that was buzzed close on all sides. Apart from that, Tomny looked as he always had; faded blue jeans and a tan jacket—though Remus did notice the rings under his eyes and stubble growing on the hollows of his cheeks and his jaw. Both made him seem older—more tired.

“You look like shit,” Remus said to the boy—man—just for old time’s sake.

Tomny’s smile turned into a smirk. “And you look like a right little boffin.”

Remus shook his head, and a moment later they were hugging in that same friendly, boyish way they always had. Tomny was still taller—though not for long he suspected—and he cupped the back of Remus’ head lightly with his hand, using the other to clap him on the back. When they finally pulled apart Tomny punched him lightly in the shoulder.

“You went and grew on me again, Ol’ John, you bastard.”

“Yeah, soon I’ll be able to see that bald spot on the top of your head,” Remus quipped, earning him another jab.

As Tomny stepped back Remus took his chance to look around the room. Most of the faces were familiar (Lee, Doss, another bloke named Craig, even Seesaw in the corner) but there were others like Vint he didn't recognise. There still couldn't have been more than ten of them all together though, a stark difference from the old flat that had once been so crammed with people that drunken bodies would pile up on each other in the hallways and bedrooms. It was strange to see it so empty.

"C'mon, Lu," Tomny said, taking his shoulder, "sit down."

Letting himself be guided, Remus followed him to the other side of the room and sat down on a corner seat of one of the sofas as Tomny took a seat in a recliner that was more patchwork than original fabric. A TV sat quietly in the other corner, its rabbit-ears turned toward the stained ceiling.

"You got a telly," Remus commented, suddenly more nervous now that he was sitting and all eyes were on him. Lee and Doss settled in beside him on the sofa while the others took a load-off on various couches and kitchen chairs that had been brought in to fill up the room.

"Yeah," Tomny said, glancing at the TV. "Never had one before, but 's good for a distraction. Lots changed around here since you'd gone."

Remus, who had already been getting a sense of the changes, felt an extra knot begin to form in his stomach. "Flacky not with you?"

Tomny held his gaze. "No."

"Oh. Too bad. Would've liked to see the little shit."

Tomny smiled. "So how was the swot school?"

"Yeah," Lee said, shouldering Remus on the couch. "Thought you were gonna get yourself tossed out by Halloween?" A few of the boys laughed, and Remus did too, trying to keep his expression unreadable.

"Well, it was…"

"A bleeding nightmare most likely," Doss interrupted.

Lee nodded in agreement with his friend. "I bet they had you reading all sorts of poncy shit."

"Now, now," Tomny said, "Lu likes to read, you all know that."

"Any pretty mares, Lupin?" Lee asked. All of them, Tomny included, leaned in a bit more. “Got a girlfriend?”

Now Remus could’ve just said no. He could’ve told them the truth: that most of the girls at Hawkings were more interested in a certain arrogant raven-haired bastard than they’d ever be him. But he didn’t.

“Yeah,” Remus said casually. “She’s back home with her family for Christmas. Really… sort of pretty for an upmarket gal.”

“Well she got a name?” Tomny asked, eyebrows raised.

“Er… Lily.”

Tomny nodded and Lee elbowed Remus. “So does that mean you ever —you know?” He made a vulgar gesture that made the rest of them snicker. Remus tried a laugh, but it was really more of a cough. Luckily he was saved by Tonya, who strode into the room with a mug in one hand.

“Shut up, Lee,” she said sweetly, “not everyone wants to share their escapades with a dosser like you.”

“Oh c’mon, Ton. I’m only tryin' to get Lupin 'ere to tell us about his pretty girl.”

“There’s enough pretty girls right here in London to reject you.” She handed Tomny the steaming mug—coffee. “You don’t need to embarrass the kid, too.”

“That’s half the fun,” Tomny said, smiling up at Tonya. “Lu’s been gone for months. He needs a good hazing.”

“You lot are so mean.” Tonya leaned down toward Tomny’s upturned face and kissed him.

Oh.

Remus turned to the TV while Lee and Doss shared a sarcastic look, though no one else seemed to bat an eye. It could only mean that the public displays of affection were a common thing. When they finally pulled apart, Tonya sat down on the recliner’s arm and crossed her thin legs as Tomny put an arm around her waist and sipped his coffee.

“You stayin' in London for the holidays, Lu?” He asked.

Nodding, he said; “Until the fourth.”

“So you’re goin' back then?” Seesaw said, his first words since Remus had arrived. He’d been busy rolling spliffs on a small table in the corner. There were other traces of drugs around the room; scattered ash trays, faint traces of a white power in the lines of the coffee table. That was normal, at least.

Remus licked his lips at the question. Going back felt like the easiest option, somehow, and that surprised him. School wasn’t exactly a favourite past-time, but for a toss-out he wasn’t all that bad. He’d also left Hope’s records under his bed. It felt wrong to leave them there.

“Yeah,” he said. “Dunno for how long, but I’d rather there than home.”

The boys, ever sympathetic to someone with a rough home-life (if they only knew where he’d actually grown up) nodded their heads.

“You could stay here though,” Lee said.

Remus looked around. Could he? The flat felt so different compared to August.

“How about you tell me what’s been happening since I left first,” Remus said, firmly.

Everyone sat back in their chairs and deferred to Tomny then. Even Tonya, who’d been busy running her fingers across the short hair at the back of his neck, stopped and looked.

“The Irish moved in to this part of town just before Halloween,” Tomny said finally. “They took over, remade the rules. All the guys work for them now, even Burrin.”

“So you work for them too, then?”

Tomny nodded, his lips almost pursed. “Not a bad gig, even if the… transition was a bit rough.” He forced a chuckle and the rest of the boys shared it.

Having never been around during a take-over, Remus wasn’t entirely sure what a ‘transition’ looked like and he wasn’t sure he wanted to. The summer before had been quiet, as their side of the End had been controlled by a gangster named Hill. Guess Hill was gone now, though.

“So where are the rest of the lads?” Remus asked, rubbing his hands together for a bit of warmth. It was always cold in the flat in the winter.

“Other houses, other groups. Things have been more spread out recently.”

Remus understood. He felt he should be grateful, at least, that most of his friends were still around for him to find. Tomny really needed a damn phone.

After that everyone was quiet until Tonya clapped her hands together, addressing the room.

“Right well, Remus can stay as long as he wants, to visit, but if you’re clearing out tonight I want you all out within the hour.” She spoke with intense surety, like she’d been around forever, though Remus had never heard of her before today. All of them listened though. One by one they stood up and began trickling out, each saying goodbye to Tomny and then Tonya, like they were the heads of some sort of mob family.

Maybe they were, Remus realised. Though they couldn’t be that high up the food chain if the Irish had just come in. And Tomny had never been interested in actually joining a group; he’d rather spend his time as the middle man, which was a more precarious place to be, but offered him the freedom to keep his own autonomy.

“I’m cooking tonight,” Tonya told Remus, after he’d shared a fat spliff with Seesaw. “You like ham, Remus?”

“Lupin will eat anything,” Tomny called, “ ‘cept his vegetables. I once watched him eat raw chicken, though.”

Remus made to swat at him from the couch. “It was not raw! It was just a little pink in the middle…”

Tonya stood up from her spot on Tomny’s recliner. “Then you’ll love the ham. Really I’m just trying to make up for not cooking tomorrow. The boys lost a bet with me last week, so they’re doing Christmas dinner.”

Remus raised his eyebrows and Tomny shrugged. He didn’t think the delinquent knew what a whisk was, let alone how to cook an entire holiday meal. Though, he supposed, that was part of the joke.

Tonya turned and made her way toward the kitchen, and as she left

Tomny took a cheeky swipe at her bum. She seemed unfazed, only stopping in the kitchen’s doorway.

“Remus, Tomny said you like music, yeah?”

He nodded, tongue in-cheek. “Yeah, I do.”

“Cool. 'Top of the Pops' has a special on tonight. We should watch it together.”

Chapter End Notes

The song at the beginning, "London Boys" was originally released in 1966 when Bowie was still working with his band The Lower Third. The song was re-released in May 1975.

Lots of slang here:
A 'yob' is generally regarded as a thuggish, working-class or uncultured person.
A 'bovver-accent' is typically connected to rowdy gangs of teenage youth.
'Scrubber' is a negative term for a woman with a lot of sexual partners. Can also mean prostitute.
A 'trap house' is a place where illegal drugs are sold/kept.
'Plonker' means stupid.
A 'boffin' is an expert in some field of science and can also be used as a tame insult such as 'nerd'.

Much of Tomny's gang is curated fiction and will be going forward. However, a group of Irish gangsters did make a push for London's east side in the mid-70's. Hill is also based on a real gangster.

Chapter 17: Christmas, 1975

Chapter Summary

Christmas passes. All is well.

Chapter Notes

CW: Smoking & recreational drugs. References to gang affiliations.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Are you hanging up a stocking on your wall?
It's the time that every Santa has a ball;
Does he ride a red nosed reindeer?
Does he turn up on his sleigh?
Do the fairies keep him sober for a day?

- "Merry Christmas Everybody" Slade, 1973

It wouldn't be until years later, during some talk-show interview that he was definitely too sloshed to remember, that Remus would name the evening of December 23rd 1975 as the first time he realised that he wanted to do music. Of course at the time he wouldn't remember the actual date, or even that he was just fifteen. All he would remember was how it felt to be laid out in front of the telly with his friends, taking it all in. He'd never been as much in line with Bowie's creative insanity as Sirius, and it may have not been the 'rock star' moment, but that evening, in a dingy East End flat, his love for Queen was born.

They were scattered about the living room, bellies full of dinner courtesy of Tonya, who had turned out to be a fantastic cook. Most of them were smoking, Tonya included, though her cigarette was long and skinny, like the ones Remus had only seen in movies. She was draped over Tomny's lap and snuggled up with him under a blanket, but had slipped her toes out and tucked them up under Remus' thigh for a bit of extra warmth.

Top of the Pops had started as it always did, with the hosts giving a jaunty thank you for everyone tuning in during the holidays. Remus thought Rod Stewart's bit was quite good for a pop song, but both Lee and Doss had spent the entire promo calling him a poof and a knob-jockey until Tomny finally snapped at them to shut up so everyone could hear.

It was just the six of them, Remus, Tomny, Tonya, Lee, Doss, and Vint (who'd yet to say more than a few short grunts all evening), and they all seemed happy enough to be there, but Remus could tell the only one actually enjoying the music was Tonya. She knew all the songs, and sang along to Sweet, Mud, and Bowie—which Sirius would've definitely gotten a kick out of—before serenading Tomny with Hot Chocolate's "You Sexy Thing". Doss tried whistling when she got up to dance, but a single sharp glare from Tomny was enough shut him up again. Not that Tonya seemed to care much; they were all drunk or high anyway. Lee had produced a very large bottle of whisky which Remus had graciously partaken from. It reminded him of Sirius' birthday, only this whisky tasted like it'd been made in a grimy bucket, which it may very well have been.

Tonya's drug of choice was something she called 'stardust', which Remus only realised later was cocaine. She offered him some, but he'd declined so he could remain coherent enough to watch the amazing finale he'd been promised in the show's intro. Tomny, Doss, and Vint did take her up on the offer though.

When the finale started and Queen's promo video came on, Remus was almost disappointed. He'd listened to the band before, and seen them live once on Pops, but he'd never been much interested. That train of thought ended roughly around the second verse of "Bohemian Rhapsody". It didn't matter if they were wearing makeup or bloody satin jumpsuits—it was like the band had reached into his soul and yanked on his vocal cords. He didn't know the song, but he hummed anyway, and soon all of them were into it—even Lee and Doss, who'd never cared much for music in the first place.

Tonya of course knew every word; Remus was almost jealous, but he'd hardly watched or listened to any new music since getting to Hawkings. Now he was kicking himself for it—how could he have missed such a masterpiece? Sirius was going to lose his mind when he heard it; maybe he was watching the same programme right now.

The moment the song was over Remus wanted to play it again, and again. Luckily, Tonya was the coolest girlfriend Tomny had ever had. Not only had she been responsible for the TV, but she was able to wheel out an entire turntable out from their shared bedroom.

“I got one of Tomny's other mates to rescue it from the bins outside and fix it up for me,” she said gleefully, standing aside to do another line while Remus set up the needle and tuned the speed. When she handed him Queen’s A Night at the Opera album, Remus put it on immediately, and the record didn’t stop spinning until they’d all fallen asleep in the wee hours of the morning.

When he woke up the next day everyone else had gone apart from Vint who was still passed out on one of the sofas, and Tonya, who was sipping coffee and reading Peter’s father’s paper, The Daily London Local, at the dining table.

“Good morning, sleepy head,” she said. There were fresh flowers in a tiny vase in front of her that almost made Remus question if he’d woken up in Tomny’s flat at all. The power women had, really.

“Mm,” Remus groaned in response, rubbing his face. He was going to be nursing a hangover for a while, but it wasn’t the worst he’d ever had. While smiling at him, Tonya gestured for him to sit, which he did.

“Coffee?” She asked, opening the fridge and withdrawing a carton of eggs. Remus grunted again and after lighting the hob she poured him a cup and passed it over. He sipped it and instantly grimaced and Tonya gave a little giggle before passing him a small bowl of sugar and some milk from the fridge. Coffee had never been Remus’ favourite, even with plenty of sugar, but at least it warmed his stomach. The flat was always freezing in winter and sweltering in the summer.

“Where’s Tom?” Remus asked, clearing his throat. His voice was still scratchy from the embarrassing amount of singing he’d done the night before.

“Dunno,” Tonya shrugged, cracking a few eggs into a pan to sizzle. She was wearing a pair of flannel pyjama bottoms and an oversized t-shirt rolled up at the shoulders that must’ve been Tomny’s and her dark hair was up in a bun, held in place by a pencil.

“He just leaves you here?” Remus sipped his coffee again, shuddering less this time.

“When it suits him.” Tonya started whistling, twirling her spatula around in her hand. Eventually she looked back over her shoulder and smiled. “How long have you known Tomny?”

“A while," Remus answered, "since I was a kid.”

”Are you not still a kid?” She smirked. “Well, I’ve only known him since Halloween. I was living in Paris before here.”

Remus tried not to let his awe show on his face. Paris felt like another world, even for someone who’d been raised as he had been. Not that Remus had ever been on something as fancy as a plane. Trains were shit enough.

“So… how’d you end up with a yob like Tomny?”

“Because I’m so hot?” She smiled over her shoulder again and he blushed into his coffee. “Tomny’s hot too, don’t you think?”

Remus made a noise in the base of his throat as Tonya turned off the hob. “I’m only joking. I met Tomny outside some bar in Shoreditch. Bit of a wild night if I’m be honest. Here, eat.”

She dumped a plate of eggs in front of Remus and handed him a fork, which he took eagerly. “Thanks,” he mumbled as Tonya took her spot across from him, going back to her paper. She was circling addresses for rent.

“You and Tomny looking to move?” Remus asked between bites.

“Just me. Tomny wants to keep the flat, but I’m not exactly in love with the area.”

“Fair enough,” Remus said. He was secretly happy that the flat wasn’t going anywhere, though it couldn’t have been easy for a pretty girl like her to walk the neighbourhood around on her own. Tonya looked good without makeup too, he noticed. All eyes, a warm brown, with a pouty mouth.

“Are you French then?” Remus asked, trying to fill the silence with conversation. Tonya shook her head.

"Malheureusement, non. Just a traveller. I was born in St Petersburg actually, but I grew up in Brighton.” Tonya circled another address. “Where are you from, Remus?”

He could’ve smacked himself. Conversation indeed. The entire time he’d been running with Tomny and the others he’d had one rule: no backstories. Feigning disinterest in others’ histories usually kept them from asking after his, but one term at a poncy rich-kid school and he was already violating his own code.

“Southwark.” It was the answer he always gave when people got too interested. “Nowhere special.”

Tonya nodded, sipping her own coffee. “Your mum must miss you. How old are you anyway?”

“Mum’s dead,” Remus said cooly. “And I’m sixteen.” Or he would be, in three months. “How old are you?”

Tonya jutted her lower lip out, but didn’t apologise for bringing up his mum. Others almost always did, like it was a natural reaction to wince and apologise over his mum catching phenomena during a bad spell. Lily had apologised up and down when Remus had first told her about Hope, though all he’d said was that she’d passed when he was eleven. Despite his reluctance to offer more, Lily had still fawned over him for the rest of the day like he was a jessie made of glass. It was irritating somehow, and Remus found he liked Tonya’s reaction better.

“I’m nineteen,” she said. “Never thought I’d date someone as young as Tomny.”

Remus made a face. “Tomny turned nineteen in November.”

Tonya smiled but didn’t correct him, and he was left feeling as though he'd missed the joke.

“What are you doing for Christmas, love?”

He shrugged, having almost forgotten that it was Christmas Eve. “Don’t really feel like going home.”

“Wonderful,” Tonya said, picking up the newspaper and straightening it out. “You can stay with us then.”

“Really?”

“Tomny won’t mind. I'll wager he misses you. A lot. Talks about you enough anyway.”

“Yeah?”

“Yeah.” Tonya folded her paper and took out another cigarette from the carton she’d left on the table, sticking it between her lips and lighting it. “It’ll be good. Even if the boys are total shite at dinner. I’ve got more records, you can play your pick.”

Remus nodded slowly. “Cheers.”

Tonya blew the smoke out her nose and smiled. “Cheers. Now finish your eggs.”

* * *

It was hard for him to wrap his head around Tonya, who was both overbearing and somehow also completely blasé about most things. She had insisted he tell someone where he was going to be staying, even if it was just a neighbour or some bum that lived in the alley nearest to his house in ‘Southwark’. Generally Remus’ go-to when it came to enigmatic people like her was to sit back in indifference or ignore them all together; but he had a feeling Tonya wouldn’t take well to being snubbed, so he took the money she gave him and walked three streets over to the nearest working phone, kicked out the bum out of the box, and made his call.

Giles wasn’t very happy when Remus rung him, but he’d picked up on the third ring as always and at least sounded relieved to find out that he wasn’t dead in a ditch somewhere. That didn’t mean he wasn’t going to lecture though.

“You should come home. You did good at that school. You can pick up any poor marks, he’s not going to worry about those.”

“He doesn’t worry about anything unless it concerns work or his dogs,” Remus shot into the phone’s receiver. “He’s not even going to be there if I come back, so I’m staying.”

“Lad, you shouldn’t throw away—”

“Just wanted you to know I wasn’t dead, Gil. I’ll call again later.” Remus hung up the phone.

By the time he’d returned to the flat Tomny was back with Lee and Doss and Tonya had another record going. “Remus is staying for Christmas,” she announced as he entered the living room, slinging her arm across his shoulders despite being almost a foot shorter. She smelt good—like vanilla—so he let her.

All the boys nodded in approval of Tonya’s announcement, and Remus felt his chest tighten in admiration and gratitude for his friends.

“And I expect everyone to get him a present,” she added, making Remus moan and pull away.

“No, don’t,” he insisted. He didn’t need anything, not from them. "It's already Christmas Eve."

“No, I reckon that’s fair,” Tomny said from across the room, while fiddling with the television’s antenna. “We didn’t get you anything for your last birthday, Lu. Christmas seems fitting enough.”

“I can’t get you anything, though.”

Tomny turned back to look at him and raised a brow. “I don’t remember asking for nothin’.” He glanced at Lee and Doss. “Did you?”

Both boys feigned ignorance and shrugged, and just like that the conversation was over.

Christmas Eve at the flat was humble and noisy, with plenty of food, drink, and dope to go around. Several people Remus didn’t know showed up later on but he’d already taken some pill from Seesaw that made his head buzzy and ended up passing out until noon on the 25th. When he woke up Tomny gave him two very large cartons of cigarettes while Lee and Doss had gone in on a copy of A Night at the Opera—apparently they’d slipped out the evening before and made it to the shop ‘just in time’. Even Tonya gave him a gift, which turned out to be a pair of round sunglasses that she said made him look like John Lennon. There had been a stiff bag of spliffs too, courtesy of Seesaw’s nimble fingers, and that had been enough to leave him almost weepy for the rest of the day.

They ended up watching Top of the Pops’s Christmas Day special, but none of the acts were as good as Queen, so they’d turned it off before the end and played Remus’ own copy of A Night at the Opera. No one complained, despite the fact that they must’ve listened to “I’m in Love with My Car” about twenty times at that point, and none of them had so much as a rusty beater to speak of.

Things became more quiet after Christmas, with the rest of the boys returning to work—whatever that meant now that the Irish ran everything. Without Flacky around Remus was the youngest of the crew, and the only real child left among them. It would’ve been a harder pill to swallow, had he not liked hanging with Tonya so much.

She’d never once left the flat while Remus was there and yet her energy never waned. After giving up her kitchen (and Tomny would never have argued that it was indeed her kitchen) to the boys on Christmas, Tonya rushed in to save them after someone had shouted that the turkey was on fire. Charred or not, they all seemed happy with the meal, which was certainly more food than any of them were used to having at one time. Remus tried hard not to compare it to the full tables in the Hawkings' dining hall.

On New Years he and Tonya found themselves alone in each other's company, after Doss had shown up with a message for Tomny that had him practically running out of the flat. The interaction had set Remus instantly on edge, but Tonya managed to distract him with a spliff and a book. Like him, she was a ravenous reader, and already they'd spent days sitting next to each other, devouring the small collection of literature she kept tucked up in Tomny's closet and only stopping to eat, sleep, or get high.

"Do you ever leave the flat, Ton?" They were dancing alone in the living room while the turntable played an Eagles album, which Remus had initially balked at—the dancing bit, not the Eagles, they were fine—but he was drunk again and Tonya was very pretty.

"It's cold outside," Tonya hummed, "and at least this way I get to keep you out of trouble."

"What makes you think I need to be kept out of trouble?" He kept his hands knotted behind Tonya's waist as they swayed to the music, cheek leaning against the top of her head, breathing in the smell of vanilla.

" 'Cause the rest of 'em are always in trouble, and you'd just follow them into the heart of it. Tomny says you're too loyal, Remus."

He mumbled into her hair; "No such thing as too loyal."

"It is when you're a baby."

"I'm not a baby. And you're not a babysitter."

"Maybe not, but I like keeping you here. It's like my job."

The song ended, and a moment of silence passed over them as Remus processed what she'd just said. Somehow the conversation felt too akin to the one he'd had with Lily at the beginning of term. He went to pull away, but Tonya held him to her by the neck, more grown and sure of herself than the red-haired girl.

“Don’t do that. Don’t pull away. We’re dancing.”

“Never wanted to dance,” he grumbled. He knew that Tonya was blitzed again, but everyone who came around the flat was high. It was like the entry fee: get blasted or gassed off your ass or get out.

“Tomny just doesn’t want you mixed up in any of it,” she murmured into his neck.

“That’s stupid,” Remus said, glaring at the wall behind her. “He had never had a problem with me coming along before.”

“Things are different now.”

How different? Why won’t any of you tell me?

Another song had started, and he found himself following Tonya’s lead, swaying to the melody as they clung together. When she spoke again her voice was still soft, but she wasn’t mumbling like she normally did when she was high.

“The other boys wanted to take you along, but he wants you clean so you can go back to school.”

“He wants me to go back?” Hearing the words aloud almost hurt.

“ ‘Course. It’s a good thing—getting an education.”

“Do you have an education?”

Drawing back from his shoulder, Tonya shook her head, looking up at him with painted eyelashes. “Dropped out when I was fourteen.”

“And then what?”

“And then I stowed away on a train to Amsterdam.”

Remus raised an eyebrow. “Amsterdam?”

“Mm… Something like that.” She smiled, and Remus shook his head, thinking how unfair it was that she was able to dispel a bad mood so easily.

“I’ve never really been out of London,” he confessed.

“You’re out now though, right? Where’s your school?”

“Scotland.”

“Scotland’s pretty.”

“You’ve been?”

“No, I hate the rain. It’s why I leave here so often.”

He snorted and Tonya resumed their swaying again, humming along to the song. She’d broken out this pretty halter-top dress for the evening, and in comparison Remus looked like a bum in the oversized shirt and jeans he’d borrowed from Tomny.

“Where to next, then?” He was getting caught up the same way he did with Tomny, the way he almost had with Sirius. Maybe if he knew enough about them, he could share in a bit of their blissful delirium.

“Dunno,” Tonya murmured. “Maybe somewhere in Asia. I look a bit Asian don’t I?”

“Er…”

Tonya laughed but neither confirmed nor denied. “Just one day at a time, Remus. We take everything one day at a time.”

There was a short clatter from the front door, and Tonya went rigid in his arms before Tomny appeared through the kitchen, stumbling as he struggled to take off his remaining boot. Remus stopped swaying, wondering how he must look with his arms around the waist of his friend’s girl, but Tonya only smiled pensively, relaxing back against him as Tomny tossed his boot across the room.

“You high?” She asked.

Tomny nodded, giving a thumbs up, and moved right past them to collapse into his patchy recliner. Tonya’s smile turned into a grin, and as another song started she leaned her head into Remus’ chest and let herself stare at her boyfriend. “We’re dancing.”

“I can see that,” Tomny said casually. He had a beer in his hand that Remus hadn’t noticed he’d brought with him. He used his teeth to pry the cap off before spitting it across the room.

“Do you want to join?” Tonya asked.

Tomny shook his head, holding up one hand. “Don’ let me interrupt.”

“Fine then, be boring.” Moving her arms from his neck to behind his back, Tonya smiled up at Remus, who felt as though his heart might beat right out of his chest. They stayed that way until the song ended, just the three of them in the whole flat, maybe even the whole world.

When he was finally released Remus slumped back onto the sofa and reached for the spliff he’d left in one of the flat’s many ashtrays, lighting it up and taking a deep drag to calm his sudden nerves. Tonya stood before him and he passed the hash cigarette along, watching as she held it between her fingers in that elegant way of hers and looked down at him like he was a puzzle she hadn’t quite solved yet.

“Like a button…” she murmured, cocking her head to the side and taking a drag. “I still dunno how you found him.”

“I didn’t,” Tomny chuckled, just as Remus realised she hadn’t been talking to him, “Lu found me.”

“How romantic.”

“Oh stuff it,” Remus scoffed, and Tonya stuck out her lower lip, looking to Tomny.

“He’s so cute. Can’t we keep him?”

“No,” he said into his beer, “and you best be careful. He’ll read ya like a book, that one.”

Tonya smirked. “I think I’d like to be read. Bet if you’re a good enough story someone’ll remember you. They might even fall in love, just a little bit.”

Remus wasn’t sure about love, but he couldn’t imagine ever forgetting this. It was too strange. Too wonderfully odd.

“Is this the part where one of you confesses your undying love for me?” He asked, before covering his mouth to hide his guilty smile. “I didn’t mean to say that.”

“Oh, I think you did,” Tonya said, and soon they were all laughing.

“This ain’t church, posh boy,” Tomny said, “can’t help you wiff any confessions.”

Staunching her laughter, Tonya took a second drag and leaned down at the waist until she was eye to eye with Remus on the couch.

“I don’t need a church to confess,” she said, before cupping his chin, pressing her lips gently to his. It was a ghost of a kiss, so brief he could've imagined it, but it was his first, and Remus was dumbstruck.

After she pulled away, Tonya placed the spliff between his lips and pressed both hands to his cheeks. “Bonne année, Remus. Dis à ta petite amie imaginaire que je suis désolée.”

She kissed him once more, on the forehead this time, before giving a dreamy smile turning to wander back toward their bedroom. As she went, she sang;

“Any way the wind blows…”

The door closed behind her, and the flat went quiet.

“Now I suddenly feel left out.”

Gaping like a right idiot, Remus spun back around on the sofa to find Tomny watching him from the recliner, his eyebrows raised like he was impressed.

“Tom, I…”

“Nope,” Tomny said very suddenly, holding up a hand. “Don’t worry your pretty head, I get it.”

“You get it…?”

“Mhm. It’s jus’ women, y'know?”

No I don’t know, he thought.

“Yeah, totally,” he said.

Tomny sipped his beer again and smiled around the rim. Once he’d pulled the bottle back, Remus’ eyes found the little scar on his upper lip.

“I tell you what though, Lu,” he said, “yer sumthin'. Really sumthin'.”

Chapter End Notes

Hope you enjoyed Christmas, next chapter we will be back at school in the 1976 new year xx

A 'beater' is just a rust-bucket of a car that barely runs.

A 'hob' is like a stove top.

Chapter 18: The B-side

Chapter Summary

Remus returns for his first term of the 1976 school year. Girlish shenanigans ensue.

Chapter Notes

No trigger warnings!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Blue eyes, blue eyes,
How come you tell so many lies?
Come up and see me, make me smile,
Or do what you want, running wild…

- "Make Me Smile" Steve Harley & Cockney Rebel, 1975

Monday 5th January 1976

Remus had been at his father's for less than two days before Giles had loaded his trunk back into the Roll's boot and drove him to Kings Cross. He dragged his feet across the platform, eerily aware of how close he was feeling to that very first day he'd left for school. He'd been less sure of things back then, and was fully prepared to hate all of it, but somehow that had proved harder than expected. Going back to friends and the easy flow of a schoolboy's day-to-day stung, because he knew what he was leaving behind. And there was no guarantee that any of it would be waiting for him next time either. He was on the outside again, playing double-life and unwilling to let so much as a single hair of them cross.

He'd already prepared himself to feel worse upon seeing the other boys so cheery and excited to be going back to school—despite the ungodly hour of the morning—and it might've proved more than he could handle, were they not such fucking nobs.

The moment they spotted him, James and Peter pressed their noses to the window and began waving frantically to flag him down. Remus paused to wave back, and just then Sirius' face appeared through the glass, grinning pompously. He raised a hand to wave back before ever-so delicately twisting his wrist to flip him the bird.

Remus shook his head with a pinched smile, before mouthing ‘fuck you’ back at him.

‘Fuck you!’ Sirius returned through the glass, smiling.

“No, fuck you!”

‘FUCK YOU!’

“FUCK YOU!”

“Oi! Stop that foul shouting!”

Remus clapped a hand over his mouth as a train attendant approached through the crowd, whistle already tucked between his teeth. Others waiting on the platform stared back at him, clearly disgruntled by the foul yelling, and before the attendant could catch up with him, Remus quickly scuttled aboard and made his way down the aisle to his friends’ carriage compartment, sliding open the door.

“Good morning, you stupid nobs,” he announced, just as Sirius launched a football straight at him, giving Remus barely enough time to duck and avoid getting smacked in the gob.

“Good morning to you too, pet!”

James jumped up from his spot on the bench and clapped him on the shoulder. “Nice reflexes, Lupin!” He congratulated, before shoving past to retrieve the ball from the aisle.

“You never give anything a rest,” Remus said, stepping into the train compartment and lifting his trunk up on the rack above their heads. “You’re such an arse.”

Sirius grinned and slumped down in his seat slightly, dark hair sticking to the vinyl behind him. “And how’d you arrive at that conclusion?”

“Resentful observation,” Remus said, taking a seat on the padded bench next to Peter and smacking his open palm in greeting. “Hey, Pete.”

“Hi ya, Lupin. Did you have a good holiday?”

“Oh yeah. You?”

“Mhm. James and I—”

“We went to Devon,” James interjected, appearing back in the compartment with his football tucked under one arm, sliding the door shut behind him. “Mum decided we should get out of the city so we went to the house there.”

“We went too,” Peter said, excitedly; “James and I got holiday houses next door to one another on the beach.”

“You two should come next year,” James offered. "It's still cold but real nice."

“Oh yeah, I’m sure mum would love that,” Sirius scoffed. James reached up to yank on his long hair and Sirius punched him in the arm.

“What did you get for Christmas, Lupin?” Peter asked, disinterested in the rough-housing.

“Cigarettes,” Remus said, and both James and Peter’s eyes widened. “Kidding.”

Sirius snorted, and a moment later the train’s whistle blew.

When they arrived back at Hawkings College, Remus was struck by the fact that the campus was somehow more dreary than he’d remembered. The snow wandered between wet slush and frozen ice depending on the time of day, and everyone’s breath came out as a small haze in front of their noses. It was damn cold, but students still dismounted their buses from the station, greeting each other with rosy cheeks while chattering away with the same merry energy that came with the passing holiday.

“Do you see them?” James asked hopefully, after they’d collected their trunks.

“Who?” Remus asked.

“He means the girls,” Sirius drawled, dropping an arm around James’ shoulders. “And no I don’t, but it’s bloody freezing and I’m starving so let’s just go get dinner and worry about your ginger problems later.”

Even after dinner, the bus, and train ride, neither Remus nor Sirius had said very much about their holidays, but both James and Peter were full of stories, which Sirius seemed happy enough to listen along to. The Potters celebrated Christmas along with other Hindu holidays such as Diwali, though James was away at school a lot of the time, so they'd always tried to make the December break extra special along with their close neighbours, the Pettigrews, an exceptionally normal upper-crust British family. The two households had a tradition of celebrating Christmas dinner at the Potters' and New Years supper at the Pettigrew's and invited most of their friends to make it a big affair, something Remus could hardly imagine. The closest thing he'd ever come to a party in his home were the Sunday afternoon teas his mother used to put on, but he'd been so small then, he could hardly remember.

Having been one of James' best friends since primary, the Potters sent along a Christmas gift for Sirius, which he unwrapped after dinner, discovering several rock and roll magazines and a whole songbook of sheet music for the piano.

"Sorry, I thought I'd told her you'd stopped playing the piano," James winced, after Sirius had unwrapped the gift.

"No," he said kindly, "I love it. Tell mum thanks."

James nodded, and passed along a small tin to Remus. "It's Christmas baking," he said, and Remus opened the tin to find several milky-white squares.

"It's called barfi," James continued. "It's made with coconut—sort of like a fudge. I told mum you liked sweet things. She says hi."

Remus thumbed the tin, feeling warm inside. "Thanks."

James nodded and carried on. To him, passing along his mother's holiday baking seemed like a perfectly normal thing, but it had never occurred to Remus that James might've been thinking of him while at home with his family. He'd thought of him, but only in passing really. Now he almost felt guilty, but somehow he doubted someone as good as James Potter would've minded. He was too busy enjoying his holiday and family time to be worried with such a thing. In fact, the only one who might've been able to relate to Remus' Christmas was Sirius, and he'd given anyway nothing so far.

It wasn't until later that evening, while Peter was off meeting with his AV club and James had popped off to the library to return an overdue book, that Remus was able to approach Sirius on his own.

"You watch any 'Top of the Pops' over the holidays?" He asked, feeling awkward. He was sitting on his bed and had called across the room rather than getting up and approaching the other boy directly.

Sirius looked up from his bed. He was reading, and until that moment Remus hadn't realised it was his copy of The Great Gatsby. A tape was going quietly in the stereo next to him, some psychedelic ballad that made the speakers sound as though they were underwater.

"No," he said, bouncing his foot off his knee as he always did. "Mum doesn't like TV much."

"Is there anything she does like?"

"Don't think so."

"Oh… well, Queen played." Remus began picking at his bed comforter. His announcement at least, seemed to get Sirius' attention.

"Oh yeah? Were they any good?"

"Yeah! It was just a promo, but the new song… blimey."

Sirius sat up on his bed eagerly, his black hair tousled from his pillow. "I haven't listened to their new album. Andy promised to send it to me for Christmas, but it hasn't arrived in the post yet."

Remus was moving before Sirius had even finished. "I got it right here —a friend gave it to me for Christmas, too." Pulling out the album, which he'd secretly stashed next to his bedside table while unpacking, he crossed the dorm room to where Sirius was already setting up the stereo and turntable. He passed it over, and Sirius paused to take the cover in, running his fingers along every edge.

"So bloody cool," he murmured.

"Wait until you hear it. Put it on! Oh, and start with the b-side."

"It's sacrilegious to start a first play with the b-side."

"Just trust me."

Sliding the record out of its sleeve, Sirius set up the needle and stepped back as the familiar crackling filled the room. Immediately, he dropped down to the floor and laid back on the rug, staring up at him with excited glee.

"Well, Lupin? You gonna lay down?"

Remus looked to his bed questioningly. “I thought we’d—”

“No,” Sirius said, shaking his head vigorously, “not for a first play. Trust me.”

“Alright.” Dropping down beside him, Remus settled in just as the music started. It felt a little odd to be lying on the floor of their own bedroom, but he forgave it under the pretence that it was just another one of Sirius’ odd musical quirks.

They made it through the entirety of “Prophet’s Song” without uttering a word, though it took Remus nearly half of the eight-minute song to really relax. When he did he found it was easy to stare at the ceiling and drift off with the music, but he was too conscious of Sirius lying next to him with his dark hair splayed out like a halo. They didn’t look at each other, didn’t speak even as the second song turned into the third, but the music had enough words for the both of them anyway and eventually, as the opening chords of “Bohemian Rhapsody” poured out of the stereo, Remus closed his eyes.

This was why Sirius had wanted to lie on the floor. There, there were no sideways glances to gauge anyone else’s reaction or to make sure they were enjoying themselves. There it was just you and the moment when you first heard a song that might change your life forever. It was the most solitary anyone could feel in the presence of another person, and yet with Sirius beside him and Queen in the air, Remus didn’t feel lonely at all.

As the song ended and Freddie Mercury’s voice filtered out and the gong was hit, Remus bit his lip over a smile, opening his eyes and blinking in the light of their bedroom as he turned to look at Sirius; “I thought it was brilliant when I first heard it. None of my friends back home really understood how good—”

Remus had to stop. Not because the next song had interrupted him, or even because he’d realised that that moment was the first time he’d openly offered any information about his London friends; he had to stop because Sirius was crying.

Watching Sirius Black cry was a lot like watching a parent cry. Even as a child you know that they must do it, that they have the capability —that they’d have to cry sometimes otherwise they’d just explode, but seeing it and imagining it were two very different things. Sirius wasn’t balling, wasn’t even weeping really, but Remus faltered anyway and glued his eyes back to the roof of their bedroom. He stayed like that, too afraid to say anything, until “God Save the Queen” had finished and the crackling needle went silent. Finally Sirius sat up, and Remus caught the quick gesture as he wiped his face on his arm.

“It must’ve been amazing.” Sirius spoke with his back to him, and Remus was struck by how small it seemed, hunched over in his school uniform.

“Oh… seeing them? Yeah.”

“They played that song, didn’t they,” Sirius picked up the album cover to read it, “ ‘Bohemian Rhapsody’?”

Remus nodded. “They looked amazing, too.”

Some silence passed, and then in a small voice, Sirius whispered; “I can’t wait.”

“Wait for what, Sirius?”

Suddenly straightening up, Sirius whipped his head around. The tears were gone, replaced with that infectious grin of his. “To write songs like that.”

“Oh.” Remus sat up next to him and stared down at the album in his hands. “You write songs, then?”

“None like that. None that are good enough to show anyone. But one day.”

Remus nodded again, automatically, but the understanding escaped him. Music for him was… well, he wasn’t quite sure what it was, but it had never been a goal. Not like it seemed to be for Sirius. He’d never wept over music.

“Want to listen to it again?” Sirius asked, with no indication that he’d just been crying at all. Swallowing the lump in his throat, Remus bobbed his head in consideration and Sirius met his gaze with a small smile. He melted instantly and let out a Sirius Black-level sigh before dropping back down on the rug, hands behind his head.

“Yeah. Go on then. A-side's good too. Dunno what they were thinking with the car track though.”

* * *

Thursday 29th January 1976

Januarys in Scotland were almost as bad as Octobers in London. The sky over Hawkings did nothing but piss rain, and when it wasn't pouring it was snowing, which turned to mud and mush the moment it started raining again. Remus had never gotten so much use out of a pair of wellies in his life. Back home, he would've just traipsed around town in his bovver boots like the rest, but this far north, wet shoes were a death sentence. If you didn't make it across the berms in the early morning without getting your socks wet, then you were left with frozen toes for the rest of the school day and a considerably bad attitude, at least where Remus was concerned.

The start of second term and the overload of homework that it came with was not entirely bad, but perhaps only because Remus had finally broken down and joined the girls in the library. It was terribly embarrassing to face Lily those first few weeks after he'd claimed she was his girlfriend to Tomny and the rest, but he told himself that as long as Lily never knew, he could bear the shame. Besides, not taking Lily with him to study would've been an academic waste.

Though, if Remus was being honest, the real spurn to raise his marks did not come from Lily's constant pestering, but the fact that Sirius hadn't received a single red mark on any of his term one exams. He must've been exceedingly good at cheating then, as Remus had never witnessed him willingly (and of his own volition) open a textbook to review. He was fully prepared to get Sirius to fess up to his crimes until Lily dispelled his suspicions during one of their private study periods.

"He's just got a really good memory, Remus. He can look at something once and then tell you what it says word-for-word. It's infuriating, really. I mean, who would throw away such a talent? All he does is mess around with Potter and listen to music. If I had that power, nothing would stop me from being top of the year."

"You're already top of the year," Marlene pointed out. She had her blonde hair done up in a sleek ponytail, and Remus didn't miss the little sapphire stud earrings she'd gotten as a Christmas gift from her parents. It made him a bit squeamish, thinking about pushing a stick of metal through your ear lobe just for the sake of fashion.

"And I have to work for it just to stay ahead of tossers like Black," Lily said. “Things come so easy to him, it’s unfair.”

“Careful Remus,” Mary said from the end of the table where was currently painting her nails with a bottle of nail polish she’d propped up on her textbooks, “she’s been whinging about Black’s marks since we’ve known the buggar. She’ll go on forever if you let her. I think she’s secretly in love with him.”

“I am not!” Lily shrieked, earning herself a sharp shush from Mrs. Pince as she passed their table. She smiled at the librarian in apology while Mary and Marlene shared a shameless smile.

Remus thought about what Lily said about Sirius’ memory; It made perfect sense really, in the way he seemed to be able to recall any lyric of any song or quote directly from a novel he’d only skimmed. Being constitutionally lazy might’ve been built into Sirius’ bones, but he could play a song on the guitar after barely glancing at the sheet music, and as much as it hurt to admit, Remus had never seen him get less than a ninety on any test. If Sirius fell academically short anywhere it was in his essays and take-home work, which he found unbearably boring and sometimes just neglected to hand in. It made Remus, who excelled at homework and dreaded tests, feel like a complete fool. But at least now he had an answer; Sirius Black wasn’t just some ordinary prodigy, he was a bloody genius.

“Remus? Remus, are you listening?”

“Huh?” Snapping out of his daze, Remus looked up from his Modern Languages text to find Lily missing from the table while Mary and Marlene stared back at him expectantly.
“Er, what was I saying?”

“You weren’t saying anything,” Marlene said, “you’d completely spaced out.”

“Oh, sorry… were you saying something?”

Mary gave him a sly smile. “Yeah, we were only asking if you had plans tomorrow.”

Remus bit the inside of his cheek, thinking. Tomorrow was a Friday and James had football practice on the school’s tiny indoor pitch in the evening, trying to get his team in shape for the upcoming season. Both Sirius and Peter had detention for supposedly cheating off one another on a maths assignment—though neither would admit who had actually copied who. Peter could’ve copied Sirius for the mark, but Sirius could've also copied Peter because he couldn't be bothered to do the assignment in the first place. Their loyal reluctance to nark at least meant Remus was free to camp out in the dorm room by himself.

"No," he said honestly. "I was going to finish the geography homework."

"We'll help you!" Marlene said, uncharacteristically loud. She reigned herself in before Mrs. Pince could return to shush them and smiled widely. "We can do it together today if you'd like. Then you can… come hang?"

Remus' eyes tightened a little at 'hang out' only because it felt so strange to hear the words come out of a mouth as conservative as Marlene's. It made him instantly suspicious.

"I don't—"

"Please, Remus?" Mary said, her voice low but still pleading. "It'd make Lily very happy."

" 'Happy'?"

"Yes, you numpty, happy! It would make Lily very happy."

"But why—"

"Just because!" Marlene insisted. "You'll see when you show up."

He wanted to say no, but one look from the both of them and he caved—almost wincing. "Alright."

"Wonderful," Mary said, sharing a glance with Marlene that Remus couldn't interpret. Why did girls have to do that? Things would really be much easier if everyone just said what they were thinking. Boys did that—said what they meant—or else they just fought and forgot. It was much preferable to the constant mind-games girls seemed to prefer.

"You're not planning anything are you?" Remus asked, now very used to being pulled around by Sirius and the rest, but both girls only shook their heads.

"We'll meet you outside Rowena House tomorrow at seven," Mary said. "Oh, and don't tell Lily."

“Why shouldn’t I—ow!"

Mary kicked him hard under the table just as Lily returned with three fresh texts. She heard him cry out and frowned as she sat down.

“Are you okay, Remus?”

Remus shot a glare at Mary, who had returned to painting her nails. “S'fine. Just a paper cut.”

* * *

Remus was going to be sick.

“What do you mean it's Lily’s birthday?"

Mary and Marlene giggled like they shared a single hive-mind.

“You’re really sort of thick when you want to be, Remus,” Mary remarked. “I mean exactly what I said—it’s Lily’s sixteenth birthday. She’s lucky really, both Marlene and I have summer birthdays. Horrible to be away from friends on your birthday.”

Remus pinched his forehead. “But I don’t understand why I’m here.”

“Remus,” Marlene said, like she was correcting a child, “you’re Lily’s friend, too.”

He was?

If his negligence toward Lily’s birthday weren’t enough, he could’ve thought up a dozen more excuses as to why he’d been disqualified for the role of ‘friend’. Besides, Remus had more than enough friends already. He had Tomny, Lee, Doss… and of course there was James, Sirius, and Peter, even if they sometimes made him want to pull his hair out—but he wasn’t about to admit that to the girls.

Remus sighed. “I don’t get why you didn’t just tell me it was her birthday in the first place.”

“Because we weren’t sure you’d come if you knew, silly,” Mary said.

“I don’t even have a present for her.”

“You don’t need a present,” Marlene assured him. “Just come say

hello."

They both batted their big eyes at him, and Remus felt his shoulders sag in defeat. He could've pretended he didn't see them in the dark, but then Mary gave him a blinding smile. "We have booze."

A pause, then; "Alright…" Curse him for being so weak to life's little pleasures.

"Wonderful." Taking him by the arm, Mary marched him around the side of Rowena House with Marlene in tow. Remus nearly gaped when they stopped outside a single second floor window. It was left open despite the late January chill and he could hear a pop song playing. Before he could ask how they were supposed to get inside, Mary climbed up onto the electrical box just below the window and turned to look at him with a smug smile.

"Don't tell me you thought only the boys snuck out after hours?"

He didn't, but it was a rhetorical question anyway, so he answered with one of his own; "I thought boys weren't allowed inside the girls dorms?"

"You're not," she said, "but Lily's a prefect, and it's her birthday. Now get up here and help me up."

With a dramatic sigh, Remus climbed up onto the metal electrical box and locked his fingers together to boost Mary through the open window, then Marlene, who stuck her head back out after, probably just to make sure he hadn't hightailed it into the woods. Waving her off, Remus gripped the edge of the window, which was only at head-level for him now, and hauled himself up and into the bedroom.

Inside, he found that the girls' dorm was much like his own, with wooden wall panelling, four beds arranged in a square, and matching rugs and curtains. Though where the boys' were red and maroon, the Rowena colouring was varying shades of dark and navy blue. Decorations representative of the girls lined each wall and surface, including posters of celebrities, films, and photo frames with pictures of them and their families.

It was almost strange to see the photos: Lily and her sister on some green hillside, a toddler Mary with a handsome man that could only have been the father she was always going on about. None of the boys had any photos displayed apart from a polaroid of James and his parents, which he'd mounted to the wall amongst his favourite football cards with a wad of chewing gum.

“Holy cricket!” A voice called, and Remus turned to find Lottie sitting up on her bed, a magazine in one hand, wearing a bright pink pyjama set and smiling from ear to ear. “I can’t believe you actually got him to come!”

“He didn’t make it easy,” Mary said. She’d appeared from the bathroom, holding a bottle of what looked like a very expensive red wine.

“Don’t bully poor Remus,” Marlene said, sitting down on her own bed. “He was actually very amicable.”

“Here Remus,” Lottie said, eagerly crossing the room to take his arm, “you can sit on my bed.”

Mary stepped past, trying to get the cork out of the wine bottle. “Don’t be a slag, Lot, you have Mickey.”

“Mickey’s not here,” she shot back, dragging Remus to her bed and forcing him to sit. The blue covers of Rowena house were covered with a bright pink, fleece blanket, and he felt instantly hot when he sat down.

“Where's Lily?” He asked, as Lottie plopped herself down next to him, pulling her heavy curls back from her face and neck.

“Prefects' meeting,” Marlene said.

“I swear,” Lottie interjected, “she never takes a break. Not even on her own birthday. Sad, really.”

Remus had already thought it before, but Lottie and Peter really were twins cut from the same blunt, oblivious cloth.

“She’ll be back any minute,” Marlene promised.

“Goddammit!” Mary moaned, slumping down on her bed with the wine bottle. She’d been trying to push the tip of the cork up with her thumbnail.

“Couldn’t find the corkscrew?” Lottie asked, and Mary gave a sour pout.

“No.”

“Give it here,” Remus said, eager to have his hands occupied.

Mary passed the bottle over and he pulled out his key ring, shoving the tip of his room key into the top at an angle the way he’d seen Lee do once to a bottle of cheap chardonnay, which had tasted more akin to sour dish soap than booze. He began to turn it, easing the cork up the neck of the bottle until it finally came free with a sharp pop.

“Oh Remus, you’re amazing!” Mary squealed.

Marlene sat up on her bed. “Where did you learn to do that?”

Remus shrugged, passing the bottle back. “A friend showed me once.”

“Remind me to give your friend a kiss if I ever meet them,” Mary said, taking the bottle to her wardrobe hutch across the way and pouring the wine into five kitchen mugs. Remus tried not to think about how excited Lee would be to get the chance to kiss someone as pretty as Mary, as she came back with four mugs of red wine and passed them around excitedly, swinging her hips to the pop music quietly playing off a small stereo set up in one corner of the room. David Essex had never interested Remus but it made sense that the girls liked him—he sung pop music and wore his trousers tighter than any average bloke would've dared.

“Shouldn’t we wait for Lily?” Marlene asked. “It is her birthday.”

“No need!” Lily called, slipping into the dorm room in a rush. “I’m in!”

Cheeks nearly as red as her hair, Lily stopped dead in her tracks when she saw Remus and pulled her coat tighter around her neck, as though he’d caught her indecent. “Remus!” She said in a shrill voice. “What are you doing here?”

What indeed.

“It was Marls and I,” Mary confessed happily, setting her mug down to help Lily out of her coat. “We told Remus to come.”

“They didn’t tell me it was your birthday,” Remus said, “sorry if I’m party-crashing.”

“You’re not!” Lily and Mary said at the same time. Lily smiled and shook the damp out of her hair, before crossing the room to sit on Marlene’s bed, hands in her lap.

“Thanks for coming, Remus,” she said, accepting the wine from Mary and sipping it easily. Remus tried to hide his surprise. Apparently Lily Evans wasn’t as straight-edged as everyone thought.

“Sixteen is an important birthday,” Lottie said, sipping her own wine. It turned her lips a purply-colour, and brought an instant flush to her face and neck. “And considering our Lils has grown so much in the past year—”

“Oh stop it, Lot, really,” Lily said, covering her face with one hand.

“No,” Lottie said, batting Remus on the shoulder. “You should’ve seen her in year ten. All she cared about was making prefect. She missed everything. Like even this party last June when we—”

“Drink your wine, Charlotte,” Mary said pointedly, using one finger to tip the bottom of Lottie’s mug up to her lips, effectively shutting her up before squeezing in between her and Remus on the bed.

“Sixteen is important though,” Marlene said, clutching her mug with both hands. “Supposed to feel different, right?”

“Well, I don’t feel any different,” Lily said. “When is your birthday, Remus?”

“March tenth.”

“We’ll have to celebrate it then,” Mary announced. “Sixteen is just as important for a fella as it is for a gal. I can’t wait until I turn sixteen.”

“Why’s that?” Remus asked, sipping his wine. It was bitter and gave him an instant headache, but he kept drinking anyway, assuming that he’d need to be at least slightly bladdered to survive the evening.

“Seems so grown up, don’t it? I mean, no one wants to date a fifteen year-old. But a sixteen year-old, that’s a woman.”

Marlene choked on her wine and all the girls dissolved into laughter. Mary was often more crude than she was funny, but she almost put Remus at ease the same way Tonya had. Like it was easy to be her friend.

The evening passed by like that for a good while, with Mary keeping their mugs topped up with all kinds of drinks—she even had vodka, which Marlene had balked at but Lily had taken in stride, almost like she had something to prove. Remus too, accepted every drink easily. It was Saturday tomorrow, and it had been nearly a month since Christmas, which had been the last time he'd been properly pissed. Eventually he found himself lying back against Lottie's headboard, his legs entangled with Mary's. Lottie was lying on the ground, propped up on a pillow as she flipped through another magazine. Lily and Marlene were leaning up against one another on the opposite bed, each with a silly smile on their face.

"Too bad you're birthday's in the winter Lils," Lottie said from the floor. "It would've been nice to go for a stroll."

"While knackered?" Lily said, hiccuping a little.

"All we've done is talk and drink, which is fine I s'pose. My mum would still kill me if she found out."

"I've got an idea!" Mary said very suddenly, sitting up and raising her mug into the air. Remus flinched sharply when her knee got a little too close to the important bits. "We've never had boy in our room before—"

Lottie snorted. "Speak for yourself."

"Never had a boy in our room that was properly invited," Mary corrected. "I think we should christen Remus."

Marlene blinked. "What are you talking about Mary?"

"Like pour the wine over him?" Lottie asked.

"No, she means like a hazing," Lily said, a shy smile on her face.

Remus backed up immediately. "No way." He'd been party to enough hazings with Tomny's crew. He didn't need one from girls who thought putting a purple shag rug in the bathroom was good taste, too.

"Not a 'hazing'," Mary scoffed," just a game. Like truth or dare, but if you refuse the question or the dare, you get a penalty."

"Sounds fun!" Lottie said, sitting up eagerly and joining Mary and Remus on her own bed.

"Birthday girl goes first," Marlene said, earning her a light shove from Lily.

"Yes!" Mary shouted. "Lily—truth or dare."

“Truth!” Lily said quickly, before hiccuping again.

“Who was your first kiss!”

Lily gasped and looked at Remus, who got the distinct feeling that this was a secret kept only between the four girls.

“Oooh, you bitch!” She hissed, punctuating her vexation by snatching up a pillow and throwing it at Mary.

Mary caught the pillow with ease and kicked her legs out in glee. “Oh c’mon, Remus doesn’t care! Would you rather a penalty, Lils?”

Grimacing, Lily tipped her head down and mumbled something into her mug.

“Can’t hear you!” Lottie shouted.

“Davey Gudgeon!” She wailed. Remus barked out in laughter, before clapping his hand over his mouth. Davey Gudgeon was a right git, always flitting around Sirius and generally pissing off James, who despite his saintly-disposition, couldn’t stand Gudgeon’s desperate and clingy behaviour.

“Evans, you didn’t,” he wheezed, and Lily pressed her lower lip out in a pout.

“Fine, Remus,” she snapped, “who was your first kiss.”

“That’s not how the game works,” Lottie moaned. “It’s truth or dare.”

“No, let the birthday girl talk,” Mary shouted, waving her arms around like a lunatic.

Remus scoffed. “It’s no one you lot would know anyway.” And it was still fresh, barely a kiss. If he were anymore of a romantic, Remus might’ve pretended like he could still smell the vanilla of Tonya’s perfume.

“Doesn’t matter,” Mary protested. “We want the details.”

Remus swallowed, and shook his head. No way. You didn’t brag about kissing your best mate’s girlfriend to other girls. “Isn’t there a rule on using the same question twice?” He said, adjusting his legs under Mary’s.

“The prude’s got a point,” Lottie said.

“Fine then,” Mary said indignantly. “Remus, if you could kiss anyone here who would it be?”

He groaned to cover up his instant mortification. The question immediately brought the memory of claiming Lily as his girlfriend over Christmas. It was stupid; he couldn’t remember why he’d said it now. He didn’t want to kiss Lily—not that she wasn’t pretty, because she was; it was just that he didn’t want to kiss anybody—probably. At the very least kissing meant relationships, which meant less time with your friends and more time worrying about things like remembering stupid anniversaries, favourite colours, siblings’ names, or how they took their tea. Everyone should just make their own damn tea.

“Don’t I even get to choose dare?” Remus protested.

“No,” Lily said, “birthday girl rules.”

“You’re a sadist, Evans.”

Mary slapped him in the thigh, hard, but grinning. “Answer the question!”

“I can’t!” He couldn’t—what sort of question was that? Was kissing all girls thought about?

“Then it’s a penalty game,” Mary said lowly. “Lottie—grab his legs.”

Chapter End Notes

Literally sooo happy with this chapter. I love the girls with my whole heart, and Remus does too, even if he's slow to admit it, haha.

'Pet' is just used as a term of endearment.
'Diwali' is a five-day holiday also referred to as 'The Festival of Lights' and is celebrated by various religious groups throughout India and the world.
'Coconut barfi' is a delicious sweet often made for Diwali but also around Christmastime. Try it if you ever get the chance!
'Wellies' are rain boots.
'Bovver boots' are big chunky boots associated with gangs/ violence/the traditional 'bovver boy'.

Chapter 19: She Doesn't Love You

Chapter Summary

Remus returns to his dorm to find the others waiting for him. Sirius has an idea.

Chapter Notes

No triggers this chapter !

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I need you more than anyone, baby,
You know that I have from the start;
So build me up (build me up),
Buttercup, don't break my heart…

- "Build Me Up Buttercup" The Foundations, 1967

Sneaking back into his dorm late Saturday morning might have proved easier had he not looked like he'd been put through a dryer along with several tubes of lipstick. Mary's idea of a penalty had included receiving a smooch from each girl wherever they pleased (Mary had gotten dangerously close to his actual mouth) and then they'd refused to let him remove the makeup for the rest of the night. At that point all five of them had been properly knackered anyway, and Remus eventually fell asleep on the rug beside Lottie's bed, still covered in red smudges.

It had been slightly more mortifying to be woken up by Marlene, the only one of them not still sleeping or else moaning over a hangover. One of the girls had at least been kind enough to tuck a pillow under his head after he'd passed out but he still had to pop each stiff joint back into place. Marlene offered him a cup of tea, but it was already nearly midday and he knew that if he didn't make it back to his own dorm to throw up he'd never be able to look the girls in the eye again.

Practically crawling to the window, Remus left the same way he'd come in, jumping out onto the lawn to make the horrible trek back to his dorm without even tying up his boots.

“I have to give you detention,” Benjy said, when he’d headed him off on the second floor staircase. Remus only nodded and Benjy handed him a pink slip before letting him slink back to his room. The older boy had mercifully said nothing about the lipstick. His roommates were not so kind.

“Where the hell were you?” James demanded, the moment Remus walked through the door. The boys must have taken their breakfast in the dorm that morning, as there were meal trays piled up by the door. Another untouched tray sat on Remus’ side table, but the thought of eating made him instantly sick, and he pushed past James and ran straight for the toilet. After he’d finished hacking his guts he came out, wiping a warm cloth across his cheek to get the rest of the lipstick off. A shower would have to wait until he could stand without the room spinning.

Collapsing down on his bed, Remus draped an arm over his eyes, but when he finally withdrew it he found all three of them standing there while looming over him with eager or worried expressions.

“Fuck! What are you doing?”

“You dog, Lupin,” Sirius leered, leaning down and jabbing his fingers into Remus’ armpits.

“Get off me, you nob.”

“You gotta tell us where you were, Remus,” Peter said eagerly.

“Nowhere.”

“Like bloody hell you were,” Sirius cackled. “Just fess up, Lupin. Who’s lips were all over you last night?”

“No one’s!”

“Why didn’t you come back last night then?” James asked, looking exceedingly less amused than the other two. It made Remus wonder if they’d been taking bets on where he’d been.

“I just fell asleep,” he snapped. “Now if you don’t mind…” Remus tried to turn over in his bed to ignore them but Sirius grabbed his shoulder and hauled him back. It was just like him to feed off of every juicy bit he could sink his teeth into.

“You fell asleep?” Peter said, grabbing Remus’ legs to hold him.

“Where?”

“Let go of me, wankers!”

“I think I know where he was,” Sirius said, low and wicked. “It was Evans’ birthday yesterday, wasn’t it?”

Remus froze, and so did James. The brief pause in thrashing was all Sirius needed to know he was right.

“HA!” He laughed, releasing Remus for the second time and standing back to slap a hand over his eyes and howl. “No WAY! That’s so funny. Evans, Lupin? Really?”

Remus sat up on his bed very quickly and shoved Sirius away, but he only kept laughing. “You’re wrong, you dickhead!”

“Nuh-uh! Oh my god—Evans! HA!”

Remus looked to James, who was staring down at him with eyes like saucers. “You saw Evans?” He asked. Instantly Remus felt more guilty than he thought he should have to. It was just a birthday, and the kiss marks had been Mary’s idea—but clearly James was more worried than that.

“I only went 'cause I was asked,” Remus said slowly, feeling like a child confessing to putting gum in his hair or drawing on the walls. “It was Mary and Marlene’s idea. They just wanted to do something for Lily’s birthday.”

“Then where did the lip prints come from?” Peter asked.

“Penalty game,” Remus mumbled. “Truth or dare. We were drinking.”

“So you were drunk then?” James said this rather indignantly. Remus nodded.

“We all were.”

Sirius was leaning up against the post of Peter’s bed, still holding his gut. “I cannot believe this stick in the mud—uppity prude—sorry excuse for a tosser—Remus Lupin—got with four girls at once in their own dorm room!”

“Four?" Peter gaped, as though he’d just realised his sister was one of the girls in question.

“He said it wasn’t like that,” James said.

“No, he didn’t,”

James snapped to Remus. “Well? Was it?”

“No!”

“There you have it then. You can shut up now, Black.”

Sirius dropped a hand from his cheek, where he’d been feigning at wiping away tears, and he and James shared a long look. Finally he took a breath and shrugged. “Still funny.”

Turning away like a scorned woman, James stormed across the room. They all watched him go, and Sirius leaned in close to Remus by the bed.

“Hey,” he said, cheekily raising his fist for Remus to bump.

“Oh sod off, you idiot,” Remus scoffed, watching as James reached down to Sirius’ pile of cassette tapes and grabbed the first one he could, slamming it into the hi-fi and turning the volume up much louder than he’d heard it in a while.

They all winced at the noise—even Sirius—as James turned around and gave a rather bitter shrug. “ANYONE FOR CARDS?”

* * *

No one brought up Remus’ end of the month escapade in front of James again, and the term trudged on. The girls were exceedingly friendly after the birthday though, and Lily even found Remus on the following Monday to apologise for the hangover he’d been nursing all of Saturday.

By mid-February James was back to his cheery self, but any mention of girls, kissing, or drinking (and these were some of Sirius’ favourite topics of conversation apart from himself) had him instantly soured and quiet. Though, if James was secretly harbouring a small grudge towards him—and he undoubtedly was—Sirius’ interest in Remus had only been invigorated. The cheeky Black family heir seemed to have created some wild image of his newest roommate as someone who snuck out all the time to smoke or hang out with girls. Remus had tried on more than one occasion to squash this impression, but it seemed as though Sirius was determined to keep Remus on his lipstick-covered pedestal. He pestered him for stories of his winter break and the times before he'd come to Hawkings.

"Is that what London is really like?" Sirius would ask him. "Girls just want to hang out all the time? How do you do that—just get them to invite you places?"

"Try not making their lives miserable every time you see them," Remus had eventually snapped. They were in music period during a practice day, and he was struggling with the pre-chorus to "Sweet Emotion" on the Fender. Mrs. Buchanan had stepped out to deal with an issue after some kick named Darby got his hand slammed in the piano fall-board.

"I don't make them miserable," Sirius said indignantly, "I leave them wanting more. Besides, all girls love a bit of teasing—even Evans. But I'm sure you'd know more about that than me."

Shooting him a nasty look, Remus slid his chair a little further away and turned back to his music stand. Buchanan had been happy enough to procure the sheet music for him and she'd been working with him on the song outside of regular assignments since early last term, but he couldn't quite grasp the ability to play the chords with the rest of the song's messy bravado. Every time he tried his notes came out sounding sloppy, not gritty. It was endlessly frustrating.

"I don't know why you started with that one," Sirius said. He'd dragged his chair closer when Remus wasn't paying attention and had his guitar in his lap. " 'Sweet Emotion' isn't exactly a beginner's best friend. It's supposed to sound sort of dirty, not like you're playing for your grandma in church."

"And I suppose you've already got it down pat?" Remus said with full-snark.

With a cheeky smile, Sirius pulled his guitar strap over his head, setting the Rickenbacker across an empty chair on his other side. "Here," he said, taking out his own binder and shuffling through several sets of sheet music. "I got Sheila to compile me a whole set of songs last year when I was first getting a handle of the guitar."

"You should really stop calling her Sheila."

Waving him off, Sirius produced a guitar score of "She Loves You" by

The Beatles, setting it on Remus' stand. Remus frowned, giving him a resentful look.

"Are you joking? 'She Loves You'? Really?"

"What? It's their number one single. Thought you had a thing for The Beatles?"

Slightly flushed, Remus turned to the music and reached out to flip the sheet over to get a look at the tablature. Sirius watched him, before pointing at the first stave at the top of the page.

"There, it's got a good bass line for a beginner. Nice and slow and repetitive. How do you think you're going to learn anyway? Not by jumping into the deep end and letting yourself drown."

"It's not even written for a bass," Remus said, keeping his eyes on the sheet.

"The guitar and bass tabs are similar for this one," Sirius said, picking up his guitar. "It'll sound a little different on the guitar, but I'll show you."

"So you play the bass now too?"

"I've been known to dabble."

Remus sighed, but finally turned his chair in toward the music stand and watched where Sirius put his fingers, copying him until he got the first few chords down pat. He wasn't going to admit it, but he could already tell the song was a better fit.

"James is mad at me isn't he?" Remus asked as Sirius flipped the sheet music to get a look at the bridge.

"Nah, 's just James being James."

"Does being a liar come with being a musical genius, or are you just an arse all on your own?"

"You think I'm a musical genius?"

"Tosser."

"He isn't mad though. He just…"

"—Likes Lily."

Sirius pushed his bottom lip out a bit. “Yeah. Has for a while, but Evans won’t give him the time of day anyway.”

“Why?” It was the first time Remus had felt brave enough to ask after Lily’s vendetta against the boys—James in particular.

“Why does he like her? Beats me—girl is wound up tighter than Ms. Pince.”

Remus rolled his eyes again. “No, I mean why doesn’t she give him the time of day?”

“Oh, I dunno. Started at the end of last year though. They were amicable up until then, I suppose. I thought Mary or Marlene would’ve caved by now and fessed up, but they won’t budge. Not even Lottie’s big mouth has been flapping about it, and Peter spent all summer trying to get it out of her.”

“So James doesn’t have any idea what he did? Do you?”

Sirius shook his head, playing a riff of “She Loves You” while bobbing his head as though he could hear the words playing in his mind. He probably could. “Evans is just frigid.”

“No, she’s not.”

“Oh? Got some experience there then?”

“No.”

Sirius remained unconvinced. “Well, I can’t pretend to know what Evans is thinking. James is great, any girl would be lucky to have him.”

“He’s like, fifteen. A kid.”

“And a romantic,” Sirius said. “Really Lupin, anyone else would think you’re twelve and not about to be sixteen.”

Remus slouched back in his seat with a sigh. He tried hard not to think about his birthday, or how Sirius had found out about it in the first place. As a result, both his roommates and the girls were insistent on planning something, and so far he hadn’t bothered to tell either group about the other. It was now looking like he was expected to be at two parties at once.

“Do you know why Evans is so pissed?” Sirius asked.

“No,” Remus said, too quickly. “They won’t tell me either.”

“You’ve asked then?”

“No, they just say stuff sometimes.”

“So Evans talks about James then?” He looked smug now.

“Not as much as you or James would like.”

Sirius strummed his guitar. “Maybe we should fix that.”

“What, like change her mind? Dunno if you’d picked up on it already, but you’re not exactly Lily’s favourite person either.”

“But you are. ‘Least as long as those pucker marks are anything to go by.”

Remus kicked his shin lightly. “I don’t like Lily. She’s just a friend.”

“Good, then there’s nothing stopping James from sweeping her off her feet.”

“Are you even listening? Lily. Hates. Him.”

“That’s just womanly fickleness.”

He very much doubted that Lily’s almost year-long hatred for them could just be put down to a ‘fickle’ nature, but Sirius was approaching the subject the same way he approached a prank, and since those had been severely lacking since Christmas, Remus knew there was no talking him down.

“I’m not going to convince Lily to go out with James.”

“You don’t have to,” Sirius said amicably. “That’s his problem. All you have to do is help us find out what it is that she’s so lashed over.”

“But they won’t tell me.”

“They won’t tell us, but a little more girl time and I’m sure they’ll let you in the club, then you’ll have rights to all their dirty little secrets.”

Remus would’ve rather done a million other things than join a 'girls’ club’. He liked the girls well enough, sure; they were kind, usually more so than the boys, and were helpful when it came to studying, plus Lily and Marlene always had a decent book recommendation, but Remus was no girl. He didn't want their 'dirty little secrets' or even the gossip, really, and he definitely didn't want to play go-between for an already doomed relationship.

"You're insane," Remus said, slumping back in his chair. Across the room Alexander Flutwarts' had started playing a screeching version of "God Save the Queen" on his accordion, much to the distaste of his other classmates. Sirius grimaced at the sound but kept his attention on Remus.

"I'll take that as a compliment, Lupin. No good artist was ever sane anyway."

"You said the same thing before Christmas."

"Knew you listened."

Another scoff. "I still won't do it."

"Oh c'mon Lupin, you've been playing both teams since the beginning of the year, you can't do it anymore!"

"Watch me!"

"Okay, tell you what," Sirius said, "I'll teach you 'Sweet Emotion' until Aerosmith themselves couldn't tell the bloody difference. You should really be playing it without a pick too, you know. It changes the sound completely."

"Where were you in fucking October?"

Sirius gave a little snort. "Ignoring you. Or trying to—but I'll teach you the song until you're perfect if you do your mate James a solid and find out why Evans is so high up on her horse."

"You'll teach me one song in exchange for lying to Lily and sneaking around like some nark?"

"You wouldn't be lying, you'd be doing just the opposite. You'd be sleuthing. We'll call it, 'Operation: Out with It Evans'."

"I was actually expecting something more clever. Thought you were supposed to be a writer."

"It's a working title—now will you do it?"

Remus leaned back with a huff and considered. Apparently he took his sweet time about it, because Sirius was already willing to renegotiate. “Any song!” He said. “Multiple songs—America’s entire rock discography if you want. And—I’ll teach you everything I know for the bass. You’ll sound like John Paul Jones himself when I’m done with you.”

“Do you even sound like John Paul Jones?”

“Semantics. Say you’ll do it, Lupin.”

Remus sighed. “Fine. I’ll do my best to find out just what pig-headed thing you lot did to make Lily Evans hate your guts.”

“Champion!”

Alexander’s accordion gave a gruesome howl from across the room and Sirius stood up very suddenly, guitar in hand.

“Flutwarts, if you don’t put that bloody groan-box down right now I’ll knock you one myself.”

As Sirius stalked away, presumably to tear the accordion in two, Remus sat up in his chair and returned to his playing, though he found it considerably harder to focus while thinking of how he was subtly going to get the girls to give up their most coveted secret. It was obviously not going to be as easy as learning the first few chords of “She Loves You”, and unlike the song, he had no one around to teach him.

Chapter End Notes

> Oh Lily, oh James, oooh Remus.... :)
>
> John Paul Jones is/was the bassist and keyboardist of Led Zeppelin.

Chapter 20: Pictures of Lily

Chapter Summary

> Remus spends the month of February trying to sort out the mystery of Lily's distaste for James. Lottie has some insight.

Chapter Notes

> C/W: 'F' slur used in a smoking context.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Girl, you really got me goin',
You got me so I don't know what I'm doin';
Yeah, you really got me now,
You got me so I can't sleep at night…

- "You Really Got Me" The Kinks, 1964

To Remus' surprise, James had been all for Operation: Out With It Evans.

"No, it's brilliant!" He said over dinner, his voice hushed so no one could overhear, but excited none-the-less. "You're already in with the girls, Lupin, why wouldn't they tell you?"

"Because I'm not a girl?"

"Semantics," James said, infuriatingly akin to Sirius, "it's a magnificent plan."

And so there was no going back it seemed. Remus had officially been recruited as the Lily Evans Sleuthing Expert and after confessing that the girls were also planning a party for him, the boys decided that his birthday would be the perfect deadline. It seemed like the best excuse to get everyone in the same room, and as long as they knew why Lily was so angry before then, James could make a big show of apologising.

"I could try and get Moira to talk to her," Peter said, but James only shook his head.

“Doubt it would work—I asked Tara Webb to do the same thing last October and Lindsey Taylor in November, and both times Evans just pretended as though she didn’t know what they were talking about."

“You mean she pretended as though she had no idea who you were,” Sirius amended. “Apparently it was pretty believable too. She should try acting rather than focusing all her efforts on school and hating you.”

“Well, your pranks certainly haven’t helped,” James said, looking pointedly at Sirius.

“My pranks? Who was it willing to climb up to the gym’s rafters to hang a bucket of bacon grease? So don’t blame me, I’m not the one trying to woo an Orthodox. And you just know you’d just hate to be left out, Potter.”

Sirius, as always, was right. Despite the fact that it was Remus’ mission, James demanded a status report on the battlefront almost every other day and was often disappointed by Remus’ lack of intel. Most days Lily was busy with school or other perfectly duties and whenever Remus did manage to bring up the subject of James, she would simply change the subject. Marlene on the other hand, played on the girls football team and like James was often swamped with pre-season practices. It left Mary and Lottie, both of whom seemed to have friends all over. Mary’s own popularity nearly rivalled James and Sirius’ and whenever Remus was alone with her plenty of other students would come up to say hello or strike-up a conversation. This made things hard in the secrets department, but Remus had a feeling that even if he’d had enough chances, Mary would never snitch. She was a gossip and a massive flirt, but she was also startlingly loyal; a sentiment he had spent several ‘reports’ repeating to James, who was insistent that there must be some way to root out the truth from one of them. Neither he nor Sirius seemed to understand just how difficult the task they’d assigned him was, mostly because they were never around to witness him squirm. Having any of his roommates nearby certainly guaranteed that he would get nothing out of the girls, who seemed locked up tighter than the Tower of London anyway, and so his roommates kept pushing for Remus to spend all his free time away from the dorm where his chances of sniffing out secrets were greatest. This led to Remus quickly realising just how much he’d come to rely on the 4A boys.

It wasn’t just the fact that he was growing tired of complimenting Mary’s choice of nail colour or having his homework scrutinised by

Lily and Marlene, it was the fact that he'd spent most of February shuffling between the girls or else alone. Whenever the boys met the topic was always Lily, and Remus' patience was growing thin. He was either going to have to throw in the towel or just start demanding answers from the girls—neither of which he imagined would make him very popular with either group.

"Well, have you tried Lottie?" James asked, kicking his football around the damp grass outside their dorm. Remus stood across from him, wrapped up in two jumpers and a jacket to ward off the late-February chill, while James remained perfectly fine in just a long-sleeve and track pants, the lunatic.

"Talking to Lottie is like talking to a radio jockey," Remus said, "they can't hear you and even if they could they talk so fast you'd never get a word in edgewise."

Shrugging, James kicked the ball toward him, and Remus received it clumsily with the side of his foot before passing it back. The kick went wide, and James had to chase the football down while he winced. He knew agreeing to bat the ball around to pass the afternoon would just lead to his own embarrassment, but he'd figured that maybe if James saw how bad he was he'd finally stop asking him to try-out for the team. So far though, no such luck. James seemed just as content to chase down the stray football as he was to talk about Lily.

"I'm starting to agree with Sirius, you know," Remus said. "Lily's great, but why bother so much?" Especially considering that James was popular enough to swing anyone he wanted; he imagined there were very few girls who would be as adverse to hanging off the arm of the school's football captain.

James smirked. " 'Agree with Sirius'? How'd that one feel coming up?"

"Like vomit."

"Yeah, well, Sirius doesn't always know what he's talking about."

"And how'd that taste?"

"Like a relief," James laughed. "I love him, but the tosser wears on the nerves sometimes. He just doesn't get it."

"Well, forgive my ignorance," Remus started, wincing as James kicked the ball back and he had to use his shin to block it, earning him a stinging smack, "but neither do I! Lily only ever talks badly about you."

"But she does talk. You gotta read between the lines, Lupin."

Remus returned the ball. "Okay, now you sound like Sirius."

"I am serious," James grinned, and Remus flipped him off. "Lily's mad and she won't say why, but she always responds when I speak to her, right?"

"Yes, but that's normally just to insult you."

"Girls don't pay attention to people they really hate, Lupin."

"Then you certainly don't know anything about girls at all," Remus huffed. "I mean really, how is it I, the kid who showed up halfway through upper-secondary, gets stuck playing middle-man for a group that's known each other since they were in nappies?"

"Lily only came to Hawkings in year seven," James pointed out.

"And here we are in year eleven."

James dribbled the ball between his feet, looking a bit sore. "We were friends before this, or at least I thought we were. It's just the last year that things have turned rough."

Remus crossed his arms over his chest. "That much I know. What is it you did though?"

"I don't know!" James exclaimed, kicking the ball with such ferocity that Remus missed on purpose and let it bounce off the brick wall of the dorm behind him. "All I know is she threw a fit right before the end of term last year and when we came back in September, she'd decided that she hated my guts!"

"So you admit she hates your guts?"

James kicked the football up into the air with his toe and caught it. "Who's side are you bloody on?"

"I'm just a man for hire, actually. Once I get my dues I'm ditching the lot of you."

"You're cruel and mean, and that's why girls like you so much."

"And yet you've learned nothing."

James shook his head and checked his watch. “I gotta go, I’m gonna be late for practice.”

Remus bristled. “You told me you didn’t have practice tonight. It’s why I’m out here in the fucking cold in the first place.”

“Actually you’re just out here for a breather and a status report,” James said. “You gotta get out more, Lupin, the library’s starting to turn you into a taller but equally uptight version of Ms. Pince.”

“You dirty liar, I take it back, you are cruel.”

James tucked the football up under his arm. “Talk to Lottie!” He called, turning and jogging down the grass toward the road.

* * *

Tuesday 9th March 1976

It took a few days to polish up just what he was going to say to get Lottie to fess up, but after another failed attempt to get Mary to talk on their way to Modern Foreign Languages, Remus decided that it was time to fully change tactics.

Talking with Charlotte Pettigrew was a lot like getting a lecture from Professor Binns, except instead of history, he was learning about the differences between hair and skin products and what celebrities had cheated on their spouses with their on-screen costars. (Lottie was distinctly under the impression that Barbra Streisand and Robert Redford were getting it on during the filming of The Way We Were. Remus hadn’t seen the film, and just ended up nodding along.) Most of the time Remus tried to tune her out by reading or smoking. Lily had found his cigarettes in his school bag one morning in Geography and was appalled of course, but at least it meant he didn’t have to hide his ‘disgusting habit’ around the girls anymore. Lottie never seemed to mind the books or fags, content enough to sit around and swap gossip, however the problem remained that it was always the wrong gossip, and by the time March 9th rolled around, leaving only a single day before his sixteenth birthday, Remus had all but given up hope of discovering just what James had done to so tremendously ruin his chances with the love of his relatively teenaged life.

It really was just by chance that he and Lottie had gotten out of private study early while Lily and Marlene had both had other things to attend to. They made their way to a picnic bench next to the dining hall and set up their books and things across from one another. It was finally warm enough to lounge around outside again, but you still had to be careful where you sat or you'd be walking around with a damp arse for the rest of the day.

"Have you ever thought about getting a tattoo, Remus?" Lottie asked after a while.

He looked up from his history text. Lottie had the same book open, but she had put a magazine over top and was reading that instead.

"A tattoo?"

"Yeah," she said, absent-mindedly. "I've always sort of wondered about getting one myself one day. I mean—not for a while, but I think they're so cool." Lottie traced her finger along the edge of her magazine. "Mickey doesn't like them though, and Mummy says proper ladies have virgin skin. If only she knew."

Remus smiled a bit, and watched her. He'd never given much thought to tattoos himself, but a few of the boys he knew had them, including Doss who walked around sporting the image of a pair of dice on his forearm. He'd gotten the tattoo after a decent round of poker thinking it would bring him the same good luck later on, but the guy giving him the tattoo had happened to be one of the game's losers and had left Doss with a set of dice that looked more like a bad bruise.

"They're coming back into fashion, you know," Lottie continued, flipping a page in her magazine. "And not just for blokes. Janis Joplin had one on her wrist."

Remus raised an eyebrow. "You know Janis Joplin?"

"Oh sure. She was a queen. It was just a small thing anyway, but she called it 'a representation of the liberation of women' on the Dick Cavett Show and I sort of always liked the idea. Like, it's my body—autonomy and all that right?"

Remus nodded his head slowly. "Joplin's cool. I reckon you should get one… If that's what you want."

"You think?" Lottie looked off in consideration. "She also had one on her chest, just on the side of her bap. I sort of love that. Imagine being with a fella and he looks down to find this tiny little tattooed heart right over your actual heart."

“Then why not?” Remus said. “I mean… you should do stuff for you, not for anyone else.”

It almost felt like cheap advice, coming from a lout on a mission to root out the issue of someone else’s sour love-life, but he hadn’t thought that Lottie was interested in anything beyond her hair and boyfriend, and she’d surprised him. The conversation actually reminded him a lot of Tonya, who wouldn’t have let anyone else tell her what she could and couldn’t do with her body. Remus wouldn’t have been the least bit surprised if she had a secret bap tattoo of her own.

Lottie tilted her head to the side a bit and flipped a page in her magazine. “I think you’re right actually. We should do stuff for ourselves, shouldn’t we?”

Remus nodded, and Lottie returned to her magazine, seeming a little happier. It made him wonder how many people she’d mentioned the idea to, and how many of them had rebuffed her like her well-to-do mother and respectable boyfriend. Maybe that was why Lottie had brought it up to him then, since there was no way Remus was of the respectable sort. Whether she’d done it on purpose or not, Lottie had looked him up and down and decided that he was the best person to broach the subject with, and she’d gotten the information she wanted.

Well, two could play at that game.

“Lottie,” Remus started, twirling his pencil between his fingers, “have Mary or the others said anything about my birthday tomorrow?”

Looking up eagerly, Lottie nodded. “Oh yeah. Mary wants it to be a ball. She got more booze from Andrea Schwartz for us. Says it’ll be lots of fun—and it’ll be warmer so we might not have to be stuck inside! Marlene was iffy about going out and breaking curfew, but we’ll already be breaking the rules by having you in our room anyway, so we might as well do what we want.”

Remus nodded amicably. “That’s great and all, but I’m actually a little bit worried to be honest.”

“Oh?”

“Yeah…” He rubbed the back of his neck for effect, “you see the lads also wanted to do something tomorrow. It know it’s the same day Mary planned for but—”

“Can’t they just do whatever it is on the weekend?” She asked. “I mean, what boys want to party on a Wednesday?”

“They’re pretty set on doing it on my actual birthday tomorrow…”

Lottie scoffed. “Course they are. Don’t worry, I’ll talk to Peter. We’ll get you out of it.”

Trying not to act offended that Lottie considered the girls’ plans more important than the boys’, Remus took another breath. “Actually I was thinking that we could all do something together. You know, as a group.”

Lottie seemed to consider this, tapping her unused pencil against her magazine. “Don’t really know how that would work—Lily would never go for it.”

“I know,” Remus said quickly. “I know none of them get along, but that’s why I brought it up to you first, because you’re friends with everybody.”

Lottie grinned at that, and he knew he’d said the right thing.

“Well, I could say something to Mary," she ruminated. "Might be fun, a big group—but Lily’s going to be the worst about it.”

“Yeah, I remember you saying something about a party not going well last year. Was it really so bad?”

Lottie gave an exaggerated sigh, like it was a conversation she was tired of having. “God, it’s so boring to talk about, really. Lily didn’t even want to go, she said as much to me right after! But I think she was just upset that they asked Mary and I to go and not her.”

Remus could practically feel himself humming. Nearly a month, and this was as close as he’d gotten to finding out anything. “Who asked?”

“Sirius—and James. But I'd already heard about it from my older brother Simeon who told them about it in the first place. Petey didn’t want me to come but I’m older than him by fourteen minutes so it’s really what I say that goes.”

“And they didn’t ask Lily?”

“No, but she would’ve said no anyway. All she cared about was exams and making prefect and it was a party for the year thirteen’s who were leaving school so there was tons of booze and stuff. We all went out to this field just outside the village and they had this big barn all lit up. I met a local guy there—this was before Mickey, you see. It was fun, and Lily was firmly against fun at the time."

Remus was almost stunned. "So… Lily's so angry, because she didn't get invited to a party?"

Lottie snorted. "No! Lily's angry because James snogged someone else at the party."

Bloody hell. Remus could've groaned. All this, over a little kissing?

There was a gasp, and Lottie covered her mouth, her normally-large eyes now considerably larger. "Oh my god, I shouldn't have told you that."

Remus coughed out a laugh, both genuine and incredulous. Lord.

"You can't tell anyone!" Lottie insisted.

"I won't," he promised, knowing it was a lie. "Just can't really believe that's what they're fighting over."

Lottie groaned and pressed her perfectly-manicured hands to her forehead, and Remus could see the guilt in her features. She may have been a loud-mouth, but she didn't do it to hurt people, at least.

"Mary's going to kill me," she sighed. "We all swore we wouldn't talk about it with anyone else. Lily decided it didn't matter."

"If it doesn't matter then why is she still so angry?"

She made a pained face, but Remus could already tell she was too far gone to stop now.

"James and Lily went on a date just before the end of last year. I think she thought he liked her, but then this party happened and she probably felt slighted that James never asked her to go. The kissing was like the cherry on top. She forgave me and Mary, but the boys bragged for forever. Reckon it got under her skin."

"That doesn't sound like James at all," Remus said in defence of his friend. "They were dating?"

Lottie shrugged. "It was one date, but it must've meant more to Lily than it did to James."

Remus sat back, conflicted. "No, no way," he said. If Lottie was telling the truth, then James did have some apologising to do, but he wanted to give the other boy the benefit of the doubt at least.

“You seriously can’t tell anyone I told you,” Lottie begged.

He nodded; “Cross my heart.” Though he’d kept his fingers crossed beneath the table just in case.

Lottie let out a little breath and her smile returned to her face. “Feels almost good to tell someone else, actually. It’s such old news but I was getting tired of just listening to Lily whinge about the boys. Not you of course, Remus, you’re different from them.”

Fucking hell. If Tomny could see him now.

Remus forced a tight smile. Apparently he was better at lying than he’d thought—or maybe Lottie was just frustratingly gullible. He wasn’t sure which was more likely.

“Thanks for telling me, Lot. Feels good to be thought of so highly.”

Lottie flipped the page in her magazine. “Anytime, love.”

* * *

Telling James why Lily was so angry with him was certainly less satisfying than it had been to find out from Lottie in the first place. As Remus had suspected, the issues arose not because James had meant to slight Lily, but because of poor communication, which could hardly be condemned for a couple kids new to everything 'love and dating'.

“You can’t be serious,” James moaned from his bed.

“I am.”

“But that was nothing!”

“Not according to Lottie.”

“Oh my god.”

James fell back on his bed dramatically as Sirius and Peter were busy killing themselves on the other side of the room, nearly in tears after Remus had explained just what they’d done to make such an enemy.

“Somebody should be writing this down,” Sirius said as he recovered. “Pete, call your dad, we might make tomorrow morning’s paper. Wager Evans’ crush would be worth the front page?”

“Lily doesn’t have a crush on James anymore,” Remus pointed out. He was sorting Sirius’ vinyl albums, having finally had enough of the general lack of organisation in his collection.

James lifted his head pitifully. “She doesn’t?”

“Not according to Lottie. And not after you supposedly bollixed-up that date.”

“It was not a date!” James insisted, dropping his head back against his pillow in defeat. “I was totally gonna fail history so I asked her to help me with some studying before exams!”

“Alone?” Peter asked.

“Well, we were alone.”

“And how did Lily seem?” Remus asked. “Happy?”

James balked. “Yes? I mean she didn’t seem any different from any other time we’d studied. She… she said the other girls weren’t coming because they had things to do!”

“Lily told you this?”

“Yeah!”

“Well did she say, ‘the girls are busy’ or did she say ‘the girls aren’t coming’?”

James threw his arms up; “What’s the bloody difference?”

“Mate,” Sirius laughed, “I almost feel bad for the girl at this point.”

“Even I would’ve been able to tell you it was a date,” Peter said, crawling onto the bed next to James as he pouted. “Doesn’t mean there isn’t still hope though.”

“Feels a tad optimistic to me,” Remus said, trying to decide if the records should be ordered alphabetically according to artist or album title.

“Lupin, you gotta help me,” James said, sitting up very suddenly.

Remus shook his head adamantly (sorted by artist, it was); “No way, I did my part—now you know why she’s been so pissed. S'not my business anymore.”

“That’s ice cold, Lupin,” Peter said over a snicker.

“But it really isn’t even my fault,” James said, “like actually. I only didn’t invite her to that party because I assumed she’d say no. And there were exams, and we were drinking, and she wanted to be a prefect because it looks good on uni applications. It was one bloody night—and it wasn’t a date!”

“If you haven’t learned to read through the lines where women are concerned, there’s no helping you,” Sirius said cheekily, standing up from Peter’s bed and strolling over to the rest of them, snapping his fingers in that way of his that meant he’d been sitting still for too long.

“You’re just as much at fault, Black. You never asked Lily to go either—and you snogged a girl at that party too!”

Remus glanced up at Sirius, who only shrugged and dropped down next to him, picking up a record and flipping it over, ruining the beginnings of his finely organised pile. “Evans wasn’t dating me.”

“We weren’t dating!”

Despite the fact that it belonged to Sirius in the first place, Remus snatched the album back. “Well you still aren’t dating her,” he said, putting the album back into order. Sirius was staring, but for once he didn’t feel shy. It had been a while since they were all together, and it had been easy to convince Lottie to talk to Mary and keep the boys’ presences at his birthday a secret. Still riding the high of his success, Remus found that he was actually looking forward to tomorrow evening.

James swung his legs around the side of his bed. “How am I supposed to apologise for a problem she’s so clearly made up in her head?”

Remus shrugged, but Sirius was in his element.

“You should serenade her,” he said smugly. “Find a song that’d really make your feelings clear.”

“I can’t sing,” James scoffed.

“Sure you can. You’ve been belting out ‘Whole Lotta Love’ in the shower for three weeks now. And what was it before that?”

“ ‘Proud Mary’,” said Peter. "Sounded pretty good to me too." Sirius pointed at him approvingly.

“Pete’s right. It’s not exactly lead singer material, but you don’t sound all that bad. Have some faith.”

Still appearing unsure, James began to nibble on his thumbnail. “Maybe just playing her a song would be enough? But I don’t really know what sort of music she likes.”

“ABBA,” Remus said, automatically. “They played a lot of it on her birthday.”

James and Sirius pulled the same repulsed face.

“Yeah, no,” Sirius said, going for another album before Remus swatted his hand away. He held his fingers like a scolded dog but continued; “It can’t be ABBA. Even if you aren’t singing, it still has to be a good song.”

“She likes The Mamas and the Papas too,” Remus supplied.

Sirius grimaced again; “It just keeps getting worse.”

“I don’t mind them as much,” James shrugged. “Just a little folky s’all.”

“How about a song with her name in it?” Peter offered. “There has to be one. It’s not as though her name is ‘Prudence’ or ‘Agatha’.”

“Well, do you know any ‘Lily’ songs?”

“No,” Sirius and Peter said at the same time as Remus said; “Yes.”

“What song?”

“It’s a single by The Who.”

James looked at Sirius, who shook his head sorely. “Don’t got that one.”

Remus wet his lips. “I do.”

A little hesitantly, he got to his feet and crossed the room to his own bed, opening his side table drawer and drawing out the tiny luggage key he kept hidden at the bottom under a copy of the Hawkings Student Handbook. He'd figuring that was the last thing that might interest anyone should they decided to go snooping.

Back still turned, Remus knelt down next to his bed and shuffled aside his school trunks to withdraw his mother's old trunk. So far none of them had asked about it and he was silently thankful. There was no need to hide his stash of fags anymore at least, but it was the rest of the contents that he really didn't want to show off. If Sirius got wind of the records he'd surely expect him to play them, and Remus wasn't sure he wanted to.

As quickly and as naturally as he could, he unlocked the trunk and lifted the lid only enough to get a glimpse of its interior. The album he was looking for was a 45 LP, smaller than a full-sized record, and there were only a few of them in the collection which made it easier to sort through and find. Once he had the album in hand, he shut the trunk with a short click and slid it back under the bed, getting back to his feet. He turned around while thumbing the edges of the paper cover, and looked up to find all three of his roommates staring.

"Here," Remus said, crossing back to James' bed and handing him the LP. James turned the small vinyl over in his hands and looked up, beaming.

"You're amazing you are, Lupin!"

Remus gave an awkward chuckle before noticing the questioning look Sirius was giving him. "What?" he demanded, but Sirius just shook his head and stood up, taking the record from James and setting it up on the turntable. A few moments later the song was playing. They all listened quietly, and Remus restrained himself from singing along. The single had always been one of Hope's favourites by The Who, and it never failed to make her laugh. The words came back to him easily.

I used to wake up in the morning,
I used to feel so bad;
I got so sick of having sleepless nights,
I went and told my dad;

He said, "Son, now here's some little something",
And stuck them on my wall;
And now my nights ain't quite so lonely,

In fact I—I don't feel bad at all…

Pictures of Lily, made my life so wonderful,
Pictures of Lily, helped me sleep at night;
Pictures of Lily, solved my childhood problems,
Pictures of Lily, helped me feel alright;

Pictures of Lily,
Lily, oh Lily;
Lily, oh Lily,
Pictures of Lily!

When the song ended, the boys stood around looking to one another expectantly. It was Sirius who finally broke the silence, fighting a snicker. "You're gonna play her a song about some bloke tugging on his nob to her picture?"

"Er—" Remus felt like his entire childhood had smacked him in the face. "That's not what the song's about! It's a love song, innit?"

Sirius handed him the album sleeve and pointed to the lyrics on the back. "Might want to try again, mate."

Remus, feeling instantly defensive, tossed the cover away. “Well it’s the only song I know with ‘Lily’ in it, so take it or leave it.”

"Maybe you can just talk over the diddling parts," Peter suggested. James, who at this point was desperate, scratched the back of his head.

“It could still work, right? We just play the song for her, and I’ll apologise and explain everything. She won't even notice the words."

“Well, don’t expect her to immediately take you back,” Remus warned, suddenly very aware that he’d betrayed the confidence of not just one, but all four of the girls—one of which seemed very good at holding a grudge.

“ ‘Course not. But it’ll be good just to be able to say the right thing this time.”

“I still don’t know why you’ve been chasing her for this long,” Sirius said. “It’s never made any sense. One girl couldn’t possibly be worth all this.”

James reached up to where Sirius was standing next to the turntable, one hip leaning against the hutch, and squeezed his shoulder. “When you meet the one for you, you’ll understand, Black.”

“Yeah, sure,” Sirius snorted.

“Considering his only true love is himself, we might be waiting for a while,” Remus said, sarcastically.

“Right you are, Lupin! I knew you laid awake every night just thinking about me, you moony bastard. It’s a tough life, being so desirable and yet so unattainable.”

“I think you mean, ‘emotionally-unavailable and also a ginormous nob’.”

“That too.”

“Enough about this tosser, Lupin,” James said, “play the song again. I need to practice my apology.”

Chapter End Notes

A "radio jockey" is just another term for radio host.
"Nappies" mean diapers.
A "Bap" or "baps" are slang for breasts.

The song Remus played for the boys was "Pictures of Lily" by The Who, released in 1967.

Stay rocking, my guys xx

Chapter 21: Happy Birthday, Remus

Chapter Summary

It's Remus' sixteenth birthday. The start of many things.

Chapter Notes

CW: Smoking, drinking, and general foul teenage language, lol.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

You say it's your birthday,
It's my birthday too, yeah;
They say it's your birthday,
We're gonna have a good time;
I'm glad it's your birthday,
Happy birthday to you!

- "Birthday" The Beatles, 1968

"HAPPY BIRTHDAY REMUS!" The girls shouted in unison, just as he'd managed to haul himself through their dorm window. Remus dropped down on the rug with a grunt, grateful that they had shifted their wardrobe hutches slightly out of the way for easier entry this time around.

"Cheers guys," he said, dusting off his shirt. Both Lily and Mary came toward the window, each taking one of Remus' arms and leading him forward. A deep blue armchair that they must've nicked from the Rowena common room sat squarely between Lottie and Marlene's beds and they pushed him down into it none-too-eagerly.

"Sit, sit," Lily said. "The chair was Marlene's idea, since she was the one who found you on the floor after my birthday."

Marlene smiled shyly from her bed, drink already in hand. "Just in case."

Mary passed Remus a drink—cranberry juice and vodka—and Remus raised it to them before drinking deeply. It was tart and gave quite the kick, but he didn't mind much. It was better that they were all at least a little gassed for the evening's events anyway. Lottie had played her part well, it seemed, and both she and Mary made more than a few sneaky glances in his direction while Lily and Marlene remained blissfully unaware.

“It really is a nice night out tonight,” Mary remarked after a while. Once she'd served them all a second round of drinks, she’d set herself up a nice spot on top of her hutch and remained camped out by the open window as though she were waiting for someone.

“We could go for a walk,” Lily said, distinctly unprefect-like. There was a stark difference between a sober Evans and the person she became when she had a drink in hand. “Figure we could make it down to the lake?”

Marlene shook her head. “Lake Dubh is freezing even in the summer. I’d rather not pretend like a visit in March is a good idea.”

“It’s not your birthday,” Lottie said, “it’s Remus’. Don’t you want to go out, Remus?”

Remus finished off his second vodka-cranberry and took a breath. Trust Lottie to forget the very thing they were waiting for. “I’m happy here,” he said simply. Lily had put on an album, Simon and Garfunkel, and he’d been bobbing his head along to it for some time.

“We should play another game,” Marlene said, before giggling. “But not truth or dare.”

“Two truths and a lie, then!” Mary called.

“You just want to know all our secrets,” Remus said, trying his best not to slur his words. Mary did know how to mix a stiff drink.

“Of course! What sort of friends would we be if we didn’t share all our darkest secrets?”

At Mary’s words, Remus looked to Lily, who scrunched her eyebrows but smiled. “What are you thinking, Remus?”

“Nothin’.”

“Liar. You gave me a look.”

“Did not.”

“Did too.”

“I know what the look was for!” Lottie exclaimed, sitting up on her bed. She had Remus’ new Godric-red tie around her neck like it was an ascot. He might’ve been afraid she’d spill the beans right there, if Mary hadn’t let out an ear-piercing scream at the same moment and launched herself off the wardrobe hutch.

“You buggar!” She wailed, holding her side as Sirius leaned over the edge of the girls’ window, pushing his dark hair out of his eyes.

“It was just a little pinch, Macdonald. You didn’t see me waving.”

“You could’ve said something!”

Lily launched herself up from Marlene’s bed, eyes wide. “What are you doing here?”

“Party crashing,” Sirius said casually, still clinging to the window sill. Another piece of hair fell into his eyes and he had to blow it away with his mouth.

“You’re not coming in, no way!”

Sirius shrugged. “Alright, if you’re sure. Though I wonder if Filch fancies a visit? I doubt he gets up to much on a Friday evening, but I’m sure he’d be very interested in the amount of booze bottles in your bin. Not to mention my mate, Lupin there, paying Rowena a little visit after hours.”

Lily drew back like Sirius had threatened to skin a live cat in front of her. “It’s Remus’ birthday!”

“So doesn’t Remus get to decide?” Remus called. Whirling around, Lily gave him an incredulous look, her green eyes twice as big as normal.

“Remus did you—”

“If you don’t mind,” Sirius interrupted, “poor Pete’s getting tired of being my stepping stool, and I'm sure this damn metal box is just murder on the knees. If we could just come in for a few minutes it’d really help soothe his back.”

“Please, Lily!” Remus heard Peter moan from somewhere below.

Rushing forward, Lily shoved Sirius’ head aside to look out the window. “You’re all here?”

“ ‘Course,” Sirius grunted, making Mary laugh.

“Oh c’mon Lily, they came all this way—”

“What do you mean ‘all this way’, they’re only two buildings down!”

“Let them iiiiiinnnnnn,” Lottie sang.

“I don’t think it’s a good idea,” Marlene said. She’d picked her feet up from the floor and was tucked up on her bed, nursing her drink.

“It’s Remus’ birthday,” Mary said.

“It’s Remus’ birthday,” Sirius repeated.

“IT’S REMUS’ BIRTHDAY!” James joined in, from somewhere outside.

“Bloody hell,” Lily groaned, “just get them in here before someone hears them.”

“Tu es très charmante, Evans,” Sirius said.

"N’est-elle pas? J'suis tellement folle d’elle," Mary added.

Lily gave them both the finger as Mary helped the boys climb in, before turning back to Remus, who had stood up to get a better look at the whole affair and was currently trying not to look too guilty.

“You told them.”

Remus shook his head. “Nooo…”

“You’re lucky it’s your birthday.”

Smiling, he handed her a bottle of Mary’s wine. “Thanks, Lils.”

Eyes still narrow, Lily sighed and took the bottle, swigging from it deeply, before stepping past him to join Marlene on her bed. Trying not to look too pleased, Remus stepped forward just as James was crawling through the window and Sirius clapped him on the back, pulling him in for a quick shoulder-hug the same way the London boys did when they greeted each other back home. “Took you long enough," Remus said, amused.

“Ah, you know how it goes,” Sirius said. “Pete was in the shower and Potter got cold feet.”

Remus glanced at James over Sirius’ shoulder. “And now?”

“A little whisky does wonders, mate,” he said, just as James looked up and said; “Hello, ladies!”

The girls responded with varying levels of enthusiasm and the room was quickly made into a space that could accommodate the growing group. It was considerably more crowded in the dorm room with all eight of them, but Mary and Lottie made room eagerly, helping the boys push Lottie’s bed aside while Marlene went down to the kitchenette to fetch more glasses. Lily remained camped out on her friend’s bed, trying not to look too sour for Remus’ sake. All the pillows, blankets, and sheets came down onto the floor to make one big plush circle to sit on and James took a seat next to Lily on the floor while the rest of them were busy sorting out drinks. It took a few minutes, but eventually he plucked up the courage to lean over and tap Lily on the knee.

“Oi, Evans—”

“Buzz off, Potter,” Lily said, drawing her legs up onto the bed. To his credit, James did not appear disheartened after the automatic rebuff.

“Alright, alright, was just gonna to ask what you got Lupin for his birthday.”

Lily returned the question with an unimpressed look. “Books.”

“Brilliant, which ones?”

“Nothing you’ve read.”

“I’ve read books before,” James said, grinning.

“Like?”

Maybe James was right—at least Lily was talking to him. Too bad he had no idea what to say in return.

He glanced desperately to Remus, who’d been observing the entire interaction from his blue throne, and was currently smiling into his drink. Even though watching his friend flounder might’ve been the more entertaining option, fixing the divide between James and Lily had been the very thing he’d spent the entire last month working toward, and so slowly, Remus reached behind himself, where he’d set aside the books the girls had given him for his birthday. Without looking, he tipped the first cover he could reach in his friend’s direction. James squinted a bit to get a look, but perked up immediately.

“Like 'The Second Sex',” he announced, before his eyes went comically wide and it dawned what he’d just said aloud.

Straightening, Remus fumbled for the book and brought it into his lap. The feminist philosophy novel was definitely not one of his birthday presents—it was one of Lily’s own books that he’d pulled off the hutch.

‘Oops,' he mouthed to James, but Lily was already gaping at him.

“You’ve read Simone de Beauvoir?”

James tried to swallow the smile, but his laughter escaped anyway. “Dear god, no.”

Rolling her eyes, Lily leaned backward on the bed and glanced to Remus, who was still clutching the book. Shooting forward, she snatched it back and used the book to swat at Remus’ thigh.

“Little shits, both of you.”

Remus exchanged a guilty look with James before snorting, and both of them began to laugh just as Marlene returned with extra mugs for the booze. After that James kept a healthy distance from Lily, sitting almost diagonal from her and only glancing over when he knew she wasn’t looking. Despite her apparent distaste for him, it didn’t take Remus long to discover that Lily was doing the same.

“Care to try some of this, McKinnon?” Sirius asked, waving around a very fat flask. “Got it from Pete’s brother. I warn you though, it’ll put some hair on your chest.”

Marlene scoffed. “If it hasn’t done as much for you, I doubt it’ll do anything for me.”

Everyone laughed while Sirius slapped a hand to his heart. “You wound me, you really do.”

"Uh-oh," Peter said. "Watch out Marlene or he might fall in love with you."

“In that case I’ll have to be much drunker.” Reaching down from her bed, Marlene snatched the flask from Sirius and took a deep swig before gasping in disgust.

“I can’t believe I just saw McKinnon do that,” James said, in awe.

“Why?” Lily started. “Because girls can’t drink?”

James straightened up a bit. “No, I only meant—”

“It’s fine, Potter,” Marlene said, passing the flask back to Sirius. “It’s a special occasion, s’all. What mum doesn’t know won’t kill her.”

“Promises, promises,” Sirius mumbled.

James nodded and Lily looked away, leaning back into Marlene like she was embarrassed. Marlene smiled and put an arm around her, swinging her head to the music that still played as the background soundtrack to their noise. David Essex had finally made an appearance.

“Right, that’s it,” Sirius said, standing up and almost tripping over one of Lottie’s pink throw pillows, “I can’t take it anymore.”

Eyebrows raised, Mary sat up a little; she’d been leaning back against Remus’ knee, sipping elegantly from her mug of wine. “What are you on about, Black?”

“This music—how you lot stand his bloody whinging I’ll never understand.”

“It’s a love song,” Lottie said, lying on her stomach on her bare mattress.

“You think everything’s a love song,” Peter said, his head resting against the side of his sister's bed. Lottie silenced him by pushing her drink against his mouth.

Sirius stepped over James and stumbled back toward the window. “It’s bloody grating on the ears, that’s what it is.” He bent down over his schoolbag and flipped open the leather top, reaching inside.

“You brought your own music?” Mary asked, sitting up more to see over her friends.

“I brought good music,” Sirius corrected. After withdrawing several records he made his way to the corner of the room, where the girls had set up the stereo and turntable on the floor next to the bathroom. Essex’s bleating came to a scratching halt and the room was quiet until Sirius had set up the next album.

“Sirius has good taste, don’t worry,” James told the room.

Lily perked up from Marlene’s shoulder. “As opposed to our taste?”

“Shush!” Sirius called. “It’s spinning.”

Both Lily and James fell quiet, but Remus didn’t miss the quick look that passed between the two of them.

'If I hear you knocking hard up on my door,
Ain’t no way that I’m gonna answer it;
‘Cause cheating is one thing and lying is another,
And when I say it’s over that’s it I’m gonna quit, yeah!'

Sirius stood up and turned around, dancing back to his place in the circle and dropping down beside James, who clapped him on the shoulder. Mary was snickering, mostly at Lily and Marlene’s expressions. Sirius caught on and grinned.

“C’mon ladies, you can’t be playing that nancy-shit on a lad’s sixteenth birthday!”

“You didn’t even ask Remus what he wanted to hear,” Marlene pointed out.

“I know what he wants to hear,” Sirius said smugly. “What kind of bandmate would I be if I didn’t?”

“Oh here we go,” Remus mumbled, and Mary shot upright again, looking up at him in his chair.

“You’re in a band?”

“No! He’s just drunk.”

“I am drunk,” Sirius agreed, “but I’m not a liar! Lupin’s just being his painfully modest-self, as per usual. Don’t have much to show for ourselves yet, but a few more lessons and he’ll be ready for the stage, I swear it.”

“Oh shut up, Black.”

James knocked Sirius’ shoulder. “When were you going to share all this?”

“Cool off, Potter. S’all still very new. Pick up a guitar and maybe we’ll let you audition. What do you think of drums, Pete?”

Peter gave a hesitant thumbs up. “Well… s’long as you teach me that stick twirling thing.”

Sirius tipped his glass toward him. “It’s a deal, my good man.”

“And I suppose you’re going to sing, Sirius?” Lottie asked.

“Only s’long as no one else here can produce anything of quality. Lupin, you sing much? Or just howl?”

Rather than answering him, Remus tipped his drink back and downed it while shooting Sirius the bird at the same time.

Band talk aside, the group kept drinking and eventually Marlene and Lily presented them all with a chocolate cake that read ‘Happy Birthday Remus!' across the top in red icing. While the rest of them stuffed their faces, Sirius and Mary took turns regaling the group with stories (Sirius mostly involved numerous detentions while Mary’s involved numerous admirers) and by midnight they were all red in the face from either laughter or the drink.

At one point, during a play-through of The Rolling Stones’ Sticky Fingers, a sharp knock came on the door.

“I’ll get it!” James said automatically, but before he could stand up completely Lily was on her feet, shoving him back into the pillows.

“You’re not even supposed to be here, you lunatic!”

Mary waved at the rest of them with frantic glee. “Hide!”

James and Sirius scrambled into the bathroom as Remus and Peter dove beneath Lottie and Marlene’s respective beds. It was Lily who answered the door, and they all heard her sweetly explain to the Rowena dorm monitor that they were simply trying to celebrate a birthday (prefect’s honour), and the loud music was just a result of some good, girlish fun. They got off easy after Lily had promised to turn the music down, and Remus thought she’d done remarkably well maintaining her calm facade for the amount of booze she’d ingested so far. Before she left the dorm monitor stuck her head inside and wished Marlene happy birthday, and the moment Lily fell against the closed door everyone erupted into laughter.

“The bathroom light is out,” Sirius said, stumbling back into the room with James just behind him. They both appeared a bit flushed but that was probably just the booze.

“We should play a game!” Mary announced. “Truth or dare!”

“Not this again,” Remus whined, pressing his hands to his eyes. Sirius caught his words as he staggered back to his place on the floor.

“If the birthday boy’s reluctant, then you know it’s bound to be fun.”

Mary got her way in the end of course, and they played several rounds of truth or dare, in which Peter was made to put on lipstick and rouge without using his hands, James had to eat a dry tea bag, and Marlene was forced to only speak in a horrible American accent for the rest of the game. She kept going back and forth between a New Yorker and a Texan, which was admittedly much more fun than listening to Sirius and Mary speak to each other in French, which they only did because they knew no one else understood them.

Avoiding truths at all cost this time meant that Remus was forced to let Peter sit on his lap for several rounds like he was a mall Santa, and received a new hairdo courtesy of Lottie and some very stiff hair mousse; but nothing was as embarrassing as seeing Sirius try on a girl’s uniform, skirt, stockings, and all.

He came out of the bathroom in the scandalously short skirt (it was Mary’s from year 8, and she only wore it when she really wanted to kick up a fuss) doing up the blue Rowena tie and shaking his head. Remus had never seen Sirius in such little clothing—he didn’t even sleep shirtless on the nights when their dorm was blazing hot—and had to watch through his hands, shrinking down in his chair until Peter fell off his lap.

“You live to embarrass me, ladies, I know you do,” Sirius said, still shaking his head but smiling despite himself.

“You have to do your hair!” Lottie said, taking a hair tie and gathering as much of Sirius’ black waves as she could into a small ponytail at the back of his head. When she was done Sirius took another swig out of his flask and walked across the room, swishing the skirt back and forth as he went.

“Surely your boy Bowie has worn something just like that,” Mary slurred through her laughter. Sirius snorted and picked up one of the Bowie albums he had brought, flipping it over.

“Oh, I'm sure he has, the fruit.”

“If I saw you from behind I might just have to say hello, Black,” James laughed. Almost blushing, Sirius blew him a kiss and walked forward to smack him upside the head with the album.

“Alright, whose turn is it, anyway?” Sirius asked after, clearing his throat.

“It’s Lily’s,” Lottie cheered.

“Oh no,” Lily said, actually laughing and as drunk as the rest of them. “I can’t even look you in the eye when you’re dressed like that.”

“Don’t be such a prude, Evans.”

“I’m not a prude!”

“Prove it.”

Lily stood up off Marlene’s bed indignantly, though swaying a bit. “Fine. I choose dare.”

Sirius ran his tongue across his teeth and glanced at James, who remained tight-lipped. “Alright,” he said, “I won’t torture you on your dear Loopy’s birthday—”

Remus puckered. “Don’t call me ‘Loopy’!”

Sirius ignored him. “I’ll give you a simple dare, Evans. Just one smooch, and I’ll never call you a prude again.”

“You’re actually daring me to kiss you?” Lily sneered.

“Nuh-uh,” Sirius said, shaking his head, “not me. James.”

The entire group gave a loud gasp, and Mary shot up so fast from the arm of Remus’ chair that he nearly spilt his drink. If James had a single murderous bone in his body he looked about ready to beat Sirius over the head with it, but it was really Lily, of course, that looked the most comical. Her mouth had dropped open into a wide ‘o’, and she looked between James and Sirius like she couldn’t decide which of them was worse.

“I’m not kissing anybody!” She declared hotly, and Sirius tilted his head at her.

“Because you’re a prude. A puritan, a schoolmarm, a Victorian so hot under the collar you’re sweating in your petticoats.”

Standing up from the floor, James held the back of his hand to Sirius’ chest. “Sirius, that’s enough.”

“You’re such a prick, Black!” Lily shouted, her face as red as a tomato.

“Oh, come now, Evans, surely you have a more colourful insult in one of those feminist manifestos of yours? Just admit what we all know to be true: you’re a prissy little Mrs. Grundy who can’t even let loose when you know no one else is watching.”

“You’re wrong!”

“Then prove it! One kiss!”

“Fine!”

Egging Lily into a frenzy had not been a part of their initial plan, but if Remus had had a camera with him he might’ve snapped a picture. Lily plucked James’ face out of the air and pulled him down to her so roughly he was half-sure their front teeth had banged together on impact, but none of that mattered. The room erupted into screams from the girls (even Marlene shrieked through the hands over her mouth) and Sirius stumbled away from the smooching pair so fast he got caught up in the blankets on the floor and went down with a heavy thud.

Releasing James with a slight shove, Lily stepped back and let out a victorious breath. “There!”

“Jesus Christ, Evans,” Sirius laughed, turning over and fixing his skirt, “didn’t think you’d go the full lock, stock, and barrel on us.”

Lily deflated a bit. “What?”

“I only meant a little peck on the cheek.”

Mary stepped forward and scooped Sirius’ flask up from the floor, tapping him on the head with it. “You’re so full of shit, Black.”

Sirius grinned like an idiot and took the flask back.

“Oh I knew I should’ve just punched you!” Lily wailed.

James, who until that point was still quietly stunned by the kiss, seemed to shake himself free of the shock as he held his jaw. “I think you might’ve dislocated something, Evans.”

“Both of you!” She corrected. “I should’ve punched both of you!”

Fuming, Lily reached down and snatched Sirius’ flask from his hand. He let her have it, holding up his hands in surrender as she unscrewed the cap and tossed it back, gulping down the biggest mouthful Remus had seen anyone take that night. It was almost impressive; he’d already had a couple swigs himself and was pretty sure Simeon had gifted them battery acid rather than alcohol.

When Lily failed to stop drinking, James, less dazzled by her sudden show, stepped toward her and reached for the flask. “Okay Evans, I think you’ve had enough now.”

Lily pulled back sharply and snapped at him over the rim of the flask. “Don’t tell me what to do, Potter.”

“You’ve already had more than—”

“Then what? Then I should?”

“Well, no… uh…”

“Than a girl should have?”

“No! I just—”

Holding one finger up in James’ face to silence him, Lily tipped back the rest of the flask and drained it. When she finally lowered the bottle she staggered a bit before blinking herself out of the daze and tossing the flask back to Sirius.

“Evans…” James started, but Lily ignored him, turning around to face Remus, who until that point had done an extremely good job on keeping out of the nasty affair.

Lily held out one hand expectantly, and Remus looked between her and James before slowly reaching out and taking it. That was enough for Lily to slump down into his lap, picking up her feet and tucking her cold toes under Remus’ thigh as she turned her face away from the rest of them to better ignore James.

Everyone stared of course, and Remus felt his own ears heat up as James gawked at him. It was all he could do to shrug. This couldn't possibly be all his fault.

"Good on you, Evans," Sirius said, biting his lip, "distinctly un-prude-like."

Lily shot Sirius the bird for perhaps the tenth time that evening and James gave him a nasty glare as he sat back down on his spot on the floor, quietly fuming.

"It's James' turn," Lottie sang, breaking the stilted silence. She had her head hanging off her bed upside down and just looking at her made Remus feel queasy.

"Truth," James said. "No more dares."

"Lily has to ask the question."

"Can't think of any," Lily said automatically.

"Then ask him about something embarrassing," Lottie instructed.

James made a face. "Like what?"

"What's the most embarrassing thing anyone's ever told you?"

"That's not even his own secret though," Mary complained, sitting down next to Sirius. "No fun."

"Too late," James cut in, "the question's been asked." He paused to think, a hand on his chin.

"Oh, Remus," Lily started, patting him on the collarbone. As she cupped her hand over his ear, Remus leaned in, but James wasn't having it.

"What's that?" He called.

"Nothing," Lily quipped. "I'm talking to Remus."

"Fine then," James said, clearly put out, as he turned back to Lottie and began in his most casual voice; "I'm not sure about the most embarrassing, Lot, but I think it would be pretty humiliating to know that I gave my first kiss to someone as rough as Davey Gudgeon."

There was a collective gasp from the girls, and Lily pulled her hand back from Remus' ear sharply. In his inebriated state Remus had to blink a few times before he realised what had been said. Lily's jaw was on the floor, and both Mary and Lottie had their hands covering their mouths while Marlene's eyes looked like they might pop out of her head.

He'd expected Lily to shout, to throw something at James even, but instead she just leaned back from Remus and the chair very suddenly, thrusting a finger in his face. "You!"

Fuck.

"Uh-uh!" Remus tried, sitting up straighter underneath Lily's legs and shaking his head aggressively. "I didn't do it! I did not tell him!"

"You knew, Lupin?" James demanded.

Remus returned the favour. "You knew?"

"How come I didn't know?" Sirius cried.

Lily gave a wail; "Potter, who told you?"

"Davey did! Little git was trying to brag!"

"Oh my god!" Sirius slumped back against Mary as he cackled, drumming his fists against her thigh. "You guys are really too much. Gudgeon, Evans? Really?"

Lily squeezed both hands into fists, looking like a bomb ready to go off. Remus, sensing that the room was distinctly heading in that direction, reached his long legs across the space and kicked Sirius hard in the shin. He didn't seem to notice.

"That had nothing to do with you!" Lily shouted.

"Not according to Davey!" James shot back.

"Stop saying his name!"

"Then stop being so angry!"

"I'm not angry!"

There were more than a few shared looks around the dorm at that and Sirius apparently took that as his cue. He turned over and cupped a hand to James' ear, whispering something before he jumped up and made a beeline for the stereo's corner. If Lily hadn't been pining him to the chair, Remus might've leapt after Sirius himself.

How could the git have such good rhythm yet such terrible timing?!

"Sirius, don't!" James shouted, but a moment later there was another record-scratching stop.

"C'mon, Potter, it's just like ripping off a plaster!"

Sirius took out Remus' little 45 LP and set it onto the turntable, and as the girls all craned their ears to listen the song started, much louder than any of the music they'd played before;

'I used to wake up in the morning,
I used to feel so bad;
I got so sick of having sleepless nights,
I went and told my dad;
He said, 'Son now here's some little something',
And stuck them on my wall;
And now my nights ain't quite so lonely,
In fact I—I don't feel bad at all…'

Remus could practically feel James' embarrassment permeate the air. The girls all shared a questioning look, but as the song came to its chorus, realisation began to dawn.

"Oh my god…" Mary echoed, trying to stifle her laughter. "You guys are insane."

Lily looked from Remus, to Sirius, and finally to James, who looked about ready to fold in on himself and disappear. He made it through the chorus before Sirius shouted at him again; "Go on, James! That's not your lap, is it?"

I'm gonna kill him, Remus thought, but apparently the sentiment was enough for James to find his nerve. He stood up very quickly, with the expression of a man about to dive head-first off a cliff.

"Lily," he started, "I know why you've been so angry at me."

Lily shook her head vigorously and leaned back into Remus as though she could disappear into his chest cavity. "No way. No. Remus make Sirius stop the music—"

“I’m sorry!” James gasped. “I’m sorry I didn’t invite you to that party last year! I’m sorry I let myself believe that you wouldn’t want to go!”

'Pictures of Lily,' the song sang;
'Lily oh Lily—'

Finally standing up and freeing Remus, Lily threw her arms out. “Stop talking!”

“I’m sorry I kissed that girl and bragged about it afterwards! I didn’t realise that we’d gone on a date!”

“Oh my god!”

Remus suddenly wished he was a lot closer to an exit. Peter, thinking the same, rolled back under Lottie’s bed, taking a bottle of whisky with him.

“It didn’t mean anything," James insisted frantically, "I just thought you wouldn’t be interested in going—you were so focused on exams and making prefect and—!”

“Potter, shut. Up.”

“It just didn’t seem like you’d be interested,” he whined. “I was just trying to be polite.”

Lily had had enough of being embarrassed apparently. “Well, don’t!”

“I have to!”

“Why? Because I’m a GIRL?”

James threw his hands out. “Yes!”

“Ugh! You’re so sexist!”

“What?”

“You are! You’re always talking down to us girls, trying to step around our feelings like we might cry at any old thing. You think of us as separate. It’s sexist!”

James whirled on Remus, still trapped between them and his chair. “Lupin, am I sexist?”

“Er—”

Lily reached across the gap between them and smacked James' shoulder. "Don't bring Remus into your mess! You've been doing this dance all night, and we're tired of it! Right, Marlene?"

Marlene, who'd been very quiet on her bed, suddenly found herself very interested in the bottom of her cup, popping a thumbs-up while she tipped back her glass.

"Don't force Marlene to take your side just because you're both girls!" James shouted.

"So you admit that we're both girls."

"Of course you're both girls! You've got all the same bloody equipment!"

"Don't talk about our 'equipment'!"

"That is rather piggish, James," Mary observed from the window, a decent distance from the active bomb-site.

"Not helping, Mary!"

The song ended and Sirius reached down to play it again. "Nothing wrong with a little equipment-talk."

"Shut up, Black. And stop playing that horrible song!"

"Oi, don't talk to my mate like that!"

"It's not my fault that all your mates are pigs."

"All of them huh? Where was that attitude when Remus came home with your lips all over him?"

Lily gasped. "That has nothing to do with this."

"Oh yeah? I just kissed some random girl, but you kissed one of my mates."

"On the cheek!"

"That's bollocks! You were just sitting in his bloody lap!"

"I didn't kiss Remus!"

Unwilling to sit in the crossfire for any longer, Remus stood up and climbed over Lottie and her bed to escape to the other side of the dorm. If the music hadn't drawn any complaints yet, James and Lily's shouting match certainly would.

"Time to go," he told Sirius, who grinned like a Cheshire cat and followed him to the window. "Sorry Mary," Remus said, as she stepped aside for them.

"Cowards!" She wailed. "Fils de putes!"

"Handsome fils de putes," Sirius added, kissing her on the cheek as Remus crawled out the window. "I'll return the skirt tomorrow. Au revoir, love."

By the time Sirius had dropped down onto the grass beside him Remus could tell that the argument had shifted from kissing people to other, less savoury activities. A crash sounded from inside, and then a desperate shout from Lottie;

"Lily, that's my shoe!"

"Go!" Sirius wheezed, shoving Remus ahead of him by the shoulders as they scrambled away from the square of light let out by the dorm window. They stumbled across the lawn, following the grass down to the road where they finally skidded to a halt, their shoes slapping the pavement. Remus' head was swimming thanks to the alcohol, but the night air was a cool and welcome change from the very heated situation that had just unfolded in the girls' bedroom.

"James is gonna kill us for ditching them," Sirius cackled.

"Not if Lily kills him first," Remus added. "Did you see Pete?"

"Yeah! He rolled under Lottie's bed to avoid the fallout. Five quid says he falls asleep there."

Remus snorted, and together they started down the lane, which was as empty as it normally was on a Wednesday night—or a Thursday morning, Remus supposed.

"Bloody chilly out, innit," Sirius hummed, bouncing up and down slightly as he walked.

Remus smirked. "Well, you are wearing a dress." He looked down at Sirius' bare legs, which were illuminated only by the occasional passing street lamp.

“You’re just jealous I can pull it off. Your hair looks ridiculous by the way.”

Remus reached up to feel his hair, which was still crunchy from Lottie’s hair mousse, and shaped a lot like a stiff pencil. “Yeah, well, at least I don’t wake up everyday looking like I stole Snape’s grandmother’s church wig.”

Sirius shoved him, and as he stumbled across the walkway Remus reached into his pocket for his cigarettes, withdrawing the carton.

“You want one?” He asked, and Sirius nodded, taking the cig he offered and popping it between his lips. Just as Remus was doing the same, Sirius slammed to a sudden halt. Remus spun around to find him slapping the front of his chest and then his legs, as though he’d lost something.

“Fuck,” Sirius groaned. “Goddammit Mary…”

Smiling around his cigarette, Remus pocketed the carton. “What’d Mary do?”

“She tricked me out of my own trousers.”

“You’re saying that’s never happened before?”

Sirius wagged a finger at him. “Ha-ha—not what I meant. I had your birthday gift in my back pocket. Buggar fuck.”

Remus pulled the cigarette from his mouth and bit down on a smile. “Oh. Well, that’s okay. You can get it later when you give the skirt back.”

“You’re supposed to give presents on someone’s birthday,” Sirius pouted, “and it would’ve been useful right now too.”

Glancing around—there was nothing but empty darkness. If it had been warmer, they’d have heard crickets. “Well what was it? You fit a new winter coat down your pants?”

“No,” Sirius said, stomping up to Remus and snatching the cig from between his lips, waving it in his face, “for these!”

“Alright, alright, calm down you alkie—cigarettes?”

“A lighter,” Sirius sighed, pushing the cig back into Remus’ mouth himself, “to replace the one you lost before Christmas.”

“I think you lost that one actually,” Remus said. Truth be told, he hadn’t thought about the lost zippo since he’d forgotten to be mad at Sirius in the first place. Going back to London for Christmas had left him more than enough of a connection to Tomny, it had told him that even if he was far from home, his friends were still thinking of him.

Sirius tsked and bit down on the end of his cigarette, before locking his hands behind his head. “Yeah, well, you can thank James for the new one. He picked it up over the holidays. Was just my idea. Happy birthday, I guess.”

He started down the road again, and after a moment, Remus followed, fumbling for the matches in his pocket. As he walked, he lit his own cigarette and snuffed out the match.

“Hey,” he called, and Sirius stopped immediately, spinning around to face him. Before he could let himself think too much, he bent down and touched the tip of his cigarette to Sirius’. It took a moment, but after a quick inhale the cigarette lit and both boys broke away, puffing into the night air.

Sirius reached up to pluck the cigarette from his mouth with two fingers, exhaling through his nose. “That was kind of erotic, Lupin.”

“Oh god,” Remus groaned, stepping back dramatically, “don’t make it weird!”

“You’re the one who did it!”

“Well you tried to do it before Christmas!”

“When?”

“B-by the window! We were talking about music.”

Sirius shook his head innocently. “Hm, no, don’t remember. I think I’m gonna have to use that one though. Next time keep eye contact a little longer though.”

“You—fucking—I hate you.”

Sirius burst out laughing and Remus ignored him, along with his thumping heart, while he puffed on his cigarette aggressively.

“Think I could beat you back to the dorm in a dress?”

Remus looked back to find Sirius smirking like he always did when he got his way. “We’re smoking.”

“And we can keep smoking, once I’m not freezing my bloody knackers off.” Grinding his cig out on the bottom of his shoe, Sirius began walking backward down the street. “Loser owes the winner a pack of fags?”

“Do you even have any fags to bet?” Remus called.

“Guess you’ll have to beat me to find out.”

Turning very quickly, Sirius took off into the dark, and for a split second Remus thought about letting him go on by himself, but he was too drunk and too happy, and he didn’t want to stop and let himself wonder why.

Tossing the cigarette into the nearest gutter, Remus sprinted after him.

Chapter End Notes

The song Sirius plays is "Good Lovin' Gone Bad" by Bad Company (1975).

A ‘Mrs. Grundy’ is a figurative term used for an extremely conventional or prudish person.

Chapter 22: Aftermath

Chapter Summary

> The group is feeling the effects of Remus' birthday. An understanding seemingly appears between James and Lily.

Chapter Notes

> CW: References to alcohol consumption and some real rough hang-overs, lol.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

My head hurts, my feet stink, and I don't love Jesus,
It's that kind of mornin';
Really was that kind of night,
Tryin' to tell myself that my condition is improvin',
And if I don't die by Thursday I'll be roarin' Friday night…

- "My Head Hurts, My Feet Stink, And I Don't Love Jesus" Jimmy Buffet, 1976

Mary had been right, sixteen felt completely different from fifteen. Before that morning he'd been simpler, less world-weary, and perhaps might've even been able to see the humour in his current circumstances, but now, at a fresh sixteen, Remus would've done just about anything to free himself from the penance that came with a night of heavy drinking.

After spending his birthday mixing liquors and drinking their weight in vodka, whisky, and tequila—though where that had come from, Remus still wasn't sure—the four boys woke up to the sound of Benjy Fenwick mercilessly banging two pots together outside their door.

"UP AND AT 'EM BOYS!" He shouted through the wood. "THE EARLY BIRD GETS THE WORM, RIGHT? OR IS IT THE HANGOVER, POTTER?"

Remus sat up on his bed and felt instantly sick. His mouth felt like sandpaper and tasted like a cross between a muddy puddle and the dregs at the bottom of a three day-old beer. Across from him Sirius stared back, dark hair falling over his face like a limp curtain.

“Who fuckin’ ratted to the dorm monitor?” Sirius grumbled.

There was a groan, and next James was upright, his dark skin looking distinctly ashen. “Got caught on the way in last night,” he grimaced. He appeared as though he might elaborate, but cut himself off when he clapped his hand over his mouth and nearly hung himself with his bed curtains, busy making a beeline for the toilet.

Remus sighed and looked to his alarm clock—7AM. “Who’s going to tell Potter he actually got caught coming in this morning?” He sighed, tugging his sheets back and swinging his legs around the side of the bed, only to step directly onto Peter, who must've passed out on the floor between their beds.

“Ah! Fucking hell, Pete!”

“Stick a sock in it, Lupin,” Peter moaned from the floor, head propped up on a small pile of Remus’ books.

Bang! Bang! Bang!

“LET'S GO LADS, THE DAY IS YOUNG AND SO ARE WE!"

At Benjy’s insistence, all four of them hauled themselves out of bed by 7.30 and made the trek down to the dining hall, moving like the living dead. The trolley was to be avoided, out of sheer fear for losing whatever hellish sludge was left in their stomachs on the ride. Instead they took the regular path to the Hawkings Dining Hall, squinting and wincing in the bright morning light only to be assaulted by the fluorescents once inside. Plenty of kids turned to stares as they crossed the hall to their regular table—and why wouldn’t they? For them it was just a regular Thursday, not a morning to deal with the repentance of drinking way past the normal human limit.

“Hey Cindy,” Sirius said, stopping by another table to tap a girl on the shoulder, “got a hair bobble? Lost mine.”

“Uh, yeah, here you go,” Cindy mumbled, taking the elastic from around her wrist and holding it out to Sirius, eyes as wide as a goldfish. She’d probably never seen the great Sirius Black looking so ragged, but at least he wore the look with some sense of achievement. Remus didn’t even want to think about how his hair looked.

Slumping down at the table, Peter gave a horrible groan, cradling his head in his arms.

“Whose idea was it to wake up today?” James breathed, sagging down next to him.

“Not mine,” Remus grumbled, rubbing his eyes. The other students around them were chattering noisily over their morning meals, making his headache even worse.

“Remind me to put laxatives in Benjy’s lunch,” Sirius grumbled, also face-down on the table. They all sat there for a little while, staring into the tea they’d collected on the way in, contemplating whether or not it was worth it to even attempt to move again.

“Well, might as well try and eat something,” James said, reaching across the table next to Remus and nudging Sirius. “C’mon Black.”

“Five more minutes, mum.”

Both James and Remus cracked bitter smiles, but stood up together. Remus reached for Sirius, helping him to his feet while James grabbed Peter, who astutely refused to move from the table.

“Fine I’ll bring you a plate,” James grumbled, dropping his arm on the table.

“You’re the best, mum,” Peter whimpered, face-down.

They crossed the hall to line up for breakfast, taking their trays and plates and moving down the line after one another. Remus ended up in front, and as he made it to the assorted fruits one of the girls from his history class cut in front to reach for a banana while he stood and yawned.

“God,” she said after doing a double-take, and Remus squinted down at her.

“Oh, hi Hannah.”

“You look awful Remus,” Hannah said, reaching up to adjust her glasses. “Are you feeling alright?”

“Yeah,” he nodded, breathing out as a wave of nausea hit him in the gut. He had to swallow to get the feeling to pass. “Jus’ getting over a bit of a bug.”

Hannah stepped back like she was afraid he might be contagious. “Maybe you should go see Ms. Pomfrey.”

“S’fine,” Remus said amicably, before feeling a sharp nudge from his other side.

“Budge up, Lupin,” Sirius grumbled, “I’m trying to reach the eggs.”

With their plates full, the boys slunk back to their table, where Peter hadn’t so much as moved. James dropped a tray in front of him and slowly he turned his head, tipping the fruit bowl toward him, only to groan again. “I hate honeydew.”

“Shut up and eat your breakfast,” James muttered, stabbing his spoon into a cup of yogurt. Just watching made Remus ill again, but James powered on, probably determined to get something of nutritional value into his stomach.

“I think I’m still sort of drunk,” Sirius said. Then, more horrified; “Am I going to get more hungover as the day goes on? We have gym today!”

“Oh god, please just shut up,” Remus whined, pinching his forehead. A sudden thwack to his left had him nearly jumping out of his skin, and he spun to find Mary sitting down next to him with her school bag on the table. Her hair was distinctly frizzier than normal, barely contained under a hair scarf, and she had smudged eyeliner from the night before under her lower lashes.

“I blame you,” she hissed lowly, while squinting at each of them.

“Us?” Remus echoed.

“Yes, all of you. I blame all of you for this fucking hangover.”

There was chuckle, and Sirius looked up from his Weetabix. “Feeling a bit off your trolley, Macdonald?”

“Here’s your bloody trousers,” Mary snarled lightly, reaching around Remus to toss Sirius his pair of grey school slacks.

“Cheers,” Sirius mumbled, before rummaging through the pockets. “Lupin, here.” Casually (or maybe it was just the hangover) Sirius passed him a silver-plated lighter, much more fine than the one he’d lost to Filch’s grubby fingers the term before. Remus thumbed the cool metal, before turning it over and finding a small engraving in its front; RJL.

“Thanks,” he said shyly, as Mary stood up from the table, pinching her nose.

“How can you fucking stand to be eating eggs?” She whimpered from behind her hand, before streaking across the room toward the girls’ bathroom.

“Weak,” Sirius said, reaching over and skewering some of Remus’ breakfast with his fork.

“Eat your own,” Remus grumbled, pulling his plate away, despite the fact that he almost felt like following Mary to the toilet. Rolling his eyes, Sirius just reached across the table, stealing a strawberry out of James’ fruit bowl instead. James let him, staring off into space as he lifted his tea to his mouth, drinking slowly.

“Alright, Potter?” Remus asked.

“Hm?” James looked up, blinking, and nodded. “Oh yeah, champion.”

“Thanks for this by the way,” he said, showing off the lighter.

“Oh, s’no problem. Glad you like it.”

Nodding, Remus returned to his breakfast, making it about two bites before he had to set his fork down and take a breather. He glanced back up at James again, who had dark rings under the eyes that could’ve rivalled his own.

“What time did you and Pete get in last night?”

James contemplated his tea. “Three, maybe?”

“Blimey. And… the girls?”

Looking up sharply, James gave an unimpressed smile. “Things are fine, I’ll have you know.”

“Oh really,” Sirius cut in, “because when Lupin and I left—”

“You mean when you ditched?”

Sirius glanced sideways at Remus. “Knew he’d be mad. You owe me some fags.”

“That wasn’t part of the bet.”

“You two took bets?” James demanded, lowering his tea.

“Only on if Evans would send you home in a body bag,” Sirius snickered.

“Well she didn’t, clearly!”

“So…” Remus prodded, “don’t tell me all my hard work was for nothing?”

James lifted his mug to his lips again. “I’ll have you know that Evans and I—” Stopping very suddenly, James lowered his mug and stared off behind Remus, who turned just in time to find Lily approaching with Marlene.

Both girls were looking distinctly rougher than normal, with pale faces and messy ponytails. They approached the table with their breakfast trays, setting them down next to Remus before sliding onto the bench. Lily lifted Mary’s abandoned book bag out of her way and dropped it down on the ground before catching Remus’ eye and straightening up.

“Good morning,” she said, though her usual chipper attitude was replaced with a stilted phrasing that said she’d had too little sleep and too much to drink the night before.

“Morning,” Remus returned, before tilting forward to get a look at Marlene, who was actually wearing sunglasses indoors. “Okay, McKinnon?”

“If you talk to me, I’ll have to kill you,” Marlene said lowly, slowly spoon-feeding herself tiny bits of porridge.

“Wish I’d thought of sunglasses,” Peter mumbled from across the table, head still propped up on one arm.

“Just close your eyes and pretend, Pete,” Remus told him, and Peter did just that, before resting his forehead against the table top once more. Shaking his head in light amusement, Remus turned back to Lily and nudged her arm. “Where’s Lottie?”

“Nurse’s. Said she had these spots in her vision.”

“It’s bollocks,” Marlene chimed. “She’s just lying to get out of class.”

Lily nodded amicably, but didn’t seem to have much in her to argue.

“You feeling okay?” James asked her finally, hunching his shoulders a bit like he was nervous.

“Yeah. Fine.” She breathed out. “You…?”

“Fine,” James nodded back, quickly. “Your dorm monitor give you a hard time?”

“A bit. Yours?”

“Oh yeah.”

Lily cracked a small smile, and Remus felt his jaw hit the floor. He glanced between his two friends, both of whom had been screaming at each other at full volume mere hours before. Catching his look, James cleared his throat a bit and gestured with his chin at Lily’s breakfast.

“Want some tea?”

“Sure,” Lily said, after licking her lips. “Two sugars, please.”

Standing, James scooped up his own mug. “Tea, Lupin?”

Remus indicated to his untouched cup; “I’m good.”

"Cool," James said, before tapping his hand to the bottom of his mug a few times and awkwardly striding away.

“Bring me back one!” Sirius called, before collapsing back against the table, eyes closed.

“Okay…” Remus started, turning on Lily, “what was that?”

“What was what?” She asked innocently, wiping the corners of her mouth with her napkin.

“That. You and James—you were talking civilly.”

“We’re always civil.”

Remus coughed out a laugh dramatically. “Don’t tell me all the booze made you forget what happened last night?”

Lily sighed and slapped her napkin down. “No. But not much else happened after you left. And I did notice by the way.”

He gave her a guilty smile. “Well it worked right? Having it out all in one go?”

“We got detention.”

“Detention? Thought you were a prefect.”

“I am,” Lily scoffed, and the smug satisfaction of hearing that her perfectly status didn’t protect from all things was enough to make Remus wiggle a bit in his seat.

“Stacy caught Potter in our room,” she sighed finally.

“That your dorm monitor?”

“Mhm. We have detention together for two weeks. Would’ve been more if she’d found the empty bottles, but Mary tossed them out onto the lawn before she saw.”

“Guess she couldn’t toss James out fast enough then,” Remus smirked. “So what do they have all of you doing?”

“It’s not all of us,” Marlene interrupted, leaning past Lily and lifting her sunglasses up to reveal her red-shot blue eyes. “James took the fall. Told Stacy he was crashing my birthday.”

Incredibly proud, Remus looked across the dining hall to see James filling up several mugs of tea; a true hero in the flesh.

“So you and Mary got away with it?” He asked Marlene in awe. "What about Pete?"

Lily clicked her tongue. “Peter hid under Lottie’s bed."

"But what about you then?"

"Well I... As prefect I should’ve been the one to shut everything down.”

Remus had never felt more scandalised. “So it’s—”

“Her and Potter,” Marlene giggled, as though she’d forgotten she was hungover. “They’re looking at several weeks of detention together." She held a hand to the side of her mouth; "Alone."

"Oh, please!" Quite dramatically, Lily covered her face with both hands and moaned. Both Remus and Marlene couldn’t resist laughing, and eventually he reached out, fist-bumping her over Lily’s breakfast. James returned a few minutes later, sliding a mug of tea across the table to Lily and Sirius, who had fallen asleep with his head on the table.

Lily took her mug and mumbled a thanks before sipping it shyly, avoiding James' gaze in her obvious embarrassment. Remus however, had no such qualms.

"You didn't tell us you got caught in the girls dorm," he mused, using the side of his spoon to cut up his scrambled eggs into tinier pieces. James looked to Lily and Marlene before pushing his glasses up on top of his head.

"Okay, Lupin, since you so clearly want to gloat—"

"Noooo. Only meant I was surprised to hear it, mate. Knight's honour."

"You're a terrible fucking liar," James said, both Remus and Marlene began snorting with laughter again, whilst Lily tipped her head back, just short of an another groan.

"You're right," Remus confessed, drumming his hands on the table top, "I am gloating." And he was happy. Happy that his friends were at least talking again, and that all the time he'd spent going between the two groups had not been entirely wasted. He still felt like shit, but as he watched Lily and James shoot each other glances from across the table, a sense of pride bubbled in his chest.

Toward the end of the breakfast hour, Mary finally returned, stopping behind Marlene and looking more ashen than she had over the eggs. "I'm never drinking again," she sighed, reaching for the napkin on Marlene's tray.

"I've heard that one before," Marlene quipped, and Mary paused her reaching to give her blonde ponytail a sharp yank. "Ow!"

"Oops." Snatching the napkin, Mary made her way down the table, scooping up her bag before she glanced at Sirius, still passed out at the table. "He got my skirt?" She asked Remus, who winced automatically.

"Oh yeah… about your skirt, Mary. You see, there was a little mishap when we got back to our room." Remus scratched at the back of his head; "Sirius was smoking and he dropped the ash and, well…"

"He burnt my skirt?"

“S’just a small hole really.”

“Ugh.” Scowling, Mary reached across the table and scooped up the spoon James had been using for his yogurt before strolling down to Sirius’ end of the table.

“Wake up,” she snapped, but Sirius only gave a little grumble, turning his head away from her. Without missing a beat, Mary slammed the spoon down on the tabletop, directly next to his ear, and along with Peter, Sirius burst upright, fully awake and panicked.

“One sugar!” He shouted, before blinking and smacking a hand to his forehead. “Fuck, Macdonald.”

Several kids from the tables around them began to laugh, and Remus sighed at the poor idiot, nudging Sirius’ cup of tea toward his hand.

“You’re buying me a new skirt you dunce,” Mary hissed. Before Sirius could grasp the cup, she snatched this tea and downed it in one go without so much as a grimace, leaving the mug turned upside down on the table top like a shot glass before spinning on her heel and strutting out of the dining hall.

“I can’t believe Macdonald just did that,” James said, then catching Lily’s eye, he added; “Not because she’s a girl. Tea’s just hot, s’all…”

* * *

Monday 12th April 1976

“Fuck.”

Remus slammed the phone down on its receiver hard enough to make the year 9 boy talking to his mum on the other line jump and let out a little squeak. Mumbling an apology, he turned away from the hall phone lines and took the stairs two at a time until he’d made it to the fourth floor, winding himself with the effort.

As he stalked back through the door of their room Sirius looked up from his spot on his bed, a pen sticking out of the corner of his mouth, the Rickenbacker across his lap, and various pages of sheet music strewn out in front of him.

“Quoi d’neuf?" He mumbled around the pen.

Remus paused with his hand still on the door handle. “You did not just use French to show off while also holding a bloody guitar in your lap.”

“Heh, yeah, maybe.” Plucking the pen out from between his teeth, Sirius leaned over one of the music sheets and continued making little notes in its margins while Remus shut the door behind himself.

“So who was on the phone? Your dad?”

Remus snorted and walked back to his bed, picking up the stack of books he’d been organising before the phone call. “As if. No, it was Giles, his driver. Says I’m not going home for our break, apparently.”

Sirius sat up a little straighter. “They’re making you stay at school for Easter holiday?”

“Yup.”

“Wicked.”

Remus rounded on him, books in hand. “You want to stay here?”

Sirius nodded eagerly. “I’d lick McGonagall’s bare foot if I could stay for a whole holiday.”

Remus scowled, forcing the image of their Headmistress’s feet from his mind. “Well, why don’t you then?”

“You already know why. Mum would kill me.”

“You say that, but how much can she do from the other end of the bloody country?”

“You’d be surprised.”

“Yeah well, at least it’ll mean I get some peace and quiet from you lot.”

Sirius gave a harsh strum on his guitar, making Remus flinch. “We are very peaceful.”

“Tosser.”

Sirius smiled and held his chin thoughtfully. “Well at least the holiday isn’t for another week. You’ve got time to practice missing us.”

“Or ignoring you. That’d really do me some good.”

Wiggling his eyebrows, Sirius returned to his fretting while Remus packed away the rest of his books. They were only out of order because Sirius kept going through them, the buggar.

“Have you seen Pete?” Remus asked, eventually, after glancing at Peter’s rumpled bed sheets.

“He’s out with Moira.”

“Again?”

“Right? I think she’s the reason he’s going to fail maths this year.”

“S’long as he doesn’t bring her back here.”

“Oh don’t be such a moralist. Honestly I’m surprised he swung anyone. Though it is just Moira, after all.”

Remus frowned. Moira was… attractive? Reasonably pretty at least and she seemed to like Peter so that was a plus. His judgemental attitude toward Peter’s girlfriend almost made him wonder what Sirius secretly thought of him, especially on the really rough mornings. It had been several weeks since his birthday when they’d all woken up looking like they’d been run over by Stan’s trolley, and yet Remus had had little luck when it came to getting his sleeping schedule back on track. It was like his mind just wouldn’t shut off. If it wasn’t a song stuck on repeat, then he was reliving the day’s events, running through every situation that could’ve gone differently and reimagining them. Worse still was the memories, the ones that came back with problems he couldn’t possibly solve inside his head.

To distract himself he’d read, pulling his lamp inside his bed curtains so as to not disturb the other boys, and if that didn’t work he’d sneak across the room and sit himself down against Sirius’ wardrobe hutch, borrowing the stereo and headphones to listen in the wee hours of the morning. It was on one of these nights that Sirius had woken up and found Remus there, back lit up by the moonlight coming through their window. He hadn’t said anything of course, electing rather to lie there and watch until Remus had finally noticed his eyes were open. That quiet kind of Sirius that only existed at night was more unnerving than any noise that came out of the East End, and he’d thought about stopping after that, but the stereo remained too tempting on those nastier nights, and the music helped drown out everything else.

“Oi, Lupin, what do you think of this?”

Remus looked up from his books as Sirius set his fingers to the Rickenbacker’s strings, playing a dirty little melody that rose to a quick peak in the middle and filtered out in the end. The riff was good, almost like listening to a jazz piano; but Sirius wouldn’t have thought that was a compliment, so he kept it to himself.

When the other boy looked up from his guitar Remus nodded. “That’s really good. Are there any words to go with it?”

Sirius shook his head. “Nah, but if you think of any, let me know, okay?”

Remus snorted. “Okay.”

“I did write something the other day though.”

“Oh? You’re writing songs now?”

“Just a few drabbles really. We’ll need them if we’re to make it as a band later.”

“Well go on then you smug idiot, let’s hear it.”

Sirius winked and then strummed a chord. “ ‘Hey diddle, diddle, Black and his fiddle, come listen to this merry tune. Pete’s a silly prat, Pot’s a right twat, and Lupin jumped over the moon’.”

“You idiot,” Remus laughed, snatching up one of his pillows and tossing it across the room. The pillow caught Sirius upside the head and he fell backwards with a dramatic ‘omph’ just as the front door opened and James walked in, book bag tucked under one arm, humming to himself.

“Alright lads?”

Peeling the pillow back from his face, Sirius grinned at Remus, who was trying to swallow his laughter. “Alright,” he answered. “How was detention? We missed you at dinner.”

“I ate with Lily,” James said, opening the hutch at the base of his bed and setting away the school books that had accompanied him to detention after class that day.

Both Remus and Sirius shared a knowing look until Sirius’ curiosity got the better of him.

“So how is Evans?” He asked, tossing Remus’ pillow back across the room.

James shrugged casually. “She's good.”

"Ah, 'good'. I see." Glancing at Remus again, Sirius shook his head and stuck his guitar pick between his teeth. It was nice to see him showing a bit of restraint, especially considering they were only just barely out of the woods where Lily was concerned.

“Are you going to practice?” Remus asked as James shucked off his school jacket and peeled his shirt up over his head. Unlike the rest of them, James had never hesitated to strip down in the middle of the room. Remus suspected that if he had his way, the dorm would’ve become little more than a glorified changing room.

“Yeah,” James said, “boys are getting ready for the tournament at the end of May. We want to beat the Scots, you know, to make up for our bruised English pride from last year’s loss.”

“S'just ‘cause we’re not used to losing to them,” Sirius snickered as James pulled his jersey down over his head.

“Want to come, Lupin? We could always use someone else to run drills.”

Remus shook his head. “Oh no, you go ahead.”

“You’d think with those legs he’d be more coordinated,” Sirius said.

James tossed one of his football boots at Sirius. “What about you then? Might as well run something besides your mouth.”

“Oh yes,” Remus said, “take him. I want to get a paper done and it would be nice to not have to do it in the common room just to avoid his flapping gums.”

Sirius gave him an offended look but set the guitar aside. “Oh fine then, Potter. But I’m not running laps.”

“It’s good exercise!”

“ ‘It’s good exercise—bah,” Sirius mocked, getting up and rifling through a draw in his hutch. He came back with a pair of jersey shorts and a t-shirt and crossed the room to the bathroom.

“Not going to change out here with your mate?” Remus called, teasingly.

“You first, ya lanky git!”

Biting his lip, Remus watched as Sirius disappeared into the bathroom to change, before tossing a pencil across the room at James, who was tying his shoes. “What do they have you and Lily doing in detention?”

James straightened up on his bed, considering. “Well first it was lines. ‘I will not sneak into the girls dorms’, ‘I will not lie to my dorm monitor’, ‘I will not break curfew’.”

“Did any of them manage to sink in?”

“Nah, they’d have to tattoo me for the message to stick.” Smiling, James tossed his pencil back, and Remus scrambled to catch it out of the air.

“And here I thought you were supposed to be the good one. Does this mean you and Lily are talking then?”

“Yeah. S’good.”

“Just ‘good’?”

James gave a shy smile. “Well, maybe a little better than good.”

Smugly, Remus tucked the pencil behind his ear and stood up, crossing the room to fiddle with the stereo. It felt too quiet without Sirius’ strumming.

“Hey Lupin?”

“Hm?”

“Thanks.”

Glancing back from the stereo’s dials, Remus gave his friend a cheeky smirk. “For?”

James sighed. “You know what for. For everything.”

“Yeah, well, do me a favour and don’t ever ask me to play match-maker again. I am officially out of the love business.”

“But you were so good at it.”

Remus batted him on the top of the head, and James returned the gesture with a swat of his own. They kept going, snickers turning to light-hearted grunts until finally the door to the bathroom opened and Sirius walked out to find them half-grappled, grinning like idiots.

“Hey, don’t leave me out!”

Before Sirius could reach them, Remus broke away and skirted back to his bed, tossing himself down amongst his books.

“Quick, take him,” he said to James, who’d stood up and grabbed the football from beneath his bed.

“He must hate me,” Sirius complained, but James only gave him a small shush, pushing his ball into his arms and leading him to the door.

“We’ll meet you for dinner later,” he called, then; “Oh, and Remus, Southampton got into the Cup finals!”

Now absent-mindedly chewing on the end of the pencil, Remus glanced up from his notes. He had been pretty sure James only favoured Arsenal, but maybe he’d switched over and he’d just tuned out that conversation.

“Oh yeah?”

“Yeah, dunno who they’ll be playing yet, it’s between Manchester United and Oxford, but we’ll have to watch the game together!”

No way. “Sure, mate.” Sounds terrible. “Sounds great.”

James beamed at him and flashed a quick thumbs up before disappearing out the door as Sirius, tossing a football up and down in the air, fell into step behind him.

Chapter End Notes

A 'hair bobble' is just another word for hair tie/ponytail.
'Weetabix' is a brand of UK breakfast cereal.

I really liked writing this chapter. It was simple but also felt nice to let the kids whine like kids and communicate back and forth in true pining-style. See you next chapter, cheers xx

Chapter 23: Easter, 1976

Chapter Summary

Remus begins his Easter vacation at Hawkings alone and finally comes face to face with (possibly) a new friend.

Chapter Notes

CW: Smoking and (briefly) implied child abuse.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I go out to work on Monday morning,
Tuesday, I go off to honeymoon;
I'll be back again before it's time for sunny-down,
I'll be lazing on a Sunday afternoon…

- "Lazing on a Sunday Afternoon" Queen, 1975

There hadn't been much rain so far that April, which only meant they were shaping up for a hot summer just like the last. Remus was beginning to feel that familiar uncomfortableness that came with the late-afternoon heat, but at least he wouldn't be stuck inside all week while his friends were at home visiting their families. All of them except for Lily had boarded the buses at the crack of dawn to make it to the station on time, but since she was the only one of them not bound for London her train wasn't scheduled to leave until noon, giving them more time to slum around after breakfast.

"I'm really sorry you're spending the holiday at school alone, Remus," Lily said, as they walked to the buses together.

"Don't be," he said, switching her trunk from one hand to the other. She hadn't asked him to carry it but he'd taken it off her hands anyway, only stopping to wonder at the last second about what his chances were of being called a misogynist.

"But the only ones around will be the year thirteens, and they're all going to be busy studying for their A-Levels."

Remus shrugged for what felt like the millionth time. "Better than staying for Christmas, at least I can go outside." Truthfully he was trying not to think about Tomny, who he'd promised to visit once he got back to London for Easter holiday. If only he had a bloody phone, the caveman.

"James offered to stay actually," Remus continued, "but I think he wants to go home and see his parents."

Lily smiled a bit. "At least Easter Communion will be nice and small. I hate how big and busy it gets back home."

"Fuck. I'd forgotten about that, you know?"

"Language, Remus. We're talking about church."

"I'm pretty sure I've heard you say worse things since my birthday."

"Shush, you. What about Black though, did he not try to stay?"

"No, he offered too, but he couldn't really have stayed. His mum's a hard-ass."

Lily nodded. "Yeah… James has mentioned before how horrible she is. Seems kind of counterintuitive. You have all that money and influence and you're still so awful? And to your own son? I mean I know Sirius is a prat and all—"

"Yeah, well, 'money doesn't buy happiness' and all that," Remus said, kicking a stone out of his path.

"It's not just her either—James said Sirius and his brother used to be closer, but he and Regulus really fell off in the last couple of years. Sirius has never said anything to me, but James did, you know… before." She blushed a bit. "Regulus hangs out with some real nasties though. I've seen them outside Sev's dorm—they're in the same House—and one time Regulus actually hit Sirius. In front of the whole lawn—just lashed him right across the face! I thought Sirius was going to kill him for it—I might've—but he only laughed. It was kind of scary actually."

Lily stopped to give a little shudder, and it occurred to him that the fight must've been scary, to affect someone as fearless as her. She continued though, lifting a hand to nibble on her thumbnail. "James told me the argument was over something Sirius said about their mum. But oh, I don't think I was supposed to tell you that… It's not really my business either."

“Don’t worry, I won’t tell,” Remus said, meaning it.

They had made it to the front of Castle Hall now, and the wide, U-shaped driveway was full with buses and cars all waiting to take the rest of Hawkings’ students home for the week.

Remus passed Lily her trunk, which she took with a smile. “You know, I never said sorry for ruining your birthday party,” she said, bashfully.

“You didn’t ruin it. It was still fun. And besides, I figure those weeks of detention punished you and James much better than I ever could. You never did say how those went, by the way.”

Lily pursed her lips over a smile. “They were fine. We got through them, and Potter was amicable enough.”

“Oh, he’s amicable now?”

“Yeah, a good bit more than you’re being right now!”

Remus smiled, and she knocked her trainer into his ankle. “Stop looking so smug!”

“I’m not smug, I’m happy! You don’t know what it was like going between you girls and the rest of them. I spent weeks trying to get information out of you lot, I’ll have you know.”

“We noticed," Lily drawled. “Mary was half-convinced you had a crush on one of us, what with how many questions you were asking.”

“Uh…” Remus suddenly felt very warm in the face.

“I’m only kidding,” Lily said finally, “besides I guess you lot got what you wanted then? You knew on your birthday—why I was angry.”

Remus rubbed the side of his neck. “Er… yeah. Lottie told me.”

“Marlene always says she needs a muzzle.” Lily sighed. “I feel like an idiot, you know. I think in the beginning I was just sort of embarrassed. They all thought I was some boring swot—”

Not all of them, Remus thought, for James’ sake.

“And that all I cared about was school. It was embarrassing that—lord—I don’t know—that I wasn’t cool enough?” Lily pinched her forehead. “And then James bragged about kissing that girl from the village in front of me and I just… I spent all summer trying to forget about it. I told myself it didn't matter but as soon as I saw him at the beginning of the year I got angry all over again."

"But you're not angry anymore?"

"No, I'm actually pretty tired of ignoring him and Black. They don't make it easy, exactly."

"No they do not," Remus said, smiling a bit. "Does this mean you and James are dating now?"

Lily swatted him in the shoulder. "God—no! You're as bad as Mary."

"S'just a question, Evans, no need to get violent."

"I'd like to settle for amicable acquaintances for now."

"And is that what we are?"

Lily shook her head with a pretty smile. "No, we're friends, Remus."

"Oh. Cheers then. Now will you tell me why Davey Gudgeon was first on your kiss-list?"

"Don't make me take my friendship back."

They shared a cheeky smile, just as another body appeared at Lily's shoulder.

"Lily, the bus is getting ready to leave," Snape said, ignoring Remus' presence entirely.

"Oh, Sev, yes! I'm coming," Lily said, snapping to attention. Snape spared Remus a single glare before picking up Lily's bag and walking off with it, though Remus noticed smugly that he struggled a little bit with the extra weight.

"I'm not studying with him anymore," Remus told the red-head. He'd only had to spend a handful of afternoons at a library table with Severus Snape, but each one had been filled with more glowering and sneering (not just from Snape) than learning. More often than not Snape had elected to speak or make a jab at Remus through Lily, as though she were the telephone line between them. Lily had been ecstatic the day Remus finally agreed to join her in exam studying, but not even a passing biology mark was worth spending more time with the greasy boy.

“Don’t worry,” Lily said, “I’ll plan accordingly for when school starts up again. I don’t really get much use out of studying with Sev anyway, he’s always just correcting my answers without teaching me how he got them.”

“So he makes a horrible teacher as well as a horrible person, then.”

“Don’t be mean.”

“LILY!” Snape barked, standing by the bus door and shaking his hands frantically to get her to hurry up.

Lily nodded to him before turning back to Remus. “I’ll see you in a week, okay?”

“Okay.”

There was a honk and Lily flounced off to follow Snape onto the bus, scuttling eagerly to a seat on Remus’ side. She waved at him and he waved back until the bus had pulled away from the curb and driven completely out of sight.

* * *

Sunday sermons were distinctly more painful to sit through without Sirius or James there to mimic the priests or thumb war when they were supposed to be reciting verses with the rest of the school. Not including the teachers who’d elected to stay for the holiday, Remus counted less than two dozen kids, most of which were year 13’s who appeared as though they didn’t want to be in church any more than he did; though he suspected their irritation had more to do with an interruption in their studying than anything else.

Without so much as a single familiar face to keep him company, Remus sat in his empty pew and twiddled his thumbs for the entire service, feeling like an idiot for not even attempting to skip. They hadn’t taken attendance, and not even Mrs. Buchanan was there to lead the sparse choir, making his mind wander toward fantastical reasons for her absence. There didn’t seem to be any other teacher who left campus as often as she did, but she did supervise one of the most chaotic forms classes in the entire school. A week before Sirius had almost laid Crouch out for making a year 8 girl cry over her dental head-brace and she’d had to separate them with one hand while balancing a tuba in the other. Perhaps she just left school for peace of mind; anyone who dealt with as many shits as could be found in Music Room #2 deserved frequent breaks.

Once the actual holidays had finished (he'd at least been fed well—beef Wellington on Sunday and a bacon-wrapped turkey on Monday) Remus found himself with plenty of time to catch up on homework and practice with his bass. It took about two days before he'd started to venture out on his own again after coming to the realisation that not only was his dorm room empty, but so was the rest of the campus. He hadn't been doing so as much in the last few months, and it was a strange feeling to be suddenly confronted with so much alone time after he'd finally gotten used to all the noise.

The preferred spot quickly became a little shaded patch under a large oak tree, just across the berm from the dining hall. Once he'd run out of homework he began taking books and the Fender along with him and used the practice to keep busy, setting up his sheet music out on the grass and using small rocks to weigh them down so that they wouldn't blow away in the spring breeze. It felt better to practice acoustically. He still hadn't gotten the hang of the power plugging into an amp gave him; it only seemed to magnify every mistake—but with no one around he found himself enjoying himself more than usual. It was easy to become self-conscious during lessons or in their bedroom since Sirius was always around to listen, but once he finally let go of the fear that someone would be around to hear his mistakes, Remus' confidence began to grow. His fretting was getting better, and he didn't trip over his fingers as much anymore. Halfway through the week he'd even managed to get through a full rendition of "Sweet Emotion" without any major blunders, and it was getting easier to play the bass's heavy strings without a pick.

Remus ate most of his meals under the tree and even enjoyed a few cheeky cigarettes since he knew no one would be around to catch him. He was sixteen now, old enough to legally buy his own smokes, but Hawkings was still pretty strict when it came to smoking outside of designated areas, and those were usually crowded with upper sixths or irritable teachers just looking for a break.

Being alone was pretty good once he'd gotten over the disappointment of not going back to London. Tomny might've been wondering where he was (maybe even placing bets with the others) but also, who's to say he was even thinking about him in the first place? Things often got messy following a take-over, and blokes like Tomny who didn't belong to any one group, preferring to pay their dues to whoever barked the loudest, were always getting shoved around until the dust settled.

Was Tonya still there, dancing around the flat to her music and creating three-course meals for boys who were used to having half a beer for breakfast? Maybe she'd found a new place in a safer neighbourhood, or maybe she'd gone back to Paris. Would Tomny be missing her then? He'd always had a quick turn-over with girlfriends, but Tonya wasn't like any of the girls he'd brought around before. Or at least, Remus had liked her the best.

The song Sirius had started composing before the holiday kept him busy after he'd run out of things to practice. It wasn't really a song, more of a melody than anything, but the parts of it he could remember sounded good on the bass too. He expanded on it, added a wonky bridge and just let his fingers play until he had something that he thought was halfway decent. Coming up with the words was harder. In his boredom Remus had started to scribble lyrics in the margins of his music sheets the way Sirius was always doing, but none of them seemed to match with the tempo and most were just plain bad;

'You want me, you want me home//You want me, pick up the phone';

'She's so sweet//Raises the heat//Leaves me wanting more//She's so hot// I can't just not//Fall across the bedroom floor';

'I watch you go through that front window//Don't you have any regrets?// I've lost the bet now//Bring back my cigarettes'.

There was no way he could ever show Sirius or the others; he'd die of embarrassment. The lyrics went back and forth between gross and nonsensical to sappy and wimpish. It felt like he was just imagining himself as Bob Dylan or James Taylor and doing a crappy job of it. How did you even write a song anyway? Were the words just supposed to appear while you stared at nothing, imagining situations that might be interesting enough to put to music? Was that why all musicians were such lunatics; because they spent all their time slamming their heads into concrete in hopes that something half-way decent might just fall out?

Remus felt particularly disgruntled over his attempts at writing when evening came and he spent all his time staring at the lyrics printed on the back of Sirius' albums. He was developing a particular vendetta against Queen for the band's ability to spin such outrageous stories into beautiful prose, and must've listened to "Killer Queen" about a hundred times;

She keeps her Moet et Chandon,
In her pretty cabinet;
“Let them eat cake”, she says,
Just like Marie Antoinette;
A built-in remedy,
For Kruschev and Kennedy;
At anytime an invitation,
You can’t decline…

He had no idea what the hell Mercury was on about, but it sounded bloody cool, and because he had nothing better to do, Remus kept playing. It had always been easy for him to pick out the instruments from one another on a recorded track, but he was getting better at reading the chords by ear now too.

By the fifth day of his paternally-imposed isolation, Remus had nearly run out of things to do all together. He smoked to pass the time, but since the truth about his dirty habit had come out to the rest of his friends, smoking had become more of a communal event and he was just left disappointed. Always eager to play the rebel, Sirius had lit up alongside him whenever he could—most of the time bumming off Remus but occasionally showing up with his own carton, which he was always willing to share. Peter had partaken enough times too, usually coughing his guts out, but really it was James that had surprised him. He didn’t like smoking in the dorm room and wouldn’t join in very often, citing football as an excuse to keep somewhat healthy, but some afternoons when he seemed to be feeling particular ballsy, James would start smoking like a chimney.

“You sure you’re not a secret chain-smoker?” Remus had asked, after watching James light up a third cigarette behind the dining hall dumpsters.

“I figure,” James started, “that if you only do it every now and then, something else’ll come along and kill you before the cigarettes realise that it’s their job.”

“I think that’s the most fatalistic thing you’ve ever said,” Sirius said, impressed.

“My dad’s always saying how the gap between British humour and death is very small.”

The memory had stuck with Remus mostly because he thought it would almost have made a decent song, and so in his boredom, he found himself trying to rhyme ‘fatal’ with something—cradle? Hateful? Dining room table?—when a hand tapped him on the shoulder, scaring the life out of him.

“Bloody hell!” Remus shouted, dropping the cigarette he’d been smoking into his lap as he scrambled to hide what he was writing. When he finally looked up it was Simeon Pettigrew standing behind him, leaning against the trunk of Remus’ oak tree with his hands in his pockets.

“Sorry,” Simeon said, over a cocky smile, “just wanted to make sure it was you and not someone else. Didn’t think I’d make you piss your pants.”

“You didn’t,” Remus huffed, setting his papers aside and picking up his cigarette, which had nearly burnt a hole in the front of his trousers. Simeon watched him, his eyes unnervingly blue. He was wearing a t-shirt tucked into a pair of brown bell-bottoms, and had a gold earring in his right ear the same as Sirius. His attire might’ve been average in a big city like London, but after months of seeing only grey slacks and House colours Remus almost balked.

“You’re Regis," Simeon said.

“Remus.”

He grinned guiltily. “Sorry. I’m Simeon. Nice glasses.”

Remus reached up to remove the teashades Tonya had given him for Christmas. “I know who you are, you’re Peter’s brother.”

He nodded. “Shouldn’t you be at home for the holidays, Remus?”

“Shouldn’t you?"

“I stayed to study.”

“So did I.”

Simeon glanced around the messy pile of papers and music sheets, then at the Fender, which was sitting in its case with the top open.

“Clearly.”

“It’s nothing,” Remus said, as he snapped the case closed and got to his feet. Simeon’s sudden entrance was the first interruption he’d had in days, and it somehow left him on edge. The sun was still shining, it not even being mid-afternoon yet, but he could always continue his ‘nothing’ in the common room.

“Looks like the fun kind of nothing. More fun than exams, anyway. You like music?”

“Yeah," he mumbled.

“Me too.” Simeon pushed off the tree and crouched down, scooping up Remus’ carton of Embassys. He hadn’t realised they’d come out of his pocket.

“You bring these from home?” He asked, looking up. “Nobody’s selling this brand on campus.”

“Yeah,” Remus said, then; “Kids sell cigarettes at school?”

“ ‘Course. You can get anything if you know the right person to ask. Hawkings is too old of a place to not have some sort of black market.”

Simeon handed the carton over as he stood up again. He was barely taller than Remus, but he had certainly taken the bulk of the ‘handsome’ gene within the Pettigrew family. Poor Peter was probably going to be 5’4” and mousey forever.

“How’s your stash? Probably getting pretty low, hey?”

“Mhm.” He had been trying not to think about it. Between nearly four months of school and supplying Sirius he was running dangerously low. The plan had been to stock up again through Tomny over Easter break, but obviously that wasn’t going to happen.

Feeling irritated over yet another interrogation (the kids at Hawkings were so nosey, like really) Remus brought his cigarette back to his lips. He had to relight it, but once he’d done so he took a deep drag and let the smoke waft over Simeon. “Is this the part where you tell me you’re the one who’s been giving Sirius the cigarettes?”

“He told you that was me?”

“No, but you get us booze.”

“Indeed,” Simeon said.

“How does he pay you? His parents cut him off.”

Simeon rubbed a hand over his mouth. “Commissary stuff mostly. Little things. He’s still got a tab there. Would’ve thought you’d have known that. Private school’s not that much different from prison, mate.”

“Yeah, I figured that much out for myself at least. You don’t got your own tab?”

“It’s mostly just a favour. I know he’s got it rough at home.”

Having it ‘rough at home’ meant very different things in the East End, but Remus tried not to think about how Simeon seemed to know more about Sirius’ home-life than he did. It irked him, for some reason.

Simeon took the silence as a chance to look Remus up and down. “So you wanna come to a party tonight?”

“A party?” Remus looked around at the empty berm. There couldn’t have been more than fifty people on the entire two-hundred acre campus. “With who?”

“Not all of us stayed just for the books,” Simeon said with an easy laugh. He turned and began scooping up the sheet music from the ground, which Remus snatched back quickly.

“So it’s your party, then?”

“Not mine, per se. Just some friends looking to have a good time. I’ll even show you had to roll your own cigs, if you want.”

Remus, who was not used to people doing things for nothing, squinted at him. “Why?”

The older boy shrugged. “Because I’m so bored I’m ready to put my head through one of the library windows, and you seem about as interesting as anything else right about now. Annnd, I’ve seen you out here by your lonesome a lot.”

“I’m not lonely.”

“Never said you were—a musician needs his downtime. Just asked so you could come and hang out with some cool people."

Remus laughed a bit. "You're cool then? Do people who are actually cool have to say that they're cool?"

"They don't, but nothing wrong with a little self-advertising."

Remus considered, wondering if he really wanted to be dragged along to another event for someone else's enjoyment. Simeon seemed less whiny than Lily or Sirius, and at least if he went he might get something out of it, but still, he was hesitant.

"You can get me some fags then?"

"Loose tobacco, maybe. We roll our own. You got anything to trade for it?"

Remus shrugged. "Some spliffs."

"Then of course."

"Fine, then."

Simeon grinned and for a moment Peter's boyish face shone through. "You'll come?"

"Yeah, but you have to show me how to roll a decent cig, too."

Simeon wiggled his eyebrows. "Deal, and in return, you have to play me a song on that guitar of yours."

"It's a bass—" Remus started, before his haughty expression vanished from his face all together. "What? No, I can't."

"It's just one song!" Simeon insisted, already backing away from the tree. "The others'll love it, and if they don't, you won't really care. Trust me."

"But I don't play—" Remus tried, but the other boy was already across most of the berm.

Simeon gave one last wave, his golden locks blowing in the breeze. "Byron House, tonight. See you there, Regis."

Chapter End Notes

I definitely cringed writing those song lyrics, but so did Remus and that was the point, LOL.

Chapter 24: Come Together

Chapter Summary

Remus attends a party hosted by Simeon Pettigrew and gets to show off a little.

Chapter Notes

CW: Drinking, smoking, and recreational drug usage.

A/N: Update There is a character featured in this chapter named Alice. She is NOT Alice Longbottom, just to be clear. xx

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Oh Peace Train sounding louder,
Glide on the Peace Train;
Come on now Peace Train,
Peace Train;

Now I've been crying lately,
Thinkin' about the world as it is;
Why must we go on hating,
Why can't we live in bliss?

- "Peace Train" Cat Stevens, 1971

Thinking that there was no way Simeon could've been serious, Remus had almost left the Fender behind. It felt stupid to bring an instrument to a party he'd only been invited to at the last minute. Sirius would've loved it of course, being an aspiring musician and naturally the most luminous person in any room he walked into, but Remus only knew a few songs and most of them sounded half-baked at best. You'd never catch him admitting it, but after Simeon had left him on the berm Remus had gone back to his dorm and practiced straight through dinner out of nervousness.

By the time he'd worked up the nerve to leave Godric the sun was long gone and the roads and paths of House Lane were lit up only by the yellow street lamps. Named after the poet, Byron boys dorm had earned itself a reputation for housing Hawkings' artsy, alternative types, though that was a loose description at best. Simeon didn't really strike Remus as ‘alternative’, but he figured the guy owned at least one or two puka shell necklaces, which had to count for something.

Passing the dorm’s exterior plaque depicting a golden ox, Remus walked right through the front door and down the hall. He heard music before anything else, but as he approached the common room, he could hear a mixture of laughter and shouting. Slowing just outside the sloped doorway, Remus leaned his head in to listen.

“I’m telling you, Cass, it’s just a division of extremist politics and industrial labour, how can you not understand that? It’s not just about being nihilistic, they’re really trying to fight against a future that isn’t working.”

Another voice joined the conversation, deep and sarcastic in tone; “I thought you were talking about the ethnic division versus the aging population?”

“It's not a 'versus' thing. Don’t you see how it all links back to one another—that those bleeding codgers in parliament are only putting a bandage over a bullet wound? They’re going to drive our generation into the ground!”

“Sunt lacrimae rerum, Audrey.”

“You don’t actually sound any smarter when you speak in Latin, dickhead.”

Another voice called out, “Audrey, come sit down, love.”

“He’s impossible! I swear there’s just sawdust where a brain should be.”

There was more laughter, and Remus had just steeled himself to walk in when a hand came down on his shoulder, making him jump.

“Two for two, today,” Simeon smirked. “You’re too jumpy, Remus.”

“Maybe you should stop sneaking up on me.”

Simeon just grinned and indicated toward the noise and laughter with a jerk of his head. “Come meet the club.”

With no choice but to go where Simeon led him, Remus went with him into the common room. Like Godric’s, the room was decorated with sofas and armchairs as well as tables and benches for studying.

Bookshelves and paintings were decorated every wall and surface, though it became obvious right away that where Godric House favoured a baroque-style and impressionism, Byron coveted surrealism. Melted faces and various depictions of juxtaposed realities stared back at him from every wall; and they weren't the only ones.

A group of five kids, two boys and three girls, watched him from the centre of the room where they had pushed the sofas together into one big circle. Each of the kids were in weekend dress, which at Hawkings usually consisted of a variation of their uniform paired with clothes they might wear at home; though they had slightly more jewelry and makeup than Remus was used to seeing, even after hanging around Mary for two terms. The windows were open to the night behind them, but Remus could still smell the hash and the coffee table was decorated with rows of bottles, cans, and ashtrays. He didn't recognise any of them from the Easter service either.

Still with an arm around Remus' shoulders, Simeon pulled him right up to the back of the sofas and held him there while everyone turned around to get a look as though he were a monkey in a zoo.

"Remus, that's Cass, Audrey, Alice, Deacon and Renata. Lads, ladies, communists, this is Remus."

"Remus who?" Audrey asked snappily. She had short, spiky blonde hair and wore so much eyeliner that she reminded him of an angry raccoon or one of the punks you could find around hanging around Denmark Street and music venues like the 100 Club.

Simeon leaned into Remus' ear. "Hey, what's your full name again?"

"It's Lupin."

"Remus Lupin!" He exclaimed. "Now everyone be good and say hello."

All of them spoke in unison;

"Hello, Remus Lupin."

Simeon nodded his head, clearly pleased, and turned him toward one of the empty sofas, which they had to climb over to enter the circle. Remus dropped his bass behind the couch, but couldn't help but notice the acoustic guitar in the lap of the boy to his left. He was big, with shoulders even James would kill for and enough freckles to rival Lily.

The guitar boy gave Remus a friendly smile and leaned over to offer his hand. “Welcome to the club, mate. I’m Cass.”

Remus shook his hand firmly, the way Giles had taught him. “Remus.”

“Anyone got his registration papers?” Cass called, sitting back.

Remus looked around. “You’re an actual club?”

“Oh yeah, they call us, 'Les Provacateurs'.”

“We’re not a club,” Simeon said from beside Remus, reaching to the hi-fi on the table beside his end of the couch and messing with the dials, “Cass’s just being a nob. We’re actually just a few numpties who always seem to find themselves in the same place at the same time. It’s completely casual.”

A pretty hispanic girl Simeon had called Renata sat up straighter across from them, grinding a cigarette stub out in the ashtray in front of her. “It’s not hard with a ringleader like Sim,” she said. Deacon, who must’ve been her boyfriend, looped an arm around her shoulders and passed her another cigarette as she slumped back into him.

Simeon grinned in a way that said he liked being known as the leader but had to deny it to save face. “That’s tosh, I’m no club boss. Although if we were a club I knew who I’d be nominating for president.”

“Who?”

“Alice, of course.”

There were a few chuckles, but they were quickly followed by nods as everyone agreed. Remus followed Simeon’s gaze to the girl sitting next to the blonde punk. She had a black bob haircut that looked much too dark on her pale skin and the oversized leather jacket she was wearing looked just as juxtaposed with her modest corduroy skirt and school shoes as the paintings on the wall.

“About time we had a woman in office anyway,” she said, leaning into Audrey, who began to stroke her hair.

“Careful what you wish for,” Cass said, fiddling with the tuning keys on his guitar, “or the next womanly world leader might really put us through the ringer.”

“And what could she possibly do in comparison,” Audrey said, “take away your cookies and milk at nap time?”

“Who needs milk when you have cheap beer?” Cass leaned forward and snatched a can up off the table, tossing it across the circle for her to catch. She did so, and flipped him off for good measure before cracking the tab.

“Want one?” Cass asked Remus, offering another can.

“Yeah, thanks,” he said.

“There,” Simeon mumbled, as he got the hi-fi to start playing a Cat Stevens album. “That’s enough Dr. Hook, I think.”

“Piss off, I liked that album,” Audrey said.

Simeon leaned in to Remus. “Don't mind Audrey. She's is our resident eristic instigator.”

"I've gathered that," Remus answered, and Simeon gave him a wink that made his stomach flip.

“What year are you, Remus?” Renata asked, blowing smoke.

“Eleven.”

“You didn’t want to go home for the holidays?”

“Uh, no.”

“That's too bad, I bet your family misses you.”

“Leave the kid alone, Renata, we’re not here to sob over a home-life,” Simeon said, then to Remus again; “ignore her, she gets sappy around the holidays.”

“What are you here for then?” He asked. “Just to study?”

Simeon glanced upwards in consideration. “That, and to forget our troubles. They won’t tell you until it’s too late, but eventually those high-up toffs are going to start asking you what it is you actually want to do with your life. Where you want to go to school next, what sort of mind-numbing career you’re going to have—what sort of ‘difference’ you’re gonna make. It’s exhausting, really.”

“Ignore him, Remus,” Renata said, “he gets bitter around the holidays.”

Simeon smirked and picked up a beer of his own, cracking it and lifting it to Renata. She returned the toast with a glass of her own.

“You sure he’s old enough to drink that, Sim?” Audrey asked, gesturing to the beer in Remus’ hand. Remus met her eyes.

“You sure you’re old enough to have a haircut like that?”

There were a few snorts of laughter and Deacon tipped his head toward Remus; “He’s right, Auds. You look like a punkified version of my grandmother.”

“Oh shut up, Deaky.”

“Deaky—like John Deacon of Queen?” Remus asked.

“Nah,” Cass said, “Deaky’s been Deaky since year—what, four?”

“Three,” Alice corrected.

“So you’ve all known each other for that long then?”

“Almost,” Simeon said, “you get more new kids in primary than secondary.” Simeon looked back to his friends. “This is Remus’ first year at Hawkings.”

“Oh, you poor thing,” Renata sighed, "you must miss your friends back home then. I know I did.”

“Oh—yeah, I do…” Remus licked his lips, staring down at his beer.

"Where are you from?" Asked Deacon.

"London."

"Us too—'cept for Cass and Alice."

"I'm from Dover," Cass said. "Alice's from Sheffield."

"Do you like Hawkings, Remus?" Alice asked.

Unnerved by the amount of questions, Remus looked to Simeon, but he just shrugged and sipped his beer.

"Yeah, it's cool," he said eventually. "Better than other schools I've been to anyway."

"With your other friends? Must've sucked to leave them," said Renata.

"Er—yeah, sure, but I never actually went to school with them."

Deacon jutted out his chin. "Where'd you meet 'em then? A party?"

"Something like that."

"Sorry," Renata amended, smacking her boyfriend's thigh and smiling guiltily, "we don't mean to pry."

"No, it's fine," Remus answered. He was suddenly caught by the realisation that not only did he miss his friends, but up until that moment, no one had ever so much as asked him. It made sense that the Tomny or Lee or the others didn't ask much about school, they knew he didn't want to go and understood that if he wanted to share he would; but Sirius, James, Lily, and the rest… what did they know about him, really? They'd never bothered to ask about things beyond family and status. They knew about the cigarettes but had never asked where he'd picked up the habit. Were they just assuming things in their heads, the same way Lily had when she'd seen his clothes that very first day?

Flexing his jaw, Remus forced himself to sip his beer. When he looked up again they were all staring at him, as though they were waiting for some big speech.

"You guys like music?" He asked, and the tension deflated out of them.

"That's right," Simeon said easily, turning off the hi-fi, "Remus promised to sing for us."

"I did not!"

Simeon ignored him. "I said I'd teach him how to roll his own baccy if he played us a song."

"You just like watching people squirm, Sim," Cass said, tapping his fingers along the edge of his guitar. Remus looked at it nervously—he hadn't expected any of Simeon's friends to know how to play too.

Catching his gaze, Simeon knocked Remus' elbow. "Cass only carries the guitar around to look cool. He's actually shit."

“I’m still just learning, you nob. Never too late to pick up a new hobby.”

“You’ve been ‘just learning’ for two years now.”

“And you’ve just been an arse. Which of us do you think’s accomplished more in that time?”

“Remus, what do you like to play?” Alice asked with a smile, showing off a single dimple on her right cheek.

“I actually only know a few songs,” Remus said sheepishly, “The Beatles, mostly.”

“That’s great!” Renata said. “I love The Beatles. And I'm sure we’d love to hear you play.”

“But if it’s terrible then you get dunked in the lake.”

“Audrey’s just kidding.”

“No, I’m not.”

“Go on, Remus,” Deacon said, “save us from Simeon’s questionable taste in music.”

“Up yours, Deaky.”

“You can do it, Remus,” Alice said kindly.

Already regretting coming (he should’ve just stayed in his dorm and finished the last essay he’d been putting off) Remus sighed and stood up, reaching behind the sofa for his case. Drawing back with it, Simeon helped him clear some of the beer cans and ashtrays off the coffee table to set it down. When he’d opened the case and picked up the Fender, all eyes were on him, small smiles on everyone's faces.

“Holy shit, that’s nice,” Cass said, staring at the instrument with an intense interest.

“It’s not mine,” Remus confessed, “I take music with Buchanan.”

“And this is what the old bird’s been hiding? Damn. Thought it was all oboes and brass.”

Simeon had a cheeky look on his face. “Regretting taking Latin over music now, Cass?”

Cass gave a cheeky gesture and sat back on the couch. “Go on then kid. Let’s hear it.”

“It’s not going to sound like a guitar,” Remus said, “it’s just a bass.”

“Oh no,” Cass said quickly, “can’t ever be ‘just a bass’. A good bass line holds the entire band together. Without it the drums and guitar are going to sound disjointed. It smooths everything over to make that perfect harmony that’ll resonate down to your very core. Can’t have a band without a bass. You just have to think of it as—”

“Stop flapping your gob and let the kid play, won’t you?” Simeon snapped.

As Cass flashed another fowl gesture at his friend, Remus turned the Fender over in his lap and tested the keys to make sure everything was in tune. “Come Together” was easiest to play without looking at the sheet music, so he started with that. Nervous, it only took a few chords for him to trip over his fingers and mess up the timing of the intro, and he had to stop and take a breath.

“Don’t worry,” Alice said, comfortingly, “you’re doing great.”

So, Remus tried again. And this time he got through it—or at least the bits he remembered. There were a few stumbles but for the most part it sounded okay, and once he’d finished Remus finally looked up from the strings to find everyone smiling at him.

“That was so good!” Renata gushed loudly, and everyone else agreed with a nod.

“Hey, Remus,” Cass said, “can you play that again?”

“You wanna hear it again?”

“Yeah, just wanna try something.” Cass picked up his acoustic guitar and set it on his lap before looking back to him. “You go ahead, I’ll join in with the parts I know.”

Remus swallowed and found the right finger positions before starting again. This time he had an accompaniment, and despite Simeon’s earlier teasing, Cass picked it up quite quickly. By the time they made it to the second verse they were at least in time with one another.

Glancing around with a suspicious smile, Simeon began tapping his hand on the arm of the couch to keep time, and a few moments later, opened his mouth to sing along.

"He wear no shoe shine—
He got toe jam football—
He got monkey finger—
He shoot Coca-Cola—
He say I know you, you know me,
One thing I can tell you is you got to be free—
Come together, right now, over me…"

There was snorting from Aubrey, and Alice swatted her in the arm hard enough that she hissed, but Simeon didn't seem to mind, he just kept singing. Remus glanced at him shyly, before looking back to his fingers so he wouldn't mess up. By the time they had made it to the bridge Renata had joined in, a much better singer than Simeon, and after her Alice and Deacon added their voices to the song. Simeon kept going, egged on by his friends now, and Remus felt the same sort of thrill he got when he was hanging around Tomny or sneaking out after hours with his roommates.

"He roller coaster—
He got early warning—
He got muddy water—
He one mojo filter—
He say, 'one and one and one is three',
Got to be good looking 'cause he's so hard to see—
COME TOGETHER! RIGHT NOW! OVER ME!"

Remus couldn't help it. He laughed and sang too. They kept singing the same verses over again, just going until they ran out of words and finally their last 'come together' filtered out with Remus' bass and Cass' guitar. Shaking out his fingers, still stiff from nerves, Remus rubbed his wrists and took a deep swig from his beer.

"You're pretty good," Cass offered.

"You too."

"Told you, Sim, you bastard. Know any other songs, Remus?"

"A couple, but I need the sheet music for them."

"Did you bring it?"

"Mhm."

“Then break it out, kid.”

Remus stood up quicker than he meant to and nearly jabbed Simeon in the ribs with the Fender’s neck. They ended up making a make-shift music stand out of the beer boxes and he played each song in his very short repertoire at least twice through. His final song went over the roughest, obviously, but by then he’d already finished off his third beer and cared a lot less.

Cass was the one supplying the weed that evening, evidently, and after finishing his second play-through of “She Loves You” (Renata loved that one, of course) Remus broke out the spliffs that he’d brought.

“You rolled these yourself?” Deacon asked, inspecting one before lighting it.

“No, I’ve got a friend back home who’s an expert at rolling.”

“Useful friend.”

“Yeah,” Remus said, before smiling to himself. “His name’s Seesaw.”

“Seesaw?” Aubrey and Alice echoed together.

“Yeah, he got the nickname after getting punched in a fight and losing the sight in his left eye.”

“That’s funny,” Cass said, “the nickname, I mean—not him losing the ability to see.”

It was funny, Remus thought to himself. And he’d never even told his roommates.

Simeon looked up from the table behind their circle of couches. They’d set up a small bar table there and he was currently mixing several drinks at once. “Hey Alice," he called in a sly voice, "you didn’t happen to invite Lucy, did you?”

Alice smirked and stuck her hand in the inner pocket of her beat-up jacket.

“Lucy another friend?” Remus asked, earning him a chuckle or a snort from every one of the older kids.

“No, he means dots,” Cass said.

Remus just stared, still as just as confused.

“It’s acid,” Simeon said, standing behind Remus’ spot on the couch and passing him a drink. He didn’t know what was in it, but it smelled like Palmolive and disinfectant.

“You ever done it?” Alice asked, pulling out a small tin case out of her pocket.

Remus sipped his drink and resisted a grimace—vodka, but also tequila and what tasted like pineapple juice. A true sinner's mix. “I think so,” he answered. “Last summer, maybe. But my friends called it something else.”

“LSD?” Cass tried. “Mellow yellow? Window pane? Trips?”

“Maybe?”

“Oh, well, you wanna try it?”

Remus considered. He still had the whole weekend left before anyone else would be back at school, and he had nothing better to do; his dorm was empty except for a few more sixth formers, and none of them seemed interested in anything but studying. If he couldn’t go home, he could at least pretend like he was.

“Yeah, sure, why not.”

Jumping up from her spot on the couch, Alice came around the coffee table toward him, popping open the tin and pulling out a small square of paper half the size of Remus’ pinky nail. He stared at it, leaning away at first. “What’s that?”

“It’s the acid.”

“But it’s paper.”

“Paper dissolves faster than a pill. Here, stick out your tongue.”

Remus did as he was told, though still sceptical, and Alice dropped the colourful square into his mouth. It had a very slight metallic taste but dissolved in seconds just as she’d said. “How long ‘til I’m supposed to feel something?”

“Twenty minutes? Ten if you’re lucky.”

“That fast?” Remus licked his lips nervously. “Where’d you even get it?”

“From Xeno,” Alice said, moving on to Deacon. “He’s got the best hook-ups if you can convince him you're cool.”

“If you need anything,” Simeon said, swinging himself over the couch with a overflowing glass of gin, “Xeno in Dalal House can get it.”

“Anything?”

“Mhm. Looks like you got lucky too. He’s only a twelfth year, which means he’ll be around next year if you or the lads ever need a little pick-me-up.”

“Only if he doesn’t get kicked out for selling drugs to children first,” Audrey said.

“He’s made it this far, Auds, you gonna nark on him now?”

“Oh fuck off.”

In the end they all took it. Across the room Renata was straddling her boyfriend and whispering in his ear and Alice had laid her head down in Audrey’s lap with her legs draped over the sofa arm, letting the other girl stroke her fingers through her hair as though she were petting a cat. Cass had plucked a book off of one of the shelves—a dusty, leather-bound thing barely holding together—and appeared to be trying to read while balancing on the back of one of the sofas. No one bothered to tell him that the book was upside down though.

While he was waiting around for the drug to kick in, Remus turned back to his bass, fiddling with the strings. First it was just mindless strumming, but then Sirius’ melody floated into his head. He kept it going with the mismatched bridge he’d added, as Simeon leaned in next to him, eyes downcast, a quiet smile playing on his lips.

“That’s quite good. What’s the song?”

“Oh, no song—Sirius wrote it,” Remus said. “Or at least, he wrote the first bit.”

“Clever one, that Sirius.”

“Yeah… Kind of a git though.”

“Eh, he might grow out of it yet. You never know.”

“You really believe that?”

“Not a chance.”

Simeon winked. It’d taken some time, but Remus now knew why Sirius always went from being his usual chatterbox-self to a full surround-sound system whenever Simeon came around. He was impressive—in that sort of devil-may-care way Sirius desperately tried to portray. Simeon had never seemed to mind the attention before, but then again, Remus hadn’t been paying as much attention before.

“He admires you,” Remus said, conveniently forgetting that the admiration was probably meant to be a casual secret.

“I know,” Simeon replied smugly. “He’s hard not to notice.”

Real hard. “He wants to play music one day—rock and roll.”

“Bet he could, too. He’s good.”

“You’ve heard him play?”

“Whole school’s heard him. He used to play piano during Communion. Stopped, maybe, last year, though?”

Remus nodded. “Says he prefers the guitar now.”

“He good with that too?”

“Oh yeah, the great arse.”

Simeon chuckled and closed his eyes. Remus could already feel himself slowing. His fingers tingled and he had to put the Fender back into its case when he realised that he’d lost feeling in them all together. He picked up his empty beer can, just to hold to make sure he didn’t lose his hands or something.

“He writes songs too,” Remus said, bragging openly now.

“I hope they’re awful,” Simeon said playfully. “Otherwise he’d have everything. Good looks weren’t enough for the little bleeder—'course he’s got to be Shakespeare too.”

“I dunno if he’s Shakespeare,” Remus snorted. His legs felt like he were floating in a pool. "Oi, is this supposed to feel like—" Remus turned to his left to find Simeon only a few centimeters away, only this time he didn't jump.

"Remus," Simeon started, blinking at him in slow-motion, "are you, you know?"

"Huh?"

" 'Cause I was wondering..."

"About Shakespeare...?"

"About you. And Sirius."

You and Sirius. The phrase made Remus giddy for some odd reason. His pleasure must've shown on his face because Simeon just smiled, shaking his head like he'd just lost a round of cards. "So you like him."

"Like who?" Remus asked dumbly.

"Sirius."

"Ha, 'course I like Sirius. Everyone likes Sirius."

"So we're off the table then?"

"What do you mean?" He was practically slurring now. Simeon just smirked and lifted a hand to Remus' face, stroking his cheek with his thumb. For some reason his touch felt like velcro scraping across his skin and he shivered, making Simeon chuckle and pull away.

"Nah, s'fine, didn't figure you were anyway. AC/DC maybe, but nah."

"There's this new Australian band called AC/DC. I don't care for 'em much."

Simeon waved him off. "His songs—are they any good? What does your Sirius write about?"

My Sirius? Oh bloody hell. “Well, I haven’t heard any of them actually. Just these bits on the guitar.”

“Wish I had something like that.”

“A guitar?” Remus had to stare hard at the common room rug to keep it from moving on its own. A moment later and the pattern had become hundreds of little butterflies; the kinds with eyes on their wings. They all blinked at him. Remus blinked back.

“A dream,” Simeon whined. “Listen to this—I’m going to finish school and take over dad's press… probably marry some pretty girl, make an honest wife of her. Then she'll pop out a few kids and stay home while I work the nine to five grind, and at the end of the day I'll come home to a reasonable dinner made by that pretty wife. We'll talk about our day, ignoring our growing waistlines and the fact that we've both been cheating with the postman. Sounds like the life, to be honest… but what else? I'll be bald by the time I'm thirty—Dad was. There should be something else to look forward to, don't you think, Remus?"

"My dad's not bald," Remus said. Then he laughed, because it was so stupid, and only he knew why. "Or maybe he is?"

Simeon reached across the couch and pat him on the shoulder. "Don't worry, lad, you're just in it now. Enjoy the ride. You'll still have a full head of hair in the morning s'long as you stay away from Audrey, okay?"

"I heard that," someone called, but their voice was distorted and Remus was too busy trying to figure out what the colour of the couch tasted like. Apricot and mushroom? Sirius would know.

"God I love drugs," someone sighed dreamily, and one by one they all began to laugh as the common room's paintings, which had already appeared melted before, began dripping down the walls and liquifying on the floor. The music had stopped playing, which Remus thought was a terrible shame, so he began to hum a tune instead. He didn't have a pen or paper on hand to write down the words, but he figured he could just remember them.

Hey diddle diddle,
You've left me a riddle,
And I can't get it out of my head;
Sirius Black's a little shit,
With a horribly quick wit,
So why do I feel such dread?

It shouldn't feel scary,
Just feelings we'll bury,
It's not like we're sharing a bed;
Can't be this smitten,
Plenty of birds left in Britain,
We probably just been mislead;

Pretend that we're blind,

There’s no way he’s inclined,
And his lips aren't even that red;
So stop with the questions,
And act with discretion,
Or surely we’ll all just drop dead.

"Simeon..." Remus whispered, two minutes or two hours later, "I wrote a song."

"That's great," Simeon murmured back, "sing it for me tomorrow."

"Okay, promise."

Chapter End Notes

"Sunt lacrimae rerum" is a Latin phrase meaning "tears of things". In this context it means more along the lines of, “life is tragic”.
Denmark Street is a street in London's West End known for being associated with music. In the 60's and 70's recording studios began popping up along the street and bands/artists such as The Kinks, The Sex Pistols, David Bowie and Elton John recorded music there.
The 100 Club is a music venue/club which has been hosting live music since 1942. It was very popular amongst the early punk scene and played host to dozens of bands.
I threw in a reference to “Margaret Thatcher the Milk Snatcher" just for fun.
Also, the term "AC/DC" is a reference to bisexuality.

Chapter 25: The Corners and Cracks

Chapter Summary

> May 1976: The FA Cup finals. Exams are looming. Remus and Sirius have a chat.

Chapter Notes

> CW: Drug mentions. The 'f' slur in a smoking context. References to implied child abuse.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Got a feeling inside (can't explain),
It's a certain kind (can't explain);
I feel hot and cold (can't explain),
Yeah, down in my soul, yeah (can't explain)...

- "I Can't Explain" The Who, 1965

It had taken all of a week for the other boys to root out how Remus had spent his Easter holidays, and that was after he had been stopped twice by his new acquaintances; once in the dining hall by Renata and again when Audrey and Alice called him over while they were making their way to the gym.

"What did Renata want?" Peter asked the first time.

Remus shrugged as he shovelled eggs into his mouth. "Nothin'."

Sirius glanced up over Remus' shoulder to get a look. "Who's Renata?"

"She's one of Sim's friends," Peter said.

They all glanced at Remus expectantly, but he ignored them, keeping his head down over his breakfast and the book in his lap. It got harder later to convince them that nothing had happened once they'd seen Alice give him a baggy of loose tobacco, and so after much pestering from Sirius, Remus finally fessed up.

"I can't believe it," Sirius exclaimed in a hushed voice, "you did acid without us?"

“You guys weren’t exactly right around the corner.”

“James, he’s not even repentant!”

“Let Remus take his psychedelics in peace, Sirius.”

“Yes,” Remus said, “let him.”

“Shut-up Lupin, you traitor. It’s like the cigarettes all over again—you just keep holding out on us. Got any other big secrets you’d like to share? Perhaps you’re growing hash in the year thirteen gardens too?”

“God, you’re such a drama queen.”

“And you’re a seditious Judas.”

“Do you always have to put on a show?”

“ ‘All the world’s a stage’, so might as well make it your bitch.”

“We’re in church,” James pointed out in a whisper.

Lily leaned across Remus’ lap. “Oh, you only just now noticed?”

Sirius leaned across too, nearly touching his nose to hers. “It’s rude to interrupt a conversation, Evans.”

“Personal space, please!” Remus hissed, pinching Sirius’ nose and making him sit up and fall back into James. A moment later Marlene looked over to give them a piercing glare and everyone was silent after that.

Rolling tobacco had at least been a hit for Sirius. According to him it was a much more useful life-skill than anything they were studying for exams, but Remus couldn’t help but pick up on the other boy’s slight jealousy when he learned that Simeon had been the one to teach him. Still, most of the memories of his time spent with the Byron House gang were spotty at best, but that was largely thanks to their friend 'Lucy', who'd turned up at more than one party, though Remus never admitted to anything other than the first time.

“You have to tuck the edge in and then lick it,” Remus instructed, showing Sirius his half-rolled spliff. “It should look like a little canoe, but don’t make it too thin at the end.”

They’d set up shop outside the Galilei Block, tucked in between the exterior wall of Sirius’ chemistry lab and an outbuilding that was used for storage and had since moved on from tobacco to hash. Despite Remus' attempts at instruction, Sirius had come away more than once with what looked like pulverized oregano on the tip of his tongue.

"Buggar," Sirius said, spitting. "Can't get the hang of it. Why can't I get the hang of it?"

"Can't be perfect at everything, Black."

"Hmph. Whatever, you finish them then."

Sirius leaned back against the brick wall and kicked one foot up over a knee, looking up at the blue sky above them. The hiding spot had been one of his favourites since Remus had found it back in January and marked it down on his campus map, which had steadily grown into more of a scribbled mess than anything else but still managed to hold every secret he had discovered about the school so far. The map itself was still a secret for the most part. Eventually Sirius would root it out (he had a bloodhound's nose for other people's business) but for now Remus was content to share only little bits of himself at a time. That way it stung less when things eventually came back to bite him on the arse.

While Remus worked, Sirius reached for his guitar. They'd both brought their instruments along without so much as discussing it, as though they were in silent agreement that they'd both missed their joint practices. Before Easter Remus had been too nervous to touch the bass much outside of music class, and even then he'd only tip-toed around the songs Sirius had been helping him with. Playing only what Buchanan had assigned—mostly exercises and symphonies written by long-dead Jerrys—was easy, and it didn't matter if he sounded uncool while doing it, the songs themselves were already uncool.

It had been fun—eventually—to play for Simeon's friends, and Remus had willingly hung out with the group for the remainder of his exile until everyone had returned from holiday; but playing in front of Sirius felt, well, more serious. With the others it was just about passing the time, filling the silence so they could ignore responsibilities like exams and a looming year's end. Remus had the best of both worlds as an eleventh year, with fewer exams to worry about and only the end of term to look forward to. Every time he'd imagined himself playing for Sirius rather than Simeon he'd get an uncomfortable feeling in the pit of his stomach and he couldn't tell if it was excitement or dread, so he'd stopped imagining all together and let Alice feed him drugs until the week was over. Afterwards he was content with pretending that the intimate parties existed in a realm separate from the reality he actually lived in, and he didn't seek the older kids out again. He would've been lying though if he'd said it didn't feel nice to be recognised by those who didn't just know him from lessons or because they lived together. He nodded to Simeon and Deacon from across the berms the same way he might if he were passing one of Tomny's acquaintances in the street and let Renata pinch his cheek when she said hi to him in the hall. Sirius took notice, of course, and always asked questions, but Remus had spent half the time with them high out of his gourd anyway and could only give little details.

"I bet if you took apart the rest of your fags you could cut them into the tobacco," Sirius mused, his fingers dancing across the strings of the Rickenbacker until he hit a bad note and winced. "Need to change the strings."

"They won't burn as well," Remus said, licking the spliff to seal it off. "I'm not that good at rolling yet."

"You will be."

Remus set the finished spliff down and sheepishly reached for his case, drawing the bass closer to himself. "I can play all of 'Sweet Emotion' now."

Perking up, Sirius paused his strumming. "Oh yeah?"

Remus answered by pulling out the Fender. Straightening up, he set it across his lap and fiddled with the keys before plucking the strings a bit to warm up his fingers. When he started to play the beginning of the song came out distinctly disjointed and unintentionally staccato, but by the middle he'd relaxed enough to put some sense of rhythm into it. Still unable to play without keeping his eyes on the strings, Remus had to wait until he'd finished the song before he looked up to gauge Sirius' reaction. When he did, he found that his perfect eyebrows had crawled up onto his forehead in surprise.

"You did that in a week?"

" 'Course not, we've been working on it since October."

"You didn't sound like that in October!" Sirius declared. "What'd you do—eat the sheet music?"

"No, you idiot. I just had a lot of time to practice without you, James, and Pete buzzing around."

"Well damn. Maybe there's hope for our band after all."

"Not unless you started teaching Peter the drums yesterday."

"Ha!" Sirius exclaimed. "I knew you were invested in the idea. You can just pick up Pete's slack with your incredible bass lines."

Remus dipped his head down, cheeks warm. "I only know a few songs, and none of them are 'Stairway to Heaven', so calm down."

Sirius cracked an easy smile, the one that turned his eyes soft at the corners. "You're allowed to show-off sometimes, you know. Be proud and all that. You sounded great."

"Why would I have to do that when you show-off enough for the both of us?"

"What else is a frontman good for? Besides just looking good, I mean."

"You have more confidence than Jagger, Black."

"Oh, just you wait—in a few years Jagger's going to wish he looked as good as me."

A smile overtook Remus' face and Sirius returned it, nudging him with his shoe. "Go on then, play the others I taught you."

* * *

Saturday 1st May 1976

Hearing that Southampton had won the 1976 FA Cup was apparently less eventful for Remus than James had expected. The championship game was held on a Saturday, and dozens of boys had spent the entire morning and afternoon huddled around the tiny television in the Godric common room like the good Brits they were. Lads like James were starved while away at school, as it was rare for anything less than a championship game to be shown on TV.

In a chance bit of mercy, Remus had been serving detention with Professor Loughty, their biology teacher, after kicking Snape's stool out from under him for making fun of Lottie when she'd cried in class. Lottie—who was overly fond of animals and swore all the time that she'd have been vegetarian if not for her mother's chicken cacciatore —had been crying over the sheep lungs they were dissecting, which had come from the school's own farm. Unfortunately, Snape had been carrying a tray with his and Lily's lung on it when he'd gone to sit down on empty air. The result was a very gory spill that left the already greasy boy spattered in sheep's blood. The rest of the class had killed themselves laughing of course, but Professor Loughty had been less forgiving and gave Remus two day's detention scrubbing test tubes and beakers. At least Lottie had been thankful.

Afterwards, Remus met his friends on the lawn outside Godric House where they were all taking in the last bit of afternoon sun. James and Sirius were a ways away when he approached, kicking a football back and forth between them. Most people had trouble keeping up with the football captain even on one of his off-days, but Sirius could hold his own so well that James was always going on about how he could've been a star player if he wasn't so perpetually lazy when it came to anything that didn't involve music. Closer, both Lottie and Mary were suntanning on towels they'd laid over the grass, dressed in shorts and bikini tops, while Lily and Marlene helped Peter limp along with his math homework.

"Remus," Lily called out, noticing him first as he crossed the lawn, "you done being Professor Loughty's slave then?"

"No, got another day of it tomorrow, but I think my fingers are going to be shrivelled forever—look." Remus dropped down beside her on Marlene's picnic blanket and shoved his hands in her face, making Lily squirm a little and bat him away.

"You smell like apples," Peter observed. He was lying on his stomach between the two girls, his and Lily's notes splayed out around him.

"It's the dish soap," Remus sighed. The sun was beating down on their heads and there was little breeze to be found, leaving him hot under his button-up and slacks. He'd been tempted a few times since the weather had brightened to break out his summer uniform, but the bottoms were just a pair of grey shorts and Remus couldn't help but imagine how silly they'd look on his skinny legs.

"Better than smelling like raw lamb-chop," Lottie said from a few yards away. Beside her, Mary snorted, then smacked Lottie's thigh.

"Don't make me laugh, I'll get lines on my face."

Lily scoffed; "That's definitely not how that works."

“Don’t be so haughty, Lils. You’d join us if you weren’t so afraid of more freckles.”

“Oh shut it, you.”

"Can you even tan, Mary?" Peter asked, eyeing Mary's rich, brown skin.

"I'm only half African," she pointed out. "And it's been ages since it's been this nice out, so let me fry in peace."

Peter put his hands up, returning to his homework.

“Remus,” Marlene started. He turned to her as she snapped her textbook closed, and found her face lit up with a smile; “did you hear the good news?”

He shook his head, and she began to practically vibrate with excitement.

“Southampton won the Cup!”

“O-Oh?”

“Yes! They beat out Manchester zero to one! A total underdog win!”

Remus glanced at Lily, who had an indifferent expression, and gave a tight smile. “That’s great, Marls. Cheers.”

Marlene’s beaming smile faltered a bit and she tilted her head in question. “Is Southampton not your favourite team? James told me yesterday that it was.”

Remus blinked. Oh fuck.

Was Southampton the team he’d told James he supported? That was so long ago—bloody September. He’d just said the first name that came to mind back then—was it Lee or Doss who supported Southampton? He couldn’t even remember that now.

“Oh well, I’ve been kind of out of touch since school started,” Remus lied, awkwardly. “Haven’t been watching much TV and you know—no live games. But hey, that’s great! They sure deserve it!”

Marlene’s smile returned just as Remus was beaned in the back of the head with James’ football.

“You wankers,” he hissed, snatching up the ball and tossing it as far as he could in the opposite direction. Sirius, the one who’d obviously hit him, grinned and chased after it like a dog playing fetch. James watched him go as he approached the group, stopping just next to where Remus was sitting.

“Marlene tell you the good news, Lupin?” He asked, lifting the hem of his shirt to wipe the sweat from his forehead. Remus looked away sharply, and found Lily had done the same. They met eyes, and she pressed her lips together to stifle a smile.

“Uh, yeah, mate,” Remus said, still not looking up, “it’s great news. I’m sorry I missed it.”

“It’s okay. They’re going to be doing a recap and team interviews tonight, so you can catch up then.”

“Oh, brilliant.” Damn it.

“Stokes was a bloody machine,” James continued, dropping down into a squat beside him, “he scored in the 83rd minute!”

Eighty-three bloody minutes? Someone kill me now.

“It was insane! We all thought Manchester was going to take it. Benjy started taking bets halfway on whether Manchester was gonna balls it up in the second half—”

“ 'Cause they started stronger!” Marlene interjected, and James pointed at her excitedly.

“Yeah! But they kept missing their chance. Couldn’t get anything past Turner!”

“I couldn’t believe it when they went into extra time! Their manager McMenemy said they didn't have a cat in hell’s chance!”

“Blimey—I thought it was over when Daly took that final shot! Turner had every chance to let one through but he didn’t! God, Remus, you should’ve seen the stands—there must’ve been a hundred thousand people there!”

“The announcer said ninety-nine thousand! I don’t know where Wembley put them all,” Marlene agreed.

Remus just kept nodding, feeling less of an idiot because he had no idea what they were on about and more because he'd bothered lying in the first place. He should've just taken the hit to his reputation at the beginning of the year—at least then he'd have been saved from James' ranting.

The pair of them went on like that for a while and eventually he was able to pass his hesitation off as negligence. When Sirius got tired of waiting he hit James with the football, which ignited a game of chase and tackle between the two of them. Peter got up to join, but was hauled back by Lily for not completing his homework. As he whinged over arithmetic sequences, Remus shuffled over to Marlene on the blanket, who had busied herself with going through her timetable.

"Southampton's your team then?" He asked quietly.

"Oh yeah. The whole family supports it. Dad grew up in Portsmouth but always supported the team so it's become a little bit of an inside joke."

Remus nodded, then confessed; "I don't favour Southampton."

"Oh? You have a different team then?"

"No. I hate football actually."

Marlene looked up at him and chuckled. "I got that, funnily enough."

"You did? Then why's it taken Potter so long to figure it out?"

"Dunno. But you looked like Lily when she's trying not to tell James and Sirius off for something; wide-eyed with a smile like your face was being pulled too tight."

"And I was so looking forward to a career in the theatre," Remus sighed, making her laugh.

"You're funny, Remus. Sirius said you were always so dour and serious, but he's not right at all."

"When did he say that?" Remus asked, indignantly.

Marlene bit her lip like she realised she'd said something wrong. "Oh a while ago—before Christmas, at least. A lot's changed since then though."

"Git thinks he's got everyone figured out…"

“Well, maybe it’s about time someone returned the favour,” Marlene said, lightheartedly. “Are you going to tell James you hate football?”

“Not sure. At this point it might break his heart. Dunno if you noticed but he’s a bit of a sop.”

“He’s going to make you play one day, you know. He’ll drag you out onto the field by your ear, sop or not. He never says it but I know he gets tired of playing the girls team—he always has to go easy. Not on me of course, but you know how it is.”

“He’ll be really disappointed with me then,” Remus said. “I’m lucky if I can kick the damn thing in a straight line.”

“Well, do you at least want me to summarize the match so you can pretend a little longer?”

He didn’t, but she seemed eager and it was nice to hear Marlene talk so passionately about something other than school, so as his friends sat around in the lazy afternoon sun without so much as a care in the world, Remus let himself be regaled with Southampton’s extraordinary win and for once he was not reminiscing about better days.

* * *

Friday 21s t May 1976 — Two Weeks Later...

“Thank you so much for your help, Remus. I know I’ve kept you from dinner.”

“S'okay. James said he’d grab me a plate for later.”

Mrs. Buchanan glanced up from her podium, where she was shuffling and organising papers. Dropping the last chair on the stack, Remus dusted his hands off on his trousers and went to the top of the room’s stage risers where he’d left his bag, pulling it over one shoulder. He really didn’t mind cleaning up after private study in the music room and Sheila often rewarded him with extra music sheets she’d composed herself from songs she heard on the radio. It was a bit irritating, but Remus had regretfully started calling his teacher by her first name in passing (though never to her face), further evidence of Sirius’ bad influence on his subconscious.

Like most lessons at Hawkings, private study periods were unique and had students constantly revolving rooms to make sure they got the chance to get help from all their professors. Remus always got the most work done when he had study periods with Lily, but Sheila was knowledgeable enough in most things for a music teacher turned choir leader, and Remus found he liked how relaxed he felt in her classes—provided that the noisier instruments were tucked away.

“You’ve really improved in the last few months, Remus,” she said, nodding her head at the bass as Remus crossed the classroom.

“I’ve been practising with Sirius.”

“Ah, so he’s a good teacher?”

Remus shrugged. “When he wants to be.”

Sheila grinned at him. “Have you thought about what elective course you’ll be taking next year?”

Remus reached the bottom of the risers and paused. He hadn’t given any thought to the following school year at all, having spent most of his first year just waiting for the moment that they’d throw him out on his behind; but there he was, nine months later, enjoying private study and aiming to get at least a ‘B’ on his Modern Biology exam. Beating Sirius would be a plus, but he figured he really only had a chance at that in Literacy or History.

Hawkings had worked then, he supposed. The damn school had bored and distracted him into good behaviour, and apart from a few measly detentions his record was clean. Remus hadn’t had such a mellow school year since he was eleven. Giles would be so proud—which for him, was just another synonym for ‘smug’.

Sheila seemed to read his silence as indecision, and began shuffling through her papers again. “I know you weren’t given a choice about taking music this year, but if you have nothing else in mind, I’d love to see you in class again next year, Remus.”

He looked up, a little in awe that a teacher had just said she wanted him in her class. “Will you still be my forms teacher?”

“Possibly. You know what they say about my forms. Maybe you’ll have… ‘graduated out’?”

“Never,” Remus said, shaking his head, “Sirius would say that’s becoming boring.”

Sheila clicked her tongue. “Well, I’d hate to become boring, too.” Coming out from behind her podium she handed Remus a few sheets of music. This time it was Johnny Cash’s “I Walk the Line”.

“See if you can get this one down pat by the end of the year,” she said. “It might be a little repetitive but—”

“ ‘Repetition is just practice’s more relaxed cousin’,” he answered shyly.

“I knew you paid attention during lessons. Now off with you, your dinner’s waiting.”

Waving goodbye, Remus left his teacher behind and made his way out of the Bellchant Music Hall. Students were trickling around, walking to or from the dining hall, some with their noses turned down into exam books, others chattering on with their friends. He made it about fifty feet himself before Sirius appeared, holding a container of Caprese chicken from dinner, which made his stomach rumble immediately. He’d skipped lunch to go to the library with Lily and Marlene.

“How come I’m never around when Buchanan gives you these detentions?” Sirius asked, taking the Fender’s case from him so Remus could eat while they walked.

“I didn’t have detention,” he said, around mouthfuls.

“Then why did she keep you so late?”

“I was helping clean up.”

“Sounds like detention to me.”

Remus ignored him. “Where’s James?”

“Dunno. He ran off after dinner saying he had something to do. Chemistry, maybe? I had the headphones on so I didn’t really hear him.”

“Hm.”

“So why do you stay to clean up all the time?”

“Because I can?” The words came out more forceful than he’d meant for, but Sirius only gave him a measuring side-eye and kept walking. Remus sighed and closed the dinner container.

“Didn’t realise you had the hots for our music teacher,” Sirius said out of the corner of his mouth.

Remus bristled. “You’re gross.”

“No, I get it. I mean, if you’re gonna pick any old mare, Buchanan’s a not bad choice—a solid seven really. Decent body for her age, when she’s not wearing those ridiculous dresses. A little grey at the temples but lots of blokes like that. Oh, you don’t have an Oedipus complex, do you? Because that would be—”

Remus slammed to a stop. “Oh my god, just shut up!”

Sirius turned around to face him, still walking backwards a few paces before stopping. “I’m only kidding.”

“It's not fucking funny.”

“Yeah, it is,” Sirius said, lowly. “It’s fucking hilarious.”

“No. It. Isn’t.”

“What’s got your panties in such a twist?”

“You,” Remus snarled. "Now piss off.”

Shoving the container of half-eaten chicken into Sirius' hands, Remus snatched his instrument back and stormed past him down the cobbled path. There was silence for a moment, and he almost let himself believe that Sirius had actually stayed behind, before the other boy inevitably fell into step with him just as they were rounding the corner onto House Lane.

“Lupin, I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to have a go at you while you were having a rough day.”

“I’m not having a rough day,” Remus said pointedly. "My day was just fine before you showed up.”

“Was it the Oedipus thing? 'Cause I shouldn’t have said that. I know your mum is—”

“It wasn’t about my mum!”

“Then I don’t know what’s got you so worked up!”

“Aren’t you listening?” He demanded. “You! It’s you! You and your bloody mouth!”

"Come on." Sirius rolled his eyes. “Don’t tell me I’m the first person you’ve met who likes to have a laugh every once in a while.”

“No! In fact, you’re not! I know plenty of people who are capable of being funny without ruining a good mood.”

“Is one of them Mary? Because she got her sense of humour from me, you know.”

“You’re such an ass!” Remus wailed. “I meant other people—people outside of this damn school!”

There it was. The thing that Remus had been pushing down deep inside him ever since Easter, when he’d realised just how little he and his supposed friends knew about each other. That was the danger of living a double life he supposed; Tomny knew one half, and Sirius and the rest knew the other. Only, where he understood why Tomny never asked about school or home, it somehow bothered him that none of his roommates had ever been so inclined. They demanded so much of him now, but couldn’t care less about who he’d been before they knew him. Maybe it didn’t matter to them either—but what was their excuse then?

Sirius puckered. “Well, they must be bloody brilliant!”

“They ARE!”

Picking up his pace, Remus trudged on, wanting to make it back to the dorm on his own, but Sirius kept up, always determined to get the last word in.

“I said sorry,” he huffed, “I don’t know what else you want me to do.”

“No, you don’t, because you don’t know anything about me. None of you tossers do.”

Remus could just sense Sirius’ rolling eyes again.

“Fucking hell, what are you on about now?”

“I’m just another yob from London who got dropped into your laps," he snapped. "I don’t know anything about you and you know nothing about me.”

“Hold on.” A hand closed around Remus’ shoulder, making him flinch back violently. Sirius drew back as he whirled around and put his hands up in a surrender. “What are you so mad about, Lupin?”

“I’m not mad, I’m drawing a line in the sand. Should’ve done it ages ago.”

“Yeah alright, but maybe you could point the line out for me because I don’t follow.”

Remus took a deep breath, trying keep calm. “James always talks about his family and I’ve met most of Peter’s, but you—you’re just a bloody mystery. This school’s based on family and heritage and money, and you try and pretend like all of it doesn’t matter. Like your family's shit doesn't matter—like where I come from doesn’t change anything!”

Sirius squinted at him. “I don’t care about your family or where you’re from, Remus.”

“Right. Nice chat then.”

“Lupin,” Sirius groaned, grabbing him as he made to move past. Remus didn’t flinch this time, but Sirius released his grip quickly anyway and looked around. They were alone on the pavement, but it was still daylight, and there were other students mulling about who could’ve easily overheard if they came too close.

“Let’s go over there,” Sirius murmured, putting his free hand into his pocket and heading toward a small garden patch situated between Bronte and Finch House. Reluctantly, Remus followed and watched as Sirius took a seat on an empty bench, swinging his legs under himself. From his sideways view Remus could see the place where Sirius’ childhood face was giving way to a man’s jawline. If his hair got any longer it’d be tickling his shoulders like Jim Morrison’s, and then the girls would really be throwing themselves at him. Pretty bastard.

Remus slumped down on the bench with his bass between his legs, staring at the garden as though its flowers might wilt by the sheer fury of his glare.

“I didn’t mean I don’t care about your life… or family…” Sirius murmured, keeping his gaze forward as well; “I just thought I knew everything I needed to know.”

Remus scoffed. “Like what?”

“Like, I know how you take your morning tea with more sugar than the average person has in an entire day, and how you bob your leg when you’re anxious or just need a fag.”

“Observant aren’t you?” Remus snapped sarcastically, and Sirius gave him a sharp sideways glance.

“I know how you are when you’re angry, how you turn off like a light and won’t talk to anyone. I know you can’t make eye contact when you’re embarrassed. I know you love The Who and Queen but have a stupid aversion to Bowie and The Sweet—”

“Sweet’s fine.”

“Mott the Hoople, then.”

“They haven't been good since their lead singer left anyway.”

“So you're getting my point?" Sirius drawled. "I also know you hate Christmas. I know you like books and will read anything that’s given to you if the person giving it says they enjoyed it. I don’t know why you do that, but you do and you never complain. You don’t like to be touched—yeah, I noticed—but you never say anything when someone does touch you because I think you’re secretly afraid of hurting their feelings.”

Remus clenched his jaw at this, but Sirius still wasn’t finished.

“You ask questions you already know the answer to, just so others can talk. And I know you have trouble sleeping, but I… I also know it’s your business why.”

Somewhere between Bowie and the books, Remus’ glare had lessened. It had been unexpected, to say the least, but he also felt conflicted. These were all things anyone who’d spent the entire year living with someone else might know. He wasn’t sure it was enough.

“And you never wanted to ask why?” Remus asked finally.

“Would you have wanted to tell me?”

“… No.”

“Well.” Sirius looked down at his hands and the dinner box. “I thought it was enough. The music, the cigarettes… I don’t want anyone judging me by my family. I wanted the me now—the music I like—the things I like… I want that to be enough. Guess I just thought you were the same."

"I am the same!" Remus took a breath. "It's just… You're so nosey about other things."

The corners of Sirius' mouth turned up. "Only the fun things."

Remus didn't know what to say to that. He clutched the case between his legs, running his fingers up and down the worn vinyl and feeling for the cracks at its edges.

"Answer a question," he said, "then I won't be mad anymore."

"Knew you were mad. Fine. Ask your question."

"Why'd you play the music so loud? I mean when we first got here. And why did James and Peter have all your stuff?"

"That's two questions."

"Don't be a twat."

Sirius grinned like it was impossible. "Mum doesn't like music much—or she does, but not rock and roll. If she knew I had that stuff—that Andy had given it to me—she'd take it away or smash it right in front of me. I'd rather send it home with the boys and not have it all summer than let her ruin it forever."

While Sirius was talking Remus' fingers had found purchase in a worn section of the case's vinyl, and he had to force himself to not pick at it. "And the volume—the bloody noise?"

There was a long pause from Sirius, and then he whispered; "Silence is loud… It's so fucking loud, Lupin. Only way to get rid of it is to drown it out with something else. Two months of silence and I… I come back and all I want is noise. I know it tortures James and Pete, but they let it go because they're good mates. Unlike me."

Remus thought back to the Lupin estate, where the only sound was barking dogs, and empty quiet. The noisy sounds of the East End had always been more comforting in comparison.

"I understand. Home is… too quiet."

Sirius looked directly at him for the first time since they'd sat down. "So you're not missing it then?"

Remus glanced away, cheeks warm. “No, but it’s complicated. Family isn’t fun—but my friends back in London, they’re good.”

“So you’re missing them then, your mates back home?”

“Yeah, reckon I am. It… I was looking forward to seeing them. Sucks that I couldn’t.” He leaned forward to rest his chin on the tip of the instrument case.

“Why don’t you just ring them?”

“Can’t. Just wouldn’t work.”

“I get that,” Sirius started, with a new energy. “I’ve always missed the lads over holidays... And it doesn’t get any bloody easier.”

“You mean like Miles?”

If he hadn’t looked sideways as he asked the question, Remus might’ve missed the way Sirius deflated again, eyes widened in surprise. It almost made him feel sorry for bringing it up, but he supposed it was only natural after they’d spent the better part of the year avoiding the subject all together. None of them had mentioned the former 4A roommate since he and Sirius had had it out on the church’s balcony staircase before Halloween. It felt like a lifetime ago. He’d have needed ten hands to count all the things that had changed since then; all the things he’d learned about his school friends, and his friends back home.

“I was,” Sirius started, looking down, “but I think it’s gotten better. At the beginning of the year I was still so angry, and I think I took it out on you. Saw you as this sort of invader, maybe. It had always been just the four of us, and then Miles up and leaves and we get someone totally new thrown into the mix. I didn’t want you to ruin what we had going, so I was a total git about it... Sorry.”

Remus lifted his chin from the top of his case and leaned back against the bench, feeling a little squeamish inside. “Don’t worry about it,” he said, clearing his throat a bit, “I was git too. Didn’t want to be here—didn’t want you lot for roommates either.”

“And now?”

“Still debating.”

“Ouch,” Sirius said, making them both laugh. Remus relaxed a bit.

“You never tried to call Miles?”

Sirius shook his head. “Wouldn’t work either.”

“Oh. Too bad.”

“Mhm.” Sirius paused for a bit, tapping his heels on the ground in front of him. “So what’s London like?”

Remus raised an eyebrow. “You’ve never been?”

“No—well, I did this one time in year nine. Instead of going home at Christmas I just got off with James and Pete and followed them. Only lasted until Mum came and got me. She doesn’t like cities—thinks they’re dirty.”

“Well, she’s right about that.”

Sirius chuckled. “My dad’s mistress lives in London, too.”

“Mistress?” Remus’ eyes bulged.

“Yeah. She’s some Dame Lady with a dead husband who was twice her age. I’ve met her, you know, at one of our dinner parties.”

“She’s been to your house?"

“ ‘Course. The circle of money is so small, Lupin. It’s suffocating. And that woman…” Voice trickling off, Remus got the feeling he didn’t mean his father’s mistress. Sirius sucked in a breath to try again; “If I could, I’d…” He trailed off again and bit his lip.

Remus looked down to his hands shyly. The last time he’d seen Sirius this close to crying was after they’d come back from Christmas, and there’d been actual tears then, but he never offered an explanation and Remus had never asked. Maybe they were both just dancing around each other; Remus hadn’t put any effort into understanding Sirius beyond the present either. He’d been too harsh, probably.

When Sirius looked up again he wasn’t crying, but he did sniff a little before he could get his words out.

“I’m going to do it. I’m going to finish school, and then I’ll never have to see any of them again. Reg can be the heir, I never cared anyway.”

“So you’re okay being a penniless bum?” Remus asked, thinking about Tomny and the rest, all bouncing between different flats, most without so much as a bed to call their own.

“I’ve got my inheritance from Uncle Al,” Sirius said with a cheeky smile. “There are some upsides to befriending the Black family black sheep you know. I’ll only be a bum in my parents’ eyes.”

“Almost sounds like a song.”

“A good song,” Sirius agreed, “with a good ending.”

“I’ll show you,” Remus said, twisting his fingers in his lap.

“Hm?”

“I’ll show you London. Not the nice parts, but the nasty bits—the gutters and the scum and the real horrible shit. We can see the dive bars and those shitty stage venues. You can smoke with real people, we’ll find ‘em. They’re there somewhere among smokes and the dinge and the corners and the cracks and…” Remus had to stop to take a breath. “I think you’d like it—that London. No one gives a shit about family there. You get to make your own.”

Sirius gave that easy smile, all eyes. “Sounds nice. We can play our songs on the corner for pennies.”

“And what about James and Pete?”

“They can come too. They’re capable enough. We’ll be a four man band, just get Pete a bucket or something to smack.”

“And James? In the East End? He’d lose his mind.”

“Is that where you’re from? The east side of London?”

Remus reached out to bat Sirius upside the head. He regretted it instantly because his hair was so soft. “You know it’s not, you git. I just—”

“Don’t worry about it,” Sirius dismissed. “We’ve got time. I’ll see it one day and until then, I suppose I should just start dragging the details out of you one at a time. Then at least I’ll be prepared for the nasty bits.”

“You couldn’t drag anything out of me if you tried.”

“I definitely could—I will!”

“That a bet?”

“Absolutely.”

Remus shook his head, smiling apathetically. “And what are the stakes?”

Sirius tipped his head back up at the sky. It was a rusty orange colour now, like a fire.

“Immortality.”

Chapter End Notes

This chapter is both light-hearted and heavy, which embodies the general vibe of this fic. I really enjoyed writing it—it's important to me within this story especially to establish that Sirius and Remus ARE friends. I wish I could jump right into the deep end of their romance, but that's not the story I'm trying to tell <3

But we're also nearing the end of year 11 at school! I cannot wait to give you guys the next few chapters. See you soon~

Slang:
Once again, 'Lucy' is a term for acid and a spliff is a marijuana cigarette.
'Jerrys' are a term for Germans, developed during WWII.
'Staccato' is a musical term meaning each note is preformed sharply and detached from the one before.
The Football Association Challenge Cup, more commonly known as the FA Cup, is an annual knockout football competition in men's domestic English football. It used to be the biggest football competition held within Britain before the establishment of the FA Premier League in the early 90's.
A 'Dame' or 'Lady' (Sirius uses both in casual conversational context) is a courtesy title for the wife of a knight or baronet and/or the daughters of various nobles.

Chapter 26: Ow-Levels

Chapter Summary

> Lily has trouble with Snape, which means Snape has trouble with James, and our boys get a very generous gift as they prepare to leave school for the summer.

Chapter Notes

> CW: Just some good ol' fashioned Snape pounding, lol.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Oh well now the band is rockin' and everybody's feelin' alright,
It's a Wednesday night, there sure is gonna be a fight;
'Cause somebody's gonna get their head kicked in tonite…

- "Somebody's Gonna Get Their Head Kicked in Tonite" Earl Vince and the Valiants (Fleetwood Mac), 1969

Tuesday 1s t June 1976

"I'm never going to understand it! Someone end my suffering, please!"

"Shh! Do you want to be kicked out of the library?"

"Yes!"

Lottie leaned over and pinched her twin's ear lobe, making Peter cry out despite Marlene's warning. "Stop your whinging. It's not that hard, you're just looking for the variable—really, how could we have shared a womb?"

Clapping a hand over his ear, Peter scowled back at his sister. "Says you! You haven't even cracked your copy of 'Lord of the Flies' and you're writing your final essay on it!"

Lottie slapped her pencil down. "Who could possibly find joy in reading about a bunch of filthy boys stranded on an island trying to kill each other? The essay is supposed to be argumentative, so I'm arguing that it was horrible."

Peter gave an exaggerated scowl and turned to Remus. "Remus, could you tell me what you got for question nine?"

"Uh…" Remus began sorting through his notes, but Marlene reached across the table and smacked her hand down on top of them.

"He's never going to learn if you just give him the answers whenever he asks."

Remus cracked a small smile. "But it's so much better than listening to him whine."

Marlene shook her head and drew her hand back, letting him find the right paper and pass it to Peter.

"Cheers, Lupin!"

Marlene snapped her fingers in Peter's direction. "Shh! If I fail my O-Levels because you lot couldn't shut up I'll thrash you all."

It didn't really matter how many times she shushed them, it was busy enough that they weren't going to be breaking any silence. Apparently it was common around end of the year exams for the Hawkings' library to turn into a bit of a zoo. Mrs. Pince, who normally crucified any student who dared to speak above a strict whisper, seemed to give up once the students who'd been neglecting their studies all term piled into her palace of tranquility, desperate for essay help and answers to their fervid questions. Having grown used to accompanying Lily or the other girls, Remus found the library as good a place as any to read and study without interruptions. Since his birthday they were occasionally joined by James or Peter, but rarely Sirius, who had no need for review and instead spent his time grumbling over his essays or else causing havoc somewhere else.

"Hey, Lupin," James said from his left, "do you have the study outline for geography?"

Remus shook his head. "Misplaced mine. I borrowed Lily's yesterday."

James pursed his lips and looked around. "Where is Evans anyway?"

"She was with Snape this morning," Lottie offered from across the table. She'd since given up on her essay and was reapplying her lip gloss in a small compact mirror.

"Why?" James asked, instantly irritated and showing it by tapping his pencil against the table top furiously.

“A chemistry project.”

“Hmph.”

Remus gave James a sideways glance. James Potter may have been the friendliest boy he’d ever met, but even he wasn’t without a temper. After Lily’s birthday party, much of Davey Gudgeon’s wardrobe had mysteriously gone missing, only for several of the statues in the Hawkings rose garden to be found dressed in his uniforms like they were on their way to lessons.

“There’s Lily now,” Lottie said.

A few seconds later, Lily was dropping her bag on the table next to Marlene and sitting down without a word. No one said anything at first, but it was obvious to all of them that Lily had been crying; her eyes were red and puffy and she sniffled slightly when she sat, despite the fact that it was nearly summertime.

As Lily began pulling her things out of her bag, James leaned forward.

“Alright, Evans?”

“Fine,” she said simply, barely glancing at him. “Remus, here’s your corrected practice test.”

She handed it over, then zipped the top of her bag with an air of finality. Again, no one said anything. Lily glanced up.

“What? Why’re you all staring at me?”

“ ‘Cause you look terrible,” Peter said, making Lottie smack him in the arm. “Ow!”

“I’m fine,” Lily said, defensively. “I just want to study.”

They all nodded like scolded school children and after that the group was quiet. Remus could tell by James’ concerned expression that he was itching to ask her what had happened, but he kept quiet, and exam prep continued in stilted silence.

It took a few days, but eventually they all learned the reason behind Lily’s tears after Mary had mentioned off-hand to Sirius that Snape had gone off on Lily for the amount of time she’d been spending with him and the rest of the 4A boys. It was lunch time, and while they’d all agreed to meet in the dining hall to eat together, Lily was nowhere in sight, downgrading their group of eight to a group of seven. Upon hearing the news James was immediately livid, mashing his grilled potatoes with his fork as he seethed next to Sirius.

“Who does that little git think he is? They’re barely friends,” he hissed.

“Do you enjoy kidding yourself?” Mary asked sarcastically. “Snape might be the slimiest Scouser to crawl out of Liverpool—and that’s saying something—but he’s still one of Lily’s oldest friends.”

James huffed, but luckily he had his own best friend on his side.

“Just ‘cause something’s old doesn’t mean it’s of any value,” Sirius said, “otherwise my mum would’ve sold dad off at auction already.”

A few of them laughed or cracked a smile, but James remained in a brooding mood for the rest of the day. That day then turned into a week, then two, and by mid-June Remus had seen so little of Lily that he’d almost convinced himself she’d dropped out of school.

The Hawkings football team ended up travelling to Aberdeen at the end of May for their tournament and came second behind the home team. James blamed himself of course, and Sirius, who’d gone as ‘water-boy’ after spending two weeks kissing up to Ms. Hooch rather than studying, told Remus and Peter that James had spent the entire tournament more distracted than he’d ever seen him. Typically James had a single mind when it came to football, but he’d spent his final weeks of the 1976 season in the poorest form the other boys had ever seen. When Sirius tried asking about it he would dismiss his questions or change the subject. He danced around Lily’s name completely, and every time the pair met in passing James would offer only indifferent small-talk, which Lily returned in kind.

Things seemed as though they were backsliding, and despite the rest of the group’s eagerness to spend time together, Remus saw them begin to splinter as the end of the year loomed and their exam period began. The girls remained loyal to Lily and did their best to defend her friendship with Snape even though it was clear that they were as revolted as the rest of them, a circumstance that neither James nor Sirius could fathom.

Sirius spent enough evenings feeding into James’ anger, both of them taking turns coming up with worse and worse names to call Snape. A few merciless prank ideas also materialised on evenings like these, but they were all so busy there was no time to bring them to fruition. So the boys settled for gossiping, some of which didn't give the girls much benefit of the doubt, despite the fact that Remus was pretty sure they had it worse-off. They had to interact with the greasy git way more often due to Lily's friendship with him; though even a single chance to give Snivellus a piece of his mind might've allowed James to blow off some steam.

As it so happens, he got his opportunity just as their geography exam was ending.

"It's over," Lily sighed happily as she skipped down the front steps of the Great Hall. Remus was fairly sure the exam had gone well for him, and with only History and Maths left his marks were sure to at least be passable considering he was the only one of his friends who didn't attempt an O-Level the year before. Even Mrs. Buchanan's practical exam had gone well, but of course Sirius had been the star of the show, wowing the entire class with a solo rendition of "Misty Mountain Hop" on his Rickenbacker.

It had been almost agonising to give the instruments back at the end of the exam, but Remus had already decided that he'd be taking music again in September, which gave him something to look forward to should he return. Sheila Buchanan was certainly his favourite teacher, and if he had to be stuck at a private school in Northern Scotland he might as well spend a few hours a day in her music room.

"I never want to hear the words 'isthmus' or 'prime meridian' again," Remus said, rubbing his eyes. "How do you think you did, James?"

Walking on his other side, James blinked and pushed his glasses up his nose. Sirius had—naturally—finished before any of them and was probably already back at the dorm.

"Hm?"

"How do you wager you did?"

"Oh…" James forced a smile, "decent I suppose, though for a while there I thought that that expository essay was going to be the death of me."

Remus clapped him on the shoulder. "S'okay, mate. They won't kick you off the team just because you couldn't define continental drift."

"Remus, would you like to play cards after dinner?" Lily asked, turning back to them as they reached the bottom of the stairs. "Lottie said she needs something to do after her math exam gets out. You can come too, Potter."

Remus glanced at James, who nodded slowly, eyebrows raised. "Yeah, sounds great."

Lily gave a small smile and adjusted the bag strap on her shoulder. "Mary wants you guys to teach us poker actually. She said—"

"Lily."

Together they all turned to find Snape standing down the pavement with arms crossed over his chest, his permanent scowl in place.

"Oh hey, Sev. Geography exam just got out," Lily said. Snape didn't take geography, able to get out of it by taking three separate science courses, which made it the only class Remus had with Lily that didn't include her slimy childhood friend. Of course he'd waited for the exam to get out.

Snape glanced at the other kids as they trickled out of the hall, and nodded. "You said we'd study history tonight."

Lily made a face like she'd forgotten and her shoulders drooped a bit. "Oh yeah, I'm sorry, I forgot. Geography really took it out of me today."

"It's important," Snape said, keeping his eyes on her. Lily's frown deepened.

"Lupin," James started, tapping Remus lightly on the chest and turning to face him as though Snape weren't even there, "you take history with Evans, right?"

"Uhm, yeah?"

"When's the exam?"

Remus stared back at James. "Last day of exam period. Friday."

"And what day is it today?"

Lily leaned past Remus to get a look at James. "What are you on about?"

"Oh it's... why it's Wednesday, James," Remus said, the beginnings of a small smile on his face.

“Wednesday,” James repeated, “means the test is what, two days from now? Surely there’s plenty of time to study before then?”

“Wow, in that case I think you might be right.”

“Well then,” James turned to Snape as he put his hands in his pockets, “there shouldn’t be a problem with taking one evening off to relax.”

Snape’s casual scowl turned more sour. “This has nothing to do with you, Potter. Sod off.”

James straightened up to his full-height. “Make me, Snape.”

Lily stepped between them both, sensing the oncoming fight. “Stop that,” she said firmly. “I just forgot. We can play cards another day—after exams end.”

James set his jaw, but looked away and Lily took that as her victory, silently nodding to Remus before she turned away to join Snape. James might’ve let them go too, if Snape had kept his bloody mouth shut.

“I can’t believe you forgot,” he hissed as she approached.

“I didn’t mean to, Sev,” Lily snapped. “Everyone’s busy.”

“They’re turning you stupid.”

“I am not stupid!”

“Then stop acting like it, why don’t you?”

Lily didn’t get a chance to offer a rebuttal before James had Snape eating the lawn off the side of the pavement. He pinned the other boy on his stomach, straddling his back while holding his shoulders.

“Don’t you talk to her like that!” James shouted.

“Get off of me you lunatic!” Snape howled into the dirt.

Remus watched with bulging eyes. He’d seen enough fights while running with Tomny, but it was astounding to see James—who was normally so friendly and patient—grinding another kid’s head into the dirt.

“Potter, stop it!” Lily wailed, rushing forward and grabbing James by his shirt sleeves. He barely noticed, and worked on pinning Snape’s flailing arms so he couldn't get a shot in.

"Apologise to her!"

"Get off me!"

By now other students had started to gather, most just stopping to stare. Around the time that someone shouted the first 'fight!' Remus discovered that he didn't have cement for feet, and dashed forward, grabbing James' other arm.

"James, he's not worth it!"

"Let go, Lupin!" James growled. "He's going to apologise!"

"Fuck you!"

"You arrogant little twat! Apologise now!"

"Let him up, James!" Lily pleaded, her face red with embarrassment.

Remus blew out an exasperated breath. "Just say you're sorry, Snape!"

"Piss off, waster!" Snape hissed into the grass, making James seethe even more. Unwilling to continue defending a shit like Snape, Remus let go of James and grabbed Lily's arm until she too, released his school shirt.

James grunted as he continued wrestling with Snape's squirming body; "You're the—foulest—git—I've ever—EUGH!" Snape brought back his head and smacked into James' chin, making his jaw snap together with a horrible crack. There was a stunned silence among the small crowd as James cupped one hand over his mouth and used his thighs to finally pin Snape's arms. With his other hand, he smushed his head into the grass.

"AH-POL-I-THIZE!"

"PISS OFF!"

"THAT'S ENOUGH!"

Even Moses would've been impressed by the way the group of students parted around Sheila Buchanan, who stormed forward in a daffodil-yellow sheath dress and matching heels. She reached down and grabbed James by the shoulders, hauling him off Snape with a single fierce tug, allowing the grass-stained boy to scramble away and whip around, spitting dirt as he glared murderously at the rest of them.

James, who was still holding his mouth, stepped back beside Remus, his chest rising and falling with each heavy breath. Sheila stood between the two, looking back and forth with her lips pressed together in a deadly-thin line. Even McGonagall would've had the sense to be afraid.

"I won't bother to ask who started it," she snapped, "but you all know that fighting amongst friends is certainly not tolerated at Hawkings School!"

"He's not my friend!" Snape shouted, face still marred with dirt.

"That is enough, Mr. Snape, no more!"

Sheila let out a huff and looked to James, who dropped his hand to stare back defiantly. "I should give you both detention until the end of the year," she started, "but because that wouldn't solve anything and I'm sure exams have you miserable enough, I will let this single infraction slide. Only this one! Do you understand?"

James glanced at Lily, who just looked away sharply, nostrils flaring like she might cry. Finally he nodded, and Remus felt a bit of the tension in his own shoulders deflate.

"And you, Mr. Snape?" Sheila demanded. "Or would you rather a detention?"

"Whatever," Snape scoffed, wiping his face.

Sheila straightened up and stepped off the grass. "Alright, then. Off you go, all of you. And no more fighting!"

As Mrs. Buchanan waved her hands to disperse the other kids, James turned to Lily. He might've apologised immediately if not for his mouth but she never gave him the chance anyway. Without so much as a single word, Lily turned and stormed off in the direction of the library, her red ponytail thrashing behind her with every step. James watched her go, looking sore despite the injury, and from behind them Remus heard Snape let out a sneer. He turned to face the other boy and raised himself up to his full height before stepping toward him very quickly like he might hit him. Snape flinched back with a sudden look of alarm and Remus snorted in bitter satisfaction, before muttering;

“Pathetic wanker.”

Turning away from the miserable git, he took his friend by the shoulder and led him out of the dispersing crowd, back toward their dorm. James did not object.

* * *

“Here.” Remus tossed a freezer-burnt bag of peas across the common room table toward James. He’d found it in the icebox of the Godric kitchenette and suspected it had probably been there since McGonagall was their age. James picked it up and pressed it to his jaw, looking up at the ceiling with a sore expression. It wasn’t his jaw that was injured per-say, but he had bitten his tongue when Snape cracked him in the chin, and now the inside of his mouth was distinctly more red and swollen. Really he was just lucky he didn’t bite it off.

“I can’t believe I missed it,” Sirius moaned, smacking his fist on the table several times. “I can’t believe you actually thrashed Snivellus and I wasn’t even there!”

“He didn’t actually hit him,” Remus answered for James, after he'd shot Sirius a dirty look. “He just… tackled him?”

“Learned that on the field, did you, Potter?” Sirius cackled, elbowing him. “Next year we’re trying full-contact football. We’ll be just like the Americans.”

James dropped one cheek to the top of the table just as Peter returned with four mugs of tea, handing them out with a cheery expression. Having been the subject of more than one verbal slight from Snape, Peter had openly gaped when Remus and James returned to the dorm and Remus had explained what had happened. If James Potter wasn’t already Peter’s number one favourite person in the world (apart from his girlfriend, Moira, of course—that had been an impressive development after Easter), he was now.

“I can’t believe Lily’s angry with you,” Peter said, sitting down next to James and taking a sip of his tea, burning his mouth in the process.

“Livid’s more like it,” Remus said. James kicked him lightly under the table, making him hiss.

“Don’t worry about it, mate,” Sirius said, done laughing for now, “she’ll come around when she realises that you were just defending her honour.”

James sat up with a melancholic nod and stared down at his tea, making Remus crack a smile. What would these boys do without each other all summer? He had Tomny and the rest back home, and Peter and James had each other, he supposed, but what god thought to imagine separating Sirius Black from his bestest and oldest friend? A cruel one, to be sure.

Lifting his cup to his lips, Remus blew on his tea. When he looked up, a familiar face was crossing the common room toward them.

“Hey there lads,” Simeon said, approaching their table and making Sirius sit up in his seat. Simeon’s school shirt was rolled up to his sleeves, showing off the beginnings of the tan Renata had once told Remus that Simeon was famous for in the summer months. Peter, of course, didn’t tan, only burned—yet another loss when compared to his older brother’s genes.

“Hey Sim,” Remus said, earning himself a pointed look from both Sirius and Peter.

“What do you want?” Peter asked.

“Peace, brother,” Simeon teased, “I come bearing gifts.”

“What gifts?”

Simeon raised his eyebrows, and looked at James instead. “Heard you got into a bit of a row outside the Great Hall, kid.”

If his tongue weren’t the size of a golf ball James might’ve rebuffed the fight, but since he could barely talk, he just rolled his eyes and waved him off.

Simeon chuckled and ran his tongue across his teeth. “Well, it sure was funny to hear about. Not all guys get to be impressed by the company their baby brothers keep.”

“Don’t turn my friends into your entertainment,” Peter snapped.

Sirius nudged Remus with his elbow. “Too late.”

Smugly, Remus smirked and nudged him back.

“Well since you’re all so cool, I thought I might bestow upon you something my forebears did for me after my O-Levels.”

All four boys looked up at him with a questioning look and Simeon reached into his back pocket, withdrawing four tiny slips of paper. He smacked them down on the tabletop between them; “Voila.”

Sirius snatched the papers up immediately. “No way.”

“I want to see!” Peter shouted, reaching for the papers as Sirius held them just out of reach.

“What are they?” Remus asked, trying to get a look for himself.

“Tickets...” Simeon said simply, “for a concert that just happens to be taking place at the end of the month. Not anyone big of course, but the venue’s great, so I’m sure you’ll still be able to have some fun.”

Sirius finally handed a ticket to each of them, and Remus scanned the front. The band’s name was ‘Dick Very and the Headways’, and the show was taking place in a venue called ‘Dice’s Attic’ on the last Saturday of June. Growing up in London, Remus had stood outside of plenty of live shows, listening to cover bands belt out the same songs he heard on the radio while his friends tucked themselves in between mulling bodies and concert-goers, tricky fingers dipping into the occasional pocket or two. Other than that there were of course shows like Top of the Pops, but he’d never had the chance to see a band play live.

“You’re just giving us these?” He asked. Sirius elbowed him in the stomach, perhaps a little harder than he’d meant to.

“Anyone ever told you not to look a gift horse in the mouth, Lupin?”

“They’re totally yours,” Simeon said. “You’ll need a ride, but lucky for you I’ve already organised everything.”

Peter lowered his ticket away from his face and scoffed. “There’s no way you snuck off campus for that long when you were sixteen.”

“Your lack of faith in me is a festering wound, Petey.”

“Just fess up, these were yours weren’t they?”

Simeon sighed over a smile. “Can’t get anything past ya. I got them in return for a favour from a friend, but I’ve already got plans. So— they're all yours."

Jumping up from the table, Sirius hugged Simeon tightly, pinning his arms to his body. Simeon raised his eyebrows but let him.

"You just gotta promise me one thing though," he said, "no drugs."

Sirius immediately let go. "What? But you and Remus—"

"I'm not going with you," Simeon said, very blasé. "Have a few drinks if you want, sure, but no drugs. I can't save your arses from here."

"So how are we even getting there?" Remus asked.

"Stan'll take you and bring you back."

"The trolley driver?"

"Don't worry, he's good for it. Just bring him a couple beers and he probably won't leave you stranded."

Peter gaped; "Probably?"

Simeon nodded. "What's life without a little risk, lads?"

* * *

Thursday 10 th June 1976

Remus could've jumped up and down on the middle of the berm, punching the air out of joy—but of course he didn't, because that would just give Sirius the satisfaction of seeing him so happy. Only Sirius Black could look so smug over a poor final History mark.

"I don't get it. How could you have done so poorly? The exam was mostly multiple choice," James said, comparing his exam marks to Sirius'. His injured tongue was now securely on the mend after a trip to the school infirmary and a few days of grudging silence.

Sirius shrugged. " 'What's past is prologue'. Every dog's allowed an off-day once in a while. Really, I'm starting to think you lads keep me on too-tall of a pedestal."

"Okay, smart-ass." James passed Sirius' mark report back and picked up his football, spinning it on the tip of his finger like a basketball until one of his teammates called out to him from across the berm.

“Oh, hey, gonna split but I’ll meet you guys in gym,” he promised.

"Kay," Remus waved, as James snatched up his bag from the ground and took off across the grass at a jaunty pace.

Dropping his arm, Remus tilted his head to get another look at Sirius' marks without him noticing. Having gotten their exam results back earlier that morning in their final forms, he'd been initially hesitant to ask the others how they’d done, but apparently his friends held no such qualms. Lily was top of the year again of course, with near-perfect marks across the board. James’ were quite good as well, at least high enough to keep his academically-minded folks off of his back for another year, and Peter had passed Maths, although only just barely.

With no marks in the red this term and at least two A-Level-equivalent results, Remus was more over the moon than he had ever felt when it came to his marks. He was almost looking forward to waving the small slip of yellow paper in Giles’ face when he picked him up from the London train station in a few days, but nothing could compare to the glee of actually beating the ever-perfect Sirius in History. The defeat came only by a small margin really, thanks to Remus’ efforts on his essays throughout the term, but it was enough to put him past Sirius after he’d bombed his final exam. Anyone else might’ve been more prickled, but Sirius just took the poor mark in stride, probably only thinking of the upside of how upset his mother would be when she found out.

“Have you decided what elective you’re taking next year?” Remus asked Sirius, casually changing the subject so as to try and keep some of his modesty intact. With James gone and Peter off on a final date with Moira (her family was from Scarborough and she and Peter would have to make due with only soppy phone calls over the summer) he and Sirius were left on the grass, watching side by side as a few prefects led the tiny year 6 students across their half of campus as preparation for the transition from primary to secondary in the following autumn.

“Music,” Sirius said simply, “I always do music. Sheila’s stuck with me.”

“Poor Sheila.”

“And you?”

Remus glanced at Sirius, who returned the look. They hadn't been this close since their argument on the bench, and the memory made Remus' stomach do little flips. "Music. Guess I'm stuck with you too."

"And our band survives!" Sirius exclaimed with sudden glee.

"You mean the imaginary one?"

Sirius turned his nose up slightly. "Won't be imaginary forever. I'm just glad to know that my efforts in teaching you how to play your own instrument won't go to waste."

"You ruin everything," Remus scoffed. "You gonna do guitar again then?"

"Mhm. Don't wanna do anything else."

"Not even piano?"

Sirius gave him a sharp side-eye. "Thought you hated gossip, Lupin."

"I do," he insisted, "but I'd have to be blind not to see the way you're always fawning over the thing in the music room."

"I do not fawn over it."

"Sure you do. People say that you're a prodigy. Are they telling the truth?"

Sirius looked away indifferently. "I was."

"Well, if you know how to play, then why not ever do it?"

"Because then she wins!" He snapped. The words had come out so automatically they left both of them stunned, and Sirius had to let out a heavy breath before continuing.

"I started piano because it's what I was supposed to do. Just like how I was supposed to listen to all my tutors, and follow orders, and be the perfect heir—I didn't do it because I wanted to. Every time I go home that fucking piano is there to taunt me."

Sirius had begun flicking his fingers in that nervous way of his, and Remus licked his lips.

"Why not just say you want to stop?"

“Mum wouldn’t let me. Still won't. ‘Least not when I’m home.”

“Why?”

“Because... she was my teacher.”

They looked at each other again, and Remus was struck by the urge to reach out and touch him. A hand on the shoulder, a simple pat, something that might offer a modicum of the comfort to the boy he’d spent the last ten months next to from dawn till dusk. In the end, all Remus could bring himself to do was reach into his pocket and withdraw one of his guitar picks that he’d been holding onto even after handing the Fender back for the term. He held the pick out to Sirius, who glanced down at it like he might snatch his hand back the moment he reached out to take it.

“Just take it,” Remus said, before reaching down and grabbing Sirius’ hand, pressing the pick into his palm. Sirius stared at it for a long moment before taking it between his fingers and expertly twirling it back and forth as a small smile tugged at the corners of his mouth.

Chapter End Notes

‘Scouser’ is a term for someone from Liverpool.

I have absolutely made up 'Dick Very and the Headways’ but you look at that name and tell me that couldn't be a British hair-band from the 70's and 80's.

Also, 'Earl Vince and the Valiants' was just the name Fleetwood Mac used to perform that song. They never used the pseudonym again.

Chapter 27: Full Moon

Chapter Summary

Gym class. Remus is a whiny bastard. Hilarity ensues.

Chapter Notes

No triggers this chapter. But it was VERY fun to write.

A/N: I have actually never played a game of rugby in my life. For those who have, please let me know how I did, lol.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I see the bad moon a-rising,
I see trouble on the way;
I see earthquakes and lightnin',
I see bad times today;
Don't go around tonight,
Well it's bound to take your life,
There's a bad moon on the rise…

- "Bad Moon Rising" Creedence Clearwater Revival, 1969

Thursday 10th June 1976 continued...

Exams concluded, everyone was to return to their regular schedules for those precious few days before the end of term, which meant that the boys were to spend their final afternoon of lessons on the sports field, baking under the hot June sun. Tomorrow was for packing and cleaning, and the day after that the entire student body of Hawkings Independent College would return home for the summer. Knowing that he'd finally be back in London after being denied the chance to visit home over April holiday, Remus should've been excited—and he had been, until he was informed that they'd be spending their final gym class playing rugby.

"It's cruel, really. An entire week of suffering through exams after months of studying for them, and still they attempt to force us back into a normal routine as though we were just robots to be oiled and shined. As though we were not people with proper wants and needs. Truly, you cannot spell systematic oppression without mandatory school sports."

"Just run the damn ball, Lupin!" James shouted from across the field, standing just beneath the goalposts of the great green rugby pitch.

Remus huffed and spun the ball in his hands before taking off at an indignant run towards the posts. Sirius met him half-way and he tossed the ball backwards to him, letting the other boy finish the play and score the practice point while he veered off to the other end of the posts toward the benches and Peter, who was standing by and watching the whole thing play out.

"Good try, Lupin," Peter said, and it took a moment for him to realise he meant 'good play' instead of a sarcastic quip. "Try", "maul", "scrum"—having to keep up with rugby terms was almost as bad as pretending to like football.

"I think this is the most dramatic he's ever been," Sirius said to James, as the both of them crossed the pitch and joined them.

"It's just a scrimmage match, Lupin," James sighed, clearly irritated with Remus' intention to have everyone share in his misery. Really, it was easy to enjoy sports when you had the arms and thighs of a Greek god. If Sirius was made in the image of a rebellious angel, James was made in that of a kindly saint—a saint who spent his free time doing press-ups and 100-metre dashes for fun.

Sometimes Remus just hated James.

Of course their uniforms didn't help his attitude either. His had never quite fit, with shorts that were too wide in the waist and always sagging down. He missed the comfort that came from his track pants, but not even the heat exhaustion he would've gotten by wearing them would've granted him a pass from Ms. Hooch, who seemed to live and breathe for physical exertion.

When she had told them that they would be celebrating the end of term with a fun, easy game of rugby, Sirius had beamed with joy. Apparently he liked rugby even more than football and was over the moon since they'd avoided the sport for most of the term, as James was in their class and an obvious expert at running football drills and coordinating games.

Remus had initially tried much harder in gym to disguise his aversion for the sport just to keep up the facade in front of the Hawkings' football captain, but he'd felt distinctly less motivated the closer they got to the end of the year, and now with both exams and the FA Cup over with, and a live music show and the summer holiday to look forward to, Remus was done pretending he more than just tolerated team sports.

“I will not be taking gym next year,” he told each of them, as James and Sirius tipped their heads back, swigging out of their water bottles.

“You could try strength and conditioning instead,” James suggested. “You know, to keep active and maybe bulk up a bit?”

“You calling me skinny?”

“Well, you are sort of built like a cigarette. Sometimes I’m afraid you’ll just turn sideways and disappear.”

“You think you’re sooooo funny, Potter.”

“Aw, don’t worry about it, Lupin,” Sirius said, coming around the back of the bench and reaching over Remus’ shoulder to pat him on the side of his chest, “ 'least you’re tall.”

“Yeah, girls always go for the tall ones,” Peter nodded, and Remus was reminded of how the other boy had been bragging since his last visit to the school nurse that he’d grown an inch and a half since his last birthday.

“Moira tell you that?” Remus asked, and Peter made a sarcastic face. A moment later Hooch blew her whistle, indicating that their warm-up was over and their game was to begin.

James ended up one of the team captains of course, and Sirius in his eagerness to play, took charge of the other. Instantly both boys began talking smack as their gym teacher divvied up the rest of the class and handed out the coloured vests to each team (blue for James’, red for Sirius’), goading each other on with varying in degrees of viciousness until they were nearly wrestling and had to be pulled apart just to start the game.

After being given a blue tunic along with Peter, Remus pulled it over his head and went to stand on James’ side of the pitch, trying not to make direct eye contact with his friend, who to his own credit, had not scoffed or groaned when Remus joined him and instead only grinned and gave him a thumbs-up.

Another reason to hate James Potter: he was so bloody-fucking nice.

At least they had the vests, he supposed. Hawkings was too posh a place to resort to 'shirts and skins' which a younger, even skinner Remus would've appreciated in years 7-10.

"Try not to cry too hard when you lose, Potter!" Sirius called across the field, as he tied his long hair into a ponytail at the back of his head. He was the only one of the 4A boys who'd made it onto the red team and just because he knew it would annoy James, Sirius clapped Davey Gudgeon on the shoulder and wrapped an arm around the other boy's neck, shaking his fist in his best friend's direction.

"Lupin," James said very quietly, "if you don't put those long legs of yours to good use today, I swear I'll get Pete to forge your schedule papers for next term and make you run drills every gym class for the entire year."

Remus shook his head. "You know there's competitive, and then there's just plain evil."

"And I can be both."

James glanced sideways at him with a cheeky smirk, which Remus returned. He wasn't looking forward to the game, but the chance to knock Sirius Black down a peg? That he was excited for.

Following James' lead, Remus slipped his rubber mouth guard around his teeth and stepped up to the pitch's halfway line.

"Your kick-off, Mr. Potter!" Hooch called from the side of the pitch, her whistle already poised between her lips. James waved back in response and tossed the ball between his hands a bit as his team lined up at the pitch's centre line. Because he could, Sirius shot James the bird from across the pitch, tongue out. James dropped the ball to return the gesture, and they both got a clipped warning whistle from their teacher.

"Hey Pete," Remus said, standing with one hand on his hip, the other shielding his eyes from the sun, "want to make a bet?"

"A bet?" Peter said, squinting up at him. "What are the stakes?"

"Ten quid says that Black gets a foul within the first five minutes of the game."

Peter looked to Sirius, who had turned away and was stretching as though he were bored. The moment spun back around and caught his friends staring, he waved and shot them the bird too just for good measure.

Another whistle. “Mr. Black!”

“Sorry, Hooch!”

“No way,” Peter said, shaking his head, “I know a losing bet when I see one.”

“Then why can’t you ever win at poker?” Remus teased. He held out his hand for Peter to give a friendly smack, which he did, not even the least bit bitter.

As Ms. Hooch stepped up to the middle of the halfway line, each boy began to bounce back and forth on their heels a little bit more. Remus wasn’t a part of the forward line, but should anyone from the red team break through he’d be expected to give chase or stand in their way. It was almost laughable. Doss had once said that Remus was as likely to be folded up into a paper airplane as he was to get any sort of bulk on him; so naturally the concept of tackling his friends in gym class was not ideal.

“Whooo! Yeah! Let’s get it on!” Sirius called, as Hooch raised her arm into the air. One short whistle-blow later and James had sent the first kick of the game sailing across the pitch. It was impressive, and Remus found himself watching it fly for what felt like forever, until another boy on his team shouldered him forward into a run.

They all converged in one spot on the red team’s side of the centre line, boys falling into one another in attempts to snatch the ball. There was no way any of it would’ve been legal in a proper game of rugby, but as long as no one came away with a bloody nose or busted knackers, Hooch was perfectly content to let them ‘scrimmage’. It had already occurred to Remus more than once during the year that Hooch must’ve been some sort of sadist, but that was true for most gym teachers, he supposed.

“C’mon, Remus,” James said, after the whistle was blown and the game reset, “back to the halfway line.” He grinned at him from behind his sports goggles, a smile only elevated by the fact that his dark skin was already shining with sweat under the sun.

Following his friend, Remus returned to the line and waited for the next whistle blow. This time Sirius was kicking-off, and he sent the ball soaring across the field. It arched over Remus' head and flew straight toward James, who stared it down before launching himself into the air, catching it in his arms much to the apparent glee of the rest of his team.

Everyone was running before Remus knew what was happening and after Peter screamed at him for freezing up, he followed suit. He couldn't remember what his position even was, let alone what he should've been doing—but that didn't matter much once Davey Gudgeon had caught him around the middle and sent him to the ground with a horrible thump.

There was a whistle blow, and Remus blinked up at the sky as James appeared over him, half-scowling at Davey who was sprawled out on the field next to him. Extending an arm, James helped Remus to his feet and clapped him on the back as another whistle blew.

"Illegal tackling, Mr. Gudgeon!" Hooch barked.

Davey rolled over on the grass and got to his feet, pointing at Remus indignantly. "I didn't tackle him! The nob ran right into me!"

James spat out his mouth guard in Remus' defense; "He didn't! You launched yourself at him!"

"Reset," Hooch ordered, breaking up the group. Still shaking his rattled head, Remus turned around to find Sirius right in front of him, a scrutinizing smirk on his face.

"You're not even trying."

"Yes I am," Remus said indignantly, picking a piece of grass off his tongue. "I just ate turf in case you didn't notice."

"Only 'cause you were practically running backwards." Sirius reached out and poked him in the shoulder, right over a newly-achieved grass stain. "If you tried you'd probably be faster than any of us."

"Is that supposed to be a compliment?" Remus sneered, holding his shoulder.

"Guess we'll have to see."

Sirius flounced past him in a little trot, joining his teammates as they waited for the penalty kick to be served. It took Remus several seconds of idle standing to realise that he was the one who was to be doing the kicking.

“This can’t be a part of my job,” he muttered as James pressed the ball into his arms.

“It’s a scrimmage in gym class,” James said, “everything’s a part of everyone’s job. Just try and get it over the goal posts.”

“Jesus Christ.” Sighing, Remus stepped up to the line, as indicated by their gym teacher.

“Just an easy little kick, Mr. Lupin,” Hooch said happily, before tooting her whistle. Remus flinched at the sharp sound before turning to face the goal, which was made of two tall metal posts inset over a football goal. Just under the goal, straight ahead of him, Sirius gave a little wave and he felt that irritated feeling in his gut he always got when Sirius taunted him.

With more effort than he’d shown in the game so far, Remus gave a hearty grunt and dropped the ball just over his foot for a stern kick. Rather than sending it up toward the goal posts, the rugby ball clipped the tip of his trainer and flew straight forward toward Sirius, who scrambled to catch it and only ended up taking it straight to the throat, choking a bit as the ball bounced off toward another one of his teammates.

Before Sirius could recover, James snatched the ball from another red-shirt and took off down the pitch. He’d scored a point before Remus had even so much as taken a step forward, and every boy in blue threw their arms up in celebration.

“Fucking hell, Lupin,” Sirius wheezed as he fell into Remus’ side dramatically, shoving him a few paces to the left. “Were you trying to kill me?”

“Maim you, maybe,” Remus said, his cheeks hot. Despite his words, he obviously hadn’t meant for the kick to sail directly in Sirius’ direction, but he couldn’t remember looking anywhere else.

“You’re not gonna get away with that again,” Sirius warned, as another whistle blow signalled the end of the play, dissolving the teams onto their own sides.

After that, Sirius was always there to intercept him—which usually involved taking Remus to the ground with varying degrees of savagery. Around the second or third tackle, he started to realise that Sirius was not only gunning for him, but he was having fun doing it.

“You’re guarding me!” Remus shouted, after Sirius had yanked on the back of his shirt during another play reset and screamed; ‘Wotcher!’.

“Am not,” Sirius said haughtily.

“Then stay away!”

“S'all part of the game, Lupin!”

It didn’t take another threat from James for Remus to start putting more effort into running after that. Sirius was quick, but he was also right, as usual; when he put his mind to it Remus was fast enough to outpace most of them. It helped that he had nothing to do with the scrums, which looked more akin to a tangled wrestling match than a sports maneuver.

By the end of the hour all of them were significantly sweaty and winded. Peter managed to score the last point before both teams regrouped for a final hurrah, desperate to break the tie they’d been struggling with since the middle half of the game.

“Bailey, Jackson, Murphy—you three are going to mind the centre,” James said, and all three boys nodded aggressively. “Mason, Poole—you bring up their rear as wing positions. Pete, you’re with Walsh and Roberts, flanking the tossers from the far side. The rest of you will scrum. Remus’ll run the ball.”

Remus gaped. “Then what’ll you be doing?”

“I’m going to be the one tossing you the ball, numpty. Unless you want to be in the scrum?”

He didn’t, but the idea that he was going to be the one responsible for scoring the winning point made him more than a little uneasy. “And you’re just assuming I’ll be able to catch it?”

“Don’t worry, Lupin,” Murphy said, slapping Remus in between the shoulder blades hard enough to make him flinch, “if you drop it, the others will just pile on you and we’ll get another chance.”

“Oh joy,” he scoffed. “And while I put my spine back into place you lot can carry me across the try line.”

“Glad you’re on board,” James said, before clapping his hands and letting all the boys disperse.

A moment later Sirius led his boys into position and Hooch checked her watch.

“Let’s make this last play a clean one!” She called.

“He’s going to go after you again,” James said into Remus’ ear. Turning around, Remus followed James’ gaze to Sirius, who was slapping his thighs in anticipation while both teams arranged themselves in the ridiculous scrum formation, heads ducked down onto one another like a great big hug-pile.

“Fake left,” James told him. “He’ll follow you, and then Pete and the boys can take him and the rest out while you go round the edge.”

“But that’s where they’re going to collide with the forward guys,” Remus said, not liking the idea of being caught in the middle of scrum. “I’ll never catch it if I’m tripping over them.”

“I’ll get the ball to you,” James promised, “just go left.”

“Fine.”

“Good man.”

Before James could clap him on the shoulder again in that sportsman-like way of his, Remus ducked away and stepped into his spot. The final point, it seemed, would be decided by who was fast enough after the ball had left the scrum pile, and he wasn’t sure that it was going to be him.

“Alright boys,” Hooch said, as the scrum group bent down over each other, James and Davey standing by to roll the ball into the middle of their grappled bodies. “Crouch! Hold! Engage!”

Like a pair of raging rhinos, the teams pushed against one another immediately, kicking the ball back until James finally freed it from their legs and sent it spiralling toward Remus. By some good god’s grace, he snatched the ball out of the air and a second later, caught sight of Sirius zipping through the crowd toward him. About to fake left, Remus noticed a tiny gap in the red team’s otherwise iron-tight defense on his right-hand side. Sending James a telepathically sarcastic apology, Remus dove through the scattered bodies, plunging ahead as fast as his legs could carry him.

The try line looming ahead, he could almost taste victory. He was so close, all he had to do was to touch the ball to the grass on the other side and then he'd have bragging rights over Sirius until they all broke for summer.

"Run Lupin!" James hollered, several feet to his left and running toward the try line like he could score the point for him. "RUN!"

And he did. He ran hard enough and fast enough that he was nearly flying across that pitch line—that is until Sirius dove forward and wrapped his arms around his thighs, dragging him to the ground in one fell swoop just as he attempted to slam the ball down onto the grass for the point.

Or at least, he dragged some of him to the ground.

Tripped up around the legs, Remus soared forward across the pitch, ramming both his face and the ball into the pitch while Sirius was left to tumble off to the side, rolling with enough force that he slammed to a stop on his back as well. Over a dozen boys skidded to a halt—blue and red shirts alike—all wincing as they watched the two of them tumble.

Shaking his rattled skull and feeling for his bruised forehead, Remus pushed up off the pitch, dazed and blinking at the rugby ball that had rolled to a tedious stop just ahead of him across the pitch's white line.

He'd done it then! He'd scored the point—Sirius hadn't gotten him!

Remus was about to celebrate, to turn to his mates and sneer at Sirius in glee, when he felt a peculiar bit of warmth down below. Warmth from the summer sun where it had never been before.

"Oh my god," one of the boys cried from behind, "you pantsed him!"

In sudden realisation, Remus shot upright on his knees. His gym shorts were missing, stolen from him by the tackle and now several feet away, clutched in Sirius' fist as he too sat up and looked around in confusion, hair loose and tumbling down over his forehead.

Remus clapped his hands behind himself and felt nothing but skin. He still had his underwear, but the briefs had been pulled down near to his knees. If not for the fact that all the boys were behind him on the pitch, they'd have received the full-frontal; but as it was all the boys got was a blinding flash from his poor, pale arse.

“Holy fuck,” James gasped in astonishment, and a moment later the whole class erupted into maddened laughter.

Mortified, Remus ripped his briefs back up around his waist and stood up, whirling on Sirius who had begun to look between him and the shorts as though he were at a loss for words. Of course knowing him, that loss didn’t last for very long.

“My bad, Lupin,” he said, breathing hard enough that Remus knew that he was just suppressing his own laughter. “Didn’t mean to turn you into an exibitionist.”

“Give those to me!” Remus roared, shooting forward. But before he could reach him Sirius had jumped to his feet and zipped away between the other boys, Remus’ shorts still in hand.

“Keep the nudist away!” He cried, and Remus fumed, his face a scarlet red from embarrassment. “I think he means to indoctrinate me!”

“You pisshead! How old are you?!” He shouted, as everyone parted around the boy with no pants and Sirius danced right into the hands of Ms. Hooch, who blew her whistle loud enough to make him wince and drop the grey shorts on the pitch.

“Mr. Lupin,” she ordered, though not unkindly, “please return your trousers to the lower half of your body.”

Amidst his classmate’s laughter, Remus stalked forward and snatched up his shorts, tugging them over his legs furiously as Sirius hid behind their teacher. Even James and Peter were giggling, and when he shot them a dirty look James only shrugged.

“Should’a gone left, Lupin.”

* * *

Remus tore across the berm, arms pumping with more effort than they had during the game. He was still rather dizzy after taking a head-butt from the ground and as a result, mostly ended up tripping over his own feet. His friends kept up with him from behind, gym bags slung over their shoulders as they hid their snickering behind fingers and smirking lips.

“We won though, Remus!” James said, for perhaps the thirtieth time.

“You won the game for us!”

“At the cost of my own pride! If he hadn’t kept gunning for me the whole time—”

“I keep telling you it was an accident,” Sirius called. “I didn’t mean to have you moon the entire class!”

“It really is sort of the best timing though,” Peter offered. “In a few days everyone’ll be going home and no one will remember that you showed off your cheeks in gym class.”

“I did not show off my cheeks in gym class!” Remus wailed, turning around on them and thrusting a finger out in Sirius’ direction. “He sabotaged me!”

“Oh c’mon, Moony,” Sirius said, “it was just a bit of fun. You’re lucky there weren’t any girls around. Or maybe you wanted to show off?”

Before Remus could lose it on him for the horrible nickname, Peter elbowed James harshly and all three of them peaked around him. “What’s that about girls?” He murmured.

Following their gaze, Remus turned around to find Lily standing in the middle of the pavement expectantly. Her red eyebrows were raised—probably as a result of their shouting. Arms locked behind her, she tilted her head in question and the brim of her sun hat dipped down over her forehead. Rather than her regular school clothes she was wearing a pretty green jumper dress, its straps buckled over a white blouse.

“You lot look happy,” she said, before noticing Remus’ face. “Or not.”

“Oh my god, Evans, you’ll never guess what happened to this one in gym.”

Before Sirius could finish, Remus turned around and shoved him. When he spun back to Lily he forced a beaming smile. “Lily,” He announced, “I was just on my way to find you!” Lacing his elbow with hers, Remus ignored her surprise and turned them both around, already marching her away from the boys.

“You were?”

“Yeah!”

“No he wasn’t,” Sirius called, “he’s just embarrassed ‘cause he—”

“Oi—I mean… Hey, Evans!” James called, and to Remus’ surprise, Lily came to an abrupt halt and turned back to look at him with big eyes.

“Yes?”

Reaching up to rub at the back of his neck, James gave a smile that looked like he was trying not to wince. “I’m sorry,” he said, “for… going after Snape. I know it upset you and I didn’t mean to embarrass you either. Not that you should’ve been embarrassed! It was his fault —and mine! Just… sorry.”

Lily looked from James to Remus like she expected him to have an answer, and though he was still pissed at his friends, he felt himself deflate a little. Sighing, Remus nodded his head, gesturing back at James before looking away. Lily gave a little smile before glancing back at James.

“I accept your apology,” she said, the picture of decorum.

With surprise clear on his face, James straightened up. “Oh. Brilliant!”

Lily nodded firmly. “Sev sort of deserved it, too. He apologised later, in case you were wondering.”

“We weren’t,” Sirius said, and James punched him in the shoulder, making him hiss.

“Happy for you, Evans,” James said.

Lily nodded again, this time with a smile. “See you lot later then. Shall we go, Remus?”

“Yes, please.”

“No!” Sirius pouted, as the pair of them began down the road. “Don’t take our Moony away! We weren’t done with him! I was going to introduce him to the art club as their first nude model!”

Over his shoulder, Remus shot Sirius the bird and Lily gave him an odd look. Thankfully the boys stopped following, probably because James was just relieved to be forgiven and didn’t want to press his luck where Lily was concerned.

Letting Lily take the lead, Remus was pleasantly surprised when they approached the path leading toward the lake, which was the closest thing to the sports fields aside from the garage where the school trolleys were parked at night.

“What’s the dress for?” He asked, as they made their way down the bank of Lake Dubh. They’d since dropped arms, and Lily was busying herself by collecting smooth rocks and tossing them into the water.

“Oh, the prefects always throw an end of the year party in last period and we’re supposed to dress up,” she said. “Do you like it?”

“Uh, yes?”

Beaming, Lily skipped further down the rocky lakeside, pressing a hand to the top of her hat to keep it from falling off as she bent over to continue collecting more pebbles. “You should be a prefect, Remus. You’re sensible, and since the year thirteens are graduating we have a hole in the ranks.”

“No way,” he scoffed, “I’m sure there’s someone more cut out for the job than me.”

Lily tutted. “Really, Remus, you need to get over this ‘oh, I’m so bad—I’ve got holes in my trousers and listen to angry music—everyone must run away from me in terror’ attitude of yours. It’s getting rather old.”

“Well, excuse me,” he muttered, as Lily tossed another stone into the lake and paused to listen to the ‘plop’ it made as it landed.

“Is there a reason you wanted to talk then?” She asked, as Remus followed her and kicked rocks out of his path. “I was on my way somewhere, you know.”

Remus winced, kicking a large rock out of his path and watching as it rolled down the bank into the water. “Sorry. Just wanted a bit of peace from those idiots who call themselves my friends.”

“Did something happen in gym then?”

“Let’s just say I’m never playing rugby again.”

Lily smirked. “What’d Black do?”

“How’d you know it was him?”

“So it wasn’t him?”

“Course it was him,” Remus huffed, rolling his eyes. “Bastard really tries my patience.”

“Well, what’d he do?”

“It doesn’t matter,” Remus said, desperate to change the subject; “You forgave James pretty easily this time around. What gives?”

“Oh,” Lily started, “well I talked to Mary and she sort of said I was being too harsh. He never hit Sev after all, just sort of embarrassed him. And I figure he’s learned his lesson after getting clocked in the chin like that.”

“He had to take his last exam with an ice pack taped to his face.”

Lily smiled down at the ground, shyly. “Still an idiot though.”

“Oh yeah,” Remus agreed, “don’t think that’ll ever change.” He looked down to his feet and Lily must’ve followed his gaze, because she jumped forward very suddenly, bending down between his feet and springing up with another stone.

“This one’s perfect for skipping!” She declared, before scuttling down to the very edge of the water. As Remus caught up with her on the bank, Lily drew her arm back and flung the flattened rock across the surface of the lake. It skipped five times before disappearing under the dark water.

“Good job,” he said, genuinely impressed.

Lily clapped her hands to her sides happily. “I’ve had lots of practice. Mum and dad used to take me and Pet around all sorts of places while they gathered research for their books. Once we—”

A sharp whistle cut across the lake from behind them, making both Remus and Lily jump before they swung around and found Barty Crouch and his favourite crony, Yaxley, at the top of the bank and standing in the middle of the path astride two school bicycles.

“Heard you gave a little show on the field, Lupin!” Barty called. “What, too embarrassed to try for it in forms? You should’ve told me, I would’ve brought a camera!”

“Fucking hell,” Remus grumbled. “Is there some sort of school-wide blower I don’t know about?”

Barty caught sight of Lily, glaring up at him beneath her sun hat and leaned over his handlebars. “You showing off to girls now too, Lupin? How pale is that arse of his, girlie? Supposedly it’s blinding.”

“What is he talking about?” Lily asked, and Remus ground his teeth together.

“Black... might’ve grabbed hold of my shorts during the last half of gym.”

“He did what?”

“He pantsed me.”

“So everyone saw your bum?”

“Oi!” Crouch demanded, as Yaxley gave another horrible whistle. “Lupin! Did you or did you not flash your nob to the entire track and field team? Or was Hooch just looking for a bit of side-action?”

Before Remus could even entertain a response, Lily took one of her pebbles and threw it up the bank, nailing Crouch in the shoulder. Even James would’ve been impressed by her aim.

“Bloody fuck!” Barty cried, holding his arm. “You—”

“Ooh,” Lily said, “that looked like it hurt. You’d better go see Ms. Pomfrey in the medical room for a bandage.”

“You can’t do that!” Yaxley said, and Lily threw another rock, beaning him in the forehead after he tried to dodge it and keep hold of his bike at the same time. Yaxley howled, slapping a hand to his head while Crouch gaped.

“Piss off you two, before I give you detention for all of next September,” Lily ordered, already primed with another stone.

“You’re fucking crazy,” Barty said, and Remus snatched up a rock of his own—this one much bigger than the ones Lily had been throwing. Before he could entertain which of the two to smack upside the head, both boys turned and fled on their bikes.

“You are kind of crazy you know,” Remus remarked, dropping the rock as they watched the boys retreat. He wouldn’t have really thrown it. Probably.

“Good,” Lily said, “I like keeping people on their toes.”

She glanced up at him, floppy hat dipping down over her pretty, freckled face, and it occurred to Remus that Lily Evans was the fiercest person he'd ever known.

Years later, after all the good had come and all the bad had passed, it would still be the truth.

Chapter End Notes

For those who were unsure, a "try" in rugby is what it means to score a point.
"Press-ups" are push-ups.
"Wotcher" is a friendly/cheeky greeting.
"Blower" is slang for telephone.

Fun fact: "Dubh" is just the Gaelic word for black. So I have indeed named my lake, "Black Lake", lol.

Chapter 28: Photograph

Chapter Summary

While the boys get ready for their personal end-of-the-year concert, Remus discovers something new about the school.

Chapter Notes

No CW's this chapter~

See the end of the chapter for more notes

We can't dance, we don't talk much, we just ball and play,
Then we move like tigers on Vaseline;
Well, the bitter comes better on a stolen guitar,
You're the blessed, we're the Spiders from Mars;
Come on, come on,
We really got a good thing going;
Come on, come on,
If you think we're gonna make it,
You better hang on to yourself…

- "Hang on to Yourself" David Bowie, 1972

Friday 11th June 1976

"What is it we're doing again?" Remus asked, as he and Lily made their way through the forest, dodging tree branches and slipping around bushes wider than their dorm rooms. It was a beautiful afternoon on their last full day on campus and the sun was peeking through the treetops to cast a warm glow on the spongy forest floor. There was another flash of light as Lily's camera shutter clicked and she stood up, plucking the freshly-printed photograph from its end and immediately tucking it into her camera bag to develop.

"I'm taking photos of all the school's native flora before we go home," she said happily, tracing her fingers across the surface of the fern she just photographed. "I do it for my parents every year and today's my last chance. Over the summer we always make them into a scrapbook together. It might sound a bit silly but I think it's about as close as they can get to keeping track of me while I'm away from them."

“It’s not silly,” Remus mumbled, looking around. He’d never gone so far into the forest behind the dorms even on his solitary walks, but when Lily had found him on their last full day before they were set to return home for the summer, he found he couldn’t say no.

“You said your parents were botanists then?” He asked, looking over her shoulder as she stopped to take a photo of a bush.

“Yup,” she said, squinting through the camera’s viewfinder and focusing the lens. “They met through their work actually.”

Remus trailed his hand across a weeping tree branch. “So you’ve been around plants a lot.”

“All my life.”

He smirked. “And so your name… that can’t just be a coincidence.”

Before she could snap her picture, Lily’s head dropped back and she sagged, sighing as she released her camera to flop down against her chest on its strap. “Alright, have a go then—the plant-crazy parents named their kid ‘Lily’—ha, ha, so funny.”

“No, it’s perfectly normal,” Remus snorted, “honestly I feel more bad for poor ‘Petunia’. You definitely got the better half of the deal if she gets stuck with ‘Pet’ or ‘Tunie’ as nicknames.”

Despite herself, Lily gave a puckered smile. “Her full name’s ‘Petunia Marigold’ actually,” she said bashfully.

“No,” Remus gasped, “that’s horrid, Lils, what were your parents thinking? Oh my god—what they name you?”

Lily scooped up a pinecone and pelted him with it. “It’s not that bad!”

Remus thought back to all the times he’d seen Lily’s name written across her school books or clothing tags; Lily J. Evans. “C’mon, what’s the ‘J’ stand for?” He demanded.

“Juniper,” Lily said proudly. “Lily Juniper Evans.”

Remus bent down to scoop up the pinecone she’d thrown at him. “Well, that’s not bad at all. No wonder Petunia’s so damn sour.”

Lily smiled and looked away again, stopping next to a plant with curly purple flowers blossoming off its stem.

“What’s that one?” Remus asked, purposely poking the flower with his finger just as Lily went to take its photo. She scoffed but patiently waited for it to print before tucking the photo away.

“This is a marsh orchid,” she said. “It belongs to the family Orchidaceae and its Latin name is Dactylorhiza incarnata.”

Remus whistled, clearly impressed. “And that one?” He pointed to a cluster of tiny white flowers clinging to the roots of a nearby tree.”

Lily craned her neck to see. “Looks like Chickweed—Stellaria media—so named because farmers cultivate it to feed to chickens.”

“And that one?”

“Er—that’s a bush.”

Remus sighed. “And you were doing so well.”

“Oh yeah? You try saying ‘Dactylorhiza incarnata’, smart-ass.”

Dropping his pinecone, he raised his hands in defeat. “I yield to your infinite knowledge of weeds, Miss Juniper.”

“Why thank you.” With a gentle tug, Lily plucked one of the purple flowers from its stem and reached up, tucking it behind his ear. “I normally prefer to leave the flora as I found it, but this—” she raised her camera; “will make such a cute photo.”

Remus raised his hand defensively. “No,” he whined.

“Don’t tell me you’re one of those people who hates getting their photo taken too?” Lily drawled. “Really Remus, pick a struggle already.”

“Ouch.”

“C’mon, we’re not going to see each other all summer—at least let me take your picture!”

With a guilty sigh he dropped his arms and tilted his head to the side, smiling awkwardly. Beaming from behind the camera, Lily snapped his photo and tore it from its spout immediately, flapping it through the air. She giggled at him in that self-satisfied way of hers and Remus only shook his head while checking his watch.

“We should go,” he said; “You said you were gonna help organise the dorm inspections with the other prefects, right? Well it's almost three."

Lily nodded and together they turned to go, weaving back through the trees the way they'd come. There was a narrow dirt path to lead them at least, but he got swatted in the face by a tree branch more than once.

"Look!" Lily cried once his picture had finished developing. She passed it back to him and he sighed, looking at the dopey photo with reluctance.

"I look high."

"Are you high?"

"No. I wish."

"Then you look handsome!"

"Thanks," he scoffed, before something in the corner of the photo caught his eye. It was blurry but just behind him through the trees, Remus spotted what appeared to be some sort of old building. He mentioned it to Lily, but she only shrugged.

"Could be another tree."

"Oh yeah, looks like Latin for 'it's-a-building-ous'."

She shoved him for his cheek, but after another glance they'd both agreed that the shape appeared too boxy to be another tree. Lily couldn't remember seeing it while snapping the photo, but eventually they made it back to House Lane anyway, where a flurry of students were already marching to and fro, lugging their rubbish to the school incinerators and shaking rugs out on the lawn.

"You guys have already cleaned, right?" Lily asked.

"Yeah—yesterday." He left out the part that they'd cleaned and packed early because they weren't going to have the time to do it that evening. Not with Simeon's concert to attend.

"Good. It better be actually clean—not like what those tossers did last year."

Before he could ask about 'last year', another prefect girl skipped up the lane in front of them, panting slightly as she smiled at Lily in relief.

“Oh good, you’re here Lily! We need help at Crowley House—the boys have flooded the common room.”

“Oh my god—how?”

“Apparently no one told them there was such a thing as ‘too much mopping’—mop water everywhere.”

“Dear lord.” Lily turned to Remus and lifted her camera bag over her head. “Can you take my camera back with you? I’ll get it later, I just don’t want it to get ruined in the flood.”

“No problem,” he said, looping the strap over his shoulder.

“Cool, see you at dinner!”

He waved, knowing she wouldn’t, and together the girls loped back up the lane. Making his way back to his dorm alone, Remus made the climb to his bedroom and walked in to find his friends tearing through their already-packed trunks.

“Pete!” Sirius barked. “I swear to GOD if you don’t put your trousers on right now…”

“I can’t find them!” Peter wailed back.

“WHAT DO YOU MEAN YOU CAN’T FIND THEM?!”

Remus shut the door quickly. The sound made Sirius look up from his trunk to squint at him. “Moony, where have you been?”

Resisting the urge to pucker at the nickname—it would only make Sirius more smug—Remus tucked his hands into his back pockets. “Out with Lily. What are you guys doing? We’re not s’posed to be meeting Stan for a few hours.”

“I’m looking for that pack of cigs you hid—yeah I know about them, you stingy arse—meanwhile Pettigrew’s lost his pants again.”

“I can only find my school slacks,” Peter whinged, half of his body tucked up under his bed while he searched. Unfortunately the half that was facing Remus was clothed only in a pair of tighty-whities.

“Wear those then!” Snapped Sirius.

“Oh, hey Lupin,” James said, busy running a comb through his hair as he strolled out of the bathroom. It almost startled Remus—he didn’t think James Potter owned a comb.

With a grunt of defeat, Peter pulled his head back out from under the bed. “I can’t just wear my uniform, you guys look so cool!”

He did have a point. Sirius was wearing a plain white t-shirt and jeans, over which he’d paired the suede jacket he’d gotten for his birthday and cowboy boots, which should’ve looked ridiculous but somehow worked under the flared hems of his jeans. It was Simeon who’d lent him the boots, but Sirius did confess to having to double-up on socks just to get them to fit. James, ever his best-friend’s counterpart, looked just as good—albeit less like he was about to get heatstroke—having emerged from the toilet wearing a pair of fitted brown slacks cuffed at the ankles and a Doors t-shirt rolled up at the shoulders.

“There’s nothing wrong with dressing casual,” Sirius blagged, “I mean look at Lupin, he’s—Lupin, what are you wearing?”

Remus looked down at himself. He was wearing jeans and his favourite t-shirt, a faded Rolling Stones tee that was so well-loved a small hole had recently opened up in the armpit. He’d tucked the sunglasses he’d gotten from Tonya into the neckline of his shirt too, but the fabric was so stretched it tugged it down to reveal his entire clavicle. Lily’s camera bag was an unforeseen addition, but it wasn’t like he was wearing it to the concert.

“What? It’s ‘casual’.”

Sirius made a face, but said nothing as Remus went to his trunks to retrieve for the cigarettes he’d been looking for.

“Remus, can I borrow a pair of trousers?” Peter asked.

Pausing his search, Remus took a moment to look Peter up and down —all 5’5” of him—and then down at his own lanky lower body. “Uh, sorry Pete, but I’m not exactly sure we’re the same size…”

James stood up from where he’d been rifling around in one of his own trunks. “Here Pete,” he said, holding out a pair of dark-wash denim, “I guess we must’ve mixed up our stuff last time we did laundry.”

“If you two did your own bloody laundry it wouldn’t be an issue,” Sirius huffed. “We’re supposed to be going home tomorrow, and you two still don't have your things straight. Lupin, have you seen the cigs? I can't bloody find them."

"Gimme a second!"

"So high and mighty," James said cheekily. "Doing laundry together saves water, and it means only one of us has to lug the basket down to the laundrette every week."

"Besides," Peter said, doing a little jump to pull on his slacks, "James and I are neighbours. If I leave my trousers in his trunk all I have to do is walk over and get them."

"Do you say that when all of your knickers go missing too?" Sirius had abandoned his own trunks and approached Remus' bed, scanning over his open trunks. "Enough books, Lupin? Pince'll maim you if you lifted them from the library, you know."

"They're from the girls," Remus shot, "and what, afraid of someone else touching your knickers, Black?"

"Careful Moony, or I'll string your knickers up the school flag post as a farewell to the rest of the school."

Sirius gave a playful smirk as Remus rolled his eyes and turned back to his trunks. They were all packed mostly: three heavy, black-clad leather suitcases with 'R. J. Lupin' monogrammed across the top. He could've sworn that he'd left the last of his Embassys tucked into his winter boots but when he looked the boots were starkly empty.

"Did you go through my trunk?" He asked, shaking out one of the boots just in case.

"Yeah," Sirius said, "last week, after the spliffs ran out. You told me to."

"Fuck, yeah okay." Sighing, Remus tucked the boot away and shut the trunk.

"So no smokes then?" Peter asked, doing up his belt behind them.

Shaking his head, Remus dropped to his knees beside his bed. "No, I have some."

Hoping to save some for the train ride back to London, he'd stashed a pack completely out of sight weeks ago, in the one place he hadn't bothered with since the beginning of term. Reaching beneath the bed, Remus withdrew his mother's trunk and lifted it up on top of the others, the white-leather a stark contrast with the dark, wood-grain colour of the rest of the room. Sirius watched intently beside him, and he could tell by the silence that Peter and James must've been craning their necks to get a look too. The trunk had been one of the things he was least willing to discuss, and the others must've picked up on this early because they'd never pestered him about it.

Apart from not being a very interesting point of discussion ("Here's the trunk my dead mother left behind, you see this stain on the edge, it's probably her lipstick, but it's red of course so one could only hope!") the trunk only reminded him of memories that left more of an ache in his chest than comfort. It was like Superman carrying around his own personal supply of kryptonite; why had he even brought the trunk in the first place? It'd gone from collecting dust under one bed to another, but he knew that at least while it was at Hawkings with him no one else would be able to touch it.

Remus unlocked the trunk and lifted the lid as unceremoniously as he could. There was a short bout of silence, then Sirius spoke;

"Records?"

At least two dozen, all piled on top of one another, creasing corners and fading in the middle where their covers were rubbing together; and on top of those, a single pack of Embassy Number 1's.

Plucking out the carton and pressing it into his back pocket Remus made to close the lid, but Sirius stuck his hand out and caught the edge. "You had this many albums with you all year and you didn't play any of them?"

Staring hard at the trunk's tarnished buckles, Remus ran his tongue over his teeth as an eager James and Peter appeared on Sirius' other side. Before he could be stopped, Sirius reached out and began shuffling through the records. "Blimey, I knew you liked The Beatles, but—"

"They're not actually mine," Remus quipped.

"Who's then?" Peter asked. "Your mum's?"

The question felt like a punch to the gut. What would they think if he told them that no one else had laid eyes on the albums in years because he couldn't bring himself to so much as look at them? They'd probably call him a sop, so the only thing Remus said was; “Yeah.”

“I still don’t get why you didn’t bring them out,” Sirius said. “There’s lots here that I don’t have. Our collection would’ve been the best in the entire school.”

“I thought your collection was already the best in school.”

“Well it can always be better, can’t it?”

Clutching The Byrds’ Mr. Tambourine Man, Sirius looked up expectantly, and Remus was suddenly reminded of how he’d looked the evening before, packing his favourite things in the world—his collection of albums and stereo—into James and Peter’s trunks and effectively saying goodbye to them for the next two months. They were mirror images of each other really; Remus had punished himself by locking the music away, while Sirius used it as a reward for enduring the home-life that should’ve been good and easy, but wasn’t. Whatever ‘home’ was like for Sirius was still unclear, but Remus thought he at least understood him a little better after spending ten months living side-by-side and sharing the bits of themselves that they could bear to speak about.

“Next year,” he said, gulping, “I’ll play them next year.”

Sirius watched him for a moment, before smiling gently. “Yeah, okay then.”

“Just another thing to look forward to in September,” James said, putting back the album he’d grabbed and shut his own trunks. Watching him, Sirius finally handed Mr. Tambourine Man back and while Remus’ hands were full, reached into his back pocket, pulling out the smokes and shaking the box a bit.

“I’ll take good care of these,” he said with a wink, and Remus scoffed.

“Tosser.”

Sirius spun away as his face split into a smile. Remus wished he could’ve framed it—and then he remembered the camera and the strange building in the woods.

“Hey,” he started, shutting Hope’s trunk and flipping open Lily’s camera bag to sort through the photos; “Is there supposed to be a building in the Eastern crop of wood? You know—just at the end of the lane?”

“No, don’t think so,” James answered, slumping back on his bed.

Remus found his photo and drew it out. “Are you sure? ‘Cause Lily and I were walking and we sorta—”

Sirius was there instantly, plucking the photo out of his hand to get a look for himself. Immediately his eyes widened in delight. “AW! Look at our Moony, isn’t he just cute as a button!”

“Give that back!” Remus hissed, but Sirius just threw himself across James’ bed and passed the photo to him.

“Is that really how you take a photo, Remus?” James sniggered, while Peter swooped in from behind. “Not that it isn’t completely adorable!”

“I think he’s even blushing,” Peter said.

“The power of women, really,” Sirius sighed.

“I could easily kill any one of you with one of James’ sport socks,” Remus threatened.

“Anyone could kill anyone with one of James’ sport socks,” Peter said, “those things fucking reek.”

“Maybe Black’s right—we should do our own laundry,” James scowled.

“I wasn’t trying to show you my face,” Remus huffed, “look at the corner—it looks like a building!”

All three boys squinted tightly, turning their heads to the side to examine the maybe-building. “Oh yeah,” James said, “I see it. But what’s a building doing that far in the woods?”

“Oh my god,” Sirius said suddenly, thrusting the photograph out ahead of himself, “oh my god! I can’t believe it—he’s found it!”

“Found what?” Peter squeaked.

Sirius gave James a sudden back-hand to the chest, making him flinch. “Don’t you remember what Sim told us that one time last year? About the shack in the woods that no one could find?”

“OH!” James’ eyes widened in recognition and he jumped into a squat on the bed. “OH MY GOD!” He turned to Peter; “PETE IT’S THE SHACK!”

“What shack?” Remus demanded for him.

“The Shrieking Shack!” Sirius grinned. “The haunted building on campus that no one can ever find! They say on dark nights you can hear screaming coming from the woods—that it’s the ghosts of the shack seeking retribution for their deaths!”

“Alright, sure,” Remus scoffed, snatching the photograph back from Sirius and tucking it into Lily’s camera bag.

“I’m serious, Lupin!”

“We know.”

“Hmm—you're a dick! But I’m not lying! God, I can’t believe you haven’t heard of it yet—it’s like Hawkings’ most famous urban legend. And you found it!”

“I didn’t even see the thing,” Remus amended, “just noticed it in the photograph.”

“That’s even better!” Peter added. “It’s evidence that it exists now, right?”

“Right! We gotta go see it.”

James checked his watch. “But we have the concert tonight.”

Sirius launched up from James’ bed. “We still have a few hours, that’s plenty of time to go look. And it’s daytime so we don’t have to worry about any ghosts coming out to snatch us!” Cackling, Sirius dove at Remus and rattled him by the shoulders. “C’mon, Lupin!” He moaned. “You gotta show us where it is!”

“Fine!” Remus moaned. “On one condition! You guys gotta take a stupid flower photo too.”

Sirius’ grin grew even wider as he began to laugh. “Sure, you bloody hippy—whatever you want.”

He wasn’t satisfied—not by far—but he also supposed there were worse ways to spend his last day at school than tracking down a haunted shack in the woods with his friends. It’d be a story to tell the others back home at least.

“If we’re going, we should go now,” James said, pulling on his trainers. Sirius and Peter set themselves back to righting their trunks and Remus did the same. At the last second, while the others were piling out of the bedroom and into the hall, Remus remembered the map he'd compiled early into first term of every notable place on campus.

"Moony, you got a key?" James called from outside, dragging Sirius down the hall in a headlock after he'd suggested that the shack would be the ideal snogging hideout should James ever actually get anywhere with Lily.

"Yeah, I got it," Remus answered, taking a final moment to rifle around for his tattered map and tuck it into his back pocket.

"What?" Sirius grunted from the hall. "I'm only saying that a house full of ghosts would make the perfect cuddling situation! No way a scared girl is gonna bother leaving room for Jesus! I'm just trying to help you out, mate!"

* * *

You're welcome, Lily, Remus thought as he tucked the guys' photographs into the camera bag. At least now she would have a full set of flower-boys.

"I don't see anything," James said, trekking ahead of them as he held his hand over his eyes and squinted in the early-evening sun.

"Well if it was just out in the open I'm sure more people would stumble upon it," Sirius said, doing the same, though he'd already tried to steal Remus' sunglasses twice.

"Sim said that a teacher murdered twelve students in the Shack, and that's why it screams at night—its the sounds of kids getting butchered by their chemistry teacher," Peter said.

"I heard he taught geography," Sirius offered.

"And I heard it was twelve groups of students," James added.

"And I think you're all full of shit," Remus finished, bringing up the rear rather unenthusiastically.

"Lupin, you should be leading!" Sirius said. "You're the one that found it!"

“I told you—Lily and I just followed the path—I don’t know where else it could be.”

“How long were you walking for?” Asked James.

“I don’t know exactly. A while. She was taking pictures.”

Sirius swatted at his own arm. “Fuckin’ midges. God, I’d scream every night if I lived out here too.”

With sudden vigour, James smacked Sirius hard on the back of the neck.

“OW! What the fuck?”

“Thought I saw a bug!”

“You dirty liar! Come here, I’ll—”

“LOOK!” Peter wailed, making all of them jump. He thrust a finger out and they all followed his gaze, settling on a dark shape through the trees. Immediately Sirius took off like a light, James close on his heels with Peter behind him and Remus reluctantly bringing up the rear once more. What they found was a single abandoned house—three stories with every window boarded over with thick wooden planks. Though smaller than those Remus recognised, it looked exactly like a —

“It’s a dorm,” Peter said. “Not a shack at all.”

“Wonder what it’s doing way out here,” Sirius mumbled.

“Standing in peace,” Remus added. He didn’t like the look of the building. Its walls were made of a dark, weather-beaten wood unlike the stone exteriors of the dorms of House Lane and the foliage leading up to its front was dark and gnarled as though the very ground it sat on were poisoned.

“Well if I were a ghost, that’s where I’d hang out,” James said humbly.

Sirius started forward; “Let’s go in!”

“Are we absolutely sure this is what we want to do?” Peter winced. “Because I was pretty sure we had plans tonight and I didn’t plan on dying before I got to do them.”

“Don’t be a chicken, Pettigrew.”

“Oh yes, God forbid someone be the voice of reason as we waltz up to a decaying house in the middle of the bloody woods!”

“I’m with Pete,” Remus said. “We’ll probably just end up falling through the floor.”

“Come on,” Sirius whined, halfway to the front door, “how ‘bout if I buy all the drinks tonight?”

“Where’d you suddenly get the money to do that, Mr. My-parents-cut-me-off?” James asked.

“I can be resourceful when I want to be,” Sirius said snottily, “now are you three coming or should I leave you to take more photos and braid each other’s hair?”

James went forward first but eventually they all followed. Unlike the windows, the boards over the Shack’s front doors had been pried off presumably by other undaunted students, leaving the leftover bits to cling to their original rusted nails. The door handle was broken so they were able push it wide, hearing every strained squeak of its rusted hingers. The moment they crossed its threshold, the horrible smell of dust and decaying wood flooded Remus’ nose and he pinched it while they looked around what had to have once been a common area but was now nothing more than a dilapidated shell. The covered windows allowed very little light inside, leaving the corners and halls darker than the forest would be at night.

“Well this is cheery,” James said, nudging an overturned chair in the middle of the room that appeared to have three of its legs ripped off. Other debris scattered the floor and a small ring of dried leaves had collected around the front door, crunching under their shoes and leaving smudges in the thick layer of dust that had settled over everything.

“We should split up and explore,” Sirius suggested, peering around in the dark.

“Haven’t you ever seen a movie?” Peter gasped. “That’s exactly how everyone gets murdered!”

“Well I wanna know what’s here, and if we’re to make the show on time then we don’t got the freedom to skirt around in a group like little girls!” Twisting his head around, Sirius scanned the dusty floor until he'd come back with a long stick, which he broke into four pieces of varying length. "Shortest stick takes top floor, second-shortest gets second floor. The other two will search around down here."

"What is it that we're looking for exactly?" Remus asked, while James and Peter eagerly snatched up a stick.

"Evil geography teachers—dead bodies—disgusting supernatural creatures—take your pick, Moony." Smirking, Sirius waved the last two sticks at him.

"Cut the 'Moony' crap or I'll murder you myself," Remus tsked, choosing his twig. One by one they all opened their palms to compare and Remus let out a long sigh.

"Guess you're climbing some stairs— Moony," Sirius sniggered.

Remus turned to James. "If I don't come back, you get the record collection."

"Aw—no fair!"

Sirius had ended up with the second-shortest stick, and so while James and Peter began weaving their way through the ramshackle ground floor, they started up the stairs, taking them slowly and wincing at every strained groan that echoed up from the rotting wood beneath them.

"This is so stupid," Remus muttered.

"It's cool," Sirius insisted. "You found something really cool, Lupin!"

He knew deep down that the reason why Sirius had become so restless in the last few weeks was directly linked to everyone returning home for summer, and though he didn't have the words to explain it aloud, Remus understood. At least he had Tomny and the others to fall back on—Sirius had no one. He would be alone at his family's estate for nine whole weeks, relying only on the written communication of his friends to tide him over. So for this reason, Remus stopped complaining about the Shack.

They made it to the second floor landing and peered down the looming hallway together. Without the light peeking through the front doors, the upstairs was even darker and left a nervous thrumming in the base of Remus' throat.

“Well,” Sirius started, sounding a little less sure of himself than he had not two minutes before, “guess I’ll see you in a bit.”

Stiffly, he straightened up and began tiptoeing down the hallway by himself, his inky-black hair instantly camouflaged in the darkness.

“Don’t fall through the floor,” Remus called with a stilted chuckle before glancing up at the rest of the staircase. “Ha… Fuck me.”

Now, Remus had never really considered himself easily-frightened. He’d walked through the East End at night by himself before, and that alone was ten times as frightening as some old building in the woods that was falling apart at the seams. However, seeing the scuffs in the dust on the third-floor landing as though a body had been dragged up or down the stairs left him more than a little concerned. Judging by the lack of dust settled in the centre of the drag-marks, whatever had done them had been there recently. Against his better judgement, he followed the scuffing down the hallway, pausing before every doorway to peer inside. The bedrooms were mostly empty, some with the decaying remnants of old mattresses left on wire bed frames that looked rustier than a scrapyard in the rain. A few times he had to push a door open just to peer inside and every creaky groan of the hinges made him clench from top to bottom.

The scuff marks ended in the final bedroom at the end of the hall. It was the biggest of all of them—perhaps a teacher’s room once, and it was so dark that peering inside was like being swallowed by a black hole. Remus could see the faint outline of a large four-poster bed, its curtains rotting on their rungs, and across from that, a heavy oak wardrobe. It appeared to be finely made, though that could’ve just been its sheer size. It was a miracle the thing hadn’t crashed through to the floors below yet.

About to turn away and return to his friends with word of only more dust and rot, Remus froze when he heard the echo of a furious scratching coming from the wardrobe.

“Oh fuck,” he breathed, “please god no…”

He paused, praying that he wouldn’t hear it again, but only a few seconds passed before the familiar scratching cut across the dark room. Hardly breathing, Remus shuffled into the bedroom, dragging his feet and leaving fresh marks in the dust.

“Please don’t be a ghost,” he murmured, “please just be a fucking rat or something…”

Reaching out, Remus nearly laughed at the dim sight of his trembling fingers. The wardrobe's handles were rusted as well but cool to the touch and as he gathered a decent grip and steeled himself against keeling over and vomiting on the floor, Remus took a final breath and threw the doors wide.

There was a screech and something flew out of the cabinet, almost smacking into the centre of Remus' chest as he fell back on his ass with a great thump. Heart beating a mile a minute, he only had time to see the tiny ball of fur streak out of the room before he collapsed against the floor in relief.

"Oh fuck… oh thank god…" He moaned, rolling around in the dust some more before finally pulling himself to his feet. Examining the inside of the cupboard, he found three shelves of nested twigs and field cotton as well as enough spiders to kill every fly in Professor Kettleburn's barn.

Shutting up the wardrobe as he'd found it, Remus returned to the hallway and began making his way back to the stairs.

"Good news," he mumbled to himself, "no dead bodies or killer teachers, just your regular Scottish squirrel."

"Moony…?"

Sirius' call cut through the darkness like a knife and Remus straightened up.

"Moony, you there? Where are you, say something you daft dimbo!"

Suddenly feeling rather petty, Remus slipped into one of the side bedrooms and behind the door. He could hear Sirius' creaking footsteps making their way down the hall, and with his heartbeat still echoing in his ears, he glanced down to Lily's instant camera and carefully slid it free of its bag.

"Moony!" Sirius hissed again. "Lupin, where are you? I swear to god if that noise was you and you—just come out!"

Biting his lip to keep from laughing, he waited until he was sure Sirius had passed him before slipping out and creeping back down the hall. He found him standing before the wardrobe and carefully slid his feet across the floor so as to not make any noise. Raising the camera, he waited for Sirius to reach out and when he did—

“GAAHHH!”

“WHAAAAAAAAAAAAH!!!!!”

Practically launching himself a foot in the air, Sirius spun around and was instantly blinded by the flash of Lily’s camera as Remus took the photo and reeled back, killing himself laughing.

“MOONY! YOU DICKHEAD!” Sirius roared, pressing his fingers into his eyes to soothe his fried retinas.

“You absolutely deserved that!” Remus crowed, stepping back as Sirius used one hand to blindly swat at him.

“I think you’ve blinded me!”

“It’s just a camera, you twat. A few spots in your vision never killed anyone.”

Pulling his hands away, Sirius blinked furiously in the dark while Remus plucked the photo from the printer slot and slid Lily’s camera back into its bag. The photo he tucked into his back pocket—he’d earned it.

“The sun is shining inside,” Sirius said, waving his hands about. Smirking, Remus grabbed him by the arm and tugged him out into the hall.

“You satisfied yet, Black? There’s nothing here apart from spiders and squirrels.”

“I didn’t see a squirrel. All I saw was your cowardly arse.”

“Then that would make this round two of ‘Moony’,” Remus said at his own expense, chuckling as he and Sirius took the stairs down.

They met James and Peter on the ground floor, both of them wide-eyed over the screaming and the loud thump before that.

“Nothing,” Remus said, “just an old house.”

“Same down here,” James nodded. “Good thing too, we’ve got to go.”

“We’ll be back,” Sirius muttered, still blinking, “I’m sensing a brilliant prank in this place’s future.”

“Well, it’s gonna have to wait for September.” Slinging his arm around

Sirius' shoulders, James led them outside, where they were all left squinting in the sun, another shared memory tucked under their belts. As they went, Remus glanced back at the Shack in all its tarnished glory and allowed himself a single smug smile.

"Hey," he called, untucking the photo from his back pocket, "anyone want to see what Black looks like when he's pissing his pants?"

Chapter End Notes

'Midges' are annoying little insects that can bite. They're a fucking menace in the Scottish Highlands.

We're almost at the end of the year! One more chapter to go, lads ^^

Chapter 29: Float Me to the Moon

Chapter Summary

End of the year, and it's concert time for the boys.

Chapter Notes

CW: Smoking, drinking, allusions to drugs.

Spotify Playlist for this school year: https://open.spotify.com/playlist/5YHpqO4otGr4QkScIjL4oG
It includes every song referenced in the fic so far, so check it out if you like the vibes. There will be one for each school year. Let me know if you think I should release it ahead of time next time or at the end of the completed year, cheers!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

And I'm blinded by the neon,
Don't try and change my tune;
'Cause I thought I heard a saxophone,
I'm drunk on the moon…

- "Drunk on the Moon" Tom Waits, 1974

Thanks to the hubbub of move-out, no one noticed four boys meandering down the campus street in the warm summer air. Curfew wouldn't start for hours and though they wouldn't be present for it, the whole school was looking forward to what everyone called 'The Final Feast', a great dinner provided by the school for making it to the end of the year. For them, the plan was to meet Stan outside of the school's eastern gates, where they'd pile into the back of his car and make the long drive to the concert. There they'd have the time of their lives for a single evening before squishing into the sedan and making the trek back in the wee hours of the morning. According to Simeon, if all went well they'd return to school with plenty of time before their buses were scheduled to depart for the train stations. Then they could sleep in the car or on the bus or train, and no one would be the wiser.

After leaving the Shack behind, they returned to their dorm room one final time to drop-off Lily's camera and ensure that everything was tidy for their inspection. The day before Remus had experienced mixed feelings as he watched each of his friends pack their lives into a few measly trunks. Their dorm hadn't felt so empty since their first week and without Sirius' stereo or James' football posters hanging about, the room felt distinctly cold. Remus' corner had stayed rather bare all year apart from the constant stack of books by his side table, but after seeing the empty room he had silently promised himself that when he returned to Hawkings the following autumn, he would hang up something that claimed the space as his own. Lee could probably find him a few cool posters, or even a busted-up lava lamp. The others would definitely get a kick out of that.

"You don't think Lily will see this as us leaving her out again, do you?" James asked, staring down at the pavement as they made their way to the eastern gates.

Sirius shook his head, exasperated. "Who cares? She already forgave you for pulverizing Snivellus."

"I didn't actually hit him," James grumbled, "but I also don't fancy spending another year as 'Undesirable #1'. Do you?"

"There's only four tickets anyway," Remus said, amicably. "And we didn't tell the girls, so just keep your lips to yourself tonight and there won't be any problems."

As Peter and Sirius began to laugh, James flashed Remus an irritated smile. "What's it going to take to get you to stop being so vicious, Moony?"

"Stop calling me 'Moony' and we'll talk."

"Don't be so put-out, Potter," Sirius said, "if you really want a kiss I'm sure one of us can do it. Don't think Lily will mind that as much."

"Oh yeah? Come here then, Black. Put your money where your mouth is!"

With a hoot, Sirius streaked away and James gave chase immediately, cackling as he ran after him. Peter joined in too, and after finding himself suddenly giddy in the early night air, Remus burst into a run after his friends. Soon all four of them were sprinting down the street, yelling and hollering at the top of their lungs like the yobs they were. They passed other kids, dodging each of them as they mulled around out front of dorms, carrying books and other things that needed to be returned to the school before everyone left for home the next day. Among them were Cass and Deacon, pushing their dorm's telly up the street on a large cart.

“Where’s the party boys?” Cass called, as they all flew past. Remus turned around mid-run to shout back at him.

“Ask Sim!”

Cass shook his head at them, smiling, while Deacon leaned up against the cart for a break. Remus waved at them before turning around and running headlong into Peter, nearly taking them both to the ground.

“What are you doing, Pete?” He demanded, before looking up to find Sirius and James just ahead of them, standing in front of their Headmistress as she stepped down from the path leading up to Byron House. She was wearing that formal school robe of hers, her grey-streaked hair tied up in its usual, severe bun.

“Good evening, gentlemen,” McGonagall said, holding a clipboard out ahead of her.

“Good evening, Professor,” they all said, in varying levels of excitement.

“Not on your way to dinner?”

“No,” Sirius said quickly, “just meeting some friends. We’ll be heading to the hall after.”

“I see.” McGonagall took a moment to look them all over, and when she glanced at Remus he felt his eyes widen a bit. He hadn’t spoken to the Headmistress since they’d gotten that earful for setting off the firecrackers on Sirius’ birthday—though neither Sirius nor James could claim as much, having been in detention much more recently than he had.

“I’m afraid I haven’t made it to Godric House yet,” McGonagall said, looking down at her clipboard. “I assume though that dorm 4A’s inspections will come away nicely?”

“Sparkling,” James said, honestly. “We’re already finished packing in fact.”

The Headmistress raised a thin eyebrow. “How wonderful that you’re all so punctual. I seem to remember you leaving a few things behind last year.”

All three of Remus' friends puckered, and James finally managed to spit out an answer.

"Yes, well, not this year."

"Good," the Headmistress said, smiling, "because I would hate to see such a mess stain your records again. I might even have to consider continuing detentions next term."

"Don't worry professor," Sirius said, having swallowed whatever laughter that had been tempting him, "everything is spick and span this year."

"No chickens then?"

"No chickens!" Peter chirped.

"Wonderful. In that case I hope all of you boys have wonderful summers, and I look forward to seeing each and every one of you again in the fall."

Remus did not miss her pointed look in his direction.

"The feeling is mutual, Professor," Sirius promised.

"Goodbye, my 4A boys," she said, before moving around them and continuing up the pavement toward the next dorm. Watching her go, Remus waited only a moment before he smacked James and Sirius on the shoulder.

"Chickens, really?"

"We may have borrowed some from the Agricultural barn at the end of last year as a little surprise," James confessed. "I assume they all made it back after the cleaners found them."

"I quite liked that prank," Peter said, "stealing the chickens was Miles' idea. Too bad he wasn't around to see it."

At the mention of Miles, Remus looked to Sirius, who glanced up from the ground with a thoughtful smile.

"Yeah well, we still pulled it off." Surging forward, Sirius locked his arms around both James and Remus' necks, bending them together into a circle in the middle of the pavement. James grabbed Peter and Remus did the same, until all of their foreheads were nearly pressed together.

“And we’re gonna do even better next year,” Sirius promised. “More pranks, more parties, more music—screw school. They’re gonna remember us.”

“Like The Three Musketeers,” James supplied.

“There’s still four of us,” Peter said, “the name’s misleading.”

Remus smiled and nodded. “Pete’s right, we need a new name. Something other than that and ‘the 4A boys’.”

“Messers?” Peter offered.

Sirius shook his head. “No, it’s too tame. And besides, that was the old us—we need something more interesting. A good moniker.”

“The Lost Boys,” James tried, but that too was shot down.

“Nope, those suckers ended up going back to crummy old London to grow up. I never want to grow up, least not the way they all want us to. We’ll just have to find a name of our own.”

Remus locked eyes with Sirius. “We’ve got time.”

“Yeah,” Sirius said with a wink, “we do.”

“Well,” Peter started, unwrapping one arm from James to take a glance at his watch, “not really. We’re supposed to be meeting Stan right now.”

“Oh shit.”

They all unravelled from one other and set off down the lane again, almost shoulder to shoulder in the middle of the street. When they’d finally made it to the east gate, where they’d be meeting their ride, Sirius reached into a bush set up against the school’s brick wall and produced two bottles of booze, both wrapped in a brown paper bag.

“Refreshments for later,” he explained, “one for us to pre-drink, and one to tip Stan.”

James took one of the bottles and peeled back the paper, revealing a very rich-looking bottle of Hennessy. Tomny and Lee would’ve killed for a sip.

“You jammy bastard,” James breathed. “Where’d you get these?”

“I know a guy,” Sirius smirked.

“And you say Lupin holds out on us.”

“Well I can’t pick a lock avec les doigts dans le nez.”

“I don’t know what you said but I feel insulted,” Remus said.

“Um, lads?”

“It wasn’t an insult,” Sirius grinned. “An insult would’ve been to say ‘j’ai eu un coup de foudre pour toi’.”

“I’ll coo your foodruh.”

James snorted. “Black, your language must be atrocious if even Moony's scandalised.”

“Oi, Lads?”

“Je t’aime aussi, Potter.”

“Can you understand him?” Remus asked.

“No, I don’t speak the ‘le francais’, I have my hands full just trying to understand my mum when she shouts at me in Hindi.”

“And your parsi accent is abysmal. I’m on team Mum.”

“Up yours, Black.”

“Laaaads!”

The three of them turned to Peter, who was standing at the middle of the wrought-iron gates, shaking a thick padlock back and forth vigorously.

“It’s locked.”

James approached the gate and looked up, a hand over his eyes to block out the sun. Like the rest of the brick wall, the top of the gate was decorated with nasty-looking spikes, probably old and rusty enough to give you tetanus after one misstep.

“Think we could try and scale the top?”

“Why don’t you suck it and see, Potter,” Sirius said, tucking one of the bottles into his jacket.

“Well how about the lock then? Think you could bust this open, Lupin?” James asked, squinting at the heavy-duty padlock.

Remus reached for his back pocket. “Don’t need to.” Pulling out the Hawkings map, he unfolded it and traced the line that indicated the school’s outer wall until he found the east gate. Like he’d thought, he found a little note he’d scribbled in just before Halloween.

“Over here.” Turning, Remus walked back toward the bushes, and after a few confused glances, his friends followed.

It took a few minutes for Remus to find the right spot (the bushes were thicker the further you got from the gate) but eventually they came upon it; a small hole in the brick wall, big enough for a single body to slide through. The bricks around the hole were worn away like whoever had done it had spent countless hours whittling away at the mortar until they could pry bits of the wall away one at a time.

“No fucking way,” Sirius breathed, after pushing aside the bushes to get a look. Remus smiled a bit to himself and ducked his head to squeeze through, emerging on the other side of the wall. James followed him, then Sirius and Peter.

“Moony, how’d you know that was there?” Peter asked, awestruck.

Remus waved the map around. “I found it.”

Sirius snatched the map out of his hand and turned it so the rest of them could get a look. “You just found this? Where?”

“I meant the hole,” Remus said, suddenly feeling more shy than he had a moment ago. “The map’s mine.”

Three pairs of eyes—one grey, one brown, one blue—all widened at the same time.

“When the hell did you have time to figure all this out?” Peter asked, tracing the spot on the map where Remus had walked the edge of Lake Dubh and marked off all the spots where the usually-muddy beach gave way to decent bits of sand. “You must’ve walked forever.”

“All the times I was trying to hide from you lot, mostly. And I happen to like walking.”

“That’s it!” Sirius cried. “No more holding out on each other—no more bloody secrets! Do you know what I could’ve gotten done this year if I had this sort of information?”

Remus shrugged. “Probably would’ve had a lot more detentions.”

“Moony, you git. First the Shack and now this! When we get back you’re going to explain everything aaaannnd how you just so happened to find a secret passageway your first year here!”

Remus snatched the map back, folding it up. “It’s just a hole in the wall, you drama queen.”

“It’s a bloody cool hole in the wall, Lupin,” James said. “Last year we had to crawl out the rubbish chutes next to the science building just to get outside.”

Remus grimaced. The bins around the Galilei Block smelt terrible, mostly thanks to the biology department. He couldn’t imagine wiggling their way out that way to get to a party had been very pleasant.

“I wanna see that again later,” Sirius warned. “It’s an entire map designed for pranking.”

“I didn’t make it for pranks. I made for—”

“We know what you made it for, Moony,” James said, holding two fingers to his lips and giving an exaggerated inhale.

“Doesn’t matter what you made it for originally,” Sirius said, “because we’re going to use it. And then just maybe, we’ll make a true prankster of you yet.”

As his friends started up the road on the outside of the school wall, Remus tucked the map back into his pocket opposite Sirius’ photograph and followed. He never would’ve admitted it, but he was —very secretly—just the tiniest bit pleased.

They found Stan a ways down the road, leaning against the hood of his car while smoking and reading the paper. He waved indifferently before dropping it closed and grunting at them to get in; “I’m paid by the night, not the hour, so let's get moving.”

Piling into the rusty old Ford Escort ended up being more eventful than they’d anticipated. Sirius had immediately called bagsy and despite Peter's moaning, hopped in the passenger's front seat, practically vibrating with excitement.

"First concert or first time in the front seat?" Stan asked, obviously kidding.

"Both!"

Stan gave him an incredulous look and Sirius just shrugged. "We have drivers."

The drive passed by slowly, perhaps because Sirius was not the only one having trouble sitting still. Stan held a monopoly on the radio of course, but it being the Scottish Highlands, the only station they could get a decent signal on was some local channel that took turns playing church songs and disco, and none of them could decide which was worse. Eventually Stan spared them by turning the radio off completely.

Peter and James passed the time in the backseat by playing a game they called 'bumps' which essentially just involved punching each other every time the car hit a pothole. Remus lasted all of fifteen minutes before begging Stan to pull over so he could switch spots with Sirius, who didn't mind really, since he'd turned around in his chair halfway through to join them.

When fields and hills began to fall away in favour of well-travelled roads and (thank god) pavement, Remus perked up in his seat and reached behind him to bat at his friends' knees. Somehow they'd all fallen asleep on each other's shoulders and he'd been left to stare out the window on his own, just grateful that Stan wasn't much of a chatterbox.

"I'm awake!" Both Sirius and James said in unison, blinking the sleep from their eyes as they looked around. They were just outside of town now, and the radio was alight with actual music, courtesy of a local disc jockey named 'Slim Jim MacDuff'.

"Shit, we almost there?" Sirius asked, reaching forward to tap Stan's shoulder.

The trolley driver shoved him off, but nodded. "The show's happenin' downtown, 'cording to your tickets."

Sirius snapped his fingers. "Moony, quick, pass me the stuff."

He was about to ask what he meant before Sirius pointed down at his feet, where the bottles of Hennessy had been rolling around since they'd left Hawkings. He handed him one of the bottles, and Sirius crushed up the paper bag before tearing away the foil covering the cork. "Shit."

Remus sighed. All these rich prats and never a single corkscrew. "Hand it here."

Sirius did so, and Remus pulled out his keys before realising that the cork was only made of wood. Fancy shit. Wrapping his teeth around it, he pried it back until the bottle opened with a dull pop.

Remus passed it back as Sirius grinned. "Cheers lads," he said, before taking a deep gulp. When he pulled back from the lip of the bottle he grimaced, and Stan laughed at him in the rearview mirror.

"Little boys shouldn't be drinking a man's drink anyway."

"We've got a bottle for you," James said, taking the booze from Sirius and taking his own swig.

"But you're not going to drink it until we're back at school," Remus said pointedly. He'd seen enough wasted chavs to know that downing an entire bottle would not make the twisting roads back to Hawkings any easier of a drive.

"Jus' mind your own, smart-mouth," Stan advised. "Pettigrew paid me for my petrol and my time, not to tolerate any lip."

Stifling a glare, Remus sat back in his seat just as Peter passed him the Hennessy bottle. It burned on the way down, of course, and made him a little ill in the pit of his stomach, but it was still nothing compared to alley juice or Lee's scrumpy.

"You better chug that, lads," Stan advised. "Show's starting in thirty minutes."

That certainly ignited a fire beneath their sixteen year-old arses. They passed the bottle around like it was an Olympic sport until it was finally empty and all of them were considerably more rattled in the head and gut.

"I feel gross," James hiccuped, staring down at his shoes and swaying.

"You toss it in my back seat and I'll leave you stranded on the curb!"

Sirius spent the rest of the short ride patting his friend on the back, and by the time Stan pulled up outside the pub, each of them were right buzzed and that first-drink queasiness had mercifully passed.

“I’ll meet you a street over after the show,” Stan said out his window. “Don’t make me wait!”

They waved goodbye as the Escort pulled away from the curb, and then for good measure, each of them shot the car’s boot the bird and turned to race into the pub.

“You go first, Lupin,” Sirius said, pushing Remus ahead of him.

“What? Why?”

“Because you’re the tallest! They ain't gonna ask if you're eighteen.” Sirius plucked the sunglasses off the front of Remus’ shirt. “Pete, put these on.”

“But it’s dark out.”

“Just do it.”

“No one’s going to say anything anyway,” Remus grumbled, but Peter had already shrugged and put the glasses on, leaving him to resist the urge to snatch them back.

They stood on the street outside of the club, its sign flashing the name "Dice’s Attic" in neon over their heads. They waited in line to get inside behind a small group of girls who were all wearing dark lipstick and tight miniskirts, and who had immediately begun to whisper and giggle once Sirius flashed them a smile.

Once they were inside—the guy ripping tickets had barely looked at any of them before waving them on ("Told you, Black.")—the four of them went straight to the bar and Sirius ordered several shots, handing the bartender a small wad of cash.

“Where did you get the dosh?” Remus had to shout to be heard over the music. The band hadn’t come on stage yet, but the stereos lining every wall were blasting rock and roll music at full volume. He followed his question up by reaching over to Peter and plucking his sunglasses off his face, much to Peter’s disappointment.

“I liked those,” he whined to James.

Sirius knocked his vodka shot against Remus'. "I made a good deal!" He smiled and downed the booze in one go, and they each ordered another, drinking right up until Dick Very and the Headways made their appearance at the front of the club, when they were all well and truly knackered.

The band played a mixture of their own songs and covers just to keep the crowd involved, and though none of them knew any of the originals, it hardly mattered; the music was everything. People crowded the little stage, girls fawning over the band members so ferociously they might as well have been Led Zeppelin themselves. Near the front of the stage, Sirius was in his element. The Headways could've played the same church songs they'd heard in Stan's Escort for all he seemed to care; as long as the room was moving, he was too. He hooted and screamed, and when he knew the words he sang along. The crowd cheered with him until Remus thought his hearing was going to be shot for good, every moving body in the room infected with the same energy. James had to keep hold of Peter, who seemed very intent on joining a table of punks on the far side of the room. In turn, Remus kept hold of James, who had always been the least coordinated version of himself while drinking. Sirius was content to bounce around all of them, head-banging perfectly in time with each song.

'Rockin' and rollin',
Pumpin' and thumpin';
You got my rabbit heart going motorway speed,
I'm telling you, baby, you're the only one I need!'

As the lead singer belted out the chorus of their only half-decent original song, the crowd went crazy, fist-banging the air with the tempo. Drunk and living for the thrill of each note, Remus swayed between his friends, cheering and hollering at the top of his lungs along with everyone else. They definitely owed Simeon his own bottle of Hennessy and then some for setting it all up.

As the band was finishing up a Black Sabbath cover, Remus felt a tap on his shoulder and turned to find one of the girls who'd stood in front of them outside of the club. She smiled up at him, her mouth moving like she was saying something, but her voice was too quiet and Remus just shook his head, pointing to his ears.

"Can't hear you!"

Undeterred, the girl pressed up onto the tips of her high heels and grabbed his neck with one hand, putting them chest-to-chest. Her lips brushed his ear, sending a shiver down his neck and immediately Remus pulled back like she'd given him an electric shock. As he did, the smile vanished from her face and she turned, quickly fleeing back through the crowd.

"MOONY!" Sirius barked next to him, apparently having witnessed the whole thing. "WHAT ARE YOU DOING YOU NUTTER? SHE WANTED TO SNOG YOU!"

Remus looked at Sirius like he was crazy. "How could you know that? We barely said a word to each other!"

Sirius shook his head like he was a lost cause and as the song ended Remus leaned in closer.

"You go then!" He shouted. "If you're so inclined!"

Sirius drew back with a funny expression, but nodded, turning his nose up a bit. "Fine!"

He pulled his arm from around James' neck and slipped past him, disappearing into the crowd in the direction the girl had gone.

"Where's he going?" James hollered, just as the music started up again.

"I don't care!" Remus snapped.

"What?"

"DON'T CARE!"

"PRAYER? SIRIUS DOESN'T PRAY!"

Using his thumb, Remus indicated toward the bar and then the floor. "STAY HERE!"

"YEAH SURE, I'LL TAKE A BEER!"

Patting James on the shoulder, Remus squeezed through the rest of the crowd until he emerged on the far side of the pub and was able to park himself by the bar top. Sirius had given him a little cash after their first round, and he used it to order whatever was on tap. If the bartender cared that Remus had barely begun to show the wisps of facial hair, he said nothing and simply passed him a tall glass of beer. It was much darker in colour than anything he'd ever had in Tomny's flat but he drank deeply anyway, appreciating the low buzz it kept going at the back of his head. Stan had called the Henessey a man's drink, but Remus disagreed. Beer was a man's drink, if only because it could be found everywhere from sports stadiums to funerals. Having been around enough bitter chavs, Remus was pretty sure he knew why men drank; men drank to feel familiar, to wind-down at the end of a long day, but most of all they drank because they were afraid of the Almighty beyond.

Maybe that was why boys didn't know how to drink; they didn't have the fear of God ingrained into them yet. They would one day—everyone did—but for now, they were God incarnate, or at the very least, beautiful, defiant angels. God had created Sirius in all his wannabe-rockstar glory. He gave him his grey eyes, those slender musician's fingers, a sharp tongue and an even sharper wit, and most of all, He gave him his talent. That, and his ability to love so fiercely it sometimes hurt. It was a love that was especially painful when you couldn't understand why it stung in the first place, and it was scarily akin to how it felt to watch Sirius Black from across a crowded pub as he shoved his tongue down another girl's throat.

Clutching his man's beer, Remus stared across the room at Sirius. He'd done exactly as he'd said he would; he and the same girl from before were straddling each other at another bar top, hands fisted in each other's clothes, faces locked together without so much as a care as who was around to see it. No one else noticed of course—there were enough fraternizing couples around they could've filled half of Wembley Stadium—but Remus had seen it, and he had an indescribable urge to be anywhere but there.

Desperate for another distraction he felt around his pockets for his cigarettes, but Sirius had them, and Remus wasn't about to march across the room and ask for them back while he had his hands up the girl's cherry-red tube top with "Whole Lotta Love" playing in the background. So instead he abandoned his drink and rushed out to the front of the pub, emerging onto the pavement. Outside was little more than a cloudy haze of hash and cigarette smoke, but the air was cooler and Remus took several deep breaths as though his addiction could be satiated just by breathing in the second-hand smoke.

"Wanna bum a smoke?"

Remus glanced sideways to find another kid, who couldn't have been much older than him, standing just outside another circle of teenagers. He had spiky blonde hair and was wearing eyeliner.

“Yeah, thanks,” Remus grunted, accepting the cigarette and light. The kid nodded and looked him up and down before turning back to his group of friends. Remus watched him, taking short puffs, and finally the kid turned back, smiling slyly and indicating with his head for him to join them. Obliging, Remus stepped up, casually nodding to a few of them as they chittered back and forth over the dull roar of the pub’s music.

He learned the blonde kid’s name was Ashley, and he and all his friends were from Elgin, but were following the band around the Highlands just for something to do. They got a bit of a kick out of Remus’ accent, but Dick Very and the Headways were from Birmingham, which might as well have been another world to the Scottish teens, so none of them questioned why he’d come to the show.

"Ye come tae many o' these things?" Ashley asked him, passing a spliff along.

"Yeah," Remus lied, taking the joint. "Er—my friends and I just got done seeing this American band, Aerosmith, dunno if you've heard of them."

"Na, ah haven't. They any good?"

"Yeah, totally."

Ashley smiled at him again and another girl appeared between them, her eyes rimmed with dark kohl and covered up to her elbows with bangled bracelets.

“You’re gey tall,” she said, stepping up to Remus and holding her hand up to measure herself against his height. She only came up to his shoulder.

“London rains a lot so we grow like weeds,” he said.

“What?”

Remus bent down to repeat himself in her ear and she giggled. Then she turned her face to kiss him.

"C'mon, Aoife," Ashley scoffed, but then there was a chorus of laughs.

Her kiss had surprised him at first—mainly because of how easy she'd made it—but suddenly Remus didn't care. He kissed her back, letting her wrap her bangled-arms around his neck and gently push him up against the wall of the pub. He knew they had an audience, but if Sirius could handle it then so could he.

It was James who found him first, or more accurately, James who stumbled out the front doors of the pub and promptly threw up off the curb. Remus spotted him over Aoife's shoulder and pulled away. “Sorry, s'my mate."

"Find me efter?" Aoife murmured against his jaw.

"Sure." He pulled apart from her and pat Ashley on the shoulder. "Nice talking to you. Thanks for the cigarettes.”

Stepping away, Remus crossed to James and gathered him into his arms, leading him to the other side of the street where he could regurgitate his dinner away from the crowd.

“Here,” he said, passing James one of the half-smoked cigs Ashley had given him. He relight it for him and once he’d calmed down, James smoked it until there was nothing left but ash.

“Where’s Sirius and Pete?” Remus asked.

“Making new friends,” James answered. “You’re supposed to do that at a pub, yeah?”

“Yeah,” Remus said bitterly, trying to push the image of Sirius and the red tube top from his mind. “I’m going to go find Pete,” he said, patting James on the shoulder once before standing.

“I’ll come with you.”

“No, just stay here.”

“I’m not sick anymore!” James drunkenly insisted. He staggered to his feet and used that uncanny strength of his that came with being an amateur football god to grab hold of Remus’ shoulders so he was forced to lead him back across the street and into the show like a two-person conga line.

Eventually they found Peter, completely gassed and sitting between two blokes whose faces were made up of more metal than skin. It took some convincing, but Remus was able to pry him off the punks, who seemed as reluctant to part with Peter as kids with a new toy. They offered a baggy of pills in exchange for the three of them to stay and hang out, but Remus just shook his head and slung one of Peter's arms over his shoulder.

Staggering away with him, Remus snapped his fingers in front of Peter's face, but the portly boy didn't so much as blink. By now the band was about ready to finish their set. The lead singer shouted into the microphone, asking if they wanted an encore, and as the crowd cheered in response, fists thrown into the air, Remus caught sight of Sirius across the room, sitting at a table with a few girls.

"STAY HERE!" Remus barked at James, letting them both slump against the pub's wall. James flashed him a thumbs up and Peter matched him, though there was a strong chance he had no idea where he was anymore.

Still decently drunk himself, Remus stumbled a bit while crossing the room as the band took their break before the encore and the pub's own music returned. By the time he made it to the table he'd banged his knee on a toppled stool and was swearing like a sailor.

"Sirius!" He hissed, and both Sirius and the pair of girls looked over at him with lazy eyes. The one he'd snubbed earlier scowled, grabbing one of Sirius' arms. Despite the fact that it was hotter than hell inside the pub, she was wearing his suede jacket.

"Moony!" Sirius gasped. "There you are!"

"Yeah and it's time to go."

"The show isn't even over yet!" The suede-girl pouted.

"I think Pete took something," Remus said. Probably just to spite Simeon, who'd made them promise no drugs.

Sirius gave him a confused look. "Pete was just here." He looked around as though he hadn't realised he'd been apart from his friends for half the night.

"We're going," Remus ordered, and one of the girls snapped at him.

"Who are you, his boyfriend?"

"Shut up," he snarled. "And give that coat back."

Halfway back to James and Peter, Sirius moaned about needing to throw up, and Remus turned them toward the front doors. He could get the others later, provided they'd actually listened to him and stayed put.

The street outside was still littered with people, and a disappointed glance around told Remus that Ashley and his group had moved on, either back into the pub or elsewhere.

Dragging Sirius away from the haze, he set him down on a small patch of grass between the pavement and street that didn't look too damp (things were always damp in Scotland).

"Go on then, vomit," he quipped, and Sirius gave a little moan, turning away and slumping back against the side of the building, eyes closed as though it were the perfect place for a nap.

"Oi," Remus huffed, squatting down and lifting Sirius' chin, snapping his fingers a few times in front of his nose. "Wake up, you alkie."

Sirius blinked as though initially dazed and then gasped; "Remus! Did you hear all that?"

"Yeah," Remus drawled. "Your new friend really liked that jacket."

"No but like—did you HEAR that? The music? Oh my god, s'like it's in my bones!" Sirius waved his hands around like he always did when he spoke, though it always got more exaggerated when he was drunk. Remus shook his head and crouched down next to him on the grass.

"You shouldn't have drank so much."

"Oh-ho-ho-ho," Sirius chuckled, "I didn't. Haven't had anything since the vodka. Knight's honour."

"Why're you acting so pissed then?"

"... Might've took somethin'…"

Remus raised an eyebrow. "I'm telling Sim."

Sirius waved him off. "You really should try it, Moony. It feels like you're floating." He gasped suddenly. "Oh my god—floating! You could've floated up to the moon! You could've been the moon, Moony!"

"You're such an idiot," he scoffed, but Sirius only smiled at him. "I didn't agree to play mother hen all night, you know. I'm not any good at taking care of people."

“Nah, that’s horseshit,” Sirius said stubbornly. “You take care of people all the time, you jus’ won’t admit it. You took care of Lily and James. You got ‘em to stop fighting.”

“You did that.”

“Nah, I jus’ pushed you into it.”

“Oh? Sirius Black showing some humility? Now I’ve seen it all.”

“Take a picture why don’t you, tosser.”

Remus smiled and gently stroked the suede jacket in his hands. Sirius was lucky he hadn’t spilt anything on it, since suede was such a bitch to clean, according to Tonya. At least he hadn’t actually thrown up.

As they sat on the curb in silence Sirius began to sway his head to the pub music. Eventually that music stopped and was replaced by the sound of instrument feedback and finally, the band’s encore song, which Remus recognised immediately.

‘Is this the real life?
Is this just fantasy?
Caught in a landslide,
No escape from reality;
Open your eyes,
Look up to the skies and see…’

“Oh god, Moony, you hear that?”

Remus opened his eyes—he’d almost drifted off. “Yeah. Can’t believe this guy’s trying for Mercury’s range.”

Sirius shot to his feet, nearly falling over in the process. “We gotta go back in!”

“You can barely stand!”

“Then bloody carry me! If I have to spend the whole summer in exile, I’m going to hear this song live first!”

Staggering to his feet, Remus tied the suede jacket around his waist and relented. “Okay, Black. Okay.” He took Sirius’ arm again and they began limping back toward the crowd of heat and smoke as Sirius began to sing into his ear.

“Mamaaaaa… just killed a man… put a gun against his head… pulled my trigger now he's dead…"

Chapter End Notes

And there goes our final chapter of year 11. It's been amazing ride, and I can't wait to give you more. Stick around for summer 1976, and as always, rock on~

Slang dictionary:
'Calling bagsy' is the British slang equivalent of 'calling shotgun'.
A 'disc jockey' is a radio DJ. (It's where the term 'DJ' comes from.)
'Scrumpy' is A cloudy cider often high in alcoholic content.
'Dosh' is slang for money.
'Alkie' is slang for 'alcoholic'.

Chapter 30: Summer, 1976

Chapter Summary

Summertime. Remus goes home.

Chapter Notes

CW: Drugs, smoking, violence, homophobic language, the whole nine yards, really. Enjoy this work of fiction and be kind to yourselves! <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

No more pencils,
No more books,
No more teacher's dirty looks;
Out for the summer,
Out till fall;
We might not come back at all…

- "School's Out (For the Summer)" Alice Cooper, 1972

The summer of 1976 was the hottest recorded temperature the British Isles had experienced in more than three-hundred and fifty years. It was so hot that if one were to stand in one place for too long they risked letting the soles of their shoes melt to the pavement. Luckily for all of them, Tonya had the sense to push Tomny into buying an air-con, which they set up on the living room front window. In a country of radiators, the air-con was a welcome blessing. On the really rough nights, they would sleep bare on the floor in front of it, since even a blanket would leave one too hot to function.

Despite the dreadful heat Remus was happy to be back, and both Tomny and Tonya seemed perfectly eager to put him up for as long as need be, provided that he followed a few set ground rules. The first being that he kept his head low and his mouth shut.

Like he'd been expecting, the hold various gangs and mob groups had over the throat of the East End had solidified since Christmas. East of Aldgate Pump, they ran everything; if you had a rent to pay, you paid it to the mob. If you happened to be one of those blokes able to make an honest living, that honest living was in moral support of another mob. If you wiped your arse, you thanked that mob for the opportunity. The neighbourhoods still long-suffering from air-raids leftover from WWII were now ground zero for radical gang reunification. This naturally led to a new world order, one Tomny seemed adamant that Remus would have nothing to do with. He spent his entire first day back getting lectured on what he could and couldn't do. Tomny still managed to tip-toe around the real information, like what it is the boys were actually running now—narcotics of course. Gone were the days where they were just running money or bets for bookies or bulking up the protection rackets of Whitechapel Lane. No, they'd all moved on to bigger and better stuff, throwing their lot in with those who guaranteed it would be worth it. Provided they kept loyal and didn't get caught.

Remus had already seen clear evidence that the area's drug problem had only gotten worse—his friends' along with it—but there was also the violence; kids getting jumped in alley ways just for talking to the wrong person, guns showing up on the streets, more and more turf wars breaking out amongst the smaller groups. It was a far cry from the place the End had been when he'd left the year before, and Tomny made sure he knew it.

"You wanna stay? Then you're gonna to do what I fuckin' tell you," he said, with no room for argument. "If you wanna be around, you can stay with Tonya. Go with her when she goes out—it'll give Vint and Doss a break at least."

Remus had instantly soured at the thought of spending another holiday locked up in the flat. It wasn't the fact that he would be playing chaperone, but that it was summer and he wanted to go out and run the town with his boys, even if the heat would most definitely have killed them. The only problem with that wish though, was that none of them were boys anymore.

"You understand?" Tomny snapped when Remus didn't answer. "Ain't a game no more."

"Never thought it was a game," Remus shot, defensively. Tomny's eyes tightened, before his shoulders dropped and he shook his head with a smile.

"You know I love you, Lu." Tomny got up from his recliner and pulled Remus into a hug. He hugged back, feeling the ache in his chest that had been there since last Christmas, as Tomny rubbed his back and spoke into his hair. "Jus' don't want you gettin' too caught up. Fun's fun, but life always catches up."

Being stuck inside the flat again made Remus wonder what Tonya's life was like when he wasn't around. It had to be lonely, staying cooped up while your boyfriend and his yobs peddled others' goods, but Tonya kept herself busy by cooking, reading, listening to music or else taking care of the tiny box garden she'd set up on the flat's balcony. All of the plants looked limp and frail in the intense heat, but Tonya watched and watered them religiously, no matter how brown they seemed to get.

"You should let me cut that hair of yours," Tonya would push at least three times a day. "Can't go back to school looking like a mutt off the street."

He'd eventually let her, and she'd done a good job, all things considered. It felt good to get some of the bulk off the back of his sweaty neck, though Tomny had been slightly disappointed there was now less 'Lu hair' to ruffle.

To pass the time he and Tonya read to each other. Since he'd been there last, a small shelf had taken up residence in the corner of the living room and was now overflowing with books of all genres. Most of them had been collected second-hand from various bits and bobs shops and were missing pages but Tonya didn't seem to mind. A natural storyteller, she used her soothing voice to read aloud to him, occasionally throwing in bits of French and Russian just to keep him on his toes. Sirius would've enjoyed it, having been able to understand her better than Remus could've, and like him, Tonya was a romantic. She'd collected countless novels where the lead rode off into the sunset with their true love, or else died tragically just before achieving eternal happiness. Those weren't the books he liked to read to her, really. Instead when she pushed for him to show off, Remus would always choose a more melancholy story; one he could enjoy without having to monologue extensive love confessions.

If his reading was ever boring Tonya never said so, and when Tomny came home they took turns reading to him until he'd passed out from the day's exhaustion or had smoked or drank himself into a stupor. Days passed like that, and Remus found himself falling into a routine. It felt like Hawkings almost; wake up, get baked, eat breakfast, read or watch TV, eat lunch, maybe play cards with Tonya and whoever happened to be around at the time. Then they'd smoke some more, make dinner, eat again, put on an album, and start drinking or smoking all over again. Or, Remus would; Tonya never stopped getting high, and eventually it occurred to him that he'd probably never seen her sober, but that was a commonality. The only thing that set her apart from the rest of the boys was her routine bathing habits. How she tolerated a steaming bath when it was already so hot out, was beyond him.

The first time Tonya locked herself in the bathroom it took until around the two hour mark for Remus to get really nervous. He began pacing the living room, thinking of all the horrible things that could happen to someone high off their arse in a bathroom. What if she'd passed out in the tub? Or fallen and hit her head on the edge of the sink?

Unable to stomach the idea of telling Tomny that he'd let his girlfriend accidentally drown herself, Remus pounded on the bathroom door until Tonya opened it wrapped in only a towel.

"Jesus Christ, what? " She demanded, holding her head.

Remus retreated back from the door a few steps. "Thought you'd drowned."

Tonya blinked at him, and then burst into laughter, nearly dropping her towel. "Oh, sweet, sweet love."

After that came the knocking, which had been Tonya's idea—a system to keep him from having to interrupt or otherwise go insane with worry. Every once in a while, when he started to feel antsy, Remus would knock on the bathroom door and Tonya would respond in one of two ways; two knocks for 'I'm okay' and one for 'I need help'. No knocks meant 'I'm already dead, bury me with white roses', which Remus only had to worry about one time, after Tonya had submerged herself beneath the water and didn't hear him.

Eventually though she would emerge, smiling, skin steaming, and they'd sit together on the living room couch, listening to music while the noise of the End drifted in through the open windows. It was mostly the moments he was alone with Tonya that Remus' mind drifted to his mother, and since they were alone a lot, Hope Lupin occupied a significant space in his brain for the month of July.

What flowers had Hope been buried with? It should've been her favourite flower, that seemed kindest. But if ten year-old Remus had ever asked what that was, he'd long since lost the memory. It was funny really, how the only ones you wanted to forget stuck around. Maybe it was the guilt, the kind that shouldn't belong to children but did anyway; the sort that woke you up at night screaming questions there would never be answers to.

It sounded like a song. A sad song.

Some days, when they could bear to be away from the air-con for longer than fifteen minutes, they'd go out. Never very far, mostly to the local market to window-shop or pick up that day's shopping. Tonya loved the florists the most, and it was during one of these rare trips out that Remus learned that she'd always wanted to open a flower shop of her own.

"Roses," she said, leaning down to smell a bouquet of yellow flowers, "they're my favourite—white especially. As a little girl I used to imagine that I had this cart I pushed up and down the streets, peddling my white roses."

"So you don't just want to be buried in them?" Asked Remus.

"Well, if I sold them then you could bury me in my own roses. Sounds sort of romantic, don't it?"

"Or morbid."

"Romance always is, somehow."

"Why white though? Why not red?"

"Too traditional. White is the colour of purity and freshness… of good things and new beginnings."

"Cocaine's white."

"Oh yes, well, coke too."

It was an easy existence, and pretending as though Tomny's problems were his problems helped Remus forget that he had spent nearly a year out of London, where he'd met new people and learned things about himself that he still wasn't entirely sure were for the better. Those people demanded parts of him that no one in the East End ever had. They wanted not only his thoughts but his feelings too. They wanted to be important and yet somehow still felt like it was okay to be at odds sometimes. It was the strangest sense of loyalty he'd ever experienced, and having to go back to Hawkings in September was going to hurt like no other, but still Remus remained conflicted.

Conflicted, because no matter how much he loved Tomny and the others, and no matter how much he hated going back to his father's estate, he was—very secretly—looking forward to seeing his friends again.

James, Peter, and the girls had all given their phone numbers to keep in touch over the summer months, but Remus had hardly been home since being back in London, and Tomny didn't have a phone. It had only been different for Sirius, who had subtly admitted that he wouldn't have much chance to call. Instead he'd given Remus the address of one of the boys who worked in his family's estate's kitchen who could be trusted to pass letters along to him without his mother knowing. Remus had given his address too, to be polite mostly, but being chatty over the phone was hard enough; what did you even put in a letter? The only written correspondence Remus had ever received were formal complaints from his schools about his poor behaviour and condolence letters following Hope's death from people he hardly knew.

He'd never read any of them.

Sirius might've, and then he might've used those feelings of anger and sadness to write a song; a tortured artist through and through. Using their empty words as inspiration, he would've twisted the sympathy or accusations into his own disillusioned rhapsody, and anyone who heard it would've fallen in love.

Honestly, the whole affair sounded exhausting.

* * *

It took until the end of July before Remus finally fessed up about Lily, and even then he couldn't bring himself to say that he'd lied about having a girlfriend, just that they'd had a very amicable break-up after Christmas. Tonya, of course, didn't believe a word.

"So, tell me again, why did she dump you?"

"I wasn't dumped."

"Right," Tonya nodded, " 'Remus Lupin was not dumped. It was a mutual break up. You just wanted different things'." She spoke like she was reading off a script.

It had been stupid to lie in the first place. Remus didn't like Lily—well he did, but only as a friend—James liked Lily, and the idea of him finding out that he'd tried to pass his childhood crush off as his own girlfriend made him more queasy in the stomach than Lee's alley juice and the Hennessy put together. It was a secret he was determined to take to his grave, at least as far as his Hawkings' friends were concerned.

"Too bad though," Tonya continued, kicking a stone out of her path with the tip of her sandal. "I would've liked to meet the girlie that could charm your tender heart."

"Sarcasm is a disease and we're all infected," Remus said, and then; "You know she lives in Liverpool anyway."

"Mhm." She was smiling.

"We're still friends."

"Oh wonderful. S'good to have friends."

As they walked, Remus readjusted the paper shopping bag in his arms. Tonya had decided that morning that she'd make a loaf for dinner, and since they'd run out of eggs and milk the day before it meant a trip to the local market was in order. Remus didn't mind—it got them both out of the house, a rarity in the last couple of weeks, as Tomny had grown increasingly paranoid. He never said why, but the blinds were to be kept closed at the flat at all times, and unless you knew someone was coming over and they didn't have the key, the front door was never to be opened. At first Remus thought it was the drugs—there were more narcotics and artillery scattered around the flat than ever, though most of it wasn't intended for the people that lived there—but Tomny was hardly the only one who had turned manic.

Lee had taken to walking around with a loaded pistol, something Remus had nearly dropped out of shock after he'd discovered it in the pockets of the other boy's jacket while digging around for a lighter. Tonya had screamed at him until he got it out of the flat, and made everyone promise that no weapons would be allowed so close to home. Everyone had deferred to Tomny at that of course, but he acquiesced to his girlfriend's wishes and from then on no one brought so much as a kitchen knife out outside of meal times.

Afterwards Remus had rebuffed himself for being so shocked over the gun. He should've been used to it—Lyall had a staggering collection of hunting rifles, and Remus had even fired one himself when he was fourteen. He'd never had much interest in guns or hunting, but after jimmying the lock on his father's safety case, he took the gun out into the back trees behind the estate to shoot at a few cans. It only took one shot to give himself a black eye after the gun's kickback smacked him dead in the face, but he'd gotten what he wanted.

That day he'd received his worst tongue-thrashing Lyall had ever given him. Remus had egged him on of course, thought for sure Lyall would smack him in the other eye, but nothing. Two days later he was off to another school, this time in Croydon.

The guns and the paranoia began to make sense the evening he stepped out onto the balcony for a smoke and noticed a couple bodies standing across the street. At first he just assumed they were loitering —you got a lot of drifters in the End—but then they'd pointed at the flat, directly where he was standing and Remus felt the hairs on his arms and legs stand up. It was dark and there were hardly any street lamps in Tomny's neighbourhood, which meant getting a look at their faces from such a distance was near impossible. Remus crept back inside and watched them for a bit through cracks in the blinds while The Animals played off the turntable, and eventually group turned and shuffled back up the street.

When he'd brought the strange encounter up to Tomny the response had been to smoke inside, keep the doors locked, and stop going out. Tonya seemed bothered by the extra-level of isolation, but apart from Tomny and a few random acquaintances she didn't have any other friends in East London, so she kept her mouth shut and smoked whatever Tomny brought home to keep herself busy.

Why aren't you leaving? A tiny voice would echo in Remus' mind. Going back to the estate would've been the smarter idea, and Tomny had even hinted at it a few times, but since he had to assume that Remus' home-life wasn't as spiffy and sunny as a heritage estate in Blackheath should've been, he never pushed him into leaving.

"You jus' worry about going back to school," Tomny would say, leaning up against Remus' shoulder on the couch. He'd started doing that more; the recliner would be abandoned in favour of the two of them sidling up on the sofa next to each other, usually with Tonya draped over their laps like a cat. It had happened so often that Tonya had started calling herself Cleopatra. Tomny was her Caesar, and Remus, her Mark Antony.

"Caesar?" Tomny had said. "He's the Roman bloke, yeah? King of his own empire—got all the statues? Bet he lived a life."

Remus hadn't the heart to tell him.

The only good thing to come out of the widespread paranoia was the telephone, which had appeared unceremoniously in the kitchen one day. Remus had had the instant inclination to call James or one of the girls, but he'd left their numbers back home in his school trunk. Resigning himself to just apologise for the lack of communication when he went back to Hawkings in the fall, he ignored the obvious neglect and instead threw himself into another book reading with Tonya, this time narrating with fervent enthusiasm. It was clear anyway that Tomny wasn't going to allow him to not go back to school, and if he was being honest with himself, things in the End had changed more than he had been banking on when he pictured himself running away from the college all those months ago.

"Remus, come look at this!"

Turning back to Tonya, Remus snapped himself out of his daze. She'd stopped outside a pub and was staring at a noticeboard.

"We agreed no getting side-tracked," he said, stepping up behind her. The flier she was staring at advertised a live show by Eddie and the Hot Rods, some pub band from Essex.

Tonya tutted. "We should go see it. I miss live music, there's nothing like it."

Remus agreed with her of course. He'd spent the better half of the summer humming along to the tune of Dick Very and the Headways' "Rabbit Heart", but he couldn't remember all the words and Tonya had never heard of them.

They looked for a little longer at the notice board, taking in all the sun-bleached handbills and ads for car boot sales, before Remus knocked their elbows together. "C'mon, Tomny said he'd be back before six."

Nodding her head slowly, Tonya stepped back from the noticeboard and turned to follow him home. Eventually the more crowded market streets gave way to their familiar neighbourhood, roads lined with rubbish and the familiar smell of burning tar and rubber. It didn't suit Tonya, with her long lashes and even longer legs, and Remus was reminded of Christmas.

“You still thinking of moving?” He asked her.

Tonya shrugged, lacing her arm in his. “Dunno where I’d go.”

“There are nicer parts of London, you know.”

“Oh I know, but Tomny’s here and it’s not exactly easy to hold down a job with a blow habit.”

Remus could’ve winced at her blasé attitude. “You’re startlingly self-aware sometimes.”

“I try,” she winked.

They made a left at the local off-license and Remus almost stopped to go in, but they didn’t bring enough money with them for both booze and the shopping.

“What about Asia?” He asked. “Thought you were going to dip again?”

“Gotta have money for the ticket.”

“And Tomny wouldn’t give it to you?”

“No… I think he would, but he’d see it as me abandoning him. He’d never leave London.”

There was nothing to be said about that, because she was right. It didn’t matter if he was born in some nowhere Scottish town, Tomny was a London-boy through and through. He’d die there, probably. Remus just hoped it was in his bed, in a better flat, at a ripe old age. Like fifty.

“And I would be abandoning him,” Tonya continued, looking down at her feet while they walked, “but that’s part of travel. You meet people, they change you—you change them, and then you start all over again in another place, with other people. It’s like taking a shower; rinse and repeat, then a few days later, you rise and repeat again.”

“Sounds like a waste of water.”

“You cheeky thing.”

They both shared a smile as they rounded the corner of the alley that connected them to the flat’s street. It was still light out and would be for some hours, and the days leading up to that moment had been quiet; perhaps the reason why they both had their guard down and why the group of strangers had been able to follow them all the way from the shops.

“Oi!” A rough voice barked from behind. Tonya jumped, still holding on Remus’ arm, and they both whirled around to see five bodies—boys or men, Remus wasn’t sure. It was hard to tell in a place where childhood was so often stolen away by circumstance.

“You Armstrong’s bitch?” The one in front asked. He had an Irish accent and his eyes were mean yet startling blue. His shirt sleeves were ripped away at the shoulders and he had dark heavy boots on despite the heat, same as all his friends. None of the guys were much taller than Remus, but each of them were bigger, and they crowded into the end of the alley as though they were nine feet tall.

“I’m nobody’s bitch, bitch,” Tonya spat.

The leader ignored her with a sick smile. “ 'e’s been skippin' out. Got’s a message for him.”

“Give it to him yourself, then!”

Remus took a breath. He was still holding the shopping bags, and Tonya’s hand had turned into a vice on his bicep. Despite her snappy retorts, he could practically hear the hitch in her breathing. The street was just behind them, the flat only one corner away. Would Tomny be back already? Would anyone be around?

“We would,” one of the cronies said, “ ‘cept no one can find 'im.”

“Slippery that one,” added another.

“So we’s thought you could pass the message along,” blue-eyes said, almost kindly.

Remus felt the gravel grind beneath his shoes as he slowly backed Tonya up toward the end of the alley. The group had advanced, taking bigger steps as though they weren’t afraid of scaring them off. Which made sense.

They were already scared.

“Armstrong owes. And the group’ll get what it’s owed.” He was only a few feet away now, but Remus couldn’t back up any faster without running, and he doubted either he or Tonya could outrun the group of them in a pair of beaten up trainers and beach sandals.

“We don’t have anything on us,” Remus said. Could he throw the shopping? How much time would a carton of eggs buy them?

“We only need you to take a message,” blue-eyes repeated, “nuffin' more. We’ll go after we’ve passed it on.”

“What’s the message?” Remus asked, his insides turning to ice.

“Wouldn’t you like to know, poofter.”

There was a round of nasty chuckles from the group. Then blue-eyes’ arm shot out towards them, but Remus was faster. He yanked Tonya back behind him, dropping the shopping bags to the ground, the sound of a shattering milk bottle echoing off the alley walls.

“Don’t touch her!”

Blue-eyes stared back in shock, but Remus didn’t wait. He shoved Tonya away from himself and turned, ready to scream at her to get away—to get someone, anyone—but he never got the chance. A hand clamped down on the back of his shirt, wrenching him backwards so harshly his feet came out from underneath him. He went to the ground on his back, the wind knocked out of him as he gaped up at the boiling sky. A moment later the sun was blotted out by a boot descending over his head, and what followed was a sickening crunch.

The pain was instantaneous. Over it Remus just barely heard Tonya scream his name.

“Don’t just stand there, one of you grab ‘er!”

With a mixture of a cry and a gurgle—he was choking on blood as it gushed from his nose—Remus threw himself onto his stomach and made a grab for the nearest pair of legs.

“TON—YA, RUN!”

“You little shit!”

More pain; this time from a kick to his ribs. Another boot caught him in the back, and as the beating started Remus had no choice but to curl in on himself, holding his arms over his head as the boys circled him.

It felt like an eternity. Remus was sure he’d never walk again. They’d broken his spine, pulverised his ribs—he couldn't even see anymore. There was blood in his eyes.

" 'Ere's your message!"

"Tomny's next if he don' own up!"

"Ya fucking bender!"

It would have been better if they'd shot him. He almost thought they did, when the sharp bang sounded and they all jumped back and scattered. Remus didn't move—afraid they might come back, but also because he couldn't feel his arms and legs. The rest of him felt like he'd been hit by a train.

A few moments after his beating had ceased, a set of heavy footsteps echoed across the gravel. Remus couldn't see who it was.

"That's hard cheese, lil' buggar."

A pair of big hands reached down and grabbed him, and Remus finally passed out.

* * *

And, what'll you do now, my blue-eyed son?
And, what'll you do now, my darling young one?

Waking up made Remus wish that Vint had aimed the pistol at him instead of the alley wall. By the grace of their bitter God, Tonya had managed to run screaming into the truck-sized man on his way home and he'd been the one to scare off the bleeders who'd jumped them, using a 9mm to shoot up the alleyway. Remus would later think how ridiculous it was for the only words he'd ever heard Vint say aloud was 'that's hard cheese', but for now he was too busy trying to keep perfectly still on Tomny's bed. Even the slightest movement had his entire body screaming in agony. He could've really used a magical healing potion at that moment. Luckily, there was plenty of magic medicine to be found.

He spent nearly a day and a half knackered with pain and drugs. They'd given him a couple of benzos to help him sleep through the really horrible bits, like when they'd snapped his nose back into place —though that had required some morphine beforehand, too. When he was finally coherent enough to speak he got no answers out of the boys, all of which were watching him with guilt and sympathy.

All except Tomny, who wouldn't see him at all.

"He's angry," Tonya said from her perch at the foot of the bed. She was smoking, but her hands were so shaky it had taken her several tries to light the cigarette.

"Wasn't my idea to get jumped," Remus said, before groaning. None of his limbs were broken, miraculously, but he shifted every now and then to keep from sweating into one spot on the bed, and his torso always screamed in objection.

"Not at you. At himself." Tonya sucked her cigarette. "He blames himself. Didn't think it was good to keep ya, but couldn't bring himself to send you off. Now he's angry."

Remus stared up at the ceiling. "Well. That's shit."

"Mhm."

Tonya passed him the cigarette.

* * *

Remus blinked awake to the sound of the air-con kicking on in the living room. It was a sound he'd never quite gotten used to, unlike the snoring from his roommates or the occasional sleepy grunts from the London boys.

The only light in the room came from the kitchen's oven lamp as it leaked yellow through the cracked bedroom door. He knew without looking that Tonya was asleep next to him on the bed. She'd hardly left his side except to go to the bathroom or to cook meals he refused to eat. It hurt to swallow. Breathing sucked too.

The real surprise came when he realised they were not alone. Tomny sat next to the foot of the bed in his patched recliner, nursing a beer bottle against the centre of his chest. He was staring at a spot at the wall, but his eyes snapped alert when Remus shifted on the bed.

“Where have you been?” Remus’ voice was hoarse but he didn’t want to ask for water in case Tomny left to go get it.

“Cleaning up.” It was obvious he didn’t mean the flat. “You’re gonna have a scar.”

Tomny indicated to his own nose with the beer bottle, and Remus resisted the urge to picture his face. Tonya had already said he had two black eyes, but the gnarly cut was clean at least.

“You should’ve been a shrink,” he said. “You’re so good at making people feel better.”

Tomny cracked a smile, but it disappeared quickly. “S'my fault.”

“Hm. Probably.”

“You shouldn’t be a shrink.”

“No shit.”

There was a bit of silence, and Remus felt his nerves spike. Silence with Tomny was a terribly lonely thing. He had to break it.

“It’s okay, you know. I’m not mad.”

Tomny sat up very quickly. “Well you should be! You should be blaming me! You should be fucking furious!”

“Don’t. You’ll wake Tonya.”

Tomny glanced at his girlfriend and slowly settled back into the chair. “Nah. She took some downers.”

Remus sighed and then winced as his chest twinged. “I want some.”

“I’ll get you some, but first we’re gonna talk.”

“…Okay.”

Tomny considered his beer for a long moment, then; “You gotta go home.”

Remus almost sat up himself. “What? No.”

“What do you mean fuckin' ‘no’, Lu? You got your ass beat a few yards from here. They came into our fuckin' backyard and tried to get at you and Tonya, two people they shouldn't have even known existed in the first place! And you're sayin no? Well, I say no. You gotta go."

"Go where?"

If Tomny hadn't looked up at him from the beer bottle Remus might've thought he'd had a chance at keeping up the charade, but he did, and he knew he was caught.

"To Greenwich," Tomny said sharply. "To Blackheath. To your fuckin' father."

Remus fisted the bed covers next to him. "No."

"Yes."

"No."

"Fucking yes!" Tomny slammed his hand down on the recliner's arm. "You're going! I shouldn't have let you come back in the first place! I was ready to let you go last summer, but you insisted on sticking around like a bad fuckin' cold."

Remus almost whimpered. "Why did you then? Why didn't you just send me packing, Tom?"

Tomny scoffed bitterly. "Because I was a fuckin' idiot, that's why. I should've kicked yer posh, pretending-arse to the curb. Sent ya back to that fancy house with a fat lip so you'd have stayed away."

"How long have you known?" Remus asked, his lower-lip trembling.

"I've always known."

"What the fuck are you on about?"

Tomny let out a breath. "Kids show up in the End all the time, that's nothin' special. But kids speaking perfect RP without so much as a scratch on 'em? Nah, you looked about as world-weary as a newborn kitten. So this one time when you went home I had Doss follow you. Imagine my surprise when he came back and told me where he'd been."

Remus stared at Tomny incredulously. Doss was a couple years older than Tomny himself, but he'd always been friendly. How had he been able to look at Remus while knowing who he really was? Anyone else would've hated his guts, would've sent him to an early grave for having the gall to pretend they were so much as slightly hard done by. Remus might've, had he been in Doss' shoes.

"Who else knows then?"

"Just Doss. Made him promise to keep hush."

Remus released the bed covers. "Then I don't get it. Why'd you let me stay if you knew everything? Why didn't you send me back with a fat lip? Others would've done worse."

"Others have. You've got a busted face and several broken ribs, I figure."

"Then why not save those fucks the damn trouble?"

"Because I was immature and stupid!" Tomny shouted. "Because I looked at you and thought 'how funny would it be to fuck-up some old codger's kid'. Turn 'em dirty, jus' like the rest of us!"

"So it was all a joke then," Remus said, huffing a bitter laugh.

"It bloody well started like that, innit."

"And now?"

Tomny looked away sharply, teeth pressed into a bitter snarl. "And now fucking like you. I started to like you and wanted to keep you around. It was all about fun back then, just causin' chaos and being yobs. But it's different now. You're a smart kid, Lu—smarter than me."

Tipping back his beer for a long swallow, Remus watched as Tomny's Adam's apple bobbed. He still had that same mole on the back of his neck, and he stared at it until he pulled the bottle back.

"You know things aren't good around 'ere," Tomny huffed. "Honest people have been losing their jobs for a while now. The strikes have done nothin' but make people angry and tired. They can't feed their families anymore. People are scared, and that fear… It gives groups like the Irish a chance to grab hold of the under belly until they own it all. And the only ones winning are minted few. Poor yobs like us—we're just surviving. And not even all of us."

"What do you mean?"

"Flacky's dead, Lu."

A muscle in Remus' jaw jumped and he looked down at himself, bruised and busted all over. Flacky had been thirteen the last time Remus had seen him. Too small for a beating.

"Was he…?"

"No," Tomny said quietly; "It started as a fever, then it got worse. Way worse..."

It took a long time for Remus to say anything else, and when he did, it was barely a whisper; "When?"

"Last October." Tomny's voice was quiet, and Remus didn't need light to know his eyes were wet.

"Before Christmas?"

"Didn't wanna worry you. You were only back for a short bit."

Remus ground his teeth together despite the ache it gave him in his face. "You still should've told me."

"Maybe. But it wouldn't have done nothing anyway. Five days 'a festering in his own bed and just like that... no more Flacky."

"You still should've told me!"

"I didn't want to, alright!" Tomny took a ragged breath, clenching his hands on the arm of the recliner. "I was 'fraid that if I told you one thing, the rest of it would just come pouring out 'til I couldn't stop it no more. Back then, shit was messy! Overnight s'like the Irish owned everything. No one had any bloody idea what was gonna happen—even Burrin had fucked off. I tried my best to stay on top 'a things, ya see? Make sure all my lads were being taken care of, but I still couldn't do nuffin' when Flacky got sick. His dad was an illegal, innit. And his mum was stuck taking care 'a six kids—she couldn't handle a sick one too. So it was me—I saw it. I watched him die... And through it all I realised that I was no better than any other waster out there. I ain't got nuffin', me, 'cept my boys. And I ain't gonna let another get taken from me. Not by a fever, and not by some Peckham bastards who think I owe 'em shit."

The pieces had begun to fall into place for Remus.

"So… all the work...? That just your way of 'staying on top'?"

Tomny nodded bitterly. “Go ahead, be a moralist. But I told myself I’d never jus' sit back and do nuffin' again, innit. My boys deserved better —I deserved better. So yeah, I run with the crowds, I do their dirty work, but I'm glad fer it. S'good money, and it's got it's side benefits."

"You mean drugs."

"Keeps the demons away," Tomny muttered, deep purple bags sown beneath his eyes. "But I should’ve seen this comin'... You don’t get work in East London without owing someone sumffin'. You were jus' the one who got stuck paying the price... I'm sorry, Lu. You should'a never been dragged into it.”

Suddenly Remus couldn't breathe. He saw Tomny's next words hurdling toward him like a freight train, and he was the fool who couldn't get off the tracks fast enough.

“I can help,” he tried, pitifully; “I can get money so you don't have to do it anymore. Or I could ask Giles to—”

“No, Lu. You’re gonna go home.” Tomny pressed his lips together tightly. “You’re gonna go home, get patched up for reals, and then you’re gonna forget about this place. I never should’ve asked you to remember it.”

Remus shook his head, feeling a sob build up in his chest as he squeezed his hands into fists. “No.”

“Yes.”

“I’ll come back. Send me away and I’ll just keep on coming back.”

“You do, and I’ll send you off with more than a fat lip.”

Remus felt his nails bite into the flesh of his palms. “Don’t make me leave.”

“I gotta, Lu. You’re gonna go back to school, and I’m gonna clean up this mess best I can. I’m glad I never told you about it. Didn’t want you to look at me any different.”

“I could never hate you, Tom.”

“I know.” Tomny smiled sadly. “But it wasn’t hate I was worried about.”

Unable to look at him anymore, Remus turned to the small body asleep in the bed next to him. She looked younger asleep, like that little girl who dreamed of roses.

“What about Tonya?”

“She’ll be okay. She’s pretty tough, y’know.”

“She called one of the guys who jumped us a bitch.”

Tomny chuckled humourlessly. “Sounds like her.”

Letting his head fall back against the pillow, Remus ran his tongue around his teeth. He could still taste the blood from his nose, lingering in the back of his throat like gasoline.

“So when are you making me leave then?”

“Tomorrow,” Tomny replied. “You can use the phone to call that driver of yours. I know he comes and gets you near Aldgate.”

“Fine. But I want something in exchange.”

“Figures the gentry-toff would ask for a favour of the poor sod.”

“Shut up,” said Remus. “I want a phone call.”

Tomny raised an eyebrow. “You can use the phone whenever you want.”

“Not me—you. I want you to call me while I’m at school. I wanna know you’re still breathing, you stupid prick.”

“Sounds like long-distance.”

“I’m sure you can afford it.”

The corners of Tomny’s mouth quirked up, sadly. “Okay, Lu.”

“Okay, Tom.”

They both fell back into silence after that. Eventually Tomny got him a cigarette and they smoked together before the aches got to be too much again and he had to take another pill to put him out of his misery for a few hours. Before the drug could take hold, Remus tried hard to focus on the quiet of the room—the peace and tranquility despite the pain. It occurred to him that like Sirius, he’d always hated silence, but the kind he found at the flat was unlike that of his childhood home. Where the Lupin Estate felt cold and empty, Tomny's flat had always been warm and inviting. No matter how quiet and still it got, there was always the unequivocal promise that it would be noisy again; filled with all the poetic sounds and colours of life.

That night he dreamt of Hawkings and its green lawns and brick walls. He had always seen the school's walls and gates as something meant to lock him in—to keep him from the things he really wanted—but in this dream the wrought-iron and stone felt protective. They kept everything nasty out and made it so people could stay together in a place where goals and expectations were clear and fair. Familial bonds were clearly a mere illusion meant to hide the true importance of choosing loved ones for one's self. Journeys were comfortable because no matter how long they lasted you always knew they would come to an end, and that that end would be just. Music was the magic that fed everyone, and night and day were companions, not enemies.

In the dream everything was straightforward. There were no fathers or mothers or death or loss, just life and friends and stories and music. The walls that kept them felt inspiring, and in the dream he wrote a song about them. As he sang Sirius was beside him playing the guitar and all their friends sat around them, crying. Remus was crying too, but he didn't know why because he felt so happy. He couldn't tell if it was a good song, but it felt joyful and he sang it with all the love he could muster until everyone else knew the words and was singing it back to him.

Like so many things, the dawn stole that dream from him, and by the time he'd woken up the next day he had no idea what it meant.

Chapter End Notes

> This is a bitter sweet end to a summer for me. New chapter we'll be back at school for year twelve. Cheers and Love xx
>
> Slang Dictionary:
> A 'bookie' is someone who facilitates gambling.
> A 'protection racket' is a scheme where a group/gang takes money from people/businesses in exchange for not hurting them.
> A 'bits and bobs shop' is a second-hand store.
> 'Artillery' is slang for the equipment used for injecting drugs.
> A 'car boot sale' is a form of market similar to a flea-market.
> An off-license is a liquor store.
> The lyrics after the second break are "A Hard Rain's Gonna Fall" by Bob Dylan, 1962.

'Benzos' is slang for benzodiazepines; a tranquilizer drug like valium, Ambien, or Xanax.
'Downers' are also tranquilizers; depressants.
RP [received pronunciation]—a “posh” British accent that is correlated with good education; ie. the ‘Queen's English', 'Oxford English' or 'BBC English'; associated with London and the Southeast of England.

Chapter 31: Back to School

Chapter Summary

Remus returns to school feeling sore after being jumped in the East End alleyway. Good thing he has his friends to comfort him.

Chapter Notes

WOW. Tbh never thought the fic would get this far. This is definitely something big for me, and trust me when I say I have plenty of content ready to share with you guys. This fic won't be ending anytime soon ^^
As a little preface, year twelve has some heavy tones, so expect that when you read! Some big mistakes, some arguing, some craziness, but all speckled with pure love and friendship, I swear.

Playlist for this year: here .

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Guess who just got back today?
Them wild-eyed boys that'd been away;
Haven't changed, had much to say,
But man, I still think them cats are crazy;
They were askin' if you were around,
How you was, where you could be found;
Told 'em you were livin' downtown,
Drivin' all the old men crazy;
The boys are back in town...

- "The Boys Are Back in Town" Thin Lizzy, 1976

Wednesday 1st September 1976

As far as Remus could tell, getting clapped on the back by James Potter while having three fractured ribs was a lot like throwing yourself in front of an oncoming train. There was no waving or conventional "hellos" to be had, just a single upright dog-pile as James and Peter charged up from behind on the busy station platform. With a great hurrah they grappled him by the shoulders and he nearly threw his mother's white trunk across the station cringing in pain. Thankfully the excitement didn't last long; the moment the other two rounded him and got a decent look at his front their delightful expressions vanished.

“Lupin, what the hell happened to your face?” James exclaimed.

Remus knew he looked rough. Still yellow under the eyes from the bruising and with a scabby cut over the bridge of his nose that extended all the way up into his eyebrow, his appearance shocked anyone who got too close. Fracturing his ribs meant that he hadn’t gotten a decent breath-in in weeks, though his nose had healed in a relatively straight line and the stitches were finally gone. The doctors said he’d probably have the scar forever, just another more permanent reminder of his refusal to play by his father’s rules. If Lyall Lupin had hated the sight of him before, he detested it now.

“Football accident,” Remus said flatly. He’d been practising the lie for most of August while he’d slummed around the estate, whining and wincing without Tomny’s downers. “I guess I make a pretty poor goalkeeper.”

James winced and Peter called it “hard cheese”, nearly making Remus laugh out loud at the thought of Vint’s last and only words to him; but at least they hadn’t badgered him for more. Like Giles (who’d had more than enough to say after picking Remus up and driving him straight to the hospital) the boys rarely overstepped boundaries, even ones never explicitly said aloud. Remus suspected it was a de facto result of being friends with Sirius for so long.

“So where’s Black?” He asked, glancing around the busy train platform just in case Sirius was getting ready to spring up and break the rest of his ribs.

“He’s already at school,” James said. “Reg made prefect this year so they had to come a day early.”

“Oh.”

“Yeah, his train would’ve come through yesterday. But c’mon, let’s go claim a carriage before they’re all full.”

Once on the train, Remus was pleased to find that that year he’d be riding in a private carriage with air con and windows working latches. As Peter and James busied themselves with a round of cards, he planted himself by the window with a book. He’d been thinking a lot about Sirius lately—or at least, more than usual. It had started when the butlers finally brought him the letters, which he’d read while bedridden and half-delirious from the pain in his face and chest. They were well-written of course, with that same Sirius Black wit that Remus had grown so used to, only now accompanied by his perfect penmanship as well.

Tucking them into the pages of his book so his friends wouldn't see, Remus scanned the letters, reminded of the bit of guilt he'd been carrying ever since he first plucked up the courage to open them. There was one for nearly every week of the summer holiday, but Remus had read them so many times he could've almost recited them off by heart.

Dear Moony,
(After a summer away Remus still cringed at the nickname.)

Summer's shit, but what else is new. Dad's away in London most of the time at least, but mum found the couple of albums I got the bloke in the kitchen to stash away for me and tossed them into the salon's fireplace. Such a bloody waste—I didn't even get to play them! At least now the salon stinks so badly that we don't do afternoon tea in there anymore. I figure they're going to be airing the place out for weeks to get rid of the smell of burnt PVC.
James says he can't ring you. I thought you said your family didn't do holidays?
I know you don't understand the romantic and sophisticated past-time that is letter writing and your handwriting is pretty shit, but if you get this one, post me back.

Sirius.

Dear Moony,

Where do you think is the most effective spot for hiding a body? I'm about ready to murder Reg's damn dog. He's only an ugly little thing, so I figure the flower beds in the front garden would be a safe bet, though Mum would just as quickly bump me off for disturbing the begonias.
You and James don't know how good you've got it. Brothers are a nightmare. I'd give anything to trade Reg for Simeon—at least he's good for something other than whinging like a girl. I'm pretty sure Reg pays Kreacher in bacon to piss in my shoes.
You've got dogs, where do you bury them? The front or back garden?
Write soon.

Sirius.
PS: I swear I really do like dogs. Most of the time.

Moony,

I'm starting to wonder if your dad's as strict as mine or if you're just illiterate. I know the second can't be true because you're never without a bloody book in your hand, so I'm just going to put your lack of return-correspondence down to you being a lazy arse.
If it is the first one though then you should write a song. A great, bloody fuck you to dear ol' dad. Wouldn't that be something? I'll write one too, then we can compare in September.
I've been trying to write actually. All of it's shit, but even the best wrote shit sometimes right? "The Laughing Gnome" must still plague Bowie, I swear.
Heard any good music since school ended? Andy's all over this group called the Ramones lately, but they've only got one album out and I haven't heard it.
Hope you're enjoying the heat.

Sirius.

He was half right at least; Remus was a lazy arse, but he was also without so much as a sophisticated or romantic bone in his body, and a few of the ones he did have were broken, so that was a decent enough excuse right?

At first Remus told himself the neglect was because he felt so damn horrible all the time; after all he'd barely left his bedroom for the last month of holiday, but eventually he had to put his lack of correspondence down to plain nerves. Even if he did write Sirius back, what would he say?

'Hey, summer's been peachy. Got beaten to a pulp and might've lost all my friends but did you catch that last episode of the Pops?'

Lord.

When he finally did write Sirius back, it was nearly the last week of summer holiday. After he'd explained that the letter was going to a school friend in Bath, Giles agreed to post it and get it expedited, but there was no telling if the letter had made it to Sirius since he hadn't written anything else back.

It didn't matter, Remus told himself. It was just a short thing anyway —hardly a Nobel Prize in literature. He and Sirius could just catch up at school, and if the other boy wanted to pummel him for ignoring him all summer Remus would at least request that he avoid the nose.

"Oi, Lupin," James called from the other bench, "put down the bloody book and come help me whip this tosser in rummy."

"Not even Lupin can't save your sorry arse, Potter," Peter grinned evilly, expertly twirling the stack of cards around in his hands.

Snapping his book shut over the letter, Remus turned back to his friends and smiled. "Fine," he said, "but we're playing aces high this time."

* * *

"Everyone got your room keys? Come get your schedules if you haven't got 'em already!"

Kenny, the new Godric dorm monitor, was doing his best to holler over the group of year 7 boys as they mulled about on the front lawn of the dorm, looking distinctly small and nervous after moving from the western primary half of campus to the bigger upper-secondary half where they'd be expected to spent the rest of their menial youth.

James waved at Kenny as they passed, both of them being on the football team, and Peter elbowed Remus, almost dropping one of his trunks in the process.

"Do you reckon you were ever that short, Lupin?" He teased, pointing at the kids.

"You reckon you'll ever be any taller?" Remus asked, and Peter knocked his trunk into the back of his legs in retaliation, nearly buckling his knees.

"Hurry up or they'll start thinking we're part of the welcoming party," James chastised, carrying two of his trunks in one hand and another over his shoulder.

They made their way up the steps of the dorm, passing the plaque depicting the Godric griffin and through the front doors. Immediately they were met with the familiar woody scent of the pine-panelled hallways and the smell of fresh tea coming from the kitchenette across the hall. Other boys were mulling around with bags in hand same as them, and even more were in the common room, greeting friends and exchanging stories of their holidays.

All three boys peered into the main rooms as they went, just in case they could spot Sirius, but he was nowhere to be found on the dorm's lower levels, so they trudged on to the stairs.

"You go on without me," Peter moaned just as they reached the third floor landing. "I can't do it anymore." He dropped his trunks in the middle of the staircase, slumping over them dramatically.

"You're not even the one carrying the stereo," James quipped, ignoring his friend and continuing up the stairs.

"Is there no sympathy for a man who just lugged three trunks across the biggest campus in the Highlands?"

"Not when he's blocking the stairs," Remus said, gently nudging his friend in the heels until he got moving again.

The sight of their dorm room after two months away was as familiar now as that of Tomny's flat. It wasn't like his room at the estate, empty and wide and quiet. The walls were as bare as they'd left them last June and the room was clean and untouched but in less than twenty-four hours it'd be filled with pictures and posters and all the things he and his friends loved. Eventually there'd be dishes waiting by the door for someone to take them downstairs, and stray slacks and socks would begin to pile up on the floor until one of them—usually James—picked them up. There would be chatter and snores to fill the in between moments and of course there would be the boys those noises belonged to. It was something to look forward to. Usually.

"Dear god!" James groaned as he made his way into the room, dropping his trunks to wave a hand across his face and fend off the smell from the thick haze that had enveloped the room. "What'd you do, Black, hot-box our room with your grandmother's moth balls?"

"No, I asked your mum for hers." Jumping up from his bed eagerly, Sirius plucked a fat cigar from his lips and tapped its end on an ashtray he'd obviously nicked from the common room downstairs. "Alright, lads?"

"Alright!" James answered, as Remus lugged the rest of his things into the room. His chest burned so horribly that he had to stop to lean up against one of his bed posts, and even worse—it seemed as though seeing Sirius again had knocked more than a few ribs loose. Sirius had returned to school with a newly chiselled jaw, no longer that belonging to a growing boy but a man. His dark hair still curled just past that jawline and he'd gotten taller but somehow avoided the lanky-limb syndrome that plagued Remus. It was so bloody unfair.

In an attempt to break himself out of his daze, Remus coughed around the room's smoke and sent himself into a spasm of pain while James and Sirius flew forward, grappling each other in a ferocious hug.

"You okay, Remus?" Peter croaked, still breathless and red in the face. Remus waved him off and clutched an arm across his tender ribs as he slid to the floor next to his trunks.

With a delightful yell James picked Sirius up off the ground and spun him, only releasing him once Sirius had caught his feet on one of his bed posts and pushed off it, nearly toppling them both. The cigar had been thrown halfway across the room, spilling ash everywhere, but their expressions remained like that of the sun after a spring storm, bright and elated; two brothers reunited after a bitter fate had sought to try to separate them.

Never wanting to be left out, Peter surged forward to receive a hug of his own, one that was just as vigorous and ended with Sirius grinding his knuckles into the top of the poor boy's head for good measure. As Peter wailed and batted at him, Sirius looked over and finally noticed Remus, still sprawled among his trunks and trying not to wince. The smile he gave him was only that of amusement at first—like a kid who'd discovered a toy he'd forgotten about—but like everyone else so far, the shock and realisation dawned as he got a better look at Remus' face.

"Fucking hell." Releasing Peter, Sirius leapt forward and dropped down into a squat, staring like he was watching a monkey in a zoo. "What chewed you up and spat you out again?"

Sirius reached out as though he might grasp him by the chin, but he was already too close and Remus felt more aware of the other boy than he normally was. He smacked Sirius' hand away and cleared his throat before answering; "It was an accident."

Sirius clicked his tongue in judgement. "This the reason why you ignored my letters all summer then?"

"Knew you wouldn't let that one go."

“ ‘Course not.” Sirius bit his lip over a smile, the expression almost endearing.

Almost.

“So, you bloody lunatic,” he continued, “what the hell did you do?”

“It was a football accident,” Remus said, enunciating each syllable. “Sorry to say I won’t be trying out for the team this year either.”

Sirius snorted but finally fell back and popped up to his feet, extending an arm to help him up. Remus took it and stood up, straightening his shirt.

“You got taller,” Sirius said once they were both standing, squinting at him a bit.

“So did you.”

“Yeah but you’re going to have to duck to get through doorways soon, you giant.”

“And you’ll have to turn sideways just to fit that fat head through them,” James chimed in, opening the window between his and Sirius’ beds to air out some of the cigar smoke.

“Probably true,” Sirius said, before licking his lips and slowly extending his arms out to the side like he was waiting for a hug. It took Remus all of three seconds before he realised he was expecting a hug from him.

“C’mon,” he said wryly, “the least you can do after ignoring me all summer is give a little cuddle.”

Remus shook his head and slipped away. “I’m an injured man, keep your mitts off.”

“Aw, where you going, Moony? I’m not gonna hurt you!”

“That nickname isn’t funny anymore!”

“But touch is the language of love, Moony!”

“You speak enough languages for all of us, Black.”

Sirius let his arms clap back against his sides. “Fine. But one day when I’m dead and gone you’re going to regret not hugging me.”

“I would agree,” Remus said, dragging a trunk toward his bed, “but then we’d both be liars.”

After Sirius had put out the cigar he’d apparently stolen from his father’s office and the room was at least semi-breathable again, James and Peter began regaling them with tales of their joint summer. They’d spent most of it at their families’ neighbouring summer homes, located in some charming sea-side town in Devon. The two of them took turns narrating the same story, interjecting when the other forgot something or when they had a differing opinion on how a scene had played out. Having already unpacked the rest of his things, Sirius seemed content to listen to them yammer while setting up his stereo and turntable, the first thing that had emerged from James’ heavy trunks.

It was with great pride that Remus used the empty wall space over his side table to blu-tack the Queen poster Lee had presented him with in early July. Over his bed he pinned pictures of other bands like The Stones, Deep Purple, and of course The Who. Once he’d finished with the stereo Sirius came over to admire them.

“Looks great,” he said.

“But I’m still missing the best part,” Remus answered wryly, before leaning forward and tacking Sirius’ Shrieking Shack photograph to the wall for all to see. Sirius scoffed immediately and crossed his arms over his chest.

“Yeah well, you’re a bleeding hypocrite if you think any of these toffs are any less fruity than Bowie.”

Remus sighed. “If I throw a stick, will you chase it and leave me alone?”

“Do you have a stick?”

Remus shook his head and reached for the remaining posters on his bed. “Potter, Pete, here.” Unfolding them carefully, he proudly presented his friends with posters of their own—The Kinks for James and Cream for Peter, the latter of which had been hard to procure since the band had broken up before they’d even hit puberty. Remus was half-sure Lee had simply ripped it off a record shop’s wall.

“Think of them as belated birthday gifts,” he said as James and Peter shared giddy looks and thanked him.

“Here’s yours,” Remus said, handing Sirius his own poster. Sirius eyed him with a slightly raised brow before unrolling it.

“Oh, bless ya, Moony!” Turning, Sirius happily showed off Bowie’s Aladdin Sane image to the rest of them.

“Maybe his fruitiness will add some colour to the room,” Remus said as Sirius rushed to his side of the dorm to hang the poster up.

“You’re right, it does add some colour,” Sirius said, standing back to admire it.

“There’s also this.”

A little more shyly, Remus handed him the copy of The Count of Monte Cristo that Tonya had let him keep after the summer. She’d marked little notes into the margins of her favourite scenes and he’d yet to get tired of reading through them, but he knew Sirius would appreciate the story.

“Is it my birthday or something?” Sirius asked as he plucked the book from his hands and skimmed through its pages.

“It’s just ‘cause you liked Dumas’ other stuff,” Remus said, sticking his hands in his pockets.

“So what, you annotate your books now?”

“No, not me. It belonged to a friend.”

Sirius looked up, another perfect eyebrow raised; “Lily?”

“Er… no.”

“So vague.” Smiling a bit, Sirius closed the book and tapped its spine against the centre of Remus’ chest. “Can’t wait to read it. Cheers.”

Nodding sheepishly, Remus turned away only to find James standing directly behind him with a stack of records in his hands and a sly grin on his face.

“Five quid says he doesn’t read it.”

“I read!” Sirius huffed. “More than you anyway, you thick jock.”

Snatching the albums from him, Sirius set them down on his bed with the rest of his collection before setting a vinyl up on the turntable and dropping its needle onto the surface. Remus recognised the opening beat of Diamond Dogs before Bowie had so much as uttered his first line, and Sirius smirked back at him, winking while they listened and enjoyed the company of friends they'd been missing all summer.

"Moony, want to help me organise these?" Sirius asked, turning back to the pile of albums scattered about his bed.

Remus looked back. "What am I, your maid?"

"So you won't do it?"

"Ugh… move over, tosser."

* * *

The rumours about the muggings, the unfortunate fencing mishap, and even the Ibiza helicopter accident could've all been tolerated, but Mary's pestering about the secret BDSM sex cult that practiced knife throwing in the nude was really beginning to weighing on Remus' mental well-being. Of course he'd been expecting all of it—not many well-to-do kiddies returned to school looking like they'd lost a knife-fight with a blind bag lady—but he would've at least thought the rumours would have remained more grounded in reality. The truth might've been less surprising to the general student body than some of the other things that were being said, but Remus wasn't quite that desperate yet.

Despite her riveting summer spent travelling around the country's coastline while her parents compiled a new reference guide on seaside flora and her older sister Petunia hogged the phone to dial-up her boyfriend, Lily's newest impassioned topic of interest became Remus' face the moment she'd laid eyes on him. He could hardly fault her for it though—everyone stared, though Remus actually had to give it to Crouch for coming up with 'scarface' and 'scratching post' all on his own.

"Remus, please just tell me what happened," she begged, leaning down over her breakfast and attempting to look him in the eye. They were sitting with James on one end of their usual dining hall table while the rest of their friends compared beginning-of-term homework lists on the other and Mary gave Sirius his first manicure of the year.

Expertly avoiding Lily's gaze, Remus continued spooning the bran cereal he'd mistakenly picked up in the cafeteria line-up into his mouth. He'd already had to pour enough sugar into it to make James grimace just to make the taste bearable. "I told you," he mumbled, mouth full, "football accident. Broke my nose."

"That's rubbish," Lily snapped, astute as always. "You hate football. And you look like you got hit by a bus."

"Your love really knows no bounds, Evans."

James leaned in to interrupt, looking at Lily rather pointedly; "Daisy, just let the man be."

"You butt out," Lily instructed, blazing past the nickname that made Remus momentarily pause his cereal-spooning in surprise. "All summer and not a single phone call—I didn't even know if you were coming back. Then you show up looking like this. Now I want the truth," she ordered, "or I'll… I'll give you detention!"

The corners of Remus' mouth turned up. "Sounds like abusing your prefect-powers, Evans."

"And here I thought Remus was the only one immune to your viciousness," James added, sharing in his entertainment.

"Secrets hurt people," Lily whined. "Just look at his nose!"

Remus pushed away his empty cereal bowl. "Well, my nose doesn't hurt anymore, however my feelings are certainly taking a beating."

Lily gave him a glare that said she'd very much like to prolong said beating, but relented and finished her own breakfast in grudging silence.

"Want some more tea?" James asked her eventually.

Lily nodded. "One sugar, please."

"I know. Fancy a cuppa, Lupin?"

"Yeah, four—"

"You're getting two," James said, snatching his mug and standing up.

"Like the bloody sugar police," Remus grumbled as James crossed the dining hall. Lily turned around in her seat as he did, chewing on her thumb nail absent-mindedly. Watching her, a suspicious feeling began to bloom in Remus' gut and after a few seconds he rapped his spoon on the table top, making Lily jump and spin around again.

"Nice view?" He drawled.

Lily's eyebrows knit together in the centre. "What?"

"I asked if you liked the view."

"What view?"

"Of Potter's arse."

Lily turned beet-red. "Don't be ridiculous. He has a stain on his trousers, that's all. I was going to tell him when he got back."

"Oh, of course."

"He did!"

"Yeah, okay. And this 'Daisy' stuff? What's that about?"

"It's just a stupid nickname. He does it because he knows it bothers me, that's all."

"Mhm, sure."

"I will give you detention."

Before she could make good on her threat, Sirius dropped down on the bench in James' spot and clapped his hands to the top of the table, fingers splayed and painted in a pattern of red and black.

"It's some of Macdonald's best work!" He declared, grinning. "And look!"

With one hand, Sirius pointed to his eyes, and Lily's eyebrows rose to her hairline.

"Is that eyeliner?"

"Yeah! Mary did it like hers," Sirius said, looking extremely pleased. Between that, the nail polish, the earring, and the silver chain tucked just under his collar that Sirius had apparently taken to wearing over the summer, he looked about as close to a rock star as Remus had ever seen him.

“Why are you wearing eyeliner?” Lily asked.

“ ‘Cause it’s cool,” Sirius said, snootily. “Jagger wears it.”

“Does Jagger wear it at eight in the morning on his way to organic chemistry?”

“I’m not even sure Jagger would know what organic chemistry is,” Remus said, finding his voice for the first time since Sirius had sat down. The dark-haired boy smirked back at him and a moment later James slid in next to Remus with three cups of tea in hand, organising them on the table in front of himself. Finally he glanced up at Sirius and gave an impressed smile.

“Well, don’t you look spiffing.”

“See,” Sirius drawled, rolling his head toward Lily, “at least someone can appreciate true artistry.”

“Slughorn’s going to write you up for sure,” Lily said, shaking her head as she reached for her tea. Remus noted with slight amusement that she was smiling though.

“Nah. Blind bat would have to stop his fluttering and focus on my face for longer than three seconds to do that.”

“At least he remembers your name. He called Davey, ‘Mr. Crumpet’ the other day.”

“That’s not even close to ‘Gudgeon’,” Remus said.

Sirius smirked. “It’s ‘cause he can’t be bothered to remember anyone’s name outside of his silly club.”

“So what does he call you?” Remus asked. “ ‘Mr. White’?”

“Just ‘Black’ actually. James and I got the notice at the end of last year—an invite into Sluggy’s inner circle.”

James nodded, and Lily’s mouth dropped open. “No way. Both of you got an invite to the Slug Club?” She narrowed her eyes at James, who gave a sorry smile and a shrug.

“It was supposed to be a surprise?” He said in a guilty voice.

Remus, who was thankful every day that he did not take chemistry, peered at them questioningly; “Not to be dim or anything but what the bloody-fuck's a 'Slug Club'?"

"It's Professor Slughorn's private chemistry group," Lily explained. "It's as close as we'll get to an official academic association before university and it's very good to have on applications, especially Oxford and Cambridge since he taught there."

"Yeah, well I don't plan on filling out any of those," Sirius said, examining his manicure.

"So you're not going?" Lily asked.

"No, I'll go."

"Why does that sound suspicious?"

It was impossible for any of them to miss the look that passed between Sirius and James, and Remus answered for them; "Because it is."

As James lifted his tea to his lips, Lily gave a groan and opted to do the same rather than prolong the conversation. Before Remus could reach for his own, Sirius stretched across the table and scooped up the last mug.

"Just think about it this way, Evans," he started, waving the cup around, "you've got two of Hawkings' finest by your side every club meeting, though I do warn you that I plan to marry Potter for his money, so you'd better back off."

Both Lily and James coughed into their tea and Sirius smugly sipped his own before gagging and nearly dropping the cup. "Fucking hell Moony, your taste in tea really is murder."

* * *

Thursday 9th September 1976

Peter wasn't very happy to hear that they'd lifted the headphones from the AV room the year before, but they were already one week into the school year and Sirius' musical habits were definitely starting to get old. It had taken some convincing on Remus' part, but once Sirius had progressed to playing The Zombies' "Tell Her No" on repeat just to be annoying, Peter had finally caved.

“Here,” he said, emerging from the AV room with a pair of headphones in hand. He passed them to Sirius, who strung them around his neck happily.

“It’s more for our benefit than his, Pete,” Remus promised, as Peter locked the door behind himself.

“I’m still distinctly under the impression that you lot won’t miss one measly set of speakers,” Sirius said, casually holding his hands behind his head.

“Your stereo is loud enough on its own!” Peter snapped, making a point of ensuring that the door was locked tightly behind them. Sirius blew his tongue at him as they all turned down the hall and made their way out of the building. Outside, other students were mulling around, taking in the remaining summer heat and enjoying themselves before the term’s inevitable worries of homework, tests, and studying set in.

“Seems like kind of a shame though,” James surmised as they emerged onto the pavement; “I mean, waiting for Halloween to have any fun?”

“You’re as bad as Sirius,” Peter huffed. “We’re not playing more Led Zeppelin in church—Francis would never believe me a second time!”

“Get your knickers out of a knot, Pete,” Sirius scoffed. “Playing the same joke two years in a row would be shameful. There’s got to be something we can pull out of our four gobs that’ll kick off the year right.”

“Didn’t you already ask Bobby to make us more fireworks?” James asked.

“Oh, because those turned out so great the last time,” Remus groaned.

“Really Moony, between you and Pete I don’t know which is the worse stick in the mud,” Sirius said, letting out a yawn just as they passed Castle Hall. Suddenly he slammed to a halt in the middle of the pavement, letting Remus walk right into him.

“Oi, watch where you’re—”

“When was the last time either of you lot paid a visit to our dear Headmistress?” Sirius asked out of the blue. Following his gaze to the top of Castle Hall’s staircase, Remus spotted Headmistress McGonagall talking to a few teachers.

“She called me in early last year,” he answered.

“And I had to talk to her about the team’s trip to the tournament,” James added, “but Lily visits her office all the time for prefect’s stuff.”

Remus smirked a little at the back of Sirius’ head. “I’m sorta surprised she didn’t haul you in last year, Sirius. You know, after that red mark in History. I thought the Blacks were supposed to be perfect in everything.”

Sirius turned around, looking scandalised. “Is that our Remus Lupin, bragging?”

“Can’t be,” James agreed.

Remus shrugged innocently. “What was it you said last year, Black? ‘Every dog’s allowed an off-day’?”

“Well, it might interest you to know that I didn’t actually fail that exam,” Sirius mused, equally as innocent.

A moment of silence passed between all of them, then; “What?”

“The kid who sat behind Potter and I—Langston Hobbs—he paid me to take the test for him so he’d pass the class. He wrote my name on the top of his exam while I wrote his name on mine. It was good money too, more than enough for a few drinks at some dingy Scottish pub show.”

There went the metaphorical rug, and Remus began to piece everything together. “So… your poor mark…”

“Yup.”

“And… the money at the end of the year…”

“Uh-huh.”

“And my beating you in history…”

“Mhm.” Sirius looked back at Remus, his expression so smug it was sour. “You actually beat Langston, not me. Sorry, Moons.”

It took a clap on the back from James to stir Remus out of his stunned silence. Once his daze was broken, he let out an incredulous laugh. “You fucking wanker! You let me believe I actually beat you in a class for a whole summer?”

“Maybe if you’d written me back I would’ve had time to fess up.”

Never underestimate a Black.

“What a bitch,” Remus said to James and Peter, who were sniggering at the both of them. “I’m gonna get you,” he swore. “This year all bets are off.”

“Bring it on, Lupin,” Sirius said. “But in the meantime, how up to snuff are your lock-picking skills?”

Instantly sobered of his humour, Peter moaned; “Lord have mercy.”

But the plan had already been hatched; Remus could tell from a single that the practical joke gears were already turning inside Sirius’ skull.

“What are you thinking, Black?” James asked, kicking his ankles playfully.

“Nothing,” Sirius said simply, “just that McGonagall must be feeling lonely after a whole summer apart from all her favourite students. Maybe we should pay her office a little visit? You know, like any good group of Hawkings students…”

Chapter End Notes

Rummy is a card game.
A 'bag lady' is a homeless [woman] who carries her belongings around in various bags.

Really excited to give you the next chapter. Pranks are the best to write ^^

Chapter 32: Prongs

Chapter Summary

The boys do some good ol' fashioned breaking n' entering. 'Prongs' is born.

Chapter Notes

Impulsively posting this because it's a fun chapter, enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Band on the run, band on the run,
And the jailer man and sailor Sam,
Were searching everyone;
For the band on the run, band on the run,
For the band on the run…

- "Band on the Run" Wings, 1973

Castle Hall was imposing enough during the daytime with its stone columns and endless front steps, but come nightfall the building really took after its namesake, appearing as a daunting stone palace that looked as though it housed more than a few blood-sucking creatures. Situated at the very heart of Hawkings' campus, the only building older than the hall was the church itself, which had been built before the boarding school for Britain's most well-to-do children had even been conceptualised. The only modern-looking thing about it was the flat roof, which made for very good pranking as far as Sirius was concerned.

"It always looks so creepy," James said as they skirted around the bushes lining the driveway and made their way up the pavement.

"I think I saw someone in the window!" Peter whimpered, pointing to one of the old stained-glass windows. All the windows were sitting dark, as the hall normally was past sundown.

"Pretty sure it was just your torch's reflection, Pete," Remus said. Peter looked down at the metal flashlight in his hand and clicked it off for good measure.

“No one’s around, you ninny,” Sirius hissed, the first one on the steps and zipping up them with about as much energy as a jackrabbit on dexys.

Peter scowled after him bitterly. “If Filch catches us I’m letting him skin you first.”

All four of them went up the stairs together, their trainers scuffing across the stone until they made it to the top flagstones. Bending down in front of one of the double doors, Remus snapped his fingers at Sirius until he handed him the hairpins.

“You think Mary’s going to start noticing she’s missing a few of these?” He asked, bending them into the right shape before sliding the bits of metal into the lock.

“Nah,” Sirius said, leaning back against the wall next to him and clicking the spring of his lighter; “girls always have an endless supply of ‘em.”

“Yeah but you plucked those ones right out of her hair today,” James mused.

“I know. Thought she was going to murder me when her hair puffed up like that.”

James and Sirius shared a cheeky fist-bump before James turned his back to the front doors while he kept watch of the front lawn. Peter did the same, though he appeared distinctly more nervous about the whole affair; it was one thing to break into an empty church or his own AV room after hours, another to bust into the Headmistress’s office when anyone could just happen upon them.

The thrill should’ve bothered him—he didn’t have time to spend another month in detention if he was going to beat Sirius come exam time—but Remus was too delighted by the idea of the prank to care all that much for nerves. It was a simple task really, apart from the manual labour, and no one would get hurt so even if they were caught the punishment couldn’t be that bad. Right?

“Jesus, Lupin, I thought you said you were an expert on breaking and entering?” Sirius huffed when Remus failed to get the door open after several minutes.

“I never said anything about being an expert,” he shot, “you just always assume whatever’s most convenient! Why don’t you stop your whinging and get me some light?"

Instead of reaching for Peter's torch, Sirius bent down next to him and clicked the lighter on, holding it next to the door handle where he was working. It was a pathetic attempt but Remus knew without even seeing his face that he was just being an ass anyway.

"Should we try another way in?" James suggested, turning to peer over Remus' shoulder. "There's gotta be a back door right?"

"There is but it leads down into the boiler room, and the door up to the rest of the building is locked from the other side," Remus answered.

"What'd you do, go around trying every door on campus?" Asked Sirius.

"No… maybe." Clumsily, Remus' fingers slipped and he lodged one of the pins deep into the lock, jamming it instantly. "Shit," he cursed, trying to wrench it free only to be thwarted by the sweat that had collected in his palms.

"Let me." Ushering him out of the way, Sirius grasped the door handle and the end of the pin. He yanked hard but the metal was slippery and didn't give.

"Here," James said, trying his best to get the pin out.

Peter chuckled, slapping his palm with the head of his torch. "How many lads does it take to get a pin out of a lock?"

"Two less than it takes to whoop you one, Pete," Remus quipped, standing up to give his knees a break while James continued to work at the stuck lock. Taking a moment to wonder if he might have a chance at the lock in the boiler room, Remus stepped up to the other door and grasped the handle, turning it. "Do we have another pin—?"

There was a crisp click and the door opened, falling toward Remus as James and Sirius stared in shock.

"It's fucking open?" Peter cried. "You mean you didn't even check to see if it was locked in the first place?"

Sirius shot upwards, clapping Remus on the shoulder. "Good job, Moony. Knew you'd get the job done!"

“Bunch of numpties, you lot are!” Peter grumbled as they all slipped inside, leaving the stuck pin behind. “Is no one even slightly worried over why the front door might be unlocked in the first place?”

“If I see anyone, I’ll ask,” Sirius said, making his way down the hall and toward the main staircase.

“There could still be teachers around!”

“It’s nearly midnight,” Remus whispered. “I doubt anyone’s around.”

“And if they are, Pete, you were just saying earlier that you needed help with some homework!” James finished, patting his friend comfortingly on the back.

While Peter used a harsh whisper to outline the impracticability of asking for help with maths during a break-in, they made their way up the stairs, trying their best to keep their footsteps quiet on the ancient staircase.

“Maybe time to cut back on the cigs, hey Moony?” James teased as they made it to the top and Remus stopped to muffle a cough with his elbow. It made his chest twinge and he leaned against the railing for support while his friends stopped to wait for him.

“If I did, you lot would just badger me until I got more,” he rasped. “Bunch of chain-smoking drunkards, you are.”

Sirius flicked his zippo on and off as he waited at the top of the stairs. “Messers, tramps, numpties, chain-smoking drunkards, what do you figure’s next? The Three Musketeers?”

“There’s four of us,” Peter pointed out.

“Read a book, Pete?” Remus sighed, before finishing the rest of his climb and emerging at the top of the staircase next to Sirius. “But alright, I’ll indulge you. Which Musketeer are you then?”

Even in the darkness of the hallway he could see the cheeky glint in Sirius’ eye. “Obviously I’m D’Artagnan. None of you are romantic enough to carry an entire story.”

“I call Athos then,” James chimed, making Sirius nodded in agreement.

“Pete’s obviously Porthos, and you my dear Moony, simply scream Aramis. I just know you're waiting to run out on us, you sneaky bastard."

"Okay, walk on then, you poof," Remus scoffed.

"What, don't tell me you're offended? You know I'm right!"

Rather than answering him, he gave Sirius a little shove that had him nearly tumbling over a decorative chair left outside an office doorway. It was amusing to watch the normally graceful Sirius catch himself on the seat of the chair and bounce back, knocking into a hutch set next to the chair and almost toppling the vase of fresh flowers sitting on top. James caught it at the last second and Sirius straightened up, shoving Remus gently in return while they cackled.

"That was very graceful, Black, good show," Peter snickered.

"I try," Sirius scoffed lightly, shooting a squinted smile in Remus' direction.

Once they'd staunched their laughter and James returned the vase to its rightful spot they continued on to the end of the hall, stopping outside the Headmistress's office.

"I've always wondered what 'O.M. First Class' meant," James said, peering at the plaque next to the door.

"Well, maybe you can ask the old bird herself." Reaching up, Sirius grasped the heavy, lion-shaped door knocker and slammed it down onto its base—once, twice, three times. Each bang echoed down the dim hallway, making the rest of them seize up in alarm. They were all deadly silent for a long moment after, just waiting for the sound of footsteps or an office door being opened. When nothing came, three pairs of shoulders slouched with relief.

"It's like you want us to be caught!" Peter hissed, and just Sirius winked as he grasped the door handle. It fell open under his grip, also unlocked.

"Pete," he started, as though he were lecturing a child, "we're going to be lifting half of her furniture and leaving it on the roof—if you haven't already prepared yourself for the chance of being caught then you're not a proper Musketeer."

Stepping inside the grand office, Sirius waited until they'd all filed in before taking Peter's torch and lighting up the room. The air was warm to the point of being stuffy but smelt softly of freshly cooked biscuits, with various novelty items, odd plants, and heavy books crowding every surface.

“Isn’t much one for interior design, is she?” Peter said, staring into the face of the grandfather clock leaning up against the wall closest to him. As if on cue, the clock struck midnight and Peter flew backward into James who had to clap a hand over his mouth to keep from laughing. Delighted, Sirius began to trail a hand over the red velvet sofa in the middle of the sitting area.

“Oh I don’t know,” he said happily, once the chiming had ceased, “it sorta looks like our salon back home, only with more… ambiance? No —character.”

Remus glanced at the fireplace and imagined throwing a record into a lit fire, watching it melt and smoke and fill the room with the scent of burnt plastic. If he’d written back to that letter of Sirius’ he might’ve told him to put Walburga’s curtains in the flames for good measure, or smash her best china. No album deserved such a nasty end—not even disco.

“Barely any dust though,” James said, standing on the opposite side of the room and trailing his fingers over one of the bookshelves, rubbing them together.

“Someone’s been cleaning,” Peter observed, pointing his torch at a small trolley of cleaning supplies on the far side of the room.

“We’re not moving all of it, right?” Remus asked, lifting a small snow globe off of the table in front of the fireplace.

“No, just enough for it to be noticeable,” Sirius said, testing the weight of an armchair.

“Good, because that desk must weigh a thousand pounds,” James said, pointing further into the office. Sirius followed his line of sight and nodded slyly.

“Moony, think you can work on getting the door to the roof open?”

“If it’s not already open,” Peter scoffed.

Remus set the globe down. “Yeah I can do it.”

Plucking another pin from his own hair this time, Sirius tossed it to him and he fumbled to catch it in the dark, looking away before he started staring at the way Sirius' dark waves tumbled down over his pale forehead.

Leaving his friends to take stock of the room, Remus borrowed the torch and crept down the quiet hallway by himself. He made it to the short staircase that led up to the little doorway letting out onto the roof and bent down in front of it, getting to work. The door was indeed locked but he managed to get it open in decent time—Take that, Black—and after a quick peek out onto the roof, Remus made his way back to the office and slipped inside, shutting the door behind himself. Rather than casing the room for furniture that could be hauled up to its new home, he found Sirius sitting on top of the desk with several file folders in hand while James slouched back in McGonagall's leather chair, spinning around and staring at the ceiling as though he were intentionally trying to make himself sick. Peter was lounging on the sofa in front of the fireplace, chin propped up against one hand and half-asleep already.

Remus cleared his throat; "Thought we were moving stuff out, not moving ourselves in."

"We're just taking a little break before the back-busting work begins," Sirius said, licking his thumb before flipping the page in the file he was reading. "Barty Crouch really is a bloody idiot. Who fails art in year ten? Oh, wait—his final project was a collage of nudie magazine clippings. That's actually kind of funny."

"I want to see," Peter said, jumping up and joining James over Sirius' shoulders, leaving the sofa's pillows significantly skewed.

"Oh! And here's his dad's phone number. How do you reckon he'd react if someone from the Communist Party of Great Britain called looking to 'thank Barty for his ongoing support'?"

I live with highly educated idiots, Remus thought as he went to right the pillows, keenly aware that they were only there to leave things a mess in the first place. As he sorted out the cushions the same cat statue he'd seen on the fireplace's mantle when he first arrived in the Headmistress's office caught his eye—only now there were two of them. An unperfect pair, the first cat was a striped grey and distinctly tall and noble in appearance while the second appeared the colour of dust and little more than a shaggy skeleton in the dim light of the room. Though unlike the other statue its eyes were distinctly lifelike, catching the light of Peter's torch as he waved it about the room.

“Oi, guys look what I found.”

Leaving the cats in peace, Remus crossed the office to join his friends as Sirius pulled another file from the cabinet behind McGonagall’s desk.

“Who’s is that?” James asked, looking up from a different file—his own.

“Evans’,” Sirius grinned, using the file to fan himself as James launched himself to his feet.

“You should put that one back.”

Sirius gawped. “Put it back—don’t you want to know what dirt McGonagall’s got on your favourite ginger?”

James shook his head firmly. “Nope, don’t need to.”

“Why not?”

" 'Cause!"

" 'Cause'? Are you joking?"

Remus reached over Sirius and snatched the file from his hand. “Leave Lily out of your pranks. I thought we had a job to do?”

Sirius rolled his eyes. “You two really need to stop licking the bottom of Evans’ boots.”

“Can we just get on with this?” James blagged.

“Yeah, it’s school tomorrow,” Peter added, stifling another yawn.

After a bit more griping from Sirius they returned the files to what they hoped were the right places and began to move about the room, sliding things closer to the door as quietly as they could. Carrying their heavy loads, they made their way down the hallways one by one and from there, up onto the roof, which was open to the stars and without any light at all. The only other way off the roof was a fire escape leading down to the ground at the back of the building, which was so old they couldn’t tell if it was painted red or just entirely rusted over.

“Watch the pipes,” James warned, carefully stepping over a vent while carrying a potted plant in his arms. Of course Remus immediately got his foot caught, going to the ground in attempts to save the lamp he was carrying.

“Fuck,” he hissed, as his friends stifled laugher behind their shirt sleeves.

“S'like a newborn giraffe,” Sirius mocked, helping him to his feet.

A half-hour later, and they’d managed to move almost half of the office’s contents up to the roof. Remus did his best to keep his feet under him, which was easier said than done after Sirius had decided that the sofa would be next.

“Knew we should’ve made Potter lift this one,” Sirius grunted, holding the bottom end as Remus walked backward up the roof’s stairs.

“He’s sorting the desk!” Remus reminded him, slumping at the top of the stairs to catch his breath.

“They always make it look so easy on TV. Just a cut-to and all the furniture’s sitting pretty on the roof.”

“Less lip and more lift,” Remus ordered, wiping the sweat from his forehead before grabbing hold of the bottom of the couch once more. His ribs were screaming but it would’ve felt like too much of a pansy excuse if he told his friends about the full-extent of his injuries in the middle of a prank. And that would just lead to more questions he didn’t care to answer.

After a bit more grunting and griping, the two boys finally set the sofa down in the middle of the roof, listening to the tiny gravel crunch under their feet.

“Just give me a second,” Remus huffed. He collapsed onto the sofa and dropped his head back while slinging an arm over his eyes, gritting his teeth to stave off the pain. A moment later he felt a gentle kick at the sole of his trainer before the sofa dipped and he lifted his arm back to find Sirius next to him, staring up at the sky.

“You see that star, the really bright one?” He pointed up, and Remus squinted before nodding. The star seemed to twinkle with a dozen different colours, blinking like it was watching them back. “The Egyptians associated that star with at least a dozen gods,” Sirius continued. “They used it to mark their New Year and built temples and pyramids aligned to its rising and falling. They call it the Morning Star, because you can see it best at dawn. Wanna guess its other name?"

Remus frowned. "Something Egyptian?"

"No," Sirius laughed, "Sirius. I'm named after that star."

Remus squinted more, though he didn't have to. The star was brighter than anything else for miles. Not even the busy city lights of London would've been able to drown it out. "Suddenly the insufferable god-complex makes much more sense," he said.

"I'll push you off the roof," Sirius quipped.

"I'll take you with me."

Chuckling, Sirius readjusted himself on the sofa and propped his feet up on McGonagall's matching ottoman. As he did his hand just barely brushed Remus' pinky, but Sirius didn't seem to notice. "Everyone in my family's named after some star or whatever. Just another stupid tradition to rope us in. Reg's got two stars actually, and Andy's got an entire galaxy out there."

"Sounds like you've been chipped then. I mean, only one star? That's chump change."

Sirius glanced over sharply, smiling. "Rich coming from a guy whose name is essentially 'Wolf Wolf'."

"Dickhead," Remus chuckled, looking down at his hands. When he glanced back up again Sirius' eyes were on the sky and he was bobbing his head, quietly humming a tune just for the two of them;

"Hmm… Hmm… 'Star baby… flashy little shiny little two timin' mama singin'… Star baby—shiny little flashy little lovin' machine…' " Pressing his chin to his shoulder, Sirius smiled to himself. "That's the only bit I know, but I think The Who got it right with that one."

Remus punched him lightly in the shoulder. "That's The Guess Who, you numpty. Thought you were supposed to be a musician."

"Ow, Moony!" Sirius moaned, half-laughing. "I was only kidding."

"Then that bruise is your own fault." Remus stood up and flexed his sides gingerly. "C'mon, I'm tired and this mess was your idea, so see it through."

"Ooh—yes, sir."

Sirius popped up from the sofa and together they crossed back to the stairs, taking them two at a time until they'd made it back into the hall. It was still quiet, but by the time they'd made it back to the office they could hear Peter's familiar whining.

"You nob, we weren't supposed to break anything!"

Stepping inside, Remus immediately spotted the deer in the headlights on the other side of the office—or more accurately, he saw James clutching the stag's head that should've been hanging over McGonagall's desk, while Peter shone an accusatory torch on him.

"Oops," James said, holding the deer in one hand and the plaque it normally hung on in the other.

"You two destroying personal property now?" Sirius called, scampering over to the desk to join him.

"It's hollow inside!" Squinting in the light of Peter's torch, James peered down into the stag's head before tipping it back and dropping it down over his shoulders like a Halloween mask. It looked ridiculous —the body of a boy with a full snout and antlers to boot—which meant everyone was laughing instantly, even Remus.

"It suits you, Pot," Sirius said, reaching up to pet James' furry nose; "Snug fit?"

"Yeah," James said, voice muffled by the mask as he swung his head back a bit and nearly took out a row of books on the shelf behind him. "Bloody stinks in here too."

"What does it smell like?" Peter asked.

"Like plastic and death."

Sirius grabbed hold of one of the antlers. "I wanna try."

"Hold on, I'm not done yet. Anyone got a camera?"

Shaking his head hopelessly, Remus glanced about the room. So far they'd managed to move the sofa, its matching ottoman, two side tables, a floor lamp, several random bits and baubles, and even the fireguard screen from in front of the fireplace. They didn't have much hope in hell of moving the desk, he figured, but at least when the Headmistress returned to her office the next morning she'd definitely notice something was off.

While the others continued to amuse themselves by testing how high James could reach with his antlers (he knocked several books off of the bookshelves doing this, but Sirius seemed to have just as much fun catching them as they fell), Remus turned back to the fireplace. For the most part all of the furniture that could be moved by them alone was already up there, and he didn't fancy messing with the student records and shelves of paperwork—that would just be making a mess no one would be laughing at. A few more bits and bobs though, now that couldn't hurt.

Using an empty magazine rack, Remus piled several more things into his arms before remembering the cat statues—or rather, the statue. When he went to retrieve them he found only one left; the noble, grey tabby. Scooping it up, he tucked it into the crook of his arm before turning to the door. He'd only just gotten it open when he looked up to the wall shelf hanging above it and nearly dropped everything he was carrying as he gasped in alarm.

The second scraggly little statue was there, resting on the top of the shelf like a little spy and staring down at them with those glowing eyes.

Remus turned, his heart still hammering in his chest. "Who left the—"

"Watch the antlers, Potter!" Sirius cried, moving around the desk as James followed him, arms outstretched as he stumbled along blind. In an attempt to steer clear of him, Sirius crashed into Peter, who went down with a great 'omph', letting his torch skitter across the floor and momentarily blind Remus as it spun to a stop in his direction.

"Bunch of toffs," Remus mumbled, turning his face away as yellow spots filled his vision. He reached for the statue, thinking it was best to take the pair together. Only, he hadn't expected it to reach back.

Quick as lightning, the cat extended a single paw and swatted at him, hissing as it left three long claw marks across the back of his hand. The noise of surprise that left Remus' mouth was more akin to a dying goat than a sixteen year-old boy. He leapt back from the door, nearly dropping everything he was holding while two boys and a stag turned toward him in shock.

"It's alive!" He exclaimed. "I-I mean—it's a cat!"

Retrieving his torch, Peter raised the light to where Remus was pointing and paled instantly.

“Oh shit—it’s Mrs. Norris,” he squeaked as the feline licked her lips.

“Who?” Remus demanded.

“Filch’s cat!”

“And just what kind of freaky cat doesn’t fucking move when you’re staring right at it?”

Suddenly Remus heard a voice echo up from the stairs through the open door ahead of him.

“Mrs. Norris, are you up there my sweet?”

“No!” Sirius called in a high-pitched voice, making every one of his friends—including James the deer—turn toward him in horror. At least he had the gall to look regretful.

"Oops."

“WHO’S UP THERE?”

“Time to go!” Peter yelped, rushing past all of them and out into the hall with his torch in hand. Desperately, Remus looked around for a place to get rid of the statue and the magazine rack before Sirius appeared at his side, taking half the load from him and tossing it aside with a loud clatter.

“You heard Pete,” He said. “Potter, come on!”

“It’s stuck!” James said, scrambling to get hold of the bottom of the deer head.

“What do you mean it’s stuck—stop playing around.”

“I’m not!”

As Sirius grabbed hold of the antlers to yank the taxidermy head off his best friend’s real one, Remus went to the door. He could hear the heavy thumps of Filch’s footsteps coming up the stairs while he continued wailing at them.

“Blimey, it really is on there,” Sirius grunted, yanking with both hands now.

“Ow! You’re going to break my glasses. And my face!”

“WHERE ARE YOU, YOU LITTLE BUGGERS?” Filch roared, even closer now. Any second he’d emerge on the top of the landing and cut off their only escape.

Remus turned back around and grabbed Sirius by the shirt collar, yanking him toward the door. “Just bring it.”

“What?” James shouted, but it was already decided. Guided by Sirius’ hold on his antlers, he was dragged from the office and forced to keep up as they booked it down the hall, passing the staircase and Filch, whose torch light could already be seen flickering up from the floor below.

“I HEAR YOU! STUDENTS OUT OF BED! STUDENTS IN THE CORRIDOR!”

They made it to the stairs, where Peter was waiting and appeared about ready to faint. After shoving James through, Remus slammed the door behind them and emerged on the roof next to his friends.

“Now where do we go?” Peter moaned helplessly.

“The fire escape.” Sirius took off across the roof, still dragging James behind him and Remus and Peter followed. Avoiding the scattered bits of furniture, they swung themselves onto the rusty bit of metal, taking the stairs two at a time and nearly toppling onto each other in their urgency to escape. As if to announce their presence, James’ antlers ratted off every bar on the way down;

Ding-ding-ding-ding-ding-ding-d-d-d-d-ding!

“This is horrible!” He screeched. Following from behind, Remus briefly wondered if he was crying under his furry helmet.

“Shh—! Shut up, James!” Peter said.

”I can’t!”

*“*Fucking—STOP!” Sirius, the leader, slammed to a halt just at the bottom of the metal staircase, and Remus nearly took an antler to the eye as he crashed into James’ back.

“Why are we stopping?” Peter barked.

“Ran out of stairs.”

Looking over the edge, Remus saw that Sirius was right—the fire escape ended several feet off the ground over a small pit of gravel, probably to deter students from doing exactly what they'd caught themselves in.

"Some bloody emergency exit," Peter moaned.

"WHEN I CATCH YOU I'M GONNA HANG YEH FROM THE CHURCH STEEPLE BY YER FRONT TEETH!"

They all looked up, apart from James, who was hooked on a hole in the grate of the stairs overhead. Remus almost thought he could see the light of Filch's torch flitting around the sky. He didn't think the headmistress would let Filch make good on his threats, but they'd also just finished moving most of her belongings up onto the roof.

"Are you gonna jump or not?" Remus hissed.

Sirius turned around to gape, before a tenuous smile split across his face. "Did I hear you right, Lupin? You said we should jump?"

"Unless you'd rather I push you."

Unfazed, Sirius shrugged. "All for one and one for all, right?" He said, before launching himself off the bottom of the stairs. James thrust his arm out at the space his best friend had been occupying just a moment before, waving it around like he could catch him.

"Sirius?!"

"Bend your knees, Potter," Remus said, before giving his friend a shove from behind. With a strangled wail, James toppled over the edge and before he could let himself look too long at the ground, Remus jumped after him. Surprisingly Peter wasted no time with his own free-fall and all four boys found themselves in one bruised pile at the bottom, half lying on each other as they wiggled to get free.

"Bloody hell, I think Prongs here got me," Sirius moaned, holding his side as he rolled away from them and staggered to his feet. James did the same, though now missing an antler thanks to their crash-landing. The groan that came out of Remus as he flipped himself over and got to his feet would've made the rest of them wince had they not been nursing injuries of their own. At least the gravel had been round little stones and not like the nasty, gritty stuff that was on top of the roof.

A loud clanging came from above—Filch was banging his torch on the bars at the top of the fire escape.

“I HEAR YOU! YOU STAY RIGHT THERE!”

“Not bloody likely,” Peter chirped, scrambling in the stones and taking off across the lawn at a full sprint.

“You see that little bugger run?” Sirius said, still rubbing his ribs.

“No,” James said. “I can’t see ANYTHING!”

“Shut up!” Remus lashed, gathering hold of the remaining antler and giving a sharp tug. The head stuck firm, earning him only another grunt from James.

“WHERE ARE YOU?”

Remus released the antler, and tsked. “Guess you’re running home like that, Potter.”

”WHAT?! NO WAY!”

“Oh-ho-ho! Fuck yeah!” Sirius cried, shoving James forward and breaking into a run. Despite his dire straits, James dashed on and soon all three of them were taking off across the campus after Peter, Filch’s torch shining after them like a flimsy spotlight.

“GET BACK HERE!”

“Yes, yes, yes! Suck it Filch!” Sirius screamed as they ran, as though it had all been part of his plan all along. They took turns pushing the man-deer between them to make sure he stayed running in a straight line rather than veering off into a tree. It didn’t take long to catch up to Peter and eventually they all made it back to House Lane, collapsing onto the front lawn of their dorm as they wheezed and howled with laughter.

Well, all of them apart from James.

He was too busy crying under his new hat.

Chapter End Notes

A torch is a flashlight.
'Dexys' are slang for the stimulant drug, dextroamphetamine.

This chapter was suuuuper fun to write. One of my favourite to date, hope you enjoyed! And yes, The Who and The Guess Who are two different bands ;)

Chapter 33: Sheila

Chapter Summary

> Remus' connection to Hawkings hits closer to home than he thought.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Eleanor Rigby,
Picks up the rice in the church where a wedding has been,
Lives in a dream;
Waits at the window,
Wearing the face that she keeps in a jar by the door,
Who is it for?

All the lonely people,
Where do they all come from?
All the lonely people,
Where do they all belong?

- "Eleanor Rigby" The Beatles, 1966

Monday 20th September 1976

“So… what do you think?”

Remus lowered the notebook, eyebrows raised. “Mm? Oh, yeah. It’s… good. This part, ‘moon, star, acoustic guitar’, yeah that bit’s good…”

“It’s shit.”

“What? No. No… Well… Maybe… But not all of it.”

Huffing, Sirius gave a grumpy strum on his guitar, legs tucked up beneath him on his bed. Remus sat across from him on the floor, back pressed against the edge of James’ bed as he flipped through the notebook Sirius had kept with him over the summer. Like his letters promised, he'd been trying to write, but most of the songs ended up being a reflection of how being at home made him feel. Either horrendously gritty or intensely dark, with many that involved setting fire to the house or giving his mother a rather (gruesome) piece of his mind. Not all of it was terrible though—several of the lyrics had promise, and Remus quite liked the lines that went;

Loving you is how it feels to be done dirty,
Without you I was clear and now all I've got are all these worries;
I never asked for none of it,
But you were always generous,
'Cause love and kind and worry are just so fucking effortless.

It felt like real rock and roll, or in the very least, melodramatic, which was Sirius' favourite brand of rebellious sentiment anyway.

"Have you shown James?" He asked, turning the next page, which was mostly just a scribble of crossed out lines than anything else.

"No. I wanted you to be the first."

"O-oh?" Remus' licked his lips and forced a chuckle. "Why? 'Cause it doesn't matter what I think?"

Sirius looked up from his guitar very quickly. "No. 'Cause you're harder to impress. James is too nice. Even if it was all shit he'd never say so—but you would. Makes me want to work harder, I think."

"Oh…" Remus suddenly found the scribbled page very interesting, staring down at it to avoid Sirius' intense gaze.

"Besides, can't hardly ever get the dumb idiot to slow down nowadays. Did you know that before you got back to the room, he blasted out of here so fast he didn't even give himself time to dry his hair. Looked like he got hit by lightning."

"So not much different from usual then?"

Sirius tossed his head back and forth a bit in cheeky consideration. "No, not by much. Gotta love him, that Prongs."

"That's your worst nickname yet," Remus said, thinking back to the weekend before, when they'd nearly had to cut the stag head in half with a pair of kitchen scissors just to get James out of it. Now it hung on a peg inside their bathroom, looking distinctly worse for wear and now missing not only an antler as but one of its eyes as well. Despite that fact, Remus still felt like he was being watched every time he took a shower or did his business, but Sirius insisted on keeping the ugly thing as some sort of horrendous trophy.

“Does this mean you’re coming around to ‘Moony’?” Sirius asked.

“No—never. Not unless you want to be ‘Starman’.”

“Well—”

“Shut up, forget I said anything.”

“You’re no fun,” Sirius grumbled lightheartedly, before mercifully returning to his guitar. Remus smiled to himself and flipped to another page in the notebook. It only had four lines, like a fleeting thought Sirius put down on the page and immediately forgot about.

Couldn’t ring you,
Couldn’t swing you;
There’s too much distance,
Haven’t found that path of least resistance.

Because he was selfish, Remus immediately thought of Tomny. It had been nearly a month of school and there hadn’t been any attempts on making good of that promise they’d made to one another over the summer. They’d talked once while Remus was recuperating at home, but even then Tomny’s answers had been short and tame in comparison to the boy he’d used to be. Not Tonya though; halfway through the call she’d stolen the receiver from her boyfriend and regaled Remus of her everyday—which was pretty much the same from dawn till dusk, and yet somehow she still managed to make it sound fascinating.

There had been no word since then though, despite the fact that Remus double-checked that they had the dorm’s direct phone number and made Tomny swear to call before letting him hang up. Of course it made more sense for Remus to phone him first, but that felt a lot like plunging off the deep end, and he was half sure he’d rather take another spill off Castle Hall’s fire escape. Plus he felt indignant; Tomny was a big boy—he needed to make good on his own promises.

Sort of like him.

Now, he’d never actually promised to write over the summer, or even pick up the phone when James or Peter called, but he did commit to other things; like taking Sirius around London one day, and playing Hope's records. And since he'd done neither…

There's too much distance,
Haven't found that path of least resistance…

"Sorry I never wrote," Remus mumbled.

Sirius' fingers stopped on the Rickenbacker's strings; he'd been practising an Elton John song, one Remus only recognised thanks to Tonya's affinity with the colourful musician.

"What do you mean you're sorry?"

"I'm sorry I never wrote back," Remus said, more firmly. "You wrote a lot—clearly, but I—"

"But you did write, Moony."

Remus looked up. "Huh?"

Reaching for his guitar case, Sirius began sorting rifling through the small pocket on the lid. From between the countless music sheets he pulled out a small envelope, covered in with postage stamps and yellow expedited stickers. Sirius opened the envelope and pulled out the letter, unfolding it and clearing his throat.

" 'To Sirius, sorry I haven't written much, summer's been buzzy'—'buzzy' Moony, really?"

"Don't!" Remus surged forward and tried to snatch the letter away, but Sirius just rolled backward on his bed, leaving the guitar abandoned between them like the Berlin Wall.

"Don't be rude, Moony, I'm not done reading. Now where was I? Ah yes. 'Sorry to hear about Reg's dog—that is if you've already bumped it off. The garden is a good bet though, as long as—'"

"Give me that!" Remus climbed up onto the bed after him but Sirius was too quick, slipping off its end to bounce across the room.

"It's not even embarrassing!" He insisted. "And look you made me lose my place again! Let's see… 'you write too much, Black.' That's funny coming from someone who can devour 'War and Peace' in a week."

"I've never even read 'War and Peace'! No one has!"

Sirius ignored him. " 'You're lucky you haven't seen any of the ‘Pops’—it’s all disco nowadays. I swear, if I have to hear ‘Shake Your Booty’ one more time I’ll put my foot through the telly’.”

Scrambling up from the bed, Remus chased after Sirius, who soared across Peter’s, keeping enough distance between them that he could still wave the letter back and forth like a dog with a bone.

“Why did you keep that in your bloody guitar case?” Remus demanded, reaching over the bed to swat at him. Sirius danced just out of reach, grinning like a hyena.

“To read it to you of course! Sort of thought I’d get the chance to do it with the other lads around, but I guess an audience of one is better than an audience of none—ooh, think that could be a lyric, Moony?”

“Sod off!” Remus threw himself over the bed for one last go, making his chest twinge in pain, but Sirius only cackled and ran around it, diving across James’ bed and upsetting the pile of laundry James had obviously neglected to put away before racing out of the room.

Hauling himself to his feet, Remus picked up one of the pillows he’d knocked off Peter’s bed and tossed it after Sirius with more force than was probably necessary—unfortunately he’d never had the best aim. The pillow sailed across the bedroom and slammed into the front of the stereo, making it clatter backward on the hutch. Both of the boys froze, almost afraid it would topple sideways from the collision, but by some miracle the hi-fi remained upright, and a moment later a faint click sounded as the tape inside the stereo came to life with a faint whirring.

‘Well, Annie’s pretty neat,
She always eats her meat;
And Joe is awful strong,
Bet your life he’s puttin’ us on;
Oh lordy!
Oh lordy!’

Remus couldn’t help himself. He sank down on top of Peter’s bed, pressing his face into the covers to smother his laughter and the sweet relief that came along with it.

The letter had made it to Sirius, all his worrying and he hadn’t even mentioned it until now, the tosser. But Sirius had gotten the letter—and he’d kept it. He’d kept it just to torture Remus later—he’d bet on it. He’d hoped for it.

When Remus had finally laughed enough that he was able to raise his head up again, he found Sirius there, leaning over from the bed's other side, the corners of his eyes pinched with a smile.

'I saw you watchin' from the stairs,
You're everyone that ever cared;
Oh, lordy!
Oh, lordy!'

"You could take it back," Sirius said, holding out the letter, "but I bet you won't."

Remus gave him a long look, grinding his teeth together behind a haggard smile.

This bloody tosser.

Using the back of his hand, he smacked the letter away and pushed off the ground. "Fine, keep it then."

Smugly, Sirius stepped back and neatly folded the letter back up, crossing back to his side of the room and carefully tucking it into its envelope. Remus watched, suddenly struck by how alike the back of Sirius' head was to Tonya's. They could've passed as siblings. Both of them shared the same black waves and pouty lips—they were pretty and they knew it.

Woah—uh-uh, you miserable toff.

Remus let out a deep breath and returned to his own bed, throwing himself onto it and staring up at the ceiling. Sirius had already tucked himself back up on his own, the Rickenbacker over his lap, but he let the rest of the song play.

'John, I'm only dancing,
She turns me on;
But I'm only dancing,
She turns me on;
But don't get me wrong,
I'm only dancing;
Dancing,
Won't someone touch me?
Touch me…'

"Hey, Moony?"

"Yeah?"

"Reckon you'll ever write any songs of your own? Like for real?"

"Who says I'm not writing them right now?"

"Are you?"

"... No. 'Course not."

There was a short pause. "Well, if you ever did, I'd sing them."

Remus stared up at the roof of his bed. He was thankful Sirius couldn't see his face from there. The smile on his face would've only tripled his ego.

* * *

Friday 24th September 1976

Now that he was no longer waking up so stiff and sore, Remus would've thought that carrying Lily's bag would've been easier, but he was half sure she carried every textbook she owned with her everywhere she went. Either that or she had a secret brick collection she'd neglected to share before passing the satchel over.

"What's the kid's name again?" Remus asked Mary, who was walking on his left while Lily walked on his right. He was somehow carrying her bag as well as his own after the girls had swindled him into holding them when they'd disappeared into the loo and then just never taken them back. Clearly their feminist agenda was just mere performance activism.

"Georgina Irene," Mary sighed. "It's a horrid name."

"So you nicknamed her 'Gigi'?"

"Only because I thought it would piss off Kara-Ann."

Mary said her step-mother's name with such visceral repulsion that even Lily made a sour face. Neither of them could blame her though, Remus wasn't sure how he'd react if Lyall came home with a wife only eight years older than he was. Thankfully, his father was a frigid bastard, averse to anything apart from his work and his dogs.

“How was I supposed to know that she was going to love it? God, all summer it was ‘Gigi this’ or ‘Gigi that’. I’m never going on holiday with my family again.”

“New York was nice though?” Lily asked.

“Pete’s been to New York,” Remus said.

“I thought he went to Florida?” Mary shook her head, swinging her umbrella with it and nearly taking out Remus’ eye. “Whatever. The city was wonderful, très éblouissante, and the shows were amazing. I could really see myself living there—but the crying. I swear, I’m never having children. I told you they didn't bring the nanny along, yeah? So whenever Daddy and that witch went out I got stuck playing babysitter! Pretty sure the kid started throwing up just because she thought it was funny to see me squirm! I never thought I’d say it but I’m glad to be stuck up here in the middle of nowhere. At least I have you guys, and it also puts me I’m far, far away from ‘Kara-Ann’—I told you she insists on being called the full thing? Just ‘Kara’ is ‘completely unacceptable’. ”

Lily glanced up at Remus like she was used to the spiel already, but there really wasn’t any stopping Mary once she started a rant. Luckily, they had James to do it for them.

“Hey guys,” James said, approaching them from across the pavement after appearing from behind the Galilei Block. He was slightly out of breath like he’d been running and both his dark hair and glasses were speckled with rain. Lily tipped her umbrella out for him to join her as he jogged to a stop in front of them and James smiled thankfully, taking it from her to hold up over the both of them.

“Black not with you?” Remus asked, adjusting Lily’s hefty school bag on his shoulder.

“Nope. Slughorn had to give him detention after he put the dry ice from today’s lesson in a water bottle and left it under Snape’s lab stool until it exploded.”

Lily gave a sharp gasp and James had to swallow an obvious smile. “I didn’t do it,” he insisted. “Made quite the boom though.”

“I knew leaving you three alone in chemistry this year would be a mistake.”

“Does that mean you’re interested in transferring in?”

“No,” Lily said haughtily, “then I’d have to drop psychology. You and Sev are just going to have to learn to get along on your own.”

“Not that this ‘finally talking to one another’ thing isn’t cute and all,” Mary said, “but I’m starving, so could we please go to dinner? Private study just about killed me.”

“You guys go ahead,” Remus said ducking out from under Mary’s umbrella (she never held it high enough to shield him from the rain anyway) and sliding the girls’ bags off his shoulder. “I’ll meet you later. I’ve got to get more strings from Buchanan. I broke one this morning.”

“It’s all the practising you and Sirius have been doing,” James said.

Mary beamed very suddenly. “Oh! Are you two writing your own songs yet? You could always write about—”

“No, we’re not,” Remus cut in mercilessly. At least he wasn’t.

“Well, say hello to Mrs. Buchanan for us,” Lily said, reaching to take her bag back. James intercepted her easily.

“I got it,” he said, taking the book bag and slinging it over his own shoulder. Lily let him, biting her lip and looking like she was fighting a blush.

“See Lily?” Mary said, taking her bag from Remus. “I told you blokes were good for something.” Grinning, she held the bag out to James.

“Cheers, Macdonald,” James sighed, obediently taking the bag. With three bags plus the umbrella he looked a lot like a human pack-animal.

“Good luck, Potter,” Remus saluted, and Mary gave him a cheeky wink as James waved him off dismissively. He didn’t appear at all displeased, though—Remus could see the puckered dimples standing out on his cheeks.

He left his friends outside the science block, turning and setting off across the campus to the Bellchant building. The rain, which had started as a regular autumn drizzle, quickly turned to a full-blown downpour and by the time he made it to the musical arts building he was soaked through to his undershirt. Sticking his head inside the classroom door, Remus found the music room empty, and the lights in Mrs. Buchanan's office off. He would’ve left all together had he not heard a clatter and a rather colourful string of curses coming from the storage room at the very back.

“Jesus F. Chopin! Ugh.” Another clatter came, louder this time, and then a little more defeated; “Shit..."

Stepping inside, Remus approached the storage room, its door slightly ajar, and knocked on the outside. “Er… Mrs. Buchanan?”

Sheila appeared in the doorway, pushing the door open so quickly it nearly sent him toppling back against the side of the orchestra risers.

“Remus! Oh, I’m sorry!” Mrs. Buchanan rushed up to him wearing a blue dress covered in white flowers and a pair of red wellies. She had her rain hat on too but was missing a jacket, making her look quite odd indoors. "You just spooked me a bit. Here, let me help you."

"It's okay." Righting himself before Sheila could apologise too much or touch him, Remus straightened up and took a peer into the storage room to find it a mess of toppled boxes and books. His teacher seemed to pick up on the awkwardness and quickly shut the door behind herself with a short chuckle.

“Oh, ignore that, I was just trying to find something but now I’m running late. I’ll have to save tidy-up for Monday.”

Remus glanced at the clock on the music room wall. “You’re leaving this weekend?”

“Yes,” Sheila sighed, giving a small smile, “my train leaves soon, but I should make it to the station in time as long as the rain hasn’t completely ruined the roads.”

She passed him by in a hurry, crossing the classroom to her podium where a large briefcase sat, open and stuffed to the brim with books and other class marking. Her raincoat was draped on a stool behind it, just as bright a red as her boots. Some of her hair had come untucked from beneath her hat in little muddy-brown wisps that fell across her face. It should’ve made her look as tired and haggard as any other teacher at the end of a long school week, but Sheila remained as bright as a summer morning. She always looked like that; it was her eyes, which would’ve been a completely unremarkable, ordinary shade of brown if they weren’t always smiling so kindly at you.

“Is there something I can do for you, Remus?”

Snapping out of his short daze, Remus crossed the classroom after her, taking his time to skip across the risers as he'd gotten used to doing over the past year. "I broke a string again," he said reluctantly, "I know it's the second since term started but—"

"Nonsense, you just have to work on not tightening them so much," Sheila dismissed. "But it also means you've been practising, good boy." She hummed a bit before abandoning the podium and walking to the far wall of the room, where she unlocked one of her cabinets and began rifling around for the right strings for the Fender.

Remus waited patiently, grinding the tip of his trainer into the bottom riser before realising it left a smudge of mud behind. He stopped immediately, not wanting to muck-up Sheila's precious space. In it nearly every day, though usually tired through the morning, Remus had come to appreciate the music room. Like an eternal paradox, it was constantly calm and hectic all at once. You were almost always guaranteed to hear some sort of moaning, banging, or squeaking from some sort of instrument, but no matter who was making the noise or acting out, Sheila was as kind as she was indulgent. Remus could remember thinking on their first day of forms that year, that not a single other person in the entire British Isles would've been able to handle the class. Sheila was the only one who was both patient and firm enough to control the group of snobby trouble-makers. He'd heard the worst of the class—Barty Crouch included—say terrible things to her during a fit or a foul mood, but no matter how badly they deserved a good beating for it, Sheila was never cross. It was always 'one more chance' with the humble music teacher, and when that chance was up, she loved her students enough to give them another. It was almost fascinating.

"There," Sheila said, closing the cupboard doors. She returned to his side and held out the package of strings. "Here you go. Do you need any help tuning it?"

"No, I'm okay. Thanks," Remus said, taking them and tucking them into his bag.

Sheila watched him, before clicking her tongue. "Remus, you're soaked to the bone, where's your raincoat?"

"Oh. Forgot it at the dorm."

"You're going to catch a cold."

"I run warm," he said, and though it was true, he could still feel the autumn chill licking up his spine.

Sheila chuckled before turning back to her podium, sliding her keys onto her wrist with a springy bracelet cord. “I think we’ve gotten rather lucky this year, actually. When I was a student here—about a million years ago—it used to rain all through autumn, and then you had to deal with the snow—and then the rain and snow. It was nearly unbearable.”

Remus was stunned. “You went to school here?”

“I did,” Sheila mused, “and somehow Professor McGonagall still managed to convince me to come back. She was my history professor back then, you know.”

“My mum went to Hawkings.” The words came out automatically, like they sometimes did when he was least expecting to say anything at all. How many months had it been since he’d thought about it? Not enough. Not when he would still catch himself lying awake at night in their dorm, wondering if she’d belonged to Rowena House like Lily and the girls, or if she’d sat in the same classroom—the same seat. The Bellchant building was over a hundred years old, it had acoustics from the turn of the century; she could have stood right there where he was standing, she could have—

Remus’ face snapped to the piano. It couldn’t be the same, but watching Sirius sit at the bench, practically drooling over the keys but never playing, it was like trying to remember his mother’s piano. So close and yet not there.

Feeling suddenly guilty though he had no reasonable reason to be, he looked back to his teacher. His jaw was clenched so tightly that he could feel the ache in his nose, which had healed weeks ago. The look Sheila was giving him was musing, not her normal, big smile, but instead something shyer.

“I know,” she said. “I knew your mum actually. Hope Lupin. ‘Course, she was Hope Howell when I knew her.”

Remus felt his mouth go dry. “You did?”

“Mhm. We were the same year even. Her family was from Cardiff, right, but both of us went to Hawkings for our entire childhood. We grew up here. Neither of us were very close with our parents because of it, but it was nice to find family in each other.”

Remus reached up and wrapped his fingers around the strap of his book bag, strangling it in his grasp. It felt like he was waiting for Sheila to burst out laughing like, 'psyche! You should've seen your face!' but she kept smiling, her eyebrows more upturned than usual.

"Do you know a lot of students' parents?" He blurted out.

Sheila nodded a bit. "Some. It's not uncommon for alumni to send their children to a school like Hawkings. This college is known for a lot of things you know, not just being damp and cold." Sheila tried a more comforting smile, but Remus was too rattled to return it. It was ironic really, that he had to travel the length of the entire country to learn more about his mother from strangers than he had in his own home.

"I'm sorry if I've upset you, Remus," Sheila said, reading his silence expertly. "I didn't want to make you uncomfortable. I thought it might be a hard thing to talk about, given that Hope's passed on."

"So you know she died then…" Remus forced himself to swallow.

It was Sheila's turn to be quiet. Finally, she nodded. "Yes. I recieved an invitation to her funeral, but... I couldn't attend due to some personal issues. I'm sorry, Remus."

You were invited to the funeral?

The idea socked him in the gut, but was almost laughable. Before coming to Hawkings he'd never even heard of a 'Sheila Buchanan'—how many strangers had attended his mother's wake? Lyall hadn't let him go—claimed he was too young for such things. Too distraught. Bad for public image.

Sheila had been invited though. This school friend Hope had never so much as mentioned. Why? Why her?

How come you got to know her and I didn't?

He needed a cigarette. Or to punch something. Probably both. He could hit the drums at the back of the room, or that horrible gong Barty was always having a go at in morning forms, but that wouldn't do anything. His hand would just bounce back. They'd just make noise. He wanted to break something.

A teacher for almost as many years as Remus had been alive, Sheila read his distress like an open book, and seemed to opt for a distraction rather than de-escalation.

“Remus,” she said, glancing quickly down at her watch, “will you come with me for a moment?”

Forcing himself to release his strangled bag strap, he managed a stiff nod. Sheila wasted no time. Snapping her briefcase shut and gathering her coat over one arm, she ushered him out of the music room and into the hall.

“It’s just down here,” she said reassuringly, leading him past music rooms number #3 and #4. Like the rest of the Bellchant building, the hallway’s walls were lined with photographs. Some were portraits of famous composers—Bach, Beethoven, Debussy, Schubert, even Sheila’s favourite, Chopin—and other frames contained class photos, each labelled with a year and filled with a collage of previous music students who’d come and gone from the school.

Remus realised what was happening before his and Sheila’s shoes stopped squeaking on the tile.

“This is the one,” his teacher said, looking up at a frame at least three feet across. The golden plaque beneath it read, Mr. Derry’s year 13 Music Class, 1954-55.

The photos encased behind the glass were scattered about one another, all elegantly framed into little boxes. Students grinned back at him around the lips of trumpets, slammed mallets down onto huge bass drums, concentrated as they were caught mid-song on their violins. Most of the photos were without colour, but none were faded. The kids could’ve been practising their instruments the day before, for all he knew. Even the uniforms remained much the same, only the faces were different.

One was familiar though.

A Sheila, twenty years younger than the one he was standing next to now, was bent over mid-laugh with a violin tucked under her chin and her bow poking into the shoulder of the girl next to her. The crest on the breast-pocket of her uniform was for Bronte House, and she had an excessively large hair bow pressed to the top of her head. Remus would’ve bet all his cigarettes for the year that the colour of the bow was similar to the bright, showy patterns Sheila wore as a teacher.

“That’s you,” he said, pointing up at a photo in the top-most corner of the frame.

“Mhm. That’s me the year I graduated from Hawkings,” she hummed. “And just there, that’s your mum.”

Remus clamped down on his bottom lip with his teeth. Sheila reached up with her long fingers and touched the bottom of her photo, right below where the girl sat in front of a grand piano. The instrument was mostly out of frame, but she was turned around on its bench, caught mid-laugh just like Sheila’s younger self. Her blonde hair was pinned back from her face in pretty curls and her fingers hovered over the keys, just barely brushing them.

The photo could’ve been staged; they looked that happy.

The last time Remus had seen Hope’s blonde hair, it had been spread out over the pillow of her hospital bed. Her blue eyes—grey and squinty with humour in the photograph—were tired, with heavy purple bags painted underneath like bruises. She’d been quiet, haunted almost, and when she did speak she hadn’t laughed, she’d cried.

He hadn’t, but that was probably just because of the chaos that was thundering through his mind. A part of him would never forgive her for what she'd told him that day, for the pressure she'd left on his shoulders, but then she'd gone and died and the anger had snowballed anyway. He sometimes wished he'd asked her more questions, but at the time they'd scared him. She'd scared him.

“Remus, are you alright?” Sheila asked softly.

“Yeah. Yeah I’m—” In realisation, Remus slapped a hand to his cheek and his fingers came away wet. Ashamed, he ran his still-damp shirt sleeve over his entire face and sucked in a sniffle, coughing to clear his throat. “I’m fine,” he said forcefully, his voice cracking slightly. “Thanks, Sh—Mrs. Buchanan. I think I’m gonna go now. Sorry if I kept you from your train.”

Sheila cupped both hands in front of her over her briefcase handle. “Don’t be sorry, love. I’m the one that’s always keeping you, after all.”

Remus nodded and turned away.

“Oh and Remus,” Sheila called, making him turn back so sharply he made her jump. “If you ever need anything,” she said, deflating in the shoulders as the surprise left her, “I’m always here to talk. I know I’m gone on some weekends, but if you ever need me, you can phone from the office. The secretarial ladies will have my number.”

He stared at her openly. “You want me to call you, while you’re not at school?”

“Only if you want to talk,” she said simply, with another warm smile. "You... well, I only mean to stay that if you ever want to talk more about Hope, I'd be glad to answer any questions I can. I know she loved you very much."

Almost bitterly, Remus touched his tongue to the inside of his cheek. “Okay. Goodbye, Mrs. Buchanan. Be… be safe on the road.”

“Goodbye, Remus. I hope you have a good weekend.”

Turning back around, he left her there in front of the photographs, the deafening echoes of his squeaking trainers chasing him all the way out of the building. The rain had stopped now, of course, and the sun was just peeking through the clouds above him. Remus stared up at it dejectedly, a hand over his eyes. He hated the rain, always had, but at least if it were still raining then there might’ve been a chance that someone else at Hawkings would’ve felt as miserable as he did.

Chapter End Notes

I'm really just posting chapters whenever I feel like it now. Sorry if that's a nuisance, lol.

The Bowie song is "John, I'm Only Dancing", 1972.

Chapter 34: Courante

Chapter Summary

> Remus gets a phone call, and then runs into someone unexpected. The boys plan a devilish prank.

Chapter Notes

> CW: References to drugs/distribution of illegal substances. Blood/gore trigger, nothing violent, just a gag. Also references to cut wrists in concurrence with the blood trigger. This is toward the very end of the chapter, so please beware if you're sensitive to it <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Surprise, surprise,
The boys are home;
My guardian angel,
Run down my telephone;
The heats on, Mister,
Can't you hear them scream,
What ever happened to the teenage dream?

- "Teenage Dream" T. Rex, 1974

Thursday 21st October 1976

"Oi, Lupin! Phone call!"

The muffled shout came with a sharp banging on their dorm room door. Hearing it, Remus launched himself up out of bed so fast he nearly tripped on the stack of books Sirius had pulled out of his hutch earlier that morning. He hadn't even taken a book, just left a mess. Remus was starting to suspect he did it on purpose just so he could watch him put them all back into order again.

"Moony, bring back tea!" Peter called as he threw the door open.

Taking the stairs two at a time, he might've slammed right into Sirius, who was making his way up to their room with a large duffle bag slung over one shoulder, had the other boy not pressed himself against the railing as Remus sailed past.

“Where’re you going in such a rush?” Sirius demanded.

“Be right back!” He called, nearly slipping on the third-floor landing as he went.

Only one of the three Godric House phones was free, but he’d gotten lucky and it was the last phone on the left, meaning that he could pull the cord taunt and swing into the other hallway for a bit of privacy.

Remus slowed as he approached the phone and readjusted his school jumper, eyeing the receiver that had been left off its hook for him to retrieve. His heart was slamming against his rib cage and his palms were clammy, but it felt stupid to hesitate, so he forced himself to scoop up the phone as casually as he could and leaned back against the wall, tucking himself around the corner so no one could watch him slowly raise the speaker to his ear.

“Hello…?”

Please God, just this once—don’t let it be Giles.

“Hey, Lu.”

Remus let out a sigh like he’d just run a marathon but his vigour returned instantly along with a sudden surge of anger. “ ‘Hey, Lu’? Two months and all I get is ‘hey, Lu’?”

“Helloooo, Remus, my darling. That better?” Tomny said from the other end, making Remus scrunch his nose up with an embarrassed smile.

“Hey, Tom,” he sighed.

“Jesus, if I’d have known you’d get so up in arms I would’ve waited another month.”

“Sod off. You already took your damn time. It’s almost Halloween—my friends are already concocting some sort of plan for it.”

“Ooh, I’m sorry, am I interrupting then? Were you busy making up your costumes? I bet you’d look really good as a little cat or something.”

“Yeah, about as good as you’d look in a fairy dress.”

“I missed your snappy attitude, Lu.” His voice came out crackly as the connection faded every now and then, but it was about as good as it got so far up in the Highlands.

“Say, who was it who picked up the phone earlier?” Tomny asked.

“What? Oh, well, the phones here are sorta communal. One rings and whoever’s closest picks up and shouts out a name.”

“Like prison?”

“Yeah, like prison.”

“Jesus Christ. Maybe we do need to come save you.”

“How’s home?” Remus asked, anxiously thumbing the phone’s cord.

“Wet,” Tomny said, “but it’s not as hot anymore, thank fuck. The humidity’s killer though.”

“It’s pretty gross up here too,” Remus answered.

“I’ll bet.”

There was a bit of silence between them, just enough for Remus to wonder why they were talking about the bloody weather. They never talked about the weather, not unless—

“You tweaking, Tomny?”

“Aw shit, Lu. Can’t even look me in the eye and ya still manage to see right through me.” There was a short laugh that ended with a muffled cough, before Tomny got back on the line. “Tonya’s trying this ‘holistic healing’ thing. Between you and me it’s all bullshit, but she got rid of everythin', even the hash. Told her it didn’t make a lick ‘a sense, while doing what—well, what we do, but she won’t have it. Lee’s almost been banished from the flat twice.”

“So what, you runnin’ drugs now, Tom?” Remus asked, though he already knew the answer. He made sure to lower his voice though, just in case. “It’s drugs now?”

“Ha, it’s always been drugs, Lu. You’re smart enough to know that. S’just where you get ‘em that’s changed.”

Remus licked his lips. Over the summer he’d watched Tonya do upwards of three or four lines a day, really hardcore stuff, and even when he'd wondered where Tomny had gotten the blow and how much his girlfriend's habit was costing him, he'd never asked. Back then it was just about keeping his head down and shutting up so Tomny wouldn't throw him out. Guess that didn't matter much anymore though. He wasn't sure quitting cold turkey was the best approach, but at least it was something.

"How is Tonya?"

"She's good—napping. I can wake her up if you'd—"

"No! I mean, I want to talk to her, yeah, but you first."

There was a bit of silence from Tomny's end, and Remus wished he really could see him, but Tomny had never been much of a chatterbox while strung-out anyway. "Okay… What do you want to talk about? You wanna tell me about school? You gettin' good grades?"

"God, you sound like Giles," Remus scoffed.

"Who's Giles?"

"Oh… dad's chauffeur."

"You mean the big bloke who's always coming to get you from Aldgate?"

"You knew he was coming to get me?"

"Sorry to break it to you, but you're not as sneaky as you think you are. You're just lucky Lee and the others are decently thick in the head."

Remus laughed. There obviously wasn't much point in lying anymore, since Tomny clearly knew everything. "Yeah well, that's him."

"He act like your mum, then? Always pestering?"

"Fuck, yes," Remus laughed, "I don't think my father would remember I existed if Giles weren't around to remind him."

"Want me to rough the old guy up? I'll meet him in Aldgate."

"Nah," Remus smiled, "Giles is good. Better than most."

"Better than us? Then your boys?"

“No. Impossible. No one better.”

Tomny gave a satisfied, “Mhm,” and Remus heard a faint voice in the background. “I should call you more often, Lu,” he said, “you make me sound so good.”

“I’m not your stooge,” Remus said.

“No, you’re not, that’s—” there was a short clatter; “Bloody hell woman, would you give me a second?”

Straightening up against the wall, Remus pressed both hands to the receiver as Tomny tussled for the phone on his end.

“Fine, fine! Lupin—the old bird wants a turn. I’ll talk to you soon, yeah?”

“Yeah!” Remus called. “Yeah, anytime, Tom.”

“It’s my turn,” a voice grumbled, and a moment later Tonya was shouting down the other end of the line; “REMUS, MY SWEET LOVE! HOW ARE YOU?”

He flinched away from the receiver and faintly heard Tomny say something crude about phone etiquette in the background.

“I know how to use the phone, Tomny. You’re the caveman,” Tonya chided. “Sorry love, just got excited. I’ve been trying to convince Tomny to call all this time, you know, but I think he just got a little nervous. Dunno why—it’s only ‘little ol’ Lu’. But you know how he is.”

“I will cut that phone line, woman!” Tomny warned in the background, making Remus smile.

“It’s nice to hear from you, Ton.”

“Oh, it’s so nice to hear from you too, darling. Have you been eating well? That school feeds you enough right? I bet you pay out the back-end for tuition, so they’d better.”

“Food’s fine. How about you?”

“Oh yeah, we’re eating fine, but these bleeders still won’t eat a fucking mushroom, can you believe that?”

“Lupin doesn’t like mushrooms either!” Tomny called, and Tonya gasped.

“Remus!”

“They’re a fungus!” He said, defensively.

“They’re good for you! Lots of fibre.”

“They grow in shit!”

“Everything grows in shit! It’s a shit-eats-shit kind of world!”

Remus clapped a hand over his eyes, even though he knew Tonya wouldn’t be able to see it, luckily she was as clever as she was erratic.

“What was that about it being nice to hear from me?” She said, cheekily.

“Well it was,” he shot back, before softening; “It is. Heard you emptied the flat of all the magic medicine.”

“I did,” she said indignantly, “and any and all artillery. We’re turning a new leaf over here. I’ve been trying to tell Tomny to stop shitting where he eats.”

“Tonya, so much shit-talk today.”

“Ooh, I better be careful or I’ll become a bad influence on our little angel.”

“I’m not an angel,” Remus said, dismissively, then more quietly; “I’m a messer.”

“A what?”

“Nothing. Say, listen to this, I lent one of my roommates your book, ‘The Count of Monte Cristo’—”

“Oh? Did he like it?”

“—Hasn’t finished it yet, but he’s started writing some song about it, something about how Dantès was wrongfully imprisoned without trial and how it's all just a metaphor for making our own luck or something.”

“Your friend writes songs?”

“Well, yeah, but—”

“Are you writing songs, Remus?”

“No—! I mean, no, definitely not.”

“I think it would be sort of brilliant if you were,” Tonya said, and Remus imagined her combing her long, black hair over one should the way she did when she got into one of her quietly excited moods.

“I’m not the musician,” he mumbled, “Sirius is.”

“Well I’m not talking about Sandy or whatever his name is—you’re taking music lessons again at school, right?”

“Yeah.”

“Then you’re a musician.” Of course Tonya said this so matter-of-factly that there was no room for argument. “Don’t sell yourself short, sweet love. It’s such a waste of time. You’re at school, you’re young—”

“You’re young too, Tonya.”

“Hm.” There was some silence, then; “Be a musician, Remus. If that’s what makes you happy. Or be a circus clown—or a rice farmer, or—”

As Tonya rambled on, Remus had to force himself to release the phone cord before it snapped; he hadn’t realised he’d been twisting it so tightly around his wrist.

“What makes you happy, Tonya?” He asked, interrupting her. She went quiet again, then spoke more softly;

“I’ll tell you at Christmas.”

Remus perked up a bit. “Christmas?”

“Yeah. You’re coming home right?”

“Well…” Home to the estate, maybe, but Remus was pretty sure Tomny had been serious: no more East End. Still, he couldn’t help the sliver of hope that bloomed in his chest. “I hope to,” he confessed.

“Brilliant. I’ll cook, we’ll do presents. It’ll be good.”

“You don’t need to get me anything.”

“Shut up, Christmas is Christmas. You’re getting a present.”

“Fine, but I’m going to get you something too.”

“I hope so. I take a size four-carat diamond.”

“Hah.”

Tonya giggled into the other end before sighing. “I should go now, love. These toll calls are atrocious, but I’ll call again, even if Tomny wants to be a little girl about it.”

“Okay. I’ll talk to you guys later then.”

“Okay. Goodbye, sweetheart.”

“Bye.”

The line clicked dead and Remus dropped the phone to his side, sagging back against the wall with his eyes closed. It was easy to replay the entire conversation in his head—he did that all the time when he couldn’t sleep—but it was harder to imagine what else he could’ve said over a phone call. Maybe things would be better by the holiday, maybe he actually could get away with visiting the flat again. His nose wouldn’t thank him and neither would Tomny, but if he already had Tonya rooting for him then at least he had a chance.

“Um, excuse me?”

Remus jolted sideways away from the sudden voice, only to be yanked back slightly by his hold on the receiver. Another boy was standing a few steps away, looking nervous as he stared up at him. Finally he pointed to the phone in Remus’ hand while shyly sucking on his lower lip.

“Are you done with the phone?”

“Oh,” Remus looked down at the stretched cord and stepped forward, dropping the receiver back down on the stand. “Yeah, s’all yours, mate.”

While the mousey boy squeezed in between him and the wall, Remus stepped away and rubbed at the back of his neck. It didn’t feel right to head directly back to his room where he’d certainly find it difficult to hide such an odd mood from his friends, so instead he walked out the front doors of the dorm, wearing only his jumper. The late October air was crisp but at least it wasn’t raining. He drifted up the pavement of House Lane, kicking rocks or pinecones that had fallen from the trees out of his way as he went.

The phone call had left him both lighter in the chest and foggier in the head; Tomny hadn't said anything about letting him visit for the holidays, that was all Tonya, and Tonya wasn't the one who'd kicked him out. She didn't know the truth either, or at least, he thought she didn't. The realisation that Tomny might've told the others who he really was and where he'd actually grown up hit harder than those kids who'd beat him in the alley. He tried telling himself that he had no real reason to believe Tomny had told anyone else—both he and Doss had kept things so hush that even Remus had been fooled—but now that he was on the outs by default, there really was no need for them to keep lying to the other lads. It wasn't loyal and it wasn't Tomny.

It would've been a lie to say that he wasn't angry about being forced out. Lee and Doss had been in plenty of fights—Seesaw had nearly gone blind during a nasty row before Remus had even known him—but he gets cornered once and that's it; you're out. Do not pass go, do not collect a decent reputation in London's roughest neighbourhood.

Remus touched his hand to his nose. The nasty gash he'd gotten when bone had broken skin had healed weeks ago, and now he was just left with an angry red scar. It would fade some eventually, but every time he looked in a mirror he was met by a reflection only a mother could love. And he didn't have one of those.

The boys had been good about it mostly, never bringing up the injury again after that first day, and always quick to offer a beating to kids like Crouch or Snape when they made their snide comments. Those Remus could handle, especially after discovering how powerful a look from 'scarface' could be when he was feeling particularly venomous. Crouch had nearly pissed his pants in the second week of forms when he'd made a jab at Sirius for his colourful nails (courtesy of Mary, of course) and Remus had slammed a fist down on a symbol behind his head, making the whole class jump and stare. Besides the fact that Crouch was a git for no reason at all, Remus had come around to Sirius' painted nails. They'd been a cherry-red that week, and Remus had zoned out watching Sirius strum on his guitar until the polish was chipped and worn.

Sirius had chosen blue next. Mary offered to paint Remus' too—a matching colour of course—but he'd refused. It was enough to just watch Sirius' fingers and pretend as though he had a fraction of the talent. He was getting better though, as Sheila spent every class assuring him, and Remus decided to give her the benefit of the doubt because it made him feel better.

It had been easy to assume that things would be awkward after the encounter with his music teacher, but Sheila remained a force to be reckoned with. The following Monday they'd all reconvened in forms as always and though Remus had done his best to avoid her gaze, she'd made no indication that anything was wrong. She called his name for registration, smiled as always and even took time out of her morning to help him and Sirius work out the bridge to "Like a Rolling Stone". It was completely and utterly normal, not like anything he'd been expecting after she'd revealed that she'd not only known Hope, but that they were close friends. Close enough to have a photograph of the pair of them hanging up for twenty years where everyone could see. He hadn't sought out the photo since Sheila had shown it to him, but he couldn't get the image out of his mind anyway; they'd looked so happy, absolutely lit up with joy. Remus wasn't sure he'd ever seen his mother look like that.

He couldn't remember deciding that his destination was going to be the Bellchant building, yet his feet had carried him there anyway. It was a Sunday and Sheila had been absent from Communion earlier that morning which likely meant she was off campus again for the weekend. It seemed that the music teacher was spending most weekends away nowadays. It made Remus kick himself for not taking the chance when they were alone to ask where it was she was always disappearing to. He'd been understandably distracted at least.

The Bellchant building was always quietest on the weekends, and he and Sirius had made good use of it to sneak away and practice toward the end of the year 11. They were rarely interrupted, and more than once he'd had to hide his cigarettes to keep Sirius from lighting up right there on the risers. He didn't think it was fair to sully the only classroom in the entire campus that he enjoyed being in with ash and smoke. It wasn't as though Sirius wanted to desecrate the hall of music and artistic expression, just that he took any and all chance to stick it to the ruling powers. Though Remus hadn't been around to see it, Sirius had once lit one of their hand-rolled cigarettes off a bunsen burner in the middle of chemistry and Slughorn gave him detention carrying all the empty propane canisters from the classroom to the school's rubbish centre. According to him, it had been worth it to see the dopey look on the professor's face though.

Remus turned around halfway to music room #2, feeling a bit stupid. Dinner was going to start soon and he'd hoped to finish his Literacy homework beforehand. He hadn't brought the Fender or his cigarettes and it wasn't like he had the stomach to 'visit mum' either, so the walk had been a waste. But just as he was making his way back to the music hall's main doors, the faint sound of a violin drifted toward him. It was coming from one of the private lesson rooms across the hallway—a pretty melody with a quick tempo, like something you could dance to.

Shifting his weight in front of the main doors, Remus' curiosity won out and he turned back, creeping up to the doorway of one of the private rooms—the only one with any light peeking through its frosted-glass window. Leaning his ear against it to listen, he was reminded of the songs Sheila would sometimes play for them at the beginning of class. Hers were always chipper and upbeat or otherwise beautiful and calming, but as he listened, Remus felt the song grow sadder, like its composer had experienced some great loss in the middle of writing it.

Perhaps it was because he was feeling sentimental after his phone call, or maybe he was just becoming too curious for his own good; either way the door clicked open and Remus peeked inside to find Regulus Black standing with his back to the door, a violin tucked under his chin. The far side of the practice room was covered in mirrors, reflecting Regulus' gentle movements as he played. His eyes were closed and the expression on his face was serene, leaving him looking younger than he normally did while wearing his usual stoic frown. Regulus' entire body moved with the song like the violin was an extension of himself, dark Black-family waves falling down across his forehead as he swayed.

Remus watched him for a long time, utterly entranced. There was a music stand set up in front of Regulus, but his eyes never opened; it was almost like the song was flowing out of him rather than off the page. It was exactly like Sirius, he thought, when he got lost in his strumming and just let his body take over.

The song's abrupt end caught Remus by surprise. He was still watching, captivated by Regulus' movement even more than the melody, but he didn't miss it when the dark-haired boy opened his eyes and straightened up, catching sight of him in the mirror.

"What are you doing in here?" Regulus demanded.

"Sorry!" Remus balked. "Didn't mean to eavesdrop, I just heard you and—"

“I booked this as a private room.”

“Yeah, sorry,” Remus rubbed his arm awkwardly, unaware that any of the rooms could be booked by students in the first place. “I’m Remus, I know Sirius and—”

“I know who you are,” Regulus snapped, bending down to throw open the violin case. “You’re one of my brother’s roommates.”

“Yeah…”

“The one who busted his face punching a cop.”

Remus’ mouth dropped open. “What? No, I never punched any cop. Who said that?”

“He did—my brother. Barty overheard him in your forms.”

Remus let out a bark of laughter. “I’m gonna kill that numpty.”

Apparently not all that entertained by Remus’ shock, Regulus snapped his violin case shut and began gathering his music sheets up off the stand. Feeling slightly guilty for interrupting, Remus squeezed the door handle and bit his lip. “That was really good,” he said, “whatever you were playing.”

Regulus glanced up at him in the mirror with an irritated expression, but answered anyway. “Violin Partita number two in D minor. Courante."

“I have no idea what that means,” Remus said, automatically.

"Well that's no surprise," Regulus scoffed, snapping his music folder closed and tucking it up under one arm as he scooped the violin case up off the floor. When he rounded and approached the door, he gave Remus a haughty look with the same grey eyes as Sirius. "Are you going to move, or are you going to punch me too?"

"Wha—?"

Regulus shoved past, disinterested.

“It was just a football accident actually,” Remus called. “I never punched anyone.” That was true, at least.

Pausing a few steps away, the younger boy glanced back. “My brother isn’t as clever as he thinks he is. If he were, he’d know when to keep his mouth shut."

Before Remus could even begin to wonder what it was that he actually meant by the remark, Regulus made his way to the front doors of the Bellchant building and pushed them open, stepping out into the sun.

* * *

When he returned to his dorm room, tea tray in hand, Remus found James and Sirius sitting on the floor, their laps covered in rope and black tarping. Along with the ominous supplies, sat the rather sorry-looking stag's head (fur now slightly matted thanks to the steam from their showers), a bucket, a box of safety matches, and a megaphone they'd surely lifted from Ms. Hooch.

"Do I even want to know?" Remus said, shutting the door behind himself with his foot.

Sirius looked up pointedly. He had a notebook open in front of him on the floor with a scribbled list of bullet points. "Where have you been, you slacker?"

Remus carefully adjusted one of the mugs of tea on his tray. "Nowhere. Now what is it I've been slacking off from?"

"You were supposed to be here helping us plan and prepare for our Halloween prank extravaganza!"

"Extravaganza? Halloween is almost two weeks away."

"That's why we gotta plan!" Sirius insisted. "Just you wait—this is gonna totally blow every other prank out of the water."

Shaking his head hopelessly, Remus crossed the room and carefully sat down across from them, setting the tea tray on the floor. "So what? No pumpkins or baseball bats this year?"

Sirius bent back over his notes. "Nope, that's kids stuff. We have matured some, Moony."

"And so naturally you resort to what appears to be a rather unorthodox murder plot."

While Sirius snickered, James continued tying knots in the bundle of rope. “You’ll think it’s brilliant when you hear it, Lupin. We’re including the girls too.”

“Lily and Marlene agreed to be in on a prank?” Remus asked in disbelief.

“No,” Sirius snorted, “they’re going to be the ones getting pranked, a’course.”

“Lily’s going to give you detention for the rest of your sorry lives. If she doesn’t kill you first, that is.”

“Whose is whose?” James asked, disregarding the threat and glancing at the tea tray, giving each cup its own sceptical look.

“This one’s yours.”

“One sugar?”

“Yes, Mum,” Remus drawled, and James took the cup from him, smirking. “I ran into your brother today,” he said to Sirius, passing him his own cup.

“Oh, yeah? How is the dear little git?”

“Fine. Though he told me you’ve been going around telling people I punched a bloody cop.” James snorted into his tea at that, and Sirius gave a guilty grin.

“I’m just trying to add to your mystique, Moony. No one’s going to be afraid of you if they find out you broke your face on a football.”

“Who says I want people to be afraid of me?” Remus demanded.

“You do—every day when you go around brooding.”

“You’re such an ass, Black.”

“You remember what you do with asses though right? You kiss them.” Sirius stuck his lips out at him, but Remus only rolled his eyes and reached for his tea.

“So what’s this plan of yours?”

To answer him, Sirius spun his notebook around and pushed it towards him. Remus scanned the page. “Bonfire? Ghosts? James dies? What the hell is this?”

“It’s history in the making,” Sirius sang giddily.

“When did you even have time to come up with this?”

“During maths, mostly. Potter helped in chem though.”

Shaking his head, Remus looked at the list again. “Oh my god… they’re actually going to murder you.”

“ ‘Us’, Lupin,” Sirius smirked, “murder us.”

Remus scoffed and pushed the notebook back before raising his tea to his lips. “So where’s Pete?”

On cue, Peter burst out of the bathroom, his arms dripping blood up to his elbows. “I did it! It worked!” He cried, thrusting his hands out ahead of him and spattering their bedroom floor with red gore.

“Bloody hell!” Remus sputtered in alarm, upsetting his cup and spilling tea down the front of his jumper.

Peter beamed. “Good pun, Moony!”

Hissing, Remus peeled hot tea-soaked fabric away from his chest, gaping up at his friends in horror. “Pete, what the fuck did you do? Slit your own wrists for fun?”

“Calm down, Lupin,” James said, stifling a laugh, “s'only fake blood.”

“Yeah, just a bit of corn syrup and food colouring,” Peter supplied, while noticing the mess he was leaving on the floor.

“But if it’s making you react like this, then Halloween’s going to be fucking amazing,” Sirius beamed.

It was James who got up first, walking up to Peter and wiping a bit of the fake blood off of his forearm, testing its stickiness between his fingers and then tasting it. He grimaced a bit, then said; “Still better than Lupin’s tea.”

“It looks so real,” Sirius observed from his place on the ground. “The girls are going to shit themselves.”

“Please no more shit talk today,” Remus mumbled to himself.

“It’s just meant to be funny,” James warned Sirius, coming out of a bathroom with a towel for Peter; “We’re not trying to traumatise them.”

“Speak for yourself.”

For James, Remus reached forward and took a swipe at Sirius’ shoulder. “Think of poor Prongs’ feelings. He’ll never get Lily’s hand in marriage if she drops dead of fright first.”

“It’s not like she’s actually his girlfriend,” Sirius said in his own defence, making James purse his lips sourly. “In fact until November first she’s just another target. So Moony, fancy a trip back to the Shrieking Shack?”

Chapter End Notes

'Artillery’ is slang for equipment used for shooting up/injecting drugs.
A toll call is like a long distance call, tends to cost more.
Song referenced in this chapter is “Like a Rolling Stone” by Bob Dylan, 1965.

A short but sweet chapter! I'm going on vacation for a little bit, but I'm still hoping to get some work done on new chapters so I can keep posting. Sorry if there ends up being some more time between them then usual for the next little bit! <3

Also, if you got the Dantès (“Count of Monte Cristo”) allegory to [canon] Sirius like my lovely sunflower, Asaelia, you get a gold star, hehe.

Chapter 35: Meet the Candyman

Chapter Summary

> As the boys gear up for their Hallowe'en extravaganza, Remus comes to realise that their personal stash is feeling a little dry.

Chapter Notes

> CW: Drugs, reference to hard substances, drinking, and references to sex.
>
> Lots of slang in this chapter, I'm realising. Read the 'end notes' before if it makes things easier. Cheers.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Straight people don't know what you're about,
They put you down and shut you out;
You gave to me a new belief,
And soon the world will love you sweet leaf...

- "Sweet Leaf" Black Sabbath, 1971

Monday 25th October 1976

They had six days until Halloween, which meant six days to put their horrifically devious plan into action. First on the agenda was scoping out an adequate spot for the bonfire that was both far enough from school that no one would stumble across it but also not too far that the girls would question their intentions. They ended up finding just the place along the path and after that—were free to set the scene.

Returning to the Shrieking Shack was not Remus' ideal way to spend their free time, but once he'd gotten to see for himself just exactly how they were going to scare the pants off the girls, he finally began to see the appeal. The plan was genius—and hard to bungle provided none of them broke character. Remus was a little nervous about that, but after Sirius had informed him he would be playing the role of 'sleeper agent'—meaning he could be as irritated and pessimistic in front of the girls as usual—he'd been more than willing to throw his hat into the ring.

Naturally though, Halloween prep went beyond fake blood and pumpkins; any good and sane teenager knew there had to be ample drink in order for anyone to have a half-decent time. Sadly for the troupe of 4A, without Simeon to supply them their stash was running dangerously low.

“Are you sure we drank that entire bottle of vodka last week?” Remus asked, rifling through his cupboards.

“Yes,” James called, “I distinctly remember reliving the experience the next morning while hugging the toilet.”

“What about the brandy?”

“Do you mean the apricot or the cherry?”

“Either!”

“Gone.”

“Then why bother specifying?” Remus grunted as he pulled his wardrobe hutch away from the bedroom wall and reached behind it, returning with a half-litre bottle of whisky that was relatively untouched. “Found one!” He declared, waving the booze in the air for James to see.

“And look what I found!” James said, untucking himself from beneath his bed to reveal a few spliffs wrapped up in a plastic baggy.

“Please do not tell me you found that in your football kit,” Remus grimaced.

“What—it hides the smell!” James said dejectedly, tossing the weed on his bed and going back to his search.

“There’s that bit of white rum in the bathroom cupboard,” Peter supplied from his own bed where he was working on his latest art assignment.

“What’s it doing in there?” James asked.

“Don’t you remember? You and Sirius dared each other to use it as mouthwash.”

“No wonder we have a shortage,” Remus said, making James snort. Standing, he went to the bathroom to have a look for himself and found the rum tucked up between a wrinkled tube of toothpaste and a bottle of Peter's aftershave—which had regrettably never been opened. When he returned to the room he tossed the booze onto James' bed along with his wardrobe-whisky and stood back to examine their small haul of illegal substances; one bottle of port wine courtesy of Mr. and Mrs. Pettigrew's wine cellar, half a litre of rum that had once been a full litre, the whisky, a few measly spliffs, and their leftover tobacco and rolling papers. All together he figured it would last them till the end of the month if they were lucky—but it wasn't nearly enough for Halloween as well as Sirius' seventeenth.

"Maybe Black'll surprise us and go cold-turkey before his birthday," James supplied, popping up next to him with one of his football trainers in hand. He dug through it a moment before pulling out another zippo and adding it to the pile with a shrug.

"A meteoroid would have a better chance of hitting the Great Hall," Remus scoffed. "It's not enough."

"I searched Sirius' side and he's fresh out too. Should we get Mary to ask around?"

"Already did. Her resources are dryer than ours after her boot went off to uni last term."

James tsked. "What about that Xeno guy? He supplied Sim a bit didn't he?"

Remus considered. From what he'd managed to gather about the reclusive drug-dealing hippy, he didn't fence for just anyone. Xeno's coterie was just as exclusive as Lily's precious Slug Club, which meant you had to know someone to get an in.

"James, isn't one of Xeno's roommates in your forms? Can you talk to him, maybe ask if Xeno would fence for us too?" He asked.

"You mean David?" James shook his head. "No, he doesn't talk to anyone."

"At all?"

"Not in forms anyway. Haven't heard him say anything since last year."

"I still don't understand why we're keeping it a secret from Sirius in the first place," Peter called.

“Because it’s his birthday,” James said with a stubborn pout. “Last year was ruined by Snape and Filch—‘least we can do is make sure we have enough booze to get him properly knackered this time around.”

Remus nodded in agreement and Peter just shrugged. “Whatever you say. But James, can you turn this way a bit? I wasn’t done with your nose.”

“Sure thing.” Obliging, James struck a pose with both arms flexed and his nose turned up to the sky. Peter snorted and kept sketching with those quick little pencil movements of his. He was always most relaxed with a pencil in his hand—the most sure of himself.

“Pete,” Remus started, having reached a conclusion on his own, “when was the last time you talked to Sim?”

Peter’s mouth pinched a bit in concentration but he didn’t take his eyes off James. “Last month—he called on me and Lot’s birthday.”

“He say how Oxford’s going?” Asked James. “Dad wants me to think about applying there for university. That or Cambridge like him and mum.”

“He’s got a new girlfriend. That’s about all I know—turn toward the light a bit?”

While James acquiesced, Remus held a hand to his mouth and stared down at their pitiful pile. No way it was enough. “Pete,” he said suddenly, “I think you need to get a hold of your brother.”

“Why…?”

“ ‘Cause we need an in—and he’s gonna give it to us.”

* * *

Three Days Later…

It was almost refreshing to keep a secret from Sirius. Not because Remus didn’t ever do that, but because it was finally a secret for the only three of them to share. They’d all agreed to keep the Xeno plan a surprise for his birthday but not telling Sirius also meant that they didn’t run the risk of disappointing him should they be unsuccessful. Xeno was already a hard man to track down. He rarely came out of his smoke-included haze long enough to interact with anyone and when he did it was only to venture to whatever whimsey, philosophical class that peaked his fancy that day. They all figured he'd have been tossed out on his rear ages ago were he not the heir to one of the richest families in all of North-Eastern England.

Peter had managed to ring Simeon at school, and he was all too willing to call up his favourite candyman and put in a good word for them.

"No guarantees boys, but I promise to do what I can," Simeon said through the phone. There was a lot of noise around them and it wasn't hard to tell that he was having a party of his own, though what university parties looked like, Remus had no idea.

Afterwards it had turned into a waiting game. Wait for Simeon to get ahold of Xeno—wait for Xeno to get ahold of them. Simeon warned them against badgering him, saying 'that's not how the game is played. Play by the rules and then you get to reap the rewards'. Remus thought it was rather stupid they had to jump through so many hoops —back home in London all one needed to do was find the dealer and make sure they had enough cash on them. But the rich loved their traditions.

"Psst! PSST! Moony!"

Lifting his head off his hand, Remus glanced to his right, where Sirius was leaning across the aisle between their desks and trying to get his attention. They were in History, which normally wasn't hard to zone out in, but Professor Binns' was out on sick leave. As a result, one of the year 13 business and marketing teachers was filling in and rather than sticking to Binns' surely-riveting daily itinerary, he'd dimmed the overhead lights and put on a film. Most of the students were thrilled by the news until the title card rolled by and they realised they were watching a documentary about disillusionment among the German troops of World War I. The rattling from the projector was louder than the film itself, but their substitute had already leaned back in his desk chair and appeared to have fallen asleep.

"Moony!" Sirius hissed again, flapping an arm at him. "What rhymes with 'diatribe'?"

"What?" Remus whispered back.

"I can only think of 'bribe' but it isn't working."

Still confused, Remus took a moment to consider. “Describe…?”

Sirius’ eyes widened happily and he turned back to his notebook, scribbling in it. A few seconds later he was smiling and he turned back to him. “Now what about ‘obsolete’?”

“Concrete.”

“And ‘reputation’?”

Before Remus could answer a third time, Lily whipped around in her seat ahead of him to give Sirius a nasty glare. “You really can’t be quiet for five minutes, can you?”

Sirius pointed his pencil at the clock on the wall above the classroom door. “Au contraire, Evans—I’ve already been quiet for thirty-five minutes.”

“It’s a new record then,” Mary giggled, turning around in her seat ahead of Sirius to join in.

“You’re supposed to be paying attention to the movie,” Lily insisted quietly.

“Why? Haven’t you realised that Clank the Wank over there only put the thing on ‘cause he’s hung over? I mean look at him.”

They all turned back around to stare at the teacher, but as far as Remus could tell, he just had no interest in interacting or teaching them. He probably hated children all together, which wasn’t much different from most other business teachers.

“How do you know?” Mary asked, tilting her head a bit to get a better look.

“Call it an alcoholic’s intuition,” Sirius answered, still scribbling away. “I’ve seen my dad pissed enough times to know what a morning after looks like.”

Though Lily still appeared unconvinced, Mary shrugged and turned back around in her seat. “What are you doing anyway?” She asked, leaning forward to peek at what Sirius was writing.

“New song for me and Lupin’s band.”

“Ooh, really? Can I read it?”

“When it’s finished.”

“Aw c’mon, Black. I’ll sing it to you,” Mary hummed.

“Tempting, but no thanks, love.”

“Hmph. Stingy.”

Lily glanced back at Remus. “A band? You mean you’re actually taking this whole thing seriously now?”

“Maybe…”

“And the songs? Are they really any good?”

Remus’ lips tugged up into a smile. “They’re getting better. Yesterday Sirius managed to rhyme ‘magic’ with ‘manic’ and it actually sounded pretty decent.”

There was a sharp ripping noise that made all of them flinch as Sirius tore the page free from his notebook. “That’s right,” he bragged, “soon Moony and I are going to be halfway to a debut album.”

“You don’t even have a name,” Lily pointed out. “Unless you’re going with ‘Numpty #1 and Numpty #2’.”

“As long as I get to be number one,” Remus said.

“You’re always number one, Remus,” Mary said, “number one in our hearts.” She drew a heart in the air with her fingers for emphasis.

“Ditto,” Sirius said, folding the paper in half, “now Moony, take this and let me know what you think about the hook. I tried with that ‘sandpaper in our throats—sawdust in our lungs’ bit we talked about but I’m still not sure that—”

Suddenly the classroom lights flicked on, blinding them and making several students burst up in their seats from the naps they were surely enjoying not a moment before. The substitute, a crotchety old man named Dr. Gibbens, was standing across the room and glaring at the four of them with all the fury a tenured professor could muster.

“I thought I told everyone there was to be no talking. You, I hope that’s not a note in your hand.” Gibbens pointed a gnarled finger at Sirius as he moved to stand in front of the projector, where a team of German shoulders continued marching across the white of his dress shirt.

Sirius pulled his arm back immediately. “No. Just some rubbish.”

Dr. Gibbens considered this before strolling out from behind the film’s glare and picking up the bin next to his desk. “Ah, well in that case…” He strolled forward down their line of desks, stopping next to Sirius and holding out the bin. “Allow me to help you throw it away.”

Sirius hesitated, and a look of sympathy passed over even Lily’s face.

“Unless you’d like to read whatever it is aloud?” The professor taunted.

Setting his jaw, Sirius slowly crumpled the paper in his fist and tossed it into the bin with a sour smile. “No, thanks for the help, sir.”

Their substitute dipped his head slightly in smug victory and returned to the front of the room. “No more chatter,” he ordered, flicking off the lights once more. Just as he did, the projector started spasming, and he had to turn them back on again as it began skipping the tape and making a loud screeching noise.

“Blasted machine!”

While their teacher went to the aid of the terribly depressing war film, Mary carefully turned around in her seat again. “I’m so sorry, Sirius,” she whispered, as Sirius leaned back in his chair, looking as put out as James whenever Arsenal lost.

“Why didn’t you just read it?” Lily murmured.

“I don’t bark on command,” Sirius grumbled. “And s’fine, I remember most of it anyway.”

“Quiet!” Gibbens snapped. Sirius sharply flipped him off from behind before glancing back to his notebook and putting pen to paper once more. Remus watched him, eager to get a hold of the drafted lyrics, but when Sirius finally passed him the next note behind their teacher’s back, he couldn’t read a word of it.

“Sirius, this is in French.”

“What did I just say?” Whirling around, Dr. Gibbens’ eyes instantly narrowed in on the note in Remus’ hand. “You!” He barked. “Enough of this nonsense! Stand up now and read the note aloud so we all might hear what’s so important that you need to interrupt the entire class!”

“Nooo… don’t read it…” Sirius said in a small, sarcastic voice before flashing Remus a lopsided smirk.

“I’m gonna throttle you,” Remus growled.

“UP!”

Reluctantly, he stood and felt the unnerving caress of twenty-five pairs of eyes on him. “Professor, I can’t read it,” he said.

“What are you daft, boy? Read the damn note so we might move on!”

Grinding his teeth together, Remus looked down and gave it his best shot; “Chair Monsieur Gibbens, jay—I mean—jie limpression… Er—kill est dee mon devour de voo informer de tr-troys choi...ses? Premiere-ment tah so-er mapple oh telephone, duce...me-ment tah femme mapple oh lit ey towahse-ment tah mer—mare...?” He broke off, defeated. "Do I really have to keep going, sir?"

If Dr. Gibbens had told him again that he was daft, he was positively sure the rest of the class would agreed with him. Every other student staring at him with open mouths and up-turned eyebrows. Mary’s face was pinched together with an embarrassed smile and Lily looked more confused than he’d ever seen her.

“Did you just speak in Klingon, Lupin?” The kid behind him asked.

Before Remus could ask what ‘Klingon’ was, Sirius burst out laughing.

“Alright,” Gibbens growled, crossing his arms over his chest, “you, the comically long-haired pillock, since you so obviously know what the note says, why don’t you enlighten the rest of us?”

Sirius stifled his laughter and shrugged, completely unbothered, before standing and taking the note back from Remus.

“Okay,” he hummed, clearing his throat as Remus threw himself back down at his desk; “Let’s see here… the note says, ‘Cher Monsieur Gibbens, j’ai l’impression qu’il est de mon devoir de tu informer de trois choses, premièrement ta sœur m’appelle au téléphone, deuxièmement ta femme m’appelle au lit, et troisièmement, ta mère’—and well, your mum... she just calls me ‘Daddy’.”

Before Sirius had even finished, Mary had clapped her hands over her mouth, instantly understanding his French. It took everyone else a moment longer but by the time they finally understood what might’ve just come out of his mouth, Sirius was already sitting back down and propping his feet on his desk with a shit-eating grin on his face.

“YOU…!” Gibbens raged, turning nearly purple in the face; “HALLWAY NOW!”

Sirius lazily dropped his feet back down without complaint and stood up. Before moving away, he held out his fist and Remus tapped it with his own, unable to stop smiling. While the rest of the class gaped or giggled, Dr. Gibbens marched him from the room and into the hall where he promptly let loose a verbal thrashing that could be heard through the walls.

“That idiot,” Lily sighed, shaking her head.

Remus opened the note. “Idiot, yes. But also an utter ledge.”

The rest of the class cheered when Sirius returned, smugly flouncing back into the room with his hands behind his head. Dr. Gibbens had to threaten everyone with their own detentions to get the class to settle, but it was clear Sirius was the winner of the day, punishment or not.

Both Remus and Sirius spent the first half of their dinner hour regaling the tale to Peter, who listened intently, disbelief clear on his face.

“One day you’re going to sass the wrong person, Black,” he warned, as Sirius lifted a spoonful of stew to his lips.

“Honestly can’t wait for that day,” Sirius said, “it’s hard being the main character in everyone else’s story.” He grimaced and shook his head. “Still needs more salt. Be right back.”

“Smug bastard,” Peter chuckled, turning back to Remus as Sirius lifted his tray and strolled across the dining room. “Did Mary ever say what the rest of the rest of the note said—the French bits?”

“Something about Gibbens’ wife calling his name in bed?”

Before Peter could laugh, James appeared at their table with his own tray and a massive grin on his face.

“We got it, lads!” He announced. “We got the appointment!”

“What appointment?” Peter asked, sipping from his juice mug.

“With Xeno!”

Remus perked up instantly. “Oh yeah?”

James nodded and slid into the table across from them. “David passed me a note today in forms.”

“Seems like there’s a lot of note-passing going on today,” Remus said, making Peter snort. “What’d it say?”

“Xeno invited us over to his room.”

“When?”

“Soon—tonight.” James checked his watch and winced. “We gotta ditch Sirius if we want it to stay a surprise.”

“Well how’re we gonna do that?” Peter asked.

Glancing across the room, he spotted Sirius was standing next to the condiments bar and chatting up another girl from their history class. Gloating, no doubt.

“Never rests, does he?” Remus murmured, before the startings of a devious idea began to materialise in the forefront of his mind. Notes, huh?

Drawing his eyes from Sirius, he scanned the room for the answer to their problems. “Just gotta give him a decent distraction,” Remus went on, making James raise an eyebrow in question.

“What you thinking, Moony?”

Suddenly giddy, Remus turned back to his friends and leaned forward, drumming his fingertips on the table in anticipation. “Prongs, you got a pen?”

“A pen? Uh, yeah sure.” James fumbled for his bag and produced a pen, handing it over.

“And Pete, can I bum your napkin?”

Peter passed his unused napkin along and Remus took it, before pausing and handing it both back to James. “My handwriting’s shit, you do it.”

With a curious look, James uncapped the pen. “Okay, what am I writing?”

“Just say hello—invite him to another table, compliment his hair or something. Oh and sign it as Kimmy.”

James’ head shot up in recognition; “Kimmy? As in ‘Kim Bishop’?”

“Yeah, and put a little heart over the ‘i’.”

“You’re evil,” James snorted as he bent over the napkin.

“Yeah, yeah, hurry up.”

Once James had finished his scribbling and handed him the note, Remus took a second to read it over.

“Can you explain what it is you’re doing now?” Peter asked, and Remus slid him the napkin as he leaned back on the bench in satisfaction.

“Oh wow.”

“Mhm.” Remus looked up just in time to snatch the note back and swallow his smile, as Sirius returned, arching an eyebrow when he realised that they were all staring at him.

“What—something on my face?” He asked, setting down his dinner tray.

“Someone dropped something off for you,” Remus said, pushing the note across the table for him. With a suspicious look, Sirius unfolded the napkin and read it over. Instantly his head shot up and he glanced about the room before settling on a group of girls about four tables down. Amongst them was Kim Bishop, possibly the most popular girl in the year above them. On a regular day, a girl like Kimmy wouldn’t have looked twice at any of them, but Sirius had never been close to being ‘regular’ anyway. They watched as Kimmy twirled a chestnut curl around one finger until one of her friends noticed their staring and leaned over to whisper in her ear. Looking up, she caught Sirius’ gaze and smiled shyly before turning back to her girlfriends to share in a giggle.

“Oh,” Sirius said, looking back at the note, “Kim give this to you?”

Remus nodded eagerly. “Mhm. But it’s clearly for you.”

“Go on Sirius, go talk to her,” James hissed from the end of the table, grinning like a madman.

“Yeah Sirius, go talk to her,” Peter sniggered.

“No way, you’re totally lying,” Sirius chuckled, flopping down on the bench next to Remus and tossing the napkin away. “Kimmy’s way too hot to approach you guys in the cafeteria anyway.”

“It’ll be a missed opportunity then,” James said in delight.

“No, he’s right,” Remus shrugged, “must be another ‘devilishly handsome, raven-haired hunk around.”

“She said that?” Sirius gaped. The look he gave him made Remus pause.

“Er—yeah. S-Sure she did…”

“Just go talk to her!” Peter said. “What do you have to lose?”

Sirius’ eyes hadn’t left Remus’, making him nervous.

“Moony?”

“What?” He blanched.

“You really think I should go talk to her?”

Remus forced a chuckle. “Don’t tell me you’re feeling shy now, Black?”

Immediately Sirius’ eyes widened a bit and he raised his chin haughtily before getting up from the table. “Alright then, guess I will.”

There was a beat of silence, and Sirius still hadn’t moved. Remus looked around before indicating towards Kimmy with his head. “Okay, go on then.”

Sirius coughed out a short laugh; “Fine,” and spun around, striding away. Remus stared after him, bewildered but unsure why and they all watched as Sirius moved across the hall, quickly settling into that confident stride of his. By the time he made it to Kim’s table he was smiling handsomely, both thumbs tucked into the belt loops of his trousers.

“It worked!” James said hurriedly, scooping up his dinner tray and slinging his bag over his shoulder. “Come on, Pete!”

“Coming!” Peter chirped, shoving a few more bites of dinner into his mouth as he tugged his jacket on.

James waved frantically at Remus, who was still sitting stunned. It took no time at all for the girls to eagerly make space at the table for Sirius, and after dropping down into the space next to Kim, he propped one elbow up onto its surface and leaned into his knuckles. Kimmy eyed him like a cat that'd just spotted a bird with a broken wing.

“Moony!”

“Yup, coming,” Remus said stiffly, snapping out of it and grabbing his bag and jacket with one hand and his dinner tray with the other. As the three of them legged it out of the dining hall, leaving their dinner plates to clatter into the dirty dish tub by the door, Remus didn’t look back.

* * *

None of them had ever been inside Dalal House, but the moment they’d crossed the threshold it became obvious that the theme throughout the dorm was distinctly more free-spirited and garish than they’d expected. In comparison to Godric or Byron House, Dalal could’ve nearly passed for a circus tent, what with all the drapes hanging from the ceiling and tapestries decorating the walls. Countless rugs and carpets lined the floor and Remus spotted more statues depicting the Buddha than he could’ve found in a second-hand shop in Soho.

“It somehow just feels kind of racist,” James said, thumbing the orange drape that decorated the archway leading into the common room. “I mean, just because they named the place after some scholar-bloke from Delhi doesn’t mean they had to go all ‘ethnic’ with the interior design, does it?”

“The fish tank’s cool though,” Peter said, staring into the huge glass tank that lined the wall opposite to phone lines.

“Good thing we don’t plan on staying for long,” Remus said, taking his friends by the shoulders and turning them toward the stairs. Other boys mulled around the halls but none really paid them much attention, and for once Remus recognised the upside of not bringing Sirius along on every jaunt. Unable to resist making a scene, Sirius would have undoubtedly had more to say about the dorm’s vibrant colour palette and lack of real chairs, but they were on a mission and Sirius was not invited.

Following each other down the dorm's second floor hallway, Peter stopped outside a door decorated in notes and scribbles—some of which were real poetry and the rest just gibberish. Made-up languages and swirling symbols that almost looked like a failed game of hangman.

"Here goes nothing," Peter mumbled, before rapping on the door several times and practically vibrating out of nervousness. He wasted no time in knocking again, making James wince.

"Uh, Pete, I think they heard you," James said.

"Sim told me you have to keep knocking otherwise they won't let you in!"

"Why would that make any sense?"

"I dunno, he just said to do it!"

The door swung open very suddenly and Peter ripped his hand back as the thick smell of hash hit them. They all stifled coughs as their new patron leaned his head out toward them.

"Shit fellas, where's the fire?

"Huh?" Peter squeaked.

"Well there must be a fire if you're that desperate to get me to come to the door. Next time, why don't you just walk right in and save my poor ear drums."

"Told you," James murmured.

"Sorry, knew Sim was lying," Peter winced. "You're Xeno, right?"

Remus immediately knew that it was a dumb question. The boy had hair so pale it might as well have been white, with droopy stoner's eyes and a silver hoop about the size of a racquetball hanging from one ear. He couldn't have been anyone but Xenophilius Lovegood, Hawking's personal bagman.

"Yeah," Xeno answered, "I go by Xeno. Or 'Love'—'Goodie'—'Phil'—even 'Willy' if you're feeling ballsy. Are you feeling ballsy?"

“Er… maybe?”

The look Peter received was dubious.

“So what are your names—whom I talking to?” Xeno started, pulling the door slightly shut behind him. “And what do you want?”

Peter hesitated this time, and James nudged him again until words were tumbling out of his mouth. “We, uh, have an appointment? I’m Peter Pettigrew—Simeon’s my brother. This is James and Remus. Did Sim not tell you we were coming? He said you could get us some—”

“Ah!” Xeno clapped a hand down over Peter’s mouth, coming out of his doorway to get in close. “We do not discuss business in the hall. Nod if you understand, puny Pettigrew.”

Peter nodded, blue eyes wide, and as Xeno withdrew his hand. “One more thing before I let you inside, though,” he said, smirking a bit. “You can’t use your real names while we do business.”

“Then why bother asking in the first place?” Remus sassed.

“Shhhh…” Xeno held out a finger to silence him. “You, puny Pettigrew—you’ll be Albatross. You tall, cheeky one, you’re Lachrymose. And you—” Xeno looked James up and down from the doorway. “You’re Legs.”

“ ‘Legs’?”

“Mhm. Look very strong, them.”

James gaped and Remus could hardly resist rolling his eyes. “Fine, he’s Legs. Now are we done standing around in the hall?”

Xeno raised a blonde brow, smirking. “I’ve changed my mind. You’re not Lachrymose, you’re Giggles. Come on in, then.”

Swinging the door wide open and washing them with a fresh wave of hash, Xeno turned and strolled back into his dorm room, which was decorated in the same orange and red colours as the common room below.

“He’s a fucking lunatic,” Remus murmured to James as they stepped across the room’s threshold.

“You’re telling me, Giggles.”

“I wonder, if I break one, would you just become a singular ‘Leg’ then?”

James winked at him.

Fighting a smile, Remus shut the door behind them and went to join Xeno on the other side of the room. The dorm was the same size as theirs in Godric, but all the four-poster beds had been pushed together on one side, extending out from one another like a single long mattress with several posts at the front and back. This gave them plenty of room next to the windows to make up a sitting area, complete with almost a dozen floor cushions and bean bag chairs, though only three were occupied; the first by Xeno and the second by a boy with dark hair clipped so short he might as well have been bald.

“Hey Dave,” James said, and David nodded coolly before going back to the paper crane he seemed to be folding and unfolding in his lap. On his other side sat a girl with blonde hair to match Xeno’s. She had braids down to her waist and was holding a huge scrapbook album over her lap, humming as she glued a newspaper clipping onto one of the pages.

“Come take a load off, lads,” Xeno said, more friendly than he had been at the door. “Can I get you anything?”

“No, we’re cool,” James said, doing his best to match his chipper attitude as all three of them crossed the room and fell into a beanbag or cushion rather ungracefully. Remus ended up closest to David, who held out a hand to shake, which he took.

“Remus,” he said, before Xeno snapped his fingers at him.

“Uh-uh. We’re on business—you’re Giggles.”

“I like that one,” the girl said, without looking up. “Very funny.”

“So what should we call you then?” Peter asked the pale-haired boy. “ ‘Phil’?”

“You can call me Amphitrion today. Tomorrow—who knows—maybe Smitty?”

Jesus Christ.

“I’ll be September,” the girl said, before leaning in to whisper, “but you can call me Pandora."

"You know Plutarch," Xeno said, clapping a hand on David's shoulder, "but I wouldn't bother getting much else out of him. He took a vow of silence in Modern Cultures class."

"So that's why you didn't say anything to me! Thought it was some sort of fear tactic, honestly," James mused, and David flashed a peace sign in response.

"Simeon told us you were his hookup all last year," Remus started, ignoring the insanity. "We wanted to know if you work your connections for us too."

"Nothing too crazy," James interjected. "We want to be able to wake up the next day. Maybe just booze and some baccy?"

"Hash, too," Peter added. "Anything fun, really."

"Couple'a men on a mission," Xeno said, "I can appreciate that. You say you want something fun? Well, lots of things are fun. Ever thought about some super C? Or PCP? I don't really deal in smack but—"

"No," Remus interjected, "nothing like that."

"How about klonopin? Diazepam?"

"They're the same thing. We want hash, baccy, and booze."

"I guess that isn't an unreasonable request," Xeno said slowly, "but how do I know I can trust you?"

All three 4A boys exchanged a look.

"I don't just fence for just anybody, you see," the hippy continued haughtily, "people gotta prove that they won't just turn around and rat—equal partners in the charade."

"Well, what's to stop us from turning you in right now?" Peter asked.

"Got anything on me, Albatross? Because you could turn this room upside down and not find a crumb. You don't cook in the office, you cook in the kitchen, and since you don't know where the kitchen is…"

"So you can't get us anything?" James frowned.

"Weeeell, this close to Hallow's eve? I'm stretched thin as it is, you see.

Demand is high around the holidays."

“Alright,” Remus cut-in, “what we gotta do then?”

Xeno took a moment to consider, glancing at David, who only stared back wordlessly. Finally he said; “Well what can you give me in exchange for letting you benefit from my little enterprise?”

“We got money,” Peter said, and Xeno shook his head.

“It’s Hawkings—everyone’s got money. I fence for friends and allies. And since we’re barely acquaintances by association, what else you got?”

“How about information?” Remus asked, and Xeno snapped his eyes to him.

“Information on what?”

Remus tongued the inside of his cheek. “How are you getting your merchandise inside? You got a mule?”

“Thought you were offering me information, mate.”

“I am. And I think I might have a better option for you—that is if your guy or whatever would rather not throw bags of drugs over the school walls.”

It was a bluff, but Xeno didn’t seem to notice. “Alright then, consider me hooked, Giggles. What you know?”

“There’s a hole in the wall somewhere around Hawkings, but unless you know where you’ll be looking until you graduate and still won’t find it. It’s wide enough for a single person to slip through, and more than big enough for a little bit of merchandise too.”

Xenophilius sat back, stroking his chin. “Huh,” he said in consideration. Remus spared a glance at his friends, who were open-mouthed like he’d just offered him the key to the Tower of London.

“Well, that might be something worth offering…” Xeno hummed.

“It’s good intel,” Remus said firmly, “and if you want it you’ll stop hassling us.”

Xeno burst out laughing, joined by Pandora while David cracked a smile. “This one’s good,” he told his friends, wagging a finger at Remus. “This one’s good! Alright Giggles, you share your little secret and I promise to be the perfect fence for you lads. Deal?”

“Deal.” Remus held a hand out to shake, but Xeno put up both hands.

“No, that’s not how we seal a pact here.”

Fiddling for the inside of his jacket pocket, he withdrew a single tin meant for breath mints and popped it open, producing a very fat spliff. “Got a light?” He asked, and Remus sighed as he fiddled for his zippo. Xeno took it and held the silver up to the light to admire the engraving on its side. “Ooh, fancy.”

Clicking the lighter to life, he lit up and tossed the zippo back to him before sucking in deeply and blowing the smoke out of the corner of his mouth. Expertly, Xeno twirled the spliff around in his fingers and offered it to Remus, wiggling his eyebrows. “Deal?”

Remus didn’t hesitate. He took the spliff and sucked in deeply, before passing it to James, who did the same, and then Peter. Once David had the ciggy, Xeno leaned back in his chair, pressing his arms behind his head.

“I think this’ll be a very lucrative agreement, lads,” he grinned.

At Xeno’s insistence, they all stayed until they’d shared at least three spliffs amongst them. Pandora continued filling out her scrapbook and eventually Remus had realised that the photos weren’t of her family or anyone she knew, but famous serial murderers and conspiracy theories. She had a whole chapter dedicated to the Mansons and was particularly fond of the theory that Paul McCartney had died in a car crash in 1966 and was just replaced by a look-alike. Remus had tuned out somewhere around there.

It was near curfew when the boys began expressing interest in leaving, but Xeno urged them to stay for one last puff of a smaller spliff. As he lit it and passed it along to Peter, Remus got his first whiff of the hash, which didn’t smell like hash at all.

“What’s that?” He asked, as Peter breathed in.

Xeno smiled lazily and shrugged; “Something ‘fun’.”

“Did you just give them a dirty fag?” He demanded, shooting upright in his bean bag.

“Oh my god—no,” Xeno said quickly. “Do you think I’d give you heroin for free? It’s just weed and lavender, mate. Good for de-stressing, which you clearly need.”

“Oh.”

“Jesus, who you been hanging out with?”

Remus glanced at James and Peter, who exchanged looks of confusion as he let out a shallow sigh. “Don’t worry about it.”

“Well we might worry about it,” James mumbled, glancing at Peter.

Pressing his lips together into a tight line, Remus climbed out of his bean bag and reached a hand down to James, who hesitantly puffed the lavender spliff and passed it on to David before standing. Peter came with them and together they shambled to the door, distinctly slower than they’d been when they arrived.

“Remember, the stuff’ll be in the bushes under your window—gimme three days. The rest’ll be here in time for your friend’s little birthday,” Xeno called. James gave him a friendly wave goodbye as they emerged into the hall, blinking in the yellow lights hanging overhead.

“Fucking hell,” Peter said, clearing his throat, “mouth tastes like ash.”

“Ass?” James echoed.

“Ash.”

“Yum,” Remus said, leading them down and out into the chilly night air. The sidewalk was empty for the most part, but anyone who passed gave them a wide berth, and they could hardly blame them. After nearly two hours in Xeno’s room they probably smelled as though they’d spent an entire weekend at Woodstock.

Halfway back to their dorm, Peter let out a little chuckle. “Have either of you been imagining Sirius’ face when he figures out we’d ditched him? Couldn’t stop thinking about it back there.”

“So that’s what you've been sniggering about. I knew Xeno’s joke about the postman wasn’t that funny,” James teased. “I’ll bet he was pissed, too, but Kim’s probably keeping him busy enough.”

“What do you mean?” Remus asked dumbly.

“The note—it was a good idea. Should give them more than enough to talk about.”

“But we wrote that note.”

“Yeah, ‘course.” James gave him an odd look. “I thought… Didn’t you know Kimmy’s sort of got a thing for him?”

“She does?”

“Yeah, at least according to Rachel from chem. Thought that’s why you wanted me to sign her name.”

“Oh well, yeah,” Remus said casually, “but who doesn’t have a crush on the prick? Sandy Herron keeps trying to get him to tutor her in music but she plays the oboe.”

James snorted before tripping and nearly sprawling across the pavement. “Someone needs to fix those damn potholes,” he grumbled.

“Think we can play bumps while walking?” Peter asked, making Remus shake his head lightly.

“Oh yeah, and how about every time we step on a crack we sock ourselves in the face too?”

“That’s actually closer to a different game, Moony. It’s called—”

“I don’t actually want to know, Pete.”

“Well I want to know how the hell you knew what Xeno was talking about, Lupin,” James said, musingly. “He might as well have been speaking Chinese in the middle there.”

“Yeah,” Peter said, “how is it you know so much about drugs, Moony?”

“Oh, you know, they give you some pretty wild stuff when you bust your face up like I did.”

“Rubbish.” James turned around and began to walk backwards. “You’re lying, I know it. I bet you get up to some funny stuff back home in London.”

“Careful or you’ll actually eat pavement, you posh prat.”

James surged forward and wrapped an arm around Remus’ neck, pulling him in close. “One day we’ll connect the dots, Moony. And if we can’t we’ll just bully you into telling the truth.”

“You? Bully someone? I think you’ll have to get a lot meaner first.”

“Alright, then I’ll recruit Lily—she’ll crack you. And Sirius too—he’s a wizard with crosswords.”

“Well good luck to the lot of you then, Prongs.”

“I want a nickname,” Peter sighed, and James gathered him by the neck too.

“Don’t worry, Pete, your moment of shame will come.”

At that, Remus laughed.

* * *

Upon their return they found their room empty and silent, despite the fact that they were only a few minutes shy of missing curfew.

“You owe me five quid, Moony,” James said, and Remus scoffed. He’d been sure that they’d have walked in on a grumpy Sirius, most likely blaring music at full volume to punish them. (Remus had bet on Bowie while Peter had gone for Zeppelin or T. Rex, but James had won when they found the room empty. Remus was just thankful that his second guess—finding Sirius with extra company—was also wrong.)

To make up for his loss, Remus crossed the room to Sirius’ stereo and put on an album, standing back to listen as he read the track listing off its back cover. He realised halfway through the first song that Hope had also had a copy, now tucked away in the trunk beneath his bed. It gave him a listless feeling. So far that term he’d avoided thinking much about Hope’s records and the boys hadn’t pestered him despite his promise last year that he’d play them—though Sirius had grumbled more than once about how he’d have loved to listen to the odd album or two, always ones they both knew were shut up just a few feet away.

“Is it cool if I shower first?” James asked and both Remus and Peter nodded. “Okay, cheers.”

Setting the album cover down, Remus retreated to his own bed as Peter had done and slumped down, gathering some of his school reading to him. It was the easy kind he could do even while high, but he hadn't forgotten his promise of beating Sirius in at least one academic subject that year. He was doing good in most of his classes—better than good in others—and figured that he might actually have a decent shot of it, as long as Sod's Law didn't suddenly win out and Sirius actually dedicated himself to his work.

By the time the album finished Peter had traded James for the shower. Remus got up to change it just as the familiar sound of a key turning in a lock sounded from across the room. James finished haphazardly drying his hair with his towel and pulled it down around his neck as Sirius strode in, tie unlaced and a dopey smile on his face.

"And here he is," James drawled, "the man of the hour."

Sirius checked an invisible watch. "Is it my birthday already? Am I that late?"

"Cheeky bastard. Where have you been?"

"Better question is where have you been? Straight up left me in the hall didn't you?"

"Don't avoid the question," James ordered, snatching his towel and twirling it to lash Sirius in the thigh. Sirius grinned and danced away, almost straight into Remus.

"Hey Moony," he said, reeling back before pulling off his tie and tossing it onto the bed.

"Hey, Black."

"Have a fun night? You smell terrible."

"So do you," Remus said, keenly aware of the flowery scent clinging to Sirius like a personal smog. Sirius paused to sniff his arm before giving another wry smile.

"Oh yeah, that's just Kimmy's perfume."

"Duh." Without changing the record, Remus set the album down and crossed back to his side of the room. Throwing himself down on his bed, he dog-eared the page of the book he'd been reading (which Lily hated, but it was a habit) and tugged his curtains across his bed to block out the light. Unfortunately, there was no spell for blocking out sounds.

“So…?” He heard James ask. “What happened?”

“You think I kiss and tell?”

“I don’t think you anything but, actually.”

“Well now I’m torn between calling that a fair assessment and telling you to fuck off. Also that note? Not nice.”

“You showed Kim?”

“ ‘Course. She said your handwriting is ugly.”

A moment later the bathroom door opened and Peter emerged, starting the conversation over again.

“So…” James asked eventually, “how was it? Did you totally embarrass yourself?”

“It was fine—thank you! Jeez, give me some credit.”

“You mean you…?” Peter gasped.

“It’s not that big ‘a deal! Bet you and Moira do it all the time, right?”

“Oh, yeah sure, ‘course, ha…”

“So that’s it, it was just fine?”

“No, it was great. Kim’s gorgeous—totally peng. I’m lucky, really, that an older gal as fit as her would look twice at me.”

“You gonna hang out with her again then?”

“Sure, don’t see why not. She’s fun. Good kisser too. She can do this thing with her tongue—blimey.”

Suddenly revolted, Remus reached for the pyjama bottoms he’d left discarded at the foot of his bed from the night before and tugged them on, leaving his shirt off as he turned over in his bed and forced his eyes shut. The boys weren’t loud, but he could already tell he’d have trouble sleeping anyway.

Eventually James declared that it was late and he could hear the sounds of his friends settling down for bed. His eyes were just sliding shut when Sirius called through the curtains, making him shoot up from his pillows.

“Psst, Moony, you asleep?”

“…Yes.”

“Oh good.” Without an invitation, Sirius stuck his head inside and Remus nearly launched himself against the wall. “Just wanted to say thanks.”

He blinked in alarm. “For what?!”

“James said the note was your idea.”

“Er, yeah... Sorry."

“No, no—it was real helpful. Perfect thing to get an in with Kimmy.”

“I didn’t know you wanted an ‘in’ with Kimmy.” If the bitter tone surprised him Sirius made no notice. He simply considered Remus’ words with a smug look on his face.

“I suppose either way it worked, so cheers.”

Remus ground his teeth together. “Yeah. Cheers, Black…”

Sirius pulled his head back out and smacked the maroon curtains for good measure as Remus settled down into his pillow. He was wide awake now, but instead of wallowing over unplayed records, or even how badly he suddenly wanted a cigarette, all he could think about was the shard of ice that had lodged itself in the centre of his chest—and where the fuck it had come from.

Chapter End Notes

Slang dictionary:

'Bungle' means to mess up.
A 'pillock' is an old-fashioned term for stupid person.
A 'ledge' means "legend"; cool.
A 'bagman' is a drug dealer.
The terms 'boot' and 'fence' are used for someone who acts as the middleman between a seller and a buyer of illegal goods.
A 'dirty fag' is a marijuana cigarette laced with heroin.
'Peng' means attractive/fit.

Chapter 36: Halloween, 1976

Chapter Summary

Fat chapter. Much chaos. Enough to spill some beans.

Chapter Notes

CW: Fake gore and other spooky things?? Possible teenage alcoholism, lol.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Don't go into the woods tonight,
'Cause underneath the sticks and stones;
Are lots of little demons enslaved by Annabella,
Waiting just to carry you home…

- "Wicked Annabella" The Kinks, 1968

Sunday 31st October 1976

As always, Halloween at Hawkings became a school-wide affair. The whole student body came together to plan various events—everything from the annual pumpkin carving contest to haunted houses set up by the drama club and organised apple bobbing outside the Great Hall. There was even a themed dance being held in one of the Agricultural barns with a costume to boot. There were so many things going on at once that Remus and his friends could hardly decide what they should do first, a fact Sirius made good use of while trying to convince the girls that it would be much more fun to do their own thing.

"It's a bonfire!" He reasoned. "Just hear us out, no screechy seventh years, no stupid ghost costumes or twee little dances playing nothing but tosspot David Cassidy LPs."

"For your information, I've already arranged to meet Mickey at that 'twee little dance'," griped Lottie. She was dressed up as the Cowardly Lion with her noise painted black and her huge blonde curls done up like a puffy mane around her head. All the girls had decided to stick with a theme that year and it had converged around Lily's Dorothy costume she'd worn the Halloween before. The part of the Good Witch was being played by Mary, done up in all pink with a little tiara and enough sparkles in her hair that Remus had nearly sneezed when she'd done a little twirl in front of him. Marlene was her counterpart, face painted a slime green for the Wicked Witch and complete with a black pointed hat and a broomstick that she'd borrowed from her dorm cupboard.

"Mickey's gonna be there, actually. He'll be over after he's finished doing his hair—or something," Sirius said to Lottie, lying through both his actual teeth and the white choppers Mary had painted on his face that afternoon for his skeleton costume.

"We have stuff for s'mores too," James sang while reaching over to gently pluck at one of Lily's red braids. She pretended not to notice at first but then gave his hand a little smack and tucked her cheek into her other shoulder to hide a smile.

"That's all well and good," Mary started, waving her magic wand around, "but do you have alcohol?"

" 'Course," Sirius snorted, "what sort of fire would it be without the chance of falling into the pit while hammered off your arse? Moony, you got the stuff?"

From inside the dark cloak he'd been supplied with, Remus pulled out a large bottle of gin. So far he'd been relatively quiet, mostly because he was sure he was a shitty actor and didn't want to give away the prank, but also because talking around the plastic vampire teeth Lily had procured for him made him spit like a lawn sprinkler.

"Then I'm in," Mary said automatically, and Marlene gaped at her, fake warts and all. "Oh, don't look at me like that, Marls. You think they're bobbing for apples in tequila? It's Halloween, I want to be pissed."

And you will be, Remus thought sarcastically, just not that kind of pissed.

"That's one on board!"

"If Mickey's coming then why not?" Lottie said with a shrug. "I like s'mores."

Peter glanced at his sister through his clown mask, turning his torchlight on her. "I thought you said you were on a diet?"

"It's Halloween, you dolt, the calories don't count. Now stop shining that thing in my face!"

Everyone looked to Marlene next, and Mary grabbed hold of her arm, giving an exaggerated pout. "Fine!" She snapped. "We'll spend the night in the woods with the midges. What fun!"

"Smashing!" Sirius said. "We almost have the full set then."

Seven pairs of eyes fell on Lily, and James nudged her with his torch. "So what d'you say, Daisy?"

"We're not supposed to have unsanctioned fires on campus," she said quietly.

"Evans, you're killing me here," Sirius groaned. "We have the day off tomorrow, and Filch isn't gonna be around to catch us. You know they force him to take the night off for everyone's peace of mind and even if they didn't—we're in the woods! Maybe try living a little?"

"I promise it'll be fun," James said, gently shouldering her with the couch pillows he'd stuffed inside his shirt sleeves for his wrestler's costume. Lily caught herself and let out a groan to match Sirius'.

"Alright fine, you win. But the fire stays in the pit."

There were several cries of victory, and as a group they all turned away from the front doors of Godric House and began trotting down the street toward the trees. The school caretaker might not be around, but that didn't mean they were going to get away with holding a bonfire right in the middle of the lawn. The woods made perfect sense really, and that was all the girls needed to know.

Remus walked alongside Lily as they made their way down the lane, taking a moment to spit out the plastic teeth and grimace at how much saliva came with them. "You're not even a little bit excited to roast marshmallows with your friends?" He asked her.

"Excited," Lily started, glancing up at him, "but suspicious." She narrowed her eyes and Remus immediately regretted sparking up the conversation, pushing the vampire teeth back into his mouth and grinning at her as they approached the tree-line. She gave him a pinched smile in return, and the next thing he knew they were batting aside tree branches, using the four torches split between them to follow along the narrow path. Mary and Lottie complained a few times about the amount of foliage they were contending with, but the boys simply ignored the griping, drawing the girls' attention with promises of booze and fire-roasted sweets. As they went, Sirius would step every so often to mark a tree trunk with a chalk ‘x’.

“So we don’t lose our way,” he instructed boldly.

“How far in are we going anyway? We’ve been walking for forever,” Marlene said, swatting at the air as though she were being attacked by a swarm of bugs.

“It’s not much further,” he called, “it had to be far enough in that no one would see us through the trees.”

“ ‘Cause that doesn’t sound suspect at all,” Lily grumbled.

Suddenly a great moan echoed from behind. Remus saw both Mary and Lottie jump, but when they turned around they only found James a ways back on the trail, head upturned while he pinched his nose. “Aw crap,” he sighed, “I think I got a bloody nose.”

“Here,” Sirius said, producing a folded up handkerchief from his pocket. Taking it, James pressed the hankie over his face with a little wince.

Instantly Lily darted back down the path toward him, concern clear on her face. “Let me see,” she ordered, and James obediently pulled his hand away, revealing a great smudge of blood covering the lower half of his face.

“Oh fuck,” Mary winced, as Lily and the others gasped. Remus was inclined to agree—Peter had done a fine job with the fake blood.

“It’s a gusher,” Sirius observed. “You feeling alright, mate?”

“Now that you mention it, head doesn’t feel too good.”

“Do you need to lie down or something, Potter?” Lily asked.

James nodded, then; “Ohhh, I think the world’s spinning. Lord—might just pass out right here. Oh god, mum, is that you?”

“Oh-kaaay,” Sirius quipped, voice high in a badly disguised warning as he stepped up to grab one of James’ arms. “I think I’m gonna take Potter to the nurse, see if we can sort all this out.”

“I can do it,” Lily said, taking his other arm.

“Don’t worry about it, Evans, I got this."

"B-But I'm the prefect here."

"And you deserve the night off. Don't worry, you lot can go ahead with Pete and Lupin and get the fire going, it'll be very helpful. We'll catch up once Pomfrey's looked over this tosser."

To drive his point home, Sirius snatched up the torch James had been holding and pressed it into the centre of Lily's chest, forcing her to release James' arm to catch it. Before she could object any further, Sirius turned and began to drag his friend back through the trees.

"Really, Prongs," he said, loud enough for all of them to hear, "you and that big nose of yours—always ruining our plans!"

"What big nose?!" James demanded, voice slightly muffled under the handkerchief.

"They'll be okay," Peter said to the girls, who were glancing back and forth in concern. To hide his grin, he pulled his clown mask back down over his face. "Pomfrey'll have him back in tip-top shape in no time. Shall we go on then, Lupin?"

"Er—yeah." Remus cleared his throat. He suddenly felt a lot more pressure now that James and Sirius were no longer the ones carrying the scene. "It's not much further…" he said awkwardly, gesturing down the path.

Mary, thankfully, seemed to have no issue with going on ahead. After gathering her pink skirts she followed Remus and took his arm in one of hers.

"Just in case there are any monsters out lurking, looking for a midnight snack," she smirked, before gesturing for him to lead on. With the rest of his friends in tow, Remus led the way to their tiny camp, which was really just a small clearing set up with a circle of scattered logs and a fire pit they'd dug using serving spoons from the dining hall.

While the girls settled down over the logs, clutching tightly to their torches and booze, Remus got to work lighting the fire, letting Lily hold James' torch over him so he could work—or at least that had been the goal.

"Uh, Lily, maybe tilt the light down here a bit more?"

"Sorry!" Surprised by herself, Lily snapped out of her daze and took the spotlight off the trees so that Remus could strike the match and place it in the centre of their mound of twigs. After a bit of prodding and poking and more tinder than initially thought necessary, they eventually had a decent fire going.

“Oh, this is so nice,” Mary said, stretching out her feet to warm them at the edge of the pit.

“Lupin, where’d we leave those roasting sticks?” Peter asked, fumbling around the dark clearing.

“Here,” Remus said, reaching behind Lily’s log and passing them along as Peter broke out the marshmallows. Stopping to admire his handy-work, Remus caught the dazed look with which Lily was staring into the flames.

“James is gonna be fine, you know,” he whispered, plopping down on the log next to her. Lily bit her lip and quickly tucked her hands into her armpits, unable to erase her nervous expression.

“I know, it’s just… His nose did look rather horrible.”

“Don’t worry, s’not like he’s gonna have some nasty scar.”

Lily glanced at him pointedly, the glow from the fire making her hair even redder than usual. “Unless you’re going to fess up to what happened, I don’t want to hear anything else about your nose.”

Raising his hands in defeat, Remus smiled guiltily and Lily returned it.

“Be right back—gotta wee,” Peter said, passing his Halloween mask to Lottie and borrowing the torch.

“Don’t get lost,” she called after him, as Peter lumbered away through the trees.

Yeah, Remus thought in agreement, get lost and the whole plan falls apart.

“I wish we had some music,” Mary said, uncapping the gin she’d already fished out of Remus’ pockets and tipping it back against her lips.

“BOO!” Sirius shouted, making Mary spew the alcohol over her dress while Marlene screamed bloody murder next to her. With a wicked grin on his face, Sirius launched himself over their log, stopping just short of the fire pit. “Well?” He asked smugly, shaking a fresh bottle of alcohol. “How ‘bout it? Anyone for more boooooo-ze?”

“Augh! Black, you arse!” Marlene picked up a fistful of leaves from the ground and threw them at his head. Remus couldn’t help his smile as he watched Sirius dust the dried leaves off his shoulders and dance around to the other side of the pit. Snatching Lily’s torch, Sirius held it up to his chin and began contorting his painted face into several different horrific expressions, really getting the full effect out of the spooky makeup.

“Where’s James?” Asked Lily, as he finally plopped down next to Lottie and snatched a marshmallow off the end of her stick, shoving it into his mouth.

“What d’ya mean?” Sirius asked around his mouthful. It took a moment of chewing, but then he sat up a bit on the log and swallowed, glancing around in confusion. “You mean he never came back?”

Lily turned rigid. “No, he was with you.”

Sirius shook his head. “His nose stopped leaking halfway back to the dorms so we turned around. But then we remembered about the rest of the whisky we’d left in our room so I split off from him. He said he was going to meet me back here with you guys.” When nobody made any indication that they knew what he was walking about, Sirius straightened up. “Wait, you mean you’re not joking?”

“Of course we’re not joking!” Lily chirped.

“I’m sure he’s fine,” Remus reasoned, “probably just needed to take a wee too.”

“How long ago did you leave him?” Marlene asked Sirius.

“Twenty minutes? Maybe a half-hour? I… got stuck talking to Mickey outside Godric—sorry Lot, he’s not coming.”

While Lottie scoffed, Lily stared back with big eyes. “It doesn’t take a whole half-hour to wee!”

“Maybe he got lost?” Lottie offered, and Sirius clasped his hands in front of him, rocking back and forth with an uneasy expression.

“Well… he was still complaining about that headache… I told him he should lay down, but it's Halloween, he wanted to hang out. Could be… but nah," he laughed, nervously. "No way Potter's just gonna let himself pass out in the bloody woods." Sirius lifted his gaze to Lily's, then Marlene, who looked equally as concerned. "Should probably go check on him though. You know, just in case."

"You shouldn't go alone," Remus said, standing, "I'll come with you."

"I'll come too," Lily said eagerly, snagging a fist full of Remus' cloak and jumping to her feet as Mary gaped at them both.

"You're just going to go traipsing through the woods in the middle of the night?" She demanded.

"We 'traipsed' our way here!" Lily answered.

"But Peter's not back yet," Lottie said nervously.

"The two of you can stay here then," Sirius said eagerly, "to wait for Pete of course… and in case Potter shows up! In the meantime, the rest of us'll go look for him."

Looking less than thrilled to be volunteered for search and rescue, Marlene sighed and came around the fire, taking one of the torches as she fell in step next to Remus.

"Wait," Lily started, as they all made their way to the far side of the clearing, "you're going the wrong way—school's this way."

"No it's not—look." Proudly, Sirius held up his torch to reveal a white 'x' on the trunk of the tree nearest to him. Remus saw a look of confusion flit across Lily's face, but they'd all seen Sirius mark the trees on their way in—there was no way he could be wrong. Unable to argue with fact, Lily took a deep breath and forged ahead with Sirius next to her, taking the uneven forest terrain in stride despite the fact that she was only wearing a pair of little red Dorothy slippers.

"I can't believe you just let him go off on his own," she grumbled.

"He's lived at Hawkings for eleven years! Forgive me for thinking he knew his way around."

"Who splits up in the woods?"

"It's barely a crop of trees!"

"You are so full of it!"

"I-know-you-are-but-what-am-I?"

“Hold on,” Remus said after they’d walked far enough that they could no longer see the fire’s glow through the trees, “got a rock in my shoe.”

As he crouched down to pretend to fix his shoe, Lily came to a reluctant stop with Sirius next to her. “I still think we’re going the wrong way.”

“You saw the marks! Why would you think I’d be leading you astray?”

“Because it’s you! You think everything’s a joke!”

Carefully, Remus untucked the scrap of James’ t-shirt from his pocket. “Hey,” he called, before remembering he was supposed to sound scared, “Er—look at this! It was on the ground right there.”

He held out the bit of fabric, which was dyed a dark red on one end. Instantly both girls’ faces drained of all colour.

“It’s James’!” Sirius gasped.

“N-No, it can’t be,” Marlene whined.

“See for yourself!”

“If this is a joke it’s not funny!” Lily snapped, making Sirius give a rather offended look as he snatched the scrap of shirt from Remus.

“ ‘If this is a joke’? Are you fucking serious? My best mate’s lost, we found only a piece of his shirt—” Sirius threw up the blood-stained rag as evidence, “and you’re asking if this is a joke? Really, Evans, sometimes you’re just the—!”

“Fine!” She shouted, trying to maintain her composure. “But if this is just some stupid stunt, then I sw—”

“Look at the tree!” Marlene shrieked, cutting Lily off as she stepped forward and yanked Remus away from the tree closest to him, nearly tearing his black cape in two. Immediately Sirius flashed his torch on the trunk, illuminating what looked to be several long slashes in its bark.

“Holy shit.”

“It’s not the only one either,” Remus said, and Sirius let his light trail across several other trees around them, revealing each to be as brutally desecrated as the last. The slashes were meant to look like claw marks but there was only so much they could do with a kitchen knife. Luckily it was dark and Marlene was decently gullible.

“They’re everywhere!” She wept.

“Don’t think a squirrel did that,” Sirius breathed, stepping up to trail his fingers along the marks. “Maybe a badger?”

“Oh, but didn’t you once say that your mother used the trunks of trees to file her nails down, Sirius?” Remus offered.

Anyone who’d been paying close enough attention would’ve seen the way Sirius’ mask dropped just long enough for the corners of his mouth to quirk up. He swallowed the smile and shoved Remus lightly in return for the quip.

“Both of you shut up and let’s just go,” Lily stammered, just as a chilling wail cut across the forest, carrying on the wind and making all of them freeze.

“What the fuck was that?” Marlene whimpered as the scream sounded again, further away this time. To Remus, it sounded a bit like a dying goat amplified by a megaphone, but Sirius played along anyway.

“Oh my god, it’s James!”

“That didn’t sound anything like James!” Lily hissed.

Ignoring her, Sirius cupped both hands around his mouth; “James!” He barked. “James, where are you?”

Marlene shoved Sirius in her panic. “Don’t yell—what if it’s not him!”

“Who else would it be?”

“Oh shut it all of you!” Lily cried, though she had a hitch in her voice. “Let’s just find the idiot already and go back!”

As Sirius and Lily started forward again, Marlene grabbed hold of Remus’ arm so tightly he thought his bicep might bruise. He could hear each of his friends’ breathing like a nervous blanket settled around them and more than once he caught Sirius’ eye as he looked back at him with his lips pressed into a thin line to hide his smile. At one point Sirius gave him a thumbs up and he had to look away or risk bursting into laughter right then and there.

“It’s getting colder,” Marlene whimpered.

“Is that a sign of something?” Remus asked. “Like maybe a—”

“SHH!” Lily hissed. “If I hear one word about ghosts or monsters I’ll —” She was cut off again as she ran headlong into Sirius’, who’d stopped at the very edge of another clearing, his blue eyes blown wide.

“Oh shit,” he murmured, “please don’t tell me he went in there.”

Standing side by side, they all gazed down the short valley at the great looming building. Remus had never seen the Shrieking Shack after dark, and even he had to agree that it looked significantly more terrifying with only the moon to illuminate it.

“There’s no way,” he scoffed lightly. “Not even Potter’s thick enough to go in there. I mean c’mon, right?”

“He might if he were scared,” Sirius reasoned; “Or… running from something.”

“You mean what did that to the trees?” Marlene asked quietly.

“Oh no,” Sirius started, “Evans, whose shoe is that?”

Lily was shaking her head adamantly. “Nope. Nope!”

“What shoe?” Marlene demanded.

“That shoe,” Remus answered, tilting Marlene’s hand for her until her torchlight fell across James’ trainer, lying abandoned just in front of the Shack’s door.

“I think I’m gonna be sick,” Marlene gasped. She made to release Remus, but as another blood-curdling yell echoed from inside the decrepit dorm, she buried her face in his shoulder, screaming on her own.

“Someone’s in there!” Sirius shouted, starting toward the Shack.

“Wait! Maybe we should get a teacher!” Lily cried, grabbing his arm.

“There’s no time to get a teacher! James is in there—don’t you care?!"

"Of course I care, you insensitive bastard!"

"I'm with you, Black," Remus said, making Marlene cry harder into his cape, leaving behind streaks of green face paint.

"C'mon," Sirius said, taking Lily's hand, "we'll go get him together."

Reluctantly, Lily let Sirius guide her down the overgrown, cobbled path that led to the Shack's front door. Though Marlene dragged her feet the entire way, she came too, and the moment they'd weaved through the busted boards covering the door and into the common area, she clapped a hand over her mouth and nose.

"It's foul in here," she moaned.

"He must be upstairs," Sirius said. "James, you in here, mate?"

There was a short groan of answer and Lily shot forward. "James!" She squeaked; "James, we're here—EEEK!"

Just before the staircase, Lily tripped and crashed to the ground with a little shriek.

"You alright, Lily?" Remus asked, wincing slightly at her very-real fall.

"Yeah," she moaned, sitting up and reaching for her torch. "Just tripped over—" She never finished, because the moment Lily turned her light toward her feet, she realised that the thing she'd tripped over was a dead deer's head, left in the middle of the hall, fur matted with gobs of blood and missing one eye.

At the same time, both Lily and Marlene gave a scream so high-pitched that Remus had to cover his ears.

"Oh my god!" Sirius gasped. "That's disgusting! What could've possibly—" Another scream came, this one outside the Shack and further off. "It's the girls!" He cried, and before any of them could stop him, Sirius shot out of the shack and into the dark night.

"Sirius come back!" Marlene wailed as she made to follow him, but the moment she reached the door it slammed in her face and she threw her arms up, letting her torch sail across the room in terror as she fled back to Remus' side.

“Wait! Do you hear that?” He gasped.

“No,” Lily moaned, still scrambling away from the deer.

But there was no mistaking it; another scream, this one coming from directly above.

“Sirius! Remus! Help! Lily, help me!”

“It’s James!” Remus said. “He needs help!”

“We need help! What the fuck did that?” Marlene cried, pointing her torch at the deer. It was positively the most swearing Remus had ever heard her do.

“James, I’m coming!” Lily shouted. Just as impulsive as Sirius in her own panic, she threw herself up the stairs after his voice and Remus followed, eager to reach the climax of their prank.

“Don’t leave me!” Marlene shrieked, dragging herself up after them.

“Lily, you’re going to break an ankle!” Remus warned, following the light of her torch as she took the stairs two at a time. Rounding the second floor's landing, she slipped on something and fell back into him with a yelp.

“Lily!” He gasped, as she stared down in horror at the blood oozing down every stair. It’d been Peter’s idea to drop a huge bucket down them from the third floor, but now as they slipped and slid across the slick wood, Remus was starting to regret everything.

“Someone help me!” James wailed again. “Oh god!”

“James!” Lily shouted again. “We’re here!”

“Please help me! Aughhh!”

“Potter, please! Just shut up!” Marlene screamed.

Pushing free of Remus, Lily climbed the stairs even faster, slipping in the waterfall of fake gore a handful of times before finally emerging on the top floor. Another grisly moan echoed down the hall as Lily whipped her head around, lashing the air with her red plaits.

“Over there,” Remus pointed, half-panting; “It came from over there.”

All three of them crept down the hallway toward the last door, reaching it with their hearts in their throats. Both girls scanned doorway leading inside with their torches until finally they converged on a single spot across the room's black abyss, where they found James lying in the dust, his wrestler's costume all torn up in the front and covered from toe to throat in blood.

It actually looks pretty damn convincing, Remus thought, as Lily burst into tears.

"What the fuck?" Marlene bleated.

Lily skidded across the room and sank down to her knees next to James, her trembling hands hovering over him as she cried. Her tears were so real that Remus instantly felt guilty.

"James? James Potter, talk to me!" Lily begged, reaching out to cup him around the neck and lightly pat his face. Her fingers came away red and Marlene clamped a hand over her mouth like she really was going to hurl.

"Potter, wake up!" Lily ordered again, gingerly tracing her shaking hands over his chest. "Oh god."

"Lily…?" James' groan was more than convincing, but the little gurgled gasp he gave after whilst also spitting up blood would've made anyone freak out.

"I'm here, we're here!"

"Oh my god," Marlene whimpered. She turned and threw herself into Remus' shoulder once more, nearly taking both of them to the ground. Lily was still half-lying over James, clearly in distress with her dress and stockings slathered in blood and grime. She'd sucked back her tears to stay calm for him, but it was obvious she was about four seconds away from a mental breakdown.

"Lily…" James breathed again, wheezing like he was dying. (He wasn't.) "Lily I…"

"It's okay!" She whimpered, hands stroking James' face gently. "We're gonna get help. We're gonna get a teacher—Sirius has gone to get a teacher! You're going to be okay, just—just keep talking!"

"Lily… I…"

"Yes, James?"

"I…"

With a great exhale, James slumped back on the floor, head lolling upward with closed eyes as blood continued to leak from the corners of his mouth. Lily gave a strangled gasp and threw herself over his body, clutching the front of James' shirt so fiercely she'd ripped another hole in it for each of her fingers.

"James, wake up!" She shouted. "Wake up!"

Marlene smacked her palms into her eyes, staggering backward and hissing, 'fuck—fuck—fuck—fuck' over and over again.

Remus just stood there. How long did one actually pretend to be dead for? They'd never discussed it, and he certainly hadn't expected such a visceral reaction. If anything, he'd assumed Lily would've caught on by now, but seeing James so torn-up had clearly shaken her.

James must've agreed, because before Remus could even contend with kicking him in the shoulder and calling the whole thing off, he opened one eye and shot upright.

"HAH!"

Lily flew backward instantly, shrieking and scrambling across the filthy floorboards. Marlene was screaming before she'd even taken her hands away from her eyes and she dove back into Remus, knocking them both over in one big heap.

"Gotcha Evans!" James shouted gleefully. "S'all fake! I'm actually fine!"

There was a moment of stunned silence, before Lily—arms, face, and hands now covered in the syrupy blood—snapped out of her shock.

"James Potter!" She roared. "You absolute DICKHEAD!" With a great hiss she threw herself forward and began to beat James in the centre of the chest with her fists.

"Ow!" He laughed. "You'd hit an injured man?"

"I'll show you injured!" Lily screeched. "You let me think you were dead! Are you fucking mental?"

"Ooof! Evans!"

"I'll kill you myself, YOU TWAT!"

Having recovered from her shock, Marlene sat up and whirled on Remus, who had finally let the facade fall and was grinning with an open mouth at the sight of Lily's anger. "You guys are the worst!" She growled, hitting him fiercely with both hands.

"Ow—c'mon! It was kind of funny," he said, making her hit him again.

"It was not!" Lily whimpered, losing her anger and beginning to cry again. Instantly sobered of his laughter, James frowned and gathered her into a tight hug right there in the middle of the room.

"I'm sorry. Don't cry, Daisy, please don't cry."

"I hate you!" Lily sobbed, but she hugged back fiercely, and Marlene and Remus were left to watch on in the dark. Eventually Marlene raised an eyebrow in question and glanced up at Remus, who shrugged, completely bewildered. A moment later the pair finally broke apart and Lily gave James another sharp shove.

"Piss off." Sniffling, she stood up and snatched her torch off the floor before storming out of the room while James called after them.

"Oh c'mon, Daisy, it was just a bit of spooky fun!"

"You don't get to call me that!" Lily shouted back, her torchlight disappearing down the hall. Remus made to sit up only to be shoved by Marlene as well, who set off after her with a sharp grunt. James stared after them, sighing wistfully like a man in love.

"Ah, man, she's going to be pissed off for weeks."

"Don't stop there, how about a whole year?" Remus sniggered.

"No, she wouldn't." James' face fell a bit. "Would she?"

"Dunno. If you hadn't broken character she'd still be busy mourning you rather than hating your guts."

"Nah, she'd hate me just for dying in the first place."

"You're probably right, but perhaps next time you should magically revive yourself rather than scare the pants off her?"

"It's called comedic timing, Lupin, look it up. You got my shoe?"

"Sirius has it, I think."

“Buggar.” James looked down and wiggled his foot. His sock was stained with mud and damp. Shaking his head, he stood up and held out a hand for Remus and together they followed the girls out, eager to be out of the dingy shack.

“Oh c’mon girls, wait for us!” James called down the stairs.

“Fat fucking chance!” Marlene hollered back.

Being careful of the blood, they managed to catch up with the girls on the ground floor. James loped in front of Lily just ahead of the front door, making her slam to a stop. He dodged the torch she swung at him but not the second slap to the shoulder.

“Piss off before I give you detention until you’re balding!” She spat.

“Potter men don’t bald," James snickered.

“Ugh! I knew I should’ve trusted my gut!” Lily rounded on Remus, blinding him with her torch as he fell into step next to them. “Where’s Black? He waiting to play dead too?”

“I don’t know where he went!”

“You’re all dickheads!” She declared, using her arm to wipe some of the blood from her cheeks. Unfortunately the sugary muck only smeared more. James reached over and flicked a finger over the blood, tasting it with a cheeky grin.

“Oh get out of my way!” Lily hissed, shoving him away from the door.

“And don’t you dare follow us!” Marlene ordered.

“Where else would we go?”

“Try Hell, Potter!”

“You have the torches, though,” Remus said, and she flipped him off just as Lily reached the door and threw it open—only to come face to face with a terrified Mary and Lottie.

“WAAAAAH—!” Mary clamped her hand over her mouth to stifle her scream as Lily and Marlene fell back from the door, clutching the front of their shirts in shock.

“Enough!” Marlene wailed. “I’m so tired!”

Mary and Lottie fled into the Shack, slamming the door after themselves and bending over and heaving for air as Lily kept her light concentrated on them. “Why’d you sneak up on us?” She demanded.

“We didn’t!” Mary wheezed. “We came to look for you, and then Black, he—he—!” Mary waved a hand vigorously as though it would finish her sentence for her. In her other hand she was brandishing Marlene’s witches’ broom like a sword. Next to her, Lottie was clutching the gin bottle tightly to her chest, blonde ringlets hanging limply around her head.

“Try announcing your presence a little earlier next time then,” Marlene moaned.

“What happened to Black, Mary?” James asked smugly.

“He was dragged off! He came to find us and them something just fucking took him!”

“Ugh!” Lily growled. “He was just playing! The bloody liar—it’s all a big gag!”

“What?! How do you know? You weren’t even there!”

“Ask this tosser,” Lily snapped, reaching back to tug James forward by his torn-up shirt. Mary and Lottie took them in with gaping mouths, eyeing the blood that coated both James and the front of Lily’s previously spotless dress.

“Great!” Mary scoffed, dropping the broom and clapping her arms to her sides; “So it was just some big bloody joke to fucking scare us!”

“I wasn’t scared,” Lottie said, sipping her gin.

“Oh bullshit.”

Pushing past James, Marlene went straight to Lottie and snagged the bottle, taking a deep gulp. Lottie let her and turned back to the rest of them pointedly.

“Where’s the other two idiots then?”

“They were supposed to be back at the fire with you,” Remus said, and Lily instantly had him by the ear, tugging him down to her height with a nasty glare.

“Enough!”

“Bloody—ow, Evans!”

“Where are they?”

“Let the poor man go, Daisy,” James said, “they really were supposed to meet us.”

“Well they weren’t at the fire pit,” Mary said. “Sirius led us back here saying all of your were hurt!”

Grudgingly, Lily released Remus’ ear and let him step back to rub it with a small pout. “Well Peter was supposed to be with you,” she said to Mary, “so where is he?”

“I don’t know,” Mary shot back. “He said he needed to wee.”

“That was AGES ago!”

“And he never came back!”

“Theen why were you screaming?” Marlene asked.

“We weren’t the ones screaming, were we Lot?”

“Nope.”

“Then it was Peter!” Lily said, exasperated. “If you hadn’t let him walk off—”

“ME? You were there too! And he said he needed to piss! Figured he had that covered on his own! You guys were the ones actually screaming—we heard you in the woods!”

“Only because of the trees!”

“The TREES?”

“And the deer!”

“What DEER?”

“That deer!” Lily thrust her finger out at the spot the stag’s head had once been, but it had vanished. As she faltered over its absence, Mary fumed.

“You screamed your head off over some dead animal?”

Lily whirled back around. “Well did you see the dead animal? Because it was covered in blood!”

“So are you!”

“I’M AWARE!”

“Okay, okay,” Marlene sighed, stepping between them and pushing the gin into Mary’s hands and picking up her broom. “Let’s just get back to the fire and get our stuff. I think we’re all tired of being in the bloody woods.”

“Good idea,” James said, and Marlene whirled around to smack him in the shins with her broom.

“You two, we’re roasting over a spit before we leave,” she threatened.

“Fine, leave Black to the bugs. I’m done,” Mary said, hiking up her frilly skirts and throwing open the front door without a hint of fear.

With a dopey grin on his face, James nodded amicably and the six of them filed one by one out of the Shack. At the end of the cobbled path they found Peter lying there, covered in blood and playing dead just as James had.

Lottie marched right up to him, either fist clenched at her sides. “If you don’t stand up right now I’ll finally have a birthday to myself,” she snarled, before drawing back her leg and slamming it into Peter’s side.

Both James and Remus winced as Peter rolled over with a groan. “What the fuck?” He demanded, before sitting up to find all of the girls glaring at him. “James?” He hissed. “You broke character?”

“Sorry Pete,” James shrugged. “Couldn’t be helped.”

Sorely, Peter climbed to his feet and Lottie shoved him forward through the trees back the way they’d come. There was very little talking on the return trip, as most of the girls were still seething with rage, and when they’d finally made it back to their little camp they found an empty ring of logs and no Sirius.

“Fuck him,” Mary lashed. “Nice knowing you, Black.”

The fire had died down without any tending, leaving only a small huddle of burning ash with their things scattered around the clearing.

Lily and Marlene used their torches to scan the ground for any rubbish before noticing a single discarded antler abandoned in the middle of the camp. Lily bent down and scooped it up, turning to Mary and holding it out to her.

“A-HA! Look, Mary, I told you. I swear to god, those—”

“What are you swearing at me for?” Mary snapped.

“I’m not actually swearing at you!”

“So you’re just being dramatic again?”

“Dramatic?”

“Yeah—dramatic! Like with this supposedly dead deer and the blood and the—!”

“Oh, that’s real rich coming from you, Mary.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

“Guys—” Marlene tried, but Lily wasn’t done.

“You were the one too afraid to even check on your friend,” she shot and Mary drew back, offended.

“We came after you didn’t we? In the dark no less!”

“But not Potter, and he was lying dead in some creepy house in the woods!”

“How’s that my fucking fault?”

“Well what if it was real? He could be seriously injured one day and you wouldn’t even know it!”

“Then how ‘bout next time you put a damn leash on him!”

“You’re impossible!”

“And you think you’re everyone’s bloody mother! Just admit you were scared!”

“I wasn’t!”

“You were screaming!”

“You try finding your boyfriend dead on the floor!”

A single collective gasp went up between the entire group. Instantly Lily’s hands flew to her mouth. She whirled on James, who appeared slack-jawed and petrified, but before any of them could say anything, a body rushed at them from behind—half human and half deer.

“WHAT THE FUCK, JAMES?” It roared.

With screams that could’ve curdled milk, Lottie and Marlene flew backward over a log as Peter threw himself back into the trees for cover and Lily dove into James, knocking him to the ground. Frozen in place with her own shrill yelp, Mary instinctively pushed Remus ahead of her and he sprawled, taking their attacker down with him.

“FUCK!” The monster wailed. “My spleen!”

It was Marlene who recovered first, flashing her torch across Remus’ back and revealing Sirius—still dressed in his black skeleton costume, only with the horrid make-shift deer mask dropped over his head.

“BLACK!” Lily screeched, sitting up on James’ chest and pushing her blood and dirt-matted hair out of her face.

“What the hell?” Sirius moaned again, blinded inside the mask. “Whoever you are—get off me!”

“I think you re-broke some of my ribs,” Remus grunted.

“LUPIN?!”

“Oooh, you shut up!” Mary snarled, kneeling down beside Sirius and yanking the stag’s head away only to slap him hard on the forehead.

“AUGH! It was just a joke, Macdonald!”

“What the hell—WHY?” Marlene wailed.

Remus made to sit up but Mary only shoved him down again stubbornly, making both him and Sirius moan with the weight.

“Oh my god,” Sirius wheezed, then; “Potter, I’m gonna kill you…”

“Me?” James demanded, sitting up in the dirt.

“Yes! You! God—Lupin, get off me!” Sirius lifted his head and pointed at Lily and James furiously. “Explain yourselves now! Since when have you two been secretly on the pull?"

Every head turned in James and Lily's direction.

"Is it true, Lils?" Mary demanded.

"No!" Lily shouted, at the same time as James said; "Kinda."

She whirled around and smacked his shoulder. "We—"

"Haven't been lying about all those trips to the library?" Marlene said, incredulously.

"And how about all that extra time on the football pitch, James?" Peter demanded, emerging from the bushes with several twigs in his hair.

"Well, we—"

"Oh, give it up already!" Sirius grunted, sitting upright and pushing Remus off. "Spit it out—how long have you been shagging behind our backs?"

Lily gasped, mortified, but Marlene and Mary just came together, shouting in unison; "HOW LONG?"

"Since summer!" She moaned.

"But James was with me all summer," Peter gasped, horrified.

"She means we've been talking on the phone," James hissed.

Sirius laughed incredulously. "Oh, so while you two were giving each other the bell all summer you just thought 'hey no need to tell my best mates anything, let them figure it out'!"

"You did, didn't you?"

"Actually Lily confessed just now," Remus said. "I'm just mad I didn't call it."

"You knew, Remus?" Marlene gaped.

"No, he didn't!" Lily said. "None of you did because we knew you'd react like this!"

"Well, maybe if you'd told us over breakfast rather than Halloween in the woods we would've reacted a bit differently," Lottie added sarcastically.

"Yeah," Mary agreed, snatching up a discarded booze bottle, "but I am curious, where is it you two have been bunking off together?"

"Yeah, which dorm?" Sirius taunted. "Or does the gym storage room get more action than I thought?"

"Oh fucking hell, Black," James scoffed, while Lily covered her face and jumped up, immediately racing up the path back toward House Lane.

"Lily!" James shouted, scrambling after her. "Lily, come back! You might get lost!"

Sirius was up in a second; "Oh no you don't, Potter!"

He shot forward but unfortunately for him, Mary was faster. She stuck her foot out, tripping Sirius and leaving him sprawled in the dirt once more with a stiff grunt. "Cowards!" He coughed, as the other girls took off after Lily and James in the night.

Gingerly, Remus stepped up to look down over Sirius as Peter began to sputter with laughter behind them. His makeup was smeared with blood and dirt, but when he looked up at Remus he sighed and smiled.

"What, got something on my face?"

"Just a smug look." Remus glanced at the discarded stag. "We gonna have to start calling you 'Prongs' too?"

Before Sirius could answer, a faint wailing called out from the trees, much more distant and haunting than any of their screams had been.

"What was the hell that?" Peter squeaked. "Reckon it was the Shack?"

"Nah, Pete, don't worry," Sirius said, "s'just my mother after finding out I skipped my last chemistry test."

Remus shook his head, too stupidly happy. "Happy Halloween, you dickhead."

Chapter End Notes

'Twee' means dainty or overly cutesy.
Midges are these horrible little flies that infest the summer and autumn of Scotland.

‘Giving the bell’ is the same as ‘giving someone a ring’ on the phone.
Being 'on the pull' means to be looking for sex.
'Bunking off' means to skip out on something for school or work, but in this case Mary's alluding to James and Lily skipping out on them to be together.

Chapter 37: Sirius Turns Seventeen

Chapter Summary

Happy birthday to Sirius, love Salazar <3

Chapter Notes

CW: Smoking & drinking, but I suppose you're getting used to that, lol. Also references to sexual themes/activities.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

You are the dancing queen,
Young and sweet;
Only seventeen,
Dancing queen,
Feel the beat from the tambourine, oh yeah!

- "Dancing Queen" ABBA, 1976

Wednesday 3rd November 1976

As surprising as the James and Lily relationship reveal had been, the fact that the girls remained livid over the Halloween gag did not come as a shock. None of them so much as glanced in the direction of any 4A boy in the three days that followed, which for Sirius could only mean that the prank must've been successful.

It was a bit startling for Remus to think of his friends as being 'together' together, but the more he thought about it the less weird it felt. James and Lily had both had feelings for one another for so long —even if one was more quick to admit it than the other—and regardless of how mad she was now, Remus hadn't missed the way Lily had been looking at James since the beginning of term. Really the most surprising thing was how long they'd been able to hide it, and how none of them had connected the dots. Tonya would've been killing herself over their blissful ignorance. He couldn't wait to tell her.

Utter betrayal from his best friend aside, Sirius was completely delighted with their victory and Peter didn't seem to mind all that much, but James spent the day bitter and lethargic after Lily had rebuffed him at every meal or meeting since. She'd even gone as far as to switch seats during lessons so that not even Remus could get a word in, and now at dinner—a full 72 hours later—Lily had propped up one of her textbooks between Mary and Marlene's shoulders to ensure there wouldn't be any chance for James to make eye contact.

"They'll get over the prank," Remus told him, sharing an amused look with Peter as James solemnly pushed his potatoes around his plate. "She didn't actually dump you, and it's not like you did something stupid like kiss another—"

"I got it, Moony," James replied cuttingly, and Remus swallowed a wry smile.

Across the dining hall, Lily and Mary stood up from their table, trays in hand. James was on his feet in an instant looking like he was about to rush her from the other side of the room, but Lily shot him a glare so fierce he could only sigh and drop back down on his bench seat in defeat. Obviously amused, Mary stuck out her tongue and drew her thumb across her neck before following Lily to the dirty dish tubs.

"Oh Mary," Remus tsked. James sighed and went back to mashing his roasted potatoes with his fork.

"He still moping?" Sirius asked, sliding in next to Remus with a giddy smile across his face.

"Just worried that Lily's actually gonna dump him," Remus murmured snidely.

"Don't say that!" James wailed; "If you put it out into the universe it might happen!"

"Or she might overhear," Peter supplied. "Subliminal messaging and all that."

James rolled his eyes before looking at Sirius. "Where were you? You were supposed to meet us for study hall so we could bunk off for your birthday."

"Got a bit sidetracked with Kimmy," he answered, "she was giving me my birthday present."

"What'd she give you?" Peter asked, looking Sirius up and down. He didn't even have a dinner tray on him.

Sirius sucked his teeth over a smug smile. “You really want to tell you what she gave me? Okay, two words: blow—”

Before he could finish all three of them were groaning.

“Oh fuck off,” Remus moaned.

“And that’s one word actually!” Peter lashed.

“Wow, Pete! I’m surprised you know what word I was talking about!” Sirius gasped, making Peter flip him off while James burst into a fit of laughter. Sirius kept cackling; “You were the ones who asked!”

“In that case you’re getting shit-all from us,” quipped Remus. “We’ll take it back to the bloody store.”

“Aw, so you lads did get me a wittle pweasent after all? That’s so adorable.”

“Don’t see the point in it now. No way we can top a gift like that,” James snorted.

“You’re just jealous because your girlfriend’s an angry tease.”

“I’ll smash your face into your own birthday cake, Black.”

“There’s a cake too?”

All three of them turned their noses up and Sirius drummed his hands on the table cheekily. “Okay, okay, don’t make me beg!”

Making eye contact with Remus, James finally dropped his school bag on the table top with a sarcastic huff. The bottles within clinked against each other and Sirius’ eyebrows shot up in anticipation. “Don’t let anyone see,” James warned as he reached for the bag and peered into it.

“Holy fuck, where’d you—” Sirius dropped his voice, “where’d you get all the booze?”

“Secured ourselves a new fence recently,” James hummed. “Sim put in a good word with Xeno. We threw your name into the deal too, but sorry to say you need a guardian's signature for anything harder than spiked cider.”

Sirius stuck his tongue out at James’ teasing and Remus chuckled, pushing their next gift onto the table. “There’s more. We all went in on a little something."

"It was James' idea," Peter offered.

"No," James corrected him, "Moony was the one who thought of it. I just talked the 'rents into picking a set up for us."

Eagerly, Sirius reached for the present—done up in a pretty box with a Godric-red bow on top, courtesy of James' mum. When he pulled it open he found a tray of sweets from Mrs. Potter, a single Cuban-leaf cigar from Mr. Potter, as well as a card congratulating him on 'growing into a fine young man'.

"You sure they've met you?" Remus prodded.

Sirius just set the card aside, smiling at it shyly. It was clear the admiration he held for James' parents was more than just surface-level.

When he finally tore the rest of the box's tissue paper away and withdrew the gleaming set of chrome-clad Pickering headphones, Sirius' eyes went from shy and humble to completely and utterly dazzled.

"They're top of the line," James said, practically bouncing in his seat. "Dad tried 'em in the store and he said the sound is like the band's playing right there in your ears!"

"Now you can finally let Peter return that dingy set to the AV room," Remus said quietly, a small smile on his face.

"And there's a few albums waiting for you back at the dorm too!" Peter added enthusiastically.

"I don't know what to say," Sirius said softly, running his hand over the cushioned vinyl of the earpieces.

"Don't say anything yet," James said, "not until you see what Andy sent for you. It might actually blow Kim right out of the water."

Sirius couldn't have smiled any wider.

After they'd cleaned up in the hall, they all legged it back to the dorm, heading up to their bedroom while James collected the gift from the hall cupboard they'd been storing it in for the last couple days. It'd been torture not to immediately tell Sirius what he'd received, but

Andy had rung James in secret and made him promise that he wouldn't give Sirius his present until his actual birthday. One thing was for sure though, this time around Andy's gift certainly hadn't been late—nor ungenerous. It was clear from the wrapping's shape alone what it was. Andy had given Sirius perhaps the one thing in the world he wanted more than anything else; his own guitar.

Or rather, she'd given him her guitar.

"Oh my god." Sirius ripped away the stiff postage wrappings furiously. The instrument's case was hand-painted across the top in a beautiful swirling pattern of purple, blue, and green, now cracked and chipped from time and wear, and had several stickers on it advertising different towns, bars, and bands Andy had visited or loved when she was their age. When Sirius flicked open the metal clasps and lifted the trunk's lid, his fingers were nearly trembling. Across from him, Remus watched with intense interest while James and Peter bobbed up and down on the bed.

"It's Andy's," Sirius said, "it's her guitar."

"Well go on then, take it out!" James ordered.

Biting his lip, Sirius reached into the case and withdrew an acoustic guitar, tanned in the body and a little rough around the edges, but still absolutely beautiful. Pushing aside the case, Sirius drew the guitar into his lap, settling his fingers on the strings and giving a short strum. The sound was warm and raw, that of dead strings badly in need of a good tuning, but Sirius only clapped his fingers over them to silence the sound and looked up at them in awe.

"I don't understand—she told me on the phone just yesterday that she hadn't even posted anything yet!"

"Is there a note?" Peter asked with big eyes.

Sirius looked back into the case, still in shock. "No, I'll—I'll have to call her."

"It's so bloody cool," James said. "Can't believe you have a guitar of your own now."

Sirius nodded fervently, as though that very fact had only just occurred to him. Standing up, he tossed the black strap over his shoulder and flounced to the centre of the room, turning to face their closed window as though he were examining his reflection.

“Guess you can give the Rickenbacker back to Sheila now,” Remus said, earning himself a scoff from Sirius.

“Not bloody-likely, but blimey…” He licked his lips, turning this way and that before grinning and rapping his fingers on the body of the guitar. “I can’t believe it! It’s Andy’s guitar! I’ve only ever seen the thing this one time, after she’d snuck it into one of the family parties —and now it’s… mine?”

“Only s’long as hasn’t come to her senses and jumped on a train to Scotland to get it back,” James said, standing. He crossed the room to Sirius and plucked at one of the strings, looking more interested than he ever had in anything besides football or Lily.

“It looks like a Spanish style,” Remus offered from the bed. “Are those nylon strings?”

“Yeah,” Sirius said, strumming once more. He glanced up at James and held the guitar out a bit. “Do you want to try?”

James immediately took a small step back. “Oh no, it’s your birthday present.”

“Bollocks,” Sirius said happily, drawing the guitar strap over his shoulder and holding the instrument out to his best friend. James wrapped his fingers around the neck gingerly before turning it over and holding it as Sirius had, turning back to Remus and Peter.

“It looks good,” Peter nodded. “Super cool.”

“Yeah,” Sirius said, “so cool I’m almost regretting handing it over.”

James smiled and plucked at the strings a few times before handing the guitar back to Sirius again. “Doesn’t sound like when you do it anyway.”

“I could teach you,” Sirius offered. “We all could learn.”

Remus watched as both Peter and James exchanged a hesitant look. They liked music well enough but neither had ever claimed to be as interested as he or Sirius were, though perhaps that was just because they had other hobbies.

“I think it’s a good idea,” Remus said, “you know, for the ‘band’.”

“Yes!” Sirius exclaimed.

James shook his head at first, but then gave the guitar a guilty look. “I guess as long as it’s before the start of the season. Could be fun?”

“It will be,” Sirius promised. “Look I’ve got some stuff here, we can start tonight!”

As Sirius dove for his hutch and began pulling out various folders of sheet music and James tried not to appear too overwhelmed, Peter stood up from James’ bed and crossed the room back to his own, picking up a sketchpad and flopping down onto his stomach. After a moment, Remus followed him and took a seat on the edge of the bed while he watched Sirius explain to James which note correlated with each of the guitar’s strings.

“This is totally gonna turn into a thing, innit?” He chuckled lightly, before nudging Peter. “Want us to find you a bucket so you can join in —maybe keyboard? I know Sirius wouldn’t mind if you—”

“I can drum actually,” Peter said quickly.

Remus perked up. “You can?”

Peter nodded at first before shaking his head with a sigh. “No, s'a lie. It’s just, my uncle was a tenor drummer in the Grenadier Guards and he used to give me lessons when I was a kid.”

“Why didn’t you ever say anything?”

“It’s not like I can actually play. Not like you or Sirius.”

“Have you told them?”

Peter baulked. “No. It’s been years anyway. Uncle Morris died when we were twelve. Mum thought I should keep up with the lessons just for something to do while Lottie was in dance class but dad thinks music is rubbish mostly. Hard to make money without any talent.”

“Did you?”

“What—make money?”

“No—have talent?”

“I was twelve.”

“Well, who gives a shit about age anyway? Sirius started learning before he could walk. I think you should tell them.”

“So I can be third-best again? No thanks,” Peter scoffed, before lowering his voice slightly; “Besides, it’s not like we’re ever going to be an actual band, Sirius is just looking for the next thing he can throw in his parents’ faces. Did you know he’s been ignoring every single one of their calls since term started? And they always phone on his birthday—direct to the Headmistress’s office—but today he skived off.”

“Yeah,” Remus said, worrying at his lower lip, “I did know.” He’d been the one to skip out with him during study hour to share a quick fag when Sirius should’ve been getting lambasted. At the time it felt like a small victory—no one should have to feel so rotten on their own birthday, especially at the hands of their own family.

“His mum’s going to throw a fit over Christmas for sure,” Peter mumbled, rolling onto his back and holding his notepad in the air above him.

Remus looked to James and Sirius, who had moved on to the stereo and were sharing the new headphones to listen to something.

“You hear that?” Sirius shouted over the music, “that’s the break—and then there’s the guitar’s dive bomb!”

“SOUNDS SO COOL!” James answered, bobbing his head steadily.

Remus smiled to himself. “Maybe he’ll just stay. Or James can smuggle him home in his trunk.”

“Don’t think so,” Peter said. “You’d have a better chance of winning the lotto than Sirius would avoiding his parents. Once in year nine he just got off at Kings Cross with us instead of going home for Christmas.”

“He told me about that.”

“Yeah well, we made it all the way home and he got to stay a few days before his mum showed up on James’ doorstep to drag him out by the ear. James' parents were real gutted about it.”

“You mean they just let her take him away?”

“What else were they supposed to do? It’s his mum.”

Remus clicked his tongue sourly. “Well who gives a shit about—”

Before he could finish, a rapid clatter came from the window as though the dorm was suddenly hit with hail. They all looked up, but it was Remus who stood and crossed the room, leaning over Sirius' hutch to get a look at the lawn outside.

“Oh look, the cavalry's come,” he said, as James popped up next to him and reached down and slid the window open.

“Hey there!" Mary called up from below, hands cupped over her mouth. All four girls stood below smiling up at them along with Moira, though she looked slightly more nervous than the rest. "Heard you were celebrating a birthday. We've come to crash it as retribution."

“Retribution?” James answered. “You mean for Halloween?”

“No for Remus' birthday!” Lily shouted.

“In that case I think you're a few months late,” Remus said in amusement.

“Well we couldn't crash his!” Mary thrust a finger up at James. “Partying while stuck in detention might as well be hittin' rock-bottom!”

“Does this mean you're not still mad about Halloween then?” James asked, eagerly drumming his fingers on the window sill.

“Invite us up and find out!”

Shoving between his friends, Sirius appeared at the window sill, grinning. “How the tables have turned, ladies! What have you brought me?”

“Just… deserts,” Lily called sweetly, holding up a cake wrapped in clingfilm.

“And games!” Lottie added, flashing a box of cards.

“Tempting,” Sirius said, before glancing sideways at James. “What do you think, Moony, Prongs? You two missing your girlfriends?”

“Oh you should talk,” James said. “You didn't invite Kimmy?”

Remus balked. “Wait, she's actually your girlfriend now? Since when?”

Sirius shrugged. “Maybe. We don’t really do a lot of talking if you know what I mean.”

“You’re the worst,” James snorted. “How she stands to date you, I’ll never know.”

“Oh, but what’s that they call it—animal magnetism? Don’t worry, Potter, I’m pretty sure she’s just using me for my body.”

“Ugh,” Remus scoffed, drawing back from the window while James shook his head.

“You dog, you.”

“Never pretended otherwise,” Sirius bragged, before turning back to the window. “Okay, come on up, ladies, we’d love to entertain a few more pretty birds for the evening!”

“Suddenly I’m less excited,” Marlene quipped, as Mary snatched her hand and began dragging her toward the doors.

“Is Peter up there?” Moira called, lagging behind with Lottie.

“I’m here, Mor!” Peter shouted, and the next moment all the girls had gone from the lawn. No one tried to stop them as they scampered up through the boys’ dorm to the fourth floor, though Mary did apparently blow a kiss to a ninth year that had left him so stunned he’d dropped his mug of tea on the stairs with a spectacular clatter. Once the girls were inside they all worked together to push the beds together and out of the way, enough so that there was room for all of them in the centre of the floor.

“Reckon Xeno would lend us a few bean bag chairs?” James asked, earning him a tackling embrace from Sirius, who still hadn’t quite forgiven them for ditching him at dinner the day before. Though getting them enough booze and tobacco to choke a horse had softened the blow a bit—that and his new potential relationship, apparently.

Despite Xeno’s haul, they all made sure to pace themselves, not wanting a repeat of Remus’ last birthday. The girls were certainly impressed by Andy’s gift, and Mary had even taken the guitar into her lap to give a few strums before Sirius slid in behind her, showing her where to properly set her fingers for a decent fret. Mary giggled and left a great pink lip-print on the side of his cheek in thanks while Remus helped Lily cut the cake.

“What’d you guys get him?” She asked, watching as Sirius handed James the guitar next and helped him position his fingers as well. He did not get a second smooch from him, though he tried his best.

“Albums, mostly,” Remus said, passing a plate of birthday cake along to Lottie. “Headphones too.”

“Oi, what we playing then?” Peter called, interrupting their chilling conversation while expertly twisting the cards Lottie had brought around in his fingers. Moira sat beside him, feeling him bites of cake.

“Poker!” Mary announced.

Peter made a face. “Do you guys even know how to play?”

“You can teach us,” Lily said.

“Yeah, a little birdie said that you guys bet with music,” Mary said, “and by that I mean Potter told Lily and Lily told us. Sounds pretty cheap for you minted few if you ask me, but luckily we came prepared to win.”

“Oh no,” Sirius and James said together, just as she reached for the bag she’d brought with her.

“Oh yes! But don’t worry, Black, I only brought good music.” Grinning, Mary began pulling several records out of her bag, the very first being ABBA’s newest release, Arrival, which had been plaguing the radio stations ever since the band’s single, “Dancing Queen” had dropped in August.

As the girls began passing around their albums, Remus heard James lean into Sirius and whisper; “They’ve never played before, I’m sure it won’t be so bad.”

Really, they all should’ve known better. Women always played the long game.

* * *

“—Dancing queen, young and sweet, only seventeen! Dancing queen, feel the beat from the tambourine, OH YEAH!”

“Dammit, ALRIGHT!” Sirius barked, as all four boys stared down the dark lake water from the end of the dock.

“Well get in the water and we’ll stop!” Mary called from the lake’s edge, waving Sirius’ trousers around over her head as she sang. There were very few lights anywhere close by, but the moon and its reflection off the water was more than enough to see the sly grins on each of their faces.

"Wait! Hold that pose!" Lily cried, scampering to the end of the dock and snapping a photo of their naked arses as the rest of the girls squealed in glee.

“I swear to fucking lord,” Sirius sighed, turning back around and rubbing his arms.

“When did they get so damn good at poker?” James whined.

“You’re the one who agreed to that stupid battle royale,” Peter pointed out. “I mean, who bets dares in poker?!”

“At least they don’t seem mad anymore…”

“Yeah,” Remus started, glancing back, “they seem real pleased.”

“Go on then, you jessies!” Lottie hooted from the end of the dock. She’d done a fine job of pretending like she was the weakest link among them, only to bring the game home for the girls the moment Mary had suggested they bet with dares instead of music. At that point they were so tired of disco-pop they’d have agreed to just about anything, and yet they’d been utterly played—Lake Dubh was always the colour of spilt ink and cold as a witch’s tit in January. At least the girls had permitted them to keep their underwear.

“If you wanted to see us completely starkers you should’ve just asked!” Sirius shouted, despite the fact that he was the only one of them that had kept his shirt on.

“We don’t want to see you starkers,” Marlene answered, “we want to see you squirm!”

James looked back. “It’s November, and it’s freezing!”

“I’m sure the water’s warmer than you think, Potter,” Lily called, without pity.

“Go on you big naked losers!” Moira shouted.

“Your girlfriends are monsters,” Sirius told James and Peter, who shared a guilty smile until a particular icy wind licked past all of them. Remus stiffened like he’d been hit by an electric shock. Worse were his feet, toes curled in on themselves as they stood, shivering, on the wet dock. His skin was almost burning from the cold, but as he recalled the moment Lottie unveiled her winning hand, making each of his friend’s jaws hit the floor in shock, he burst into laughter, earning himself a very incredulous look from Sirius.

“What’s so funny?” He demanded.

“Nothing! It's just—she’s right, you know.”

“She’s—how much did you smoke tonight?”

Remus only laughed harder. “Oh c’mon, she’s right! We’re all a bunch of big naked losers. Well, almost all of us.” He looked down at Sirius’ white shirt pointedly, the brightest thing for miles under the moonlight. Just beneath it he could see that silver chain he’d been wearing since the start of term peeking out along his collarbone.

“I think it’s a little funny too,” James added, despite the fact that his teeth had started chattering and he had to squint even more in the darkness without his glasses.

“Funny?” Sirius echoed, looking back to James. “How funny? This funny?”

Before Remus could peer around to catch his expression, Sirius’ arm shot out and slammed into the centre of his chest, effectively launching him off the end of the dock and backwards into the dark water.

“F-FUCK!” Remus sputtered as he emerged from the lake completely soaked and instantly frozen. “Why did you push me?”

“ ‘Cause I felt like it!” Sirius cackled.

Over the initial shock of the cold, Remus hauled himself up to the edge of the dock and wrapped one hand tightly around his ankle. Sirius toppled instantly and fell into the water next to him with a garish shriek.

When his head broke the surface Sirius’ eyes were as wide as saucers. “FUCKING JESUS, MARY, AND JOSEPH CHRIST! That’s fucking COLD!”

“I know!” Remus shouted, paddling to keep himself afloat in the deep water.

“Get in here you pricks so we can get out!” Sirius ordered, wiping back his soaked, black hair and splashing water up on the dock that James and Peter had to dance around to avoid.

James grinned as though he were already in pain. “No fucking way, mate.”

“Dickheads,” Remus grunted, hauling himself up once more and making a grab for James’ ankle. He avoided it, but Sirius splashed Peter at the same time and both boys crashed headlong into each other, slipping ever so gracefully on the docks’ soggy planks.

“Oh Christ—!” James hit the water with a smack, taking poor Peter with him. They broke the surface sputtering and moaning while Remus and Sirius crowed, nearly out of breath between their laughter and the cold.

“Nooooo…” Peter whimpered through his teeth, seizing up all over as James instantly scrambled to grab hold of the dock and haul himself up.

“Fuck-fuck-fuck-fuck-fuck!” He hissed, upon realising that it was in fact colder while exposed to the night air. He rolled onto his back and Remus scrambled up after him, before turning to help haul both Peter and Sirius up.

“Give me my clothes!” Sirius shouted as he dragged himself back to his feet, then; “Those slags!”

The girls had gone, effectively ditching them on the shore of the freezing lake in nothing but wet underwear. Not even James' glasses remained. The only thing left behind were their shoes, a painful reminder that women truly were the cruelest vindicators.

The trip back to Godric was both quick and torturously long. They ran most of the way, desperate to keep themselves warm but also terrified of being caught naked under the moonlight, and by the time they were stumbling across the dorm’s threshold, their lips were blue and their fingers and toes were little more than stumps of ice.

“James, Pete, I want a divorce,” Sirius grumbled, arms tucked into his arm pits. “Your side-pieces are too much.”

“I thought you were the side-piece,” James said, making Remus snigger while he considered walking into the common room to shove his frozen hands into the fireplace. He almost did it too, until a rowdy noise emanating from the staircase caught his attention.

As the four of them stood there, still dripping onto the hallway carpet, Regulus Black, Barty Crouch, and their other two roommates Yaxley and Travers shot down onto the landing, skidding to a halt only when they all noticed they’d been caught.

“Jesus Christ,” Crouch gasped, “looks like someone beat us to it.”

The Salazar boys began laughing in unison, all except Regulus, who looked completely stunned and horrified to see his brother soaked in his underwear in the middle of the public hall.

“What are you shits doing in here?” Sirius demanded.

“Just visiting,” Yaxley preened through his cackling.

“Yeah,” Crouch said, “heard it was your birthday, Black, so we came to say hi. Didn’t realise Lupin had started a trend—you all going around flashing people as a group now?”

James stepped forward first, squinting without his glasses. “Get out of our dorm.”

“Sorry, Potter. Only meant to—”

“He said piss off,” Remus snarled, and Crouch pulled back sharply.

“Alright, alright. We just were leaving anyway.” Mockingly, he raised his hands and both Yaxley and Travers copied him, moving around the boys to get to the other side of the hallway. It took Regulus a little longer, but finally he stepped down from the stairs and passed, moving stiffly and not making eye contact.

“And you?” Sirius snapped suddenly, just as Regulus passed him. “What, don’t have anything to say for yourself?”

Regulus froze and glanced up at his brother. “It’s your birthday," he answered dryly; "We wanted to surprise you.”

“Then colour me surprised, Reggie.”

The air grew heavy with unsaid words between the two brothers, and finally Regulus turned and moved past, joining Crouch and the others as they pushed open the dorm's front doors and skipped out into the night, sniggering back and forth.

"That was nice," Peter said bitterly.

"Let's just go to bed." Taking Sirius' shoulder, James guided him to the stairs, which they all took slowly, tired from the lake and the surprise interaction. Once inside their room, each of them scrambled for warm clothes and once dressed, began sighing with relief. The air was warm at least thanks to the radiator, but the room did still smell of hash so James opened the window to air it out some. The stereo's radio was going, which Remus thought as odd since Sirius barely ever used the radio feature; there was only one local station and it only ever played church ditties and Scottish folk music.

"We'll clean tomorrow, don't worry about the mess, Potter," Sirius was saying to James, who'd already begun clearing away the dishes from Lily and Marlene's cake, when suddenly Peter gave a yelp from the far side of his bed;

"Oh shit!"

"Step on a tack or something, Pete?" Asked James.

"I think someone spilled something over here."

"It sticky?"

"Nah, just looks like water."

"I'll get a towel," James said, as Remus leaned over Peter's bed to get a look. The puddle was much bigger than he imagined, and stretched the entire far side of the room, all the way to the bathroom.

"Oh damn, that's cold," James hissed as he stepped in it, hand closing around the doorknob. Remus watched him, and noticed how the water was flowing, turning the puddle into a lake.

"James, wait—"

But he was too late. The moment James opened the bathroom door, water burst free and sailed across the room beneath their beds, instantly soaking the floor, carpet, and anything the boys had neglected to pick up off the floor.

"Oh SHIT!" Sirius gasped, diving for his piled up records while Remus sorely tried to save the books he'd left on the floor—most of which didn't even belong to him. James and Peter did their best too, scrambling around and scooping up everything from homework to comics to laundry. They danced around like that for a while, throwing curses while the clogged drains of their sink and tub leaked icy water until finally Sirius threw his things down onto his bed and streaked out of the room.

"I'm gonna murder them!" He shouted as he went, and James flashed Remus a look of brief concern before following him out.

"Sirius!" James shouted. "Sirius, stop!"

"They did it! Those pissheads did it!"

"You're going to wake up the whole dorm!"

"You both are!" Peter added, as he and Remus chased after them, back down four floors and out onto the front lawn, where Sirius finally stopped, breathing through his nose like a raging bull. Despite his desire to commit vicious homicide, none of the Salazar boys were stupid enough to hang around and risk getting throttled, and they were met with only silence and a few buzzing street lamps.

"Son of a bitch!" Sirius growled, as James caught up and set a hand on his back.

"Sirius, it's fine—"

"It's not fine! They tried to prank us, except it wasn't funny—they just ruined our room!"

"I bet they'd find it funny anyway," Peter huffed.

"But it's not," James agreed. "And we can get them back another time. You're just angry because you're pissed and knackered, we all are. So let's think about it in the morning, okay?"

Sirius' shoulders deflated slightly and he held his forehead. It was the second birthday in a row for him that had started pleasantly enough but ended in less than ideal circumstances. Perhaps November 3rd was just cursed.

"Could be worse," Remus offered, "the prank could've actually been clever. Think of what it would do to our reputations."

Sirius’ lips puckered into a smile, and he shook his head. “Anyone remember to turn off the water?”

They all exchanged a daft look and Sirius’ hands turned into fists at his side.

“Brilliant.”

Chapter End Notes

About time they got pranked in return, even if Sirius didn't find it as funny. Excited to carry forward with the term, sorry in advance for any incoming angst, LOL.

'Starkers' just means naked.

Chapter 38: November (Part 1)

Chapter Summary

> November proves as a test of endurance.

Chapter Notes

> CW: Smoking/drinking, gas-lighting, and references to sexual content. Also a light self-harm trigger for pinching/bruising/ elastic snapping used as a deterrent for certain thoughts.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Boys, boys, it's a sweet thing,
Boys, boys, it's a sweet thing, sweet thing;
If you want it, boys, get it here thing,
'Cause hope, boys, is a cheap thing,
Cheap thing…

- "Sweet Thing" David Bowie, 1974

He remembered it like a flash—a jab of what felt like pain but somehow wasn't, just behind the eyes. They'd been so busy mopping up the rest of the prank, teeth still chittering from the frosty waters of the Dubh, that he'd forgotten. James and Peter's side had taken the brunt of the mess, and afterwards they'd all fallen into bed like zombies. The same.

Before it all came back Remus thought he must have been dreaming, which he didn't do very often. He was flying maybe, or weightless somewhere, just floating along. It wasn't like being in water; in water you were still able to feel the weight of your arms and legs as they fought to keep you upright. Instead he felt like air—complete nothingness. He'd come apart at the seams, breaking up into little bits of matter until he was nothingness itself. He'd think later how that should've scared him—the thought of becoming nothing—but when you were so used to being everything at once, being nothing didn't seem all that bad.

He remembered his mother's trunk during that dreaded hour of night that was too unreasonably late to be up, but too horrifyingly early to be awake. Remus called this time of night the 'shit hour', because you could do shit-all during it and shit-all about it. Couldn't talk, couldn't play music, couldn't turn on a light, could only sit and think; mostly about things you could do shit-all about. It was all-around shit. You could always worry though, since worrying was shit too.

His heart had leapt into his throat as he threw off his covers, dropping to his knees and reaching beneath the bed to find it. For the first few seconds his fingers fell upon only empty air, and he briefly wondered if the trunk had also disappeared into nothingness, but then his palm collided with the familiar leather surface of one of its corners and he fought to reach the handle. Dragging it out as quietly as he could so as to not disturb his roommates, Remus smoothed trembling fingers along the outside. The leather was damp, moisture already seeping into the cracks along its seams where it would eventually break it apart from the inside-out like a cancer.

Not entirely a masochist, Remus didn't stop to wonder if the water had made its way inside. Using the tiny luggage key, he popped the trunk's top and breathed out as he stared down at its contents.

They were fine.

The trunk's exterior had held the test of time and prank. There was no hint of damp or mistreatment, not even along the delicate silk lining. The records were still pristine, albeit slightly dusty from six years of neglect. Perhaps it would've been better if they were ruined—the covers left soggy so he'd have no choice to throw them out or risk mold. It'd be half the hurdle, gone. But Remus had never been very lucky.

Oh, where have you been, my blue-eyed son?
And where have you been, my darling young one?

"Shit," he mumbled. Told himself.

He shut the trunk.

* * *

Friday 5th November 1976

The Hawkings rumour mill could've rivalled the BBC with how well it collected and carried news. It took all of one day for word of their 'late-night dip in the Dubh' to spread across the entire campus, though at the behest of Regulus and his cronies or Mary and her beautifully big mouth, no one could be sure. Up until that moment Remus had been certain there wasn't a single thing about the school that could surprise him anymore, but the prestige that running around freezing and naked in nothing but their knickers brought really threw him for a loop.

" 'Course we did it," Sirius had boasted to a crowd of kids in their next forms, "cold water's supposed to be good for you. Tightens everything up and all that. Lupin would know, he's got abs."

"Oh shut up, you dickhead," Remus snapped, making everyone laugh. He could have lived in the weight training room and would still never pass for more than a bulky noodle, but he'd already resigned himself to suffer the cheeky questions and prodding until Sirius inevitably gave everyone something else to talk about.

Too bad not everyone was under the same impression.

"You need to stop telling everyone you ran around school naked, it's not funny," Kimmy lashed as she clutched tightly to Sirius' arm on the common room couch. It was almost rare to see them sitting so solitary. Kimmy usually preferred to have an audience, parading Sirius around like he was an expensive broach on her shirt.

"We weren't actually naked," Sirius reasoned, "I told you we—"

"It doesn't matter what actually happened if everyone thinks something else. Presence matters—public image matters! Really Sirius, I thought you'd understand that."

Sirius said nothing, just turned away with a stubborn look as though he were pretending to count the books that lined the common room's walls. Finally Kimmy reached for his chin and gently drew his gaze back to her as she traced a line around his perfect cupid's bow.

"I don't mean to be harsh, darling. You know I can't stand the embarrassment—not after what Daddy did to Mummy, leaving us like he did. You understand, don't you?"

Sirius nodded coolly and Kimmy's face split into a smile as she began brushing her fingers through his hair. A moment later and they were made-up; kissing and sinking into the sofa with the fireplace blazing at their backs. Sirius' hand slid up to cup Kimmy's neck but she tugged it down across her collarbone and then even lower, right out there in the open for all to see. Still kissing her, Sirius' eyes opened and flitted across the room. It took Remus a split-second to realise he was looking at him—that he'd noticed him staring.

Horrified, Remus ripped his eyes away, heart thrumming in his ears with embarrassment.

"Moony, it's your turn," Peter said.

Swallowing the lump in throat, Remus straightened up in his seat and turned back to their game of chess. He couldn't stop thinking about Kimmy and her sickly-sweet voice—she never spoke quietly, not even while fighting with her boyfriend—and Sirius with those stormy eyes of his. Remus moved a pawn just to do something, and instantly Peter was grinning in delight.

"That's checkmate, Lupin."

"Fuck." Remus flopped back in his seat. He should've known; he could've been in the best form he'd ever been in and still wouldn't be able to beat Peter in chess.

"Do you want to have another round?"

Remus glanced at the clock. "No, sorry, I should really get that assignment done for Flitwick. I haven't even started."

"I thought you finished it yesterday," Peter said, gathering up the game pieces.

Remus pursed his lips. He'd meant to finish the homework yesterday, but Sirius had inexplicably showed up in the library with a gang of Kimmy's friends and he'd fled before he could be tortured by any more of his girlfriend's unbearable giggling. It was getting ridiculous really—everywhere he went, there they were. As though Sirius were determined to make him into their own personal voyeur. Hawkings College existed on over five hectares of land—it was bigger than Windsor Castle for Christ's sakes—and still there was no relief. Remus figured that he'd have to start sleeping in a tree soon just to avoid Sirius and James' late-night conversations about how it felt to touch Kimmy's boobs.

Peter eventually left him to find Moira and after collecting his things, Remus made his way out of the common room and toward the stairs. As went he allowed himself one final glance back, but this time Sirius wasn't looking at him. Instead his eyes were trained on the fire while Kimmy snuggled into his chest and traced circles across his chest.

Remus returned upstairs.

* * *

Wednesday 10th November 1976

According to the Hawkings student handbook, students were to be responsible for their own laundry to 'help reinforce proper etiquette and value in the small chores of life'. Remus didn't mind much, though the amount of teenagers who were too posh to know how much laundry detergent to put in with their bed sheets really stupefied him. He tended to wait until late in the evenings to do his laundry, that way he could sit and relax with a cigarette and a book and not have to worry about a prefect strolling along and giving him detention for smoking out of bounds. Too bad he had his own personal prefect to contend with.

Lily checked the remaining time on her washer and came to join him on the laundrette's bench as they waited. Mary had also joined them, propped up on top of one of the dryers and musing over her current fascination, which also happened to be Sirius' relationship status. Remus had no escape from it.

"I heard she hooked up with a student teacher in her tenth year," Mary said, sipping the hot chocolate she'd brought with her from the dorms.

"Mary! I thought we agreed that we weren't going to badmouth other women anymore," Lily huffed; "There's enough ingrained societal misogyny without us adding to it! Men are constantly tearing us down —there's literally no use in us doing it to one another when we have them to do it for us. No offence, Remus."

He waved her off, indifferent.

"What about the fact that you're always whinging about Chastity?" Mary pointed out snidely.

"You mean Chastity Bell from history?" Remus asked, interest suddenly peeked.

"You gossips, that's different," Lily shot. "I don't dislike her because she's a woman, I dislike her because she's an air-bag."

Remus snorted as Mary gave Lily a 'whatever you say' sort of look.

"Hey Remus," Mary started, "is Buchanan a good teacher?"

"Uh—yeah. She's great actually, why?"

"I thought I might consider taking voice lessons with her next year. I've been doing the math and I'll have a free period so I figured I might as well do something that'll be fun before we leave school and start preparing to work until we die."

"I thought your life goal was to move to Paris and become a rich widower," Lily teased.

"Well, that too. But imagine how many attractive Parisian men will be knocking down my door when they discover I'm rich, with a dead husband, and the voice of an angel."

"I didn't know you could sing," Remus said.

"Oh yes," Lily giggled. "The shower's her opera."

Mary just pressed her hands to her cheeks and smiled humbly. "It was just a thought. My mum had a beautiful voice. Daddy used to say it was one of the reasons he fell in love with her."

Remus looked down at the ground. He appreciated the fond way Mary could talk about her mother. It was clear she loved her a lot.

"Petunia expects her boyfriend'll propose soon," Lily blurted suddenly. "I've never even met the guy, but she told me yesterday on the phone."

"Isn't she still in school?" Mary asked, scandalised.

"Yeah, but she wants to get married the second she's done. Says she doesn't want to wait like Mummy did, but our mum wasn't even old when she and dad got married. She just wanted a career first."

"So she's not going to university then?" Remus asked.

"Our parents want her to consider a polytechnic or a vocational program but she's pretty stubborn."

"God," Mary scoffed; "I couldn't imagine getting married at our age. There's too many things I want to do first and having a man hanging around that often would be awful. No offence, Remus."

“Isn’t this ‘no offence’ stuff getting a bit old?”

“Nope,” Lily grinned.

“Could you imagine if one of us got married?” Mary said, lifting her hot chocolate back to her lips before gasping. “I wouldn’t put it past Kimmy. Think she could convince Sirius to propose before Christmas? Bet she’d demand some tacky ring that’s been passed down through his family for ages and then complain that it’s ugly.”

“They’ve barely been dating for two weeks,” Remus said.

“Like that means anything. She’s got claws like a saber-toothed tiger, and Sirius has money.”

“His family has money—he doesn’t want any of it.”

“Well, that’ll change if Kimmy’s got anything to say about it. And she seems very fond of him. I heard her call him ‘Loveykins’ the other day.”

“I think I’m gonna hurl.”

A ding sounded, Lily’s washing machine, and she popped up to begin pulling her sheets out and transferring them to the dryer Mary was currently sitting on. “Stop teasing poor Remus, Mary, his sensitive heart can’t take it.”

“I’m not sensitive,” Remus objected.

“Sure you are. You’ve been moping ever since Black started dating the girl.”

“I have not.”

“Are you lonely, Remus?” Mary asked. “I’m still seeing Ken Thomas but if you’re really hurting I can put that on hold and take you out myself.”

“Thanks for the offer, Mary, but I’d rather be single and lonely than dating and pitiful.”

“Then you’re the only one.”

Lily shut the dryer and reached past Mary, hitting the start button. It jarred her so fantastically that she split hot chocolate across her skirt and slid off the dryer to scowl down at the fresh stain.

“Boo, you hag,” she huffed at Lily, who only smiled.

“We are in the laundry room—want to throw your skirt in with Remus’ stuff?”

Mary glanced playfully at Remus before reaching for her zipper.

“Oh, you guys are ridiculous,” he wailed, covering his eyes as both girls giggled at him.

Eventually Lily got Mary a towel to wear around her waist and they all moved on to the next topic of business, but Remus’ mind couldn’t avoid veering back into Sirius-territory.

No! Stop it, you bloody idiot. Stop thinking about it!

He pinched himself, squeezing until the dull ache turned into a throbbing and the pain had occupied at least some of his thoughts of Sirius Black.

That’s it. Every time you think of it, you can just pinch yourself.

Remus sighed. He’d definitely gone mental. But maybe it would just work. It could work. After all, no one else was telling him to make Sirius a priority, it was all in his head. If he could just turn it off then everything would be alright again. They were just friends—Remus shouldn’t care so much.

And so he wouldn’t. That was that.

“Remus, did Sirius ever say if he had my Runaways tape still? I couldn’t find it yesterday,” Mary said.

“Uh, yeah he and Kimmy were listening to it… yesterday.”

“Oh, okay. I’ll get it back from him later then.”

In the cover of his lap, Remus pinched the inside of his wrist.

This was going to take some getting used to.

* * *

Remus Lupin was a weak, weak man.

Sirius’ problems are not your problems, he told himself over and over again like a mantra. I bet if you asked Sirius he wouldn't even call them problems in the first place!

The voice taunted him, as did the faint bruises decorating the inside of his arm. He'd given the habit up only a few days into it after realising that both the act of pinching and the bruises it left only made him think of Sirius more. He'd tried snapping an elastic around his wrist instead, but that wasn't any better. And so there they were, nearly halfway into November, and it was still impossible to put Sirius or Kimmy from his mind. Perhaps it was because they liked to fight so much—publicly too, to the point where daily relationship updates might as well have been posted on the school's main noticeboard.

THIS JUST IN: Sirius Black only loves Kim Bishop's purple miniskirt this much, rather than THIS much.

HOT OFF THE PRESSES: Kim Bishop's boyfriend thinks she should really get a sense of humour! One joke about bowel movements every other blue moon shouldn't be such a world-ending event!

TALK OF THE DAY: Year 12 students should be able to accompany their year 13 girlfriends off campus during free-days and if the faculty says they can't, well then it must be the boyfriend's fault! HA!

Really, he should've been grateful. Early on Sirius had discovered he wasn't likely to get the same sort of ego-boosting reaction out of Remus as he did with James or Peter. Apparently it was supposed to be quite thrilling to be regaled with how it felt to snog Kimmy between the shelves of the library where they could be drawn and quartered by Ms. Pince at any moment, but thankfully Sirius had quickly learned to stop trying where Remus was concerned. That didn't mean however, that he wasn't going to complain to him.

"Sometimes it's like talking to a bird—like an actual bird, Moony—just chirp-chirp-chirp-chirp-chirp. It never ends. And the whining—ugh."

"Then break up with her," Remus suggested for the tenth time, trying hard to concentrate on his geography text. He had a free period and was trying to study in one of the empty halls, but Sirius had tracked him down after bunking off from Modern Languages.

"Ah," Sirius smirked, "but see where's the fun in that?"

Fun? How about relief? Relief and a bit of repose for the rest of us!

"I don't get the upside," Remus grumbled. "All you do is fight."

“But she’s hot.”

Oh my god.

Sirius sighed wistfully, doodling stars on Remus’ open notebook. “Kimmy's pretty fun too, you know. She’s always willing to try new things—did I tell you she went with me to the Shrieking Shack?”

“Did I tell you that Lily went to the library and found out that it was actually where they housed tuberculosis patients in the thirties?”

“So you mean to say that people have actually died there? Cool.”

Remus resisted a groan. “You’re so thick sometimes.”

“Maybe, but Kimmy’s not. She’s actually really smart. In that sort of untrying way. And she’s very loyal to her friends—you should come and hang out with them sometime! Bet we’d all have a party.”

Fat chance.

“—And she likes my music too! She lets me put on whatever I want and always has a good opinion on it.”

“So she’s you.” And yet somehow so much worse.

“Oh damn,” Sirius laughed; “You might be onto something, Moons. Potter’s always saying I’m likely to fall in love with my own reflection. Ha, Kimmy’s gonna love that.”

Fall in love?!

“Well, why don’t you just marry her then!” Remus snapped, making Sirius shift uncomfortably in his seat.

“Woah, marry her? Where’s this coming from?”

“Nowhere,” he huffed, glancing away quickly. “Just something Mary said… It was a stupid joke.”

Sirius leaned in. “You’re not jealous by any chance, are you Moons?”

Remus looked back, fully ready to explode on him—No, I’m not jealous, your girlfriend’s just the worst thing since The Beatles breaking up! —but the expression on Sirius’ face was not his usual teasing. It was open and honest, seeking the truth. If Remus wanted to, he could’ve made his feelings clear right then and there. But even he didn’t know what those were and a part of him was afraid Sirius would try to ask.

So, because he was young and stupid just like Sirius, and because he wanted to punish them both, Remus said;

“No, I’m not jealous. You’re just an idiot.”

Sirius’ honest look was instantly replaced with bitter anger, which no one could’ve really blamed him for. “Fine,” he lashed, pushing up to his feet and letting his chair skid backwards. “Call me when you’re done having your little fit or whatever.”

“Call me you’re done being a selfish twat!” Remus shouted back, as Sirius stormed from the room, flipping him off over his shoulder.

After that they started avoiding each other at all costs. Remus was determined to never be alone in the same room with Sirius, or else risk having to talk about it. It drew any musical practice of theirs to an immediate halt, but it was a sacrifice Remus had to make for his sanity. As long as someone else was around then the subject of Kimmy could be avoided and Sirius couldn’t ask why Remus was acting so nasty about everything all of a sudden.

It isn’t all of sudden, he would tell the imaginary Sirius in his head, it’s always been like this with you!

And yet he had no explanation. The realisation that Sirius had always ignited this jealous part of him hurt a little bit—no one liked thinking of themselves as a complete cad—but even the green-eyed monster within him didn’t prevent the buzzing couple from showing up wherever he went.

“What are they even doing here?” He ground out, turning around on the bench at the edge of the football field to scowl at Sirius and Kimmy. They were sitting amongst the sports stands along with a handful of Kimmy’s friends, all of them drinking warm hot chocolate from the dining hall and sharing cigarettes between themselves. Remus thought haughtily that they didn’t look nearly as fun or thrilling as Simeon and his friends. At least their hot chocolate would’ve been likely spiked with Amaretto.

James lowered his water bottle and pulled the hem of his sports jacket away from his body to fan himself. It was the team’s last practice outdoors before they all moved into the indoor pitch for the winter and Remus was more chilled sitting on the bench than he’d hoped he’d be. Despite James’ eagerness when he’d asked to accompany him to the field that morning, Remus was only there because Sirius had told them that morning that he was planning on bringing Kimmy back to the dorm. Guess he'd changed his mind. Bloody prick.

"They always hang out here," James advised with indifference. "They're friends with Keith and he's on the team. Dunno why Kimmy still stays to watch though."

"What do you mean?"

"Keith's her ex. He's just like Kim so naturally the whole team heard about their break-up. I just sorta figured they wouldn't want to be around one another so much since it was apparently pretty messy, but I guess that's what happens if you share a friend group."

As James loped away to join the team's practice match, Remus couldn't help but look back. Kimmy and Sirius were bundled up next to each other on the stands, laughing and passing a spliff back and forth.

I rolled that, he wanted to shout, I know him better than you.

But it didn't make any sense, so he just turned back around on the bench and read his book.

Remus knew he could only avoid Sirius for so long. Whether it be because of his inability to remain consistent in his emotions or Sirius' general lack of commitment, he could already feel them softening toward each other. In the beginning it'd been snide quips that left James and Peter to look between them awkwardly, but eventually their energy was spent and it took everything Remus had just to ignore the problem that shouldn't have even been a problem in the first place.

The day he was confronted about it came on a particularly cold Friday in late November, after everyone had spent the school day complaining about the drafty conditions of the classrooms and quickly retired to the warmth of the dorms. The girls had joined them in camping out around their common room fireplace and they were all watching some game show on the telly. Remus was only half-paying attention, draped back against one of the sofas and trying not to fall asleep. On one side of him was Lily and James, curled up next to one another under a knitted blanket, and on the other was Marlene, her toes tucked under his thigh for warmth. Sirius sat sprawled ahead of them on a bed of cushions Mary had made up, no Kimmy in sight. None of them asked where she was of course, and Remus was grateful.

It felt like just saying her name would will her into existence.

'Next category: Name that Tune! Remember, there are no lyrics, just that funky beat! Here's the first ten seconds,' the host rattled. A moment later the soul-beat music spilled from the television speakers and Mary shot upright.

"Ooh! Oh! 'Shining Star' by Earth Wind and Fire!" She declared. "Or—or it's The Temptations!"

"No, it's gotta be like James Brown or something," Sirius said. "I say 'Sex Machine'."

"You really think they'd put a song called 'Sex Machine' on television?" Marlene gaped.

"If they can put 'You Sexy Thing' and 'My Ding-A-Ling' on 'Top of the Pops' then these game show hosts can do whatever they want."

"You're all wrong anyway," Remus murmured. "It's 'I Want to Take You Higher'. Sly and the Family Stone."

'And that was "I Want to Take You Higher" by Sly and the Family Stone!'

"Wow Remus," Lily smiled, "good job."

He shrugged, cheeks burning as he tried to avoid the look Sirius was giving him. It didn't work. "Something on my face?" He drawled finally.

"Just surprised is all."

"Me too. Thought you were supposed to have a perfect memory?"

Sirius gave him a little smile. "Guess it's more subjective than I thought."

Breathing in, Remus busied himself by picking at the fuzz on Lily's blanket. He knew the next song too but didn't bother showing off and Mary got it, grinning at Sirius smugly.

"Lucky guess," he grumbled, shouldering her good-naturedly.

"Do you want a cuppa?" Remus asked Marlene as the show went to commercial break.

"Sure," she nodded.

After taking stock of the rest of his friends' tea orders, Remus pulled himself free from the couch and turned to make his way into the kitchenette across the hall.

"Hold on, I'll come help you," Sirius said, popping to his feet and immediately coming after him. Remus stubbornly didn't bother waiting but Sirius paid no mind, padding in after him and leaning against the countertop as Remus gathered everything for tea.

"So James and I were going to have a little practice sesh tomorrow if you were interested," Sirius said, passing him the kettle without being asked.

Remus lit the burner on the hob and shook out the match. "Sorry, got homework," he mumbled.

"Oh, how about something the next day then? Kimmy's having a little get-together."

"You're inviting me to one of Kimmy's parties?"

"Yeah, don't worry, It's totally casual. You should come, really."

Remus squeezed his eyes shut. Why, oh why, do you insist on having me around?

"That's the day before Bilshin's next test," he said eventually, "I think I should probably study."

"You don't need to study anymore," Sirius scoffed. "You have that test in the bag already."

"Easy for you to say, Mr. 'I threw my final exams and still got better marks than ninety-percent of the school'."

"You're still hung up on that?"

Remus glared at him.

"Okay, how 'bout we study together first! Thennnn… we hang out?"

"Sirius, I'm not really interested in hanging out."

"Why not?" He whined. "It's like you've become a ghost or something —can't nail you down anywhere!"

The metaphor only made Remus more unnerved. "I—I don't need you to ‘nail me down’!”

“Well I didn’t mean it like that,” he snorted. “But please, Moons. I’m tired of fighting—not that we were fighting, of course. Everyone has spats, just—I miss you.”

Oh fucking hell. Fuck you and everything you stand for you stupid fucking supermodel of a tosser!

Remus rubbed awkwardly at the back of his neck. It would’ve felt better to hit something, but then he’d be the loon. He just wished the water would boil faster. “I wouldn’t fit in.”

“I wouldn’t want you to,” Sirius said, honestly. “I just want to hang out with my mate.”

“And your girlfriend.”

“Well, yeah duh? But Kimmy’s got friends. Yvonne mentioned she might have a thing for you actually.”

“Which one’s Yvonne?”

“Short—blonde—got all those freckles. Cute enough, I suppose,” Sirius shrugged. “You should come! It’s been a while since it’s just been you and me.”

“But it won’t just be you and me.”

“I know, but—please?”

Remus knew he wasn’t interested, but as Sirius stood there and begged him, he could feel his weakness creep back into his bones like a cancer.

“Fine, but I’m not gonna be nice.”

“Oh no, that would be asking far too much,” Sirius snickered, lifting himself up on the edge of the countertop and casually resting his hands on his thighs. From that angle he was finally taller than him, and as Remus looked up he felt a tug just behind his navel. It scared him and so he stepped back, accidentally brushing his hand across the side of the hot kettle.

“Shit!” He hissed, bringing his finger to his mouth to suck on.

“You okay, Moons?” Sirius asked, leaning forward.

Oh how I hate you sometimes. Wish I knew why.

“Pretty prick,” Remus mumbled around his wound.

Sirius smirked. “What was that?”

“I said you still owe me for the last two rounds of baccy from Xeno.”

“Oh.” Sirius’ face split into another grin. “Don’t worry, I’ll make it up to you. Promise.”

You’d better.

* * *

Sunday 21st November 1976

When James and Peter asked where they were going, Sirius said ‘a party’. He invited them too, but they both had club activities. Apparently Professor Slughorn was planning on letting students start construction on their own homemade rockets.

“Wouldn’t that mean you also have Slug Club stuff?” Remus asked, surprised Sirius wasn't more interested in the idea of shooting off his own personal explosion.

“Nah,” Sirius shrugged, “I only go when I feel like it.”

“And how often do you feel like it?”

Sirius just winked at him.

After bundling up to ward-off the cold, they met Kimmy and her friends camped out in a small crop of trees by the lakeside, surrounding an illegal bonfire of their own.

“I would’ve asked the girls to come too, but I think they’d be suspicious of another fire,” Sirius said to him, arm wrapped around his neck as they approached the clearing.

Kimmy stood up when she spotted them coming, eagerly racing over and combing her sandy waves to one side so as to show off her long neck.

“Hi Loveykins,” she beamed, kissing Sirius and making Remus pull away immediately. “Where’s your friend—James?”

“James isn’t coming,” Sirius said. Remus noted with a bit of satisfaction that he’d winced at the nickname too.

“But you said he was gonna be here,” Kimmy frowned; “I told Yvonne and everything.”

“I said I’d bring a friend,” Sirius said, eyeing Remus pointedly.

“Oh.” Kimmy looked him up and down appraisingly. “That’s fine then. I’ll go let Yvonne know.”

She scuttled back to the group and Sirius gently bumped his fist against Remus’ shoulder. “Sorry,” he winced, “she really only said to bring my ‘friend’.”

“Believe it or not, Black, I did not have the time to fall head-over-heels for ‘Yvonne’ in the last day and a half. I think I’ll be alright.”

“Oh good,” Sirius wrapped his arm around his neck again as he dragged him toward the fire; “not sure I could handle a broken-hearted Moony.”

Someone had brought a wireless radio at least, and as they settled in on a log next to Kimmy, Remus found himself drifting with the quiet music. It was a Showaddywaddy song, one that had been hogging the radio waves since its release and probably would until everyone hated it enough to change the channel whenever it came on.

‘Let’s go for a little walk,
Under the moon of love;
Let’s sit down and talk,
Under the moon of love;
I want to tell ya,
That I love ya,
And I want you to be my girl;
Little darling let’s walk,
Let’s talk,
Under the moon of love!’

“Guys, this is my best mate, Remus,” Sirius said, introducing him to the circle of about a dozen kids, all of them huddled close to the fire and each other. Remus waved back shyly and turned to Sirius.

“Who’s wireless is that?”

“Keith’s,” Sirius answered, cracking the tab of a beer and passing it to him. “Isn’t it cool? He just got it so it can reach stations even further away than anything Pete’s got in that AV club of his. We finally have more to listen to than just church hymns and disco!”

Suddenly it made a lot more sense as to why Sirius liked hanging out with them so much. “So you like Keith then?"

"Sure, he's an alright bloke."

"But isn’t he Kimmy's—?”

He never got to finish his sentence. Kimmy leaned over and pat Remus on the knee while pulling her puffer coat up tightly around her neck. “Remus take this end of the blanket!” She said. “That way we can all snuggle.”

He might’ve objected, but Sirius was already passing the fuzzy pink monstrosity over his shoulders and he’d forgotten to double-up on jumpers.

“Sirius,” Kimmy said suddenly, her bubbly-tone replaced with that of disappointment; “I thought we talked about this?”

Remus glanced over to see Kimmy staring at Sirius’ painted nails.

“It’s black though,” Sirius reasoned, examining his fingers.

“It’s still nail polish—not very manly.”

“So what, you’re not going to hold my hand if my nails have a bit of colour on ‘em?”

Kimmy gave him a sour look but Sirius just leaned in and whispered something in her ear that made her smile and she finally took his hand. “Alright, as long as you take it off by tomorrow.”

Remus had to bite his tongue to keep from saying anything, and Sirius just shrugged indifferently. As Remus sipped his beer, waiting desperately for the buzz to set in and dull his irritated nerves, Sirius went around the circle of teens and rattled off their names like racehorses on a track.

“And that’s Stanford and Jaz, they’re together but Jaz was with David before. Now David’s casually seeing Kiki but Kiki’s also on-again, off-again with Anwar who dated Erica before that but is now basically with Stacy. And then that there's Yvonne and she's sitting next to Monica and Luke—they're step-siblings—and next to them is Keith who dated—"

"Let me guess, Kimmy?"

"Yeah!"

"We're all very comfortable with one another," Kimmy said, leaning in again and sliding one hand up Sirius' thigh. From an objective point, Remus knew she was pretty, but even her current friendliness made him want to tear his hair out.

"So have you dated David, Kiki, and Anwar too, Kim?" He asked.

"Oh don't be silly, David's like my brother."

Remus downed the rest of his beer.

Watching Kimmy's friends play around the fire was a lot like how it felt to see politicians and bureaucrats play nice at Lyall's dinner parties. Remus had never really been to very many of them beyond the few his father made him squeeze into an uncomfortable monkey-suit for, but he'd spied on more than one of the galas held at the Lupin Estate. He'd been younger then, but he could still remember how the officials would weave their way through the crowds, and stopping to talk to people less important than they were but never daring to interrupt a conversation of someone above their station. The upper class had never really changed that way, and it occurred to him as he watched the kids interact, that they were those same future elites. One day they would be feigning laughter with an American congressman or some heir to a booming investment firm, rather than just pretending to ignore one another over a fire.

It made Remus miss Audrey with her unsolicited socio-economical commentary, and Renata and Deacon with their almost grandparent-like way of asking how your day was. They could always find something to be glad about. He wished Cass were there with his guitar —he'd have been a 'beginner' on it for three years now. He craved the floaty, nonsensical feeling of Alice's drugs and most of all, he wished Simeon were there to call everyone on their bullshit. At least Sirius would've listened to him.

"Moony," Sirius said, nudging him with a half-smoked spliff. Remus took it and nearly brought it to his lips before passing it onto the kid on the log next to them. Stanford or Stanley or something.

“You okay?” Sirius asked, eyeing him. “You don’t seem like you’re having much fun.”

Because Kimmy had moved away to join Keith and another girl on the other side of the fire, Remus answered honestly. “I’m not.”

“Why? Are you cold?”

“Yes, but it’s not that.”

“Then what is it?”

He sighed. “They’re like a commune.”

“I know right?” Sirius beamed. “Isn’t it great?”

“No, it’s not great. They aren’t actually about ‘peace and love’, they’re just glorifying everything. You really think Kimmy with her thousand pound-sterling, mink-lined coat would be caught dead sharing beans and alfalfa in some dingy co-op with a bunch of hippies? All this is, is some weird incestuous friend group who doesn’t actually like being friends with one another.”

“It’s not incestuous.”

“Are you sure about that? Because those step-siblings are sitting mighty close to one another.”

Sirius scoffed. “You think you can see through everyone, don’t you?”

“I see enough. Are you really going to stop wearing things like nail polish just because Kimmy says she doesn’t like it?”

“She doesn’t mean anything by it, she’s just got a strict family. They wouldn’t think it’s proper for a bloke to show up with nancy nails and all that.”

“When were you planning on meeting her bloody family?”

“I wasn’t!”

“Then I don’t get it.”

“Well, that’s a first.” Sirius opened another beer. It was his third or fourth. Remus tried hard to rein-in his temper.

“I don’t mean to insult your new friends. I’m just happy with ours.”

“I am too, nothing could replace you guys. It’s just… nothing wrong with branching out a bit right? Unless you… have something else to say about it?”

Remus drew back. “Like what?”

Sirius gave him a long look. “Nevermind, I was just kidding. Go on then, how is it these guys are any different from us?”

“Well for one thing we don’t all sleep with each other.”

“We could.” Sirius wiggled his eyebrows.

“Don’t be gross. At least we all actually like each other.”

“Fine, so we like each other. Anything else?”

“I just don’t get how this couldn’t bother you. Look at your girlfriend —” Remus threw out a hand before remembering other people were around. Setting his jaw, he lowered his voice; “She’s practically sitting in her ex-boyfriend’s lap, doesn’t that bother you?”

“No, why should it? I dated Mary and we’re still friends.”

“Oh, right. Glad to know that a three-week relationship didn’t totally decimate your friendship.” Remus sighed. “I just don’t want you to be upset if this doesn’t turn out how you want.”

“Aw, are you worried for me?”

“Don’t make me drown you in the lake.”

Sirius smiled, setting his head on Remus’ shoulder playfully. “Don’t worry, Moons, nothing can break my heart.”

Remus wanted to push him away, but he found he was frozen in place. Chalking it up to the cold, he kept still until finally Sirius pulled away and untucked himself from the blanket. “Be right back,” he said, “gotta wiz.”

Watching him go, Remus picked up Sirius’ fresh beer and took a swig for himself. “Tosser,” he grumbled, as Kimmy picked up the edge of the blanket and sat down in Sirius’ spot herself.

“Uh—sorry Kim, Sirius just went to the toilet.”

“That’s okay,” she said, snuggling into his side, “I don’t mind waiting.”

Remus tried to ease away, but Kimmy just slid closer, a dozy smile on her face. “I wanted to say I wasn’t actually disappointed when he brought you along,” she said.

“Oh yeah…?”

“It was just Yvonne. She has a thing for athletes.”

“James has a girlfriend anyway.”

“Mhm, Sirius told me, but Deedee’s good at getting what she wants. I still think she’s crazy though. Athletes are all wrong—learned that the hard way with Keith. We never saw eye-to-eye on things. He’s much too tame. Who you should want are the ones you really shouldn’t. The wild ones.”

On ‘shouldn’t’ a shiver ran up Remus’ spine.

“It’s why I go for the artists,” Kimmy said. “Sirius said you play music with him.”

“Sometimes.”

“Bass, right?”

“Yeah…”

“Well, I think that’s very hot.”

The gall of a woman with a drink in her hand.

“I think I’m gonna go have a smoke,” Remus said, attempting to untangle himself from the blanket.

“Oh no, have it here. In fact, have one of mine.”

Kimmy produced a box of menthol cigarettes and pulled one free, offering it to him between two fingers. “I got them from in town. They taste great compared to those ugly rolled ones Sirius is always smoking.”

“No, I think I’m okay.”

“Oh c’mon, here.” She took the non-filter end between her teeth and cheekily tried to pass it to him that way, but when he didn’t take it, she just plucked it from her lips and turned it around, lighting and blowing smoke up into the night air. The minty smell hit Remus’ eyes and made them twinge, but Kimmy didn't seem to notice.

Across the fire, the wireless continued to play, this song more unwelcome than the last;

' —at a church,
Were people saying, My God, that's tough;
She stood him up,
No point in us remaining;
We may as well go home,
As I did on my own;
Alone again, naturally…'

Remus was about to get up and ask Keith to flip the channel himself when Kimmy turned to him, lips pursed quizzically.

"Has Sirius talked about me much?" She asked.

It felt like a trick question. "Well yeah, of course."

"Oh good. That makes me happy to hear. What sort of things has he said?"

"Kim, I don't think I should—"

"I don't care if it was dirty, in fact that might be more fun. At least in regards to what I wanted to ask you."

"Ask me?"

She turned to him suddenly and got even closer, holding the burning menthol between them. "Look, I'm no slag, but I thought it might be fun if the three of us… you know."

"Hooked up?" The words came out before he could stop them, and instant regret surged as Kimmy's face lit up.

"Yeah. I was talking to Sirius about it and neither of us have ever—"

"You talked to Sirius about this?"

"No," Kimmy said fondly, setting her hand on his thigh and stroking it gently, "but I'm sure he wouldn't mind."

"Actually I think he would."

"Why? Was he lying when he said he'd never done it before?"

Remus' face felt hot. "No, I just—maybe I mind!"

"Oh, don't worry about that." Kimmy laughed and pinched his thigh lightly, making Remus straighten up on the log. "It'll be fun," she told him in an alluring voice, before moving her hand up and taking his. She raised it toward herself—toward her chest.

"No," Remus chirped, pulling his hand back sharply. It knocked the cigarette from Kimmy's hand and she stared down at it sorely before snapping her face back to his as he stood up. "I don't think this is a good idea," he said.

"Remus, sit down back down," Kimmy hissed, "the others are looking."

"Oh I forgot, you only like people watching when you want them to, right?"

A nerve jumped in her jaw. "Sit down and I'll forget you said that."

It felt like an ultimatum, and instantly Remus was that same hoodlum kid again, who was always running away from school to chase his friends around dodgy alleys and throw beer bottles at cars. Posh public school prats like Kimmy didn't know what it was to really be intimidating.

"No," he snarled viciously. "In fact, I was right. I'm not interested. You're like a leech hanging on to my best friend. Someday someone's gonna burn you off."

Kimmy's mouth dropped open in disbelief but Remus held his ground. "You can tell Sirius that I went back to our room," he growled. "Oh and by the way, your menthols smell cheap."

Turning, he marched away from the circle of kids, almost trembling to his very core and not because of the cold. Kimmy had more than surprised him, but it wasn't the idea of sleeping with her that had thrown him. It was the fact that she might've brought it up to Sirius first.

"Fuck," Remus hissed, hugging himself as the sound of Keith's radio fell away.

'And when she passed away,
I cried and cried all day;
Alone again, naturally,

Alone again, naturally…'

Chapter End Notes

The two songs that were playing around the fire were "Under the Moon of Love" by Showaddywaddy (1976) and "Alone Again" by Gilbert O'Sullivan (1972).

Chapter 39: November (Part 2)

Chapter Summary

Remus wonders what it is that's missing.

Chapter Notes

CW: Remus has a bit of a melt-down here. Just in case that's triggering for anyone <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I'm singing this note 'cause it fits in well,
With the chords I'm playing;
I can't pretend there's any meaning here,
Or in the things I'm saying;
But I'm in tune,
Right in tune;
I'm in tune,
And I'm gonna tune,
Right in on you…

- "Getting in Tune" The Who, 1971

Remus could not, under any circumstances, ever look Sirius in the eye again.

And that pissed him off, because it wasn't even his fault!

Sirius had demanded to know of course, what it was that had made him flee so quickly from the bonfire. Apparently Kimmy had done just as he'd asked and told Sirius that he'd gone back to his room, but the aloof attitude with which she'd spent the rest of the night in had been more than cause for alarm.

"I just started feeling bad," Remus said the next morning, trying to rush into the toilet while Sirius got in his way.

"Did Kimmy say something to you?"

"God, no! Can I just piss, please?"

“Sorry, Lupin!” Peter said, slipping into the bathroom behind Sirius.

Remus swerved around Sirius in anger and pounded a fist on the door. “Ugh—Pete, get your sorry arse out here now!”

“You’ve been moodier than a girl on the blob—if you want me to break up with her just say so!” Sirius said from behind him.

“I don’t care what you do, Sirius! Just leave me out of it!”

“Fine!”

“Fine!”

“Smashing,” James declared, walking into the room with four cups of tea. “Now can you two numpties stop yelling? It’s seven in the morning.”

They didn’t exactly make up after that, but there wasn’t any need to. Remus had already resolved for perhaps the millionth time to put Sirius and Kimmy as far from his mind as possible, and now that they were both suitably pissed off at him, it was easier. While Sirius threw himself into his relationship, Remus threw himself into the books, spending every moment he could out of their dorm and in the library. He still missed practising with Sirius, and his music marks were suffering slightly as a result, but he couldn’t bring himself to ask him. Every time Sirius so much as glanced at him he assumed that that was it; that he knew what Kimmy had asked him and they’d finally have to talk about it, and Remus couldn't have that.

But he did want to talk about it—just not with Sirius. But who could he go to? Peter and Lottie couldn’t keep a secret to save their lives, and Mary would’ve been just as unable to keep something so juicy to herself. Lily wouldn’t tell anyone—except for maybe James, and James knowing felt about as world-ending as Sirius knowing. It left Marlene, who could certainly be trusted but he didn’t want her judgement either.

It was all such a mess.

Then it hit him; Tomny and Tonya.

Of course! They knew him, they’d believe him when he said he wanted nothing to do with the girl—that she’d come on to him.

When he finally got the nerve to phone the flat, only Tonya was around. It was almost a relief actually, not to have to explain to Tomny why he was so pissed over another bloke's girlfriend. He wasn't mad because Sirius had a girlfriend, he was mad because that girlfriend was Kimmy. At least, that's what he hoped.

"She sounds like a right bitch," Tonya said.

"God, yes. Finally someone gets it."

"So what are you gonna do?"

"Huh?"

"You turned down her offer. Would you have accepted it if your friend had been the one to ask?"

"N-no! I—I don't have any interest in other guys' girlfriends."

"Oh, I know," Tonya laughed, "couldn't get you to make a real move on me if I tried."

"Not funny, Ton."

"It's a little funny."

Remus sighed into the phone. "I don't know what I'm gonna do. I'm tired of fighting with him."

"Then maybe you should be honest, tell him you think his girlfriend's a miserable cow."

"Can you do it for me?"

"Yes."

"… That was a rhetorical question, but thanks anyway."

"Always here to help, love."

Talking with Tonya had made him feel better, but it did little in the long run. Remus still couldn't bring himself to admit that what he needed wasn't more distractions, but an honest answer.

That he still did not have.

The fact of the matter was that Sirius Black was a rare enigma he didn't know what to do with, and that meant less time spent at his side, and more time spent at the library.

“Hey Scarface,” Barty hollered down the library’s centre aisle, “take any more naked trips to the lake? How's those pale cheeks of yours?” Before he could so much as begin to laugh though, Ms. Pince appeared and hauled him out by the ear.

“Didn’t think Barty even knew this school had a library,” Remus grumbled, grinding his pencil down to the nub in the middle of his notebook.

“I don’t know why you don’t just tell people it never happened,” Lily said, innocently flipping through her history text.

“Because it did—or were you suddenly not there?”

“Oh I was there alright. And you do have pale cheeks, you know.”

“That’s a blatant lie—you never saw them!”

She looked away with a smug expression but neither confirmed nor denied. At least being with Lily was easy. She never brought up Kimmy and any griping about James usually came about because it was impossible to grip with him. Lily had said more than once that if their relationship failed it would be because James was too nice to point out when she was being an absolute nutcase.

Clearing her throat, Lily flipped a flash card, quizzing him to pass the time. “On what Mediterranean island was Napoleon Bonaparte born?”

What ever happened to the #1 pencil? Remus wondered, zoning out.

“Remus?"

“Huh? Oh… longitude?”

“We’re studying history.”

“What,” he paused to yawn, “they didn’t use longitude in the old days?”

With a sigh, Lily finally set the flashcards down and glanced at the wall clock. “Where is she? We agreed to meet at four-thirty.”

“Maybe you scared her off by suggesting we do the project on the 'decline of feudalism during the French Revolution'.”

“I'm trying to be nice,” she huffed impatiently, “but between this and prefect stuff, I’m about ready to snap.”

“Does this mean Snape’s still ditching you to be Slughorn’s hound?”

Lily nodded grimly. “Yesterday was the fourth time this month that he’s left me alone to prefect work with Chastity. Figures I would get grouped with her in class too.”

“Does he know about you and James yet?”

“No! God, I don’t even want to know how he’d react. They hate each other.”

“For good reason.”

“You’re not going to say anything are you?”

Remus shook his head adamantly. He didn’t need to go around spilling other people’s secrets, he had enough of his own. “No, never. You and James already made all of us promise to keep it hush.” A thought suddenly occurred to him, and he squinted at her. “Wait, don’t tell me this is all because of Snape?”

“I just don’t want there to be any arguments,” Lily reasoned.

“But you’re dating! How does James feel about all of this?”

“He’s fine with it.”

“Really?”

“Yes, ask him yourself if you don’t believe me.”

Remus sat back in his chair. It wasn’t hard to believe that James wouldn't do just about anything to make Lily happy, but resisting rubbing his successful relationship in Snape’s face every time they crossed paths? That was a feat.

“Remus,” Lily started again, drawing his gaze, “is there something else you’d rather be doing? Because you’ve spent half the morning daydreaming and the other half making it snow inside.”

She was right of course. Since they arrived he’d successfully shredded the first several pages of his study guide into tiny pieces. “No, sorry,” he mumbled, scooping the scraps into a pile with his palms.

“Are you feeling okay? You look really tired.”

“Well it is a Saturday morning, Lils.”

“So you’re tired because it’s early, not because you barely slept last night?”

Remus just grunted in response and Lily frowned.

“Have you gone to see Ms. Pomfrey? She might be able to give you something that’ll help.”

“The nurse can’t do anything. I’m not a restless baby you can give opium to, Lily.”

“And she’s not going to give you opium, Remus, but maybe she’s got a tea or something.”

“Blimey, you’re right, how could I have never thought of chamomile before?”

Lily scowled, unimpressed, and closed her history text. “Will you tell me why it’s so bad then? Why you can’t sleep?”

To avoid her gaze, Remus began patting at his mountain of paper bits. “No reason. Always been a shit sleeper.”

“So it’s chronic?”

“Guess so.”

“Insomnia’s supposed to be triggered by stress, you know.”

“Is it really? Fascinating.”

She threw a flashcard at him.

“Sorry,” he said over a light laugh, “it’s nothing.”

“It can’t be nothing,” she pressed. “Is it exams that have you so distressed? Because you know those aren’t for a few weeks.”

“I’m not distressed.”

“And you’re going to pass all of them with flying colours so—”

“Lily, it’s not exams!”

“Okay…” Lily bit her lip. “Is it something else then? Like maybe… someone else?”

“Oh my god,” Remus moaned, pressing his fingers into his eye sockets, instantly mortified that she had somehow been able to read his mind. “Please stop.”

“I know, I know. But Peter’s got Moira and Lottie’s with Mickey and Mary just started seeing that Bryan guy from the year above—”

“I thought his name was Ken?”

“Different guy—but I know we’ve been busy and Sirius has been spending a lot of time with other people, so I figured if you’re feeling a little neglected—”

“I have you and James.”

Lily raised her eyebrows pointedly. “Not that I’m not flattered, Remus —truly—but… my point? Me and James?”

“Oh…”

“It’s not like I want you to feel as though you can’t—”

“No, I get it,” Remus said, raising a hand to stop her.

“Yes, well,” Lily cleared her throat a bit, “I’ve been thinking…”

“Shocker.”

“Oh so snide—I meant I’ve been thinking about you. You and… other people…”

That got his attention. “What are you on about now, Evans?”

“Nothing! Just that Marlene really clung to you on Halloween, so I thought that maybe…”

“Here’s the pot calling the kettle black if I’ve ever seen it! What about you and Potter? You were hugging and kissing and—”

“We did not kiss!”

“Only because you were too busy trying not to knock his head off.”

“Yours too, actually. And you both would’ve deserved it.”

Remus smirked. “Bet you liked tricking him out of his clothes on Sirius’ birthday.”

“Oh shut it, you.”

Remus sat back, satisfied. But he couldn’t deny the odd feeling that came over him when Lily brought up Marlene. They were friends, right?

“I swear to god…” Lily sighed, looking to the clock again. “She must think this all some joke. If our marks suffer because we had to drag her along—”

“Well I think we should consider ourselves lucky. Sirius and Lottie got stuck with Snape.”

“Or Sev got stuck with Sirius.”

Remus groaned. “How much does that git pay you to buy such loyalty?”

Lily stuck her tongue out at him and he reached over to poke the back of her hand with his pen in retaliation. She gasped before doing the same to him, leaving a mark on his wrist and igniting a pen-war that only ended when Chastity Bell finally dropped her book bag down onto the table across from them.

“Hi-ya,” Chastity said coolly, pulling her long brown hair over her shoulder. She raised an eyebrow when she noticed the ink, now decorating them up to their elbows.

“Hi, Chastity,” Lily said, straightening up and reaching for her books. “Glad you could make it. I don’t know if you got the chance to look over my notes but we—”

“Look I don’t mean to be rude or anything, but is there any way we can make this quick?” Chastity started, untucking her chair from the table and sitting down. “I’ve just got some things to do today.”

Lily gave a vinegary smile. “Yeah, that’s fine. How about we go over the project’s rubric to assign roles, that way we can do them separately.”

“Sounds perfect.”

Stiffly, Lily set about organising her notes as Remus stretched and draped one arm over the back of his chair. Chastity hadn't bothered to unpack any of her things, and instead was simply staring at him like he was a puzzle she'd yet to work out. It made him slightly nervous and he licked his lips, keeping his eyes focused on Lily's papers as well.

"There, that one," Remus said, pointing at the rubric. Lily slid it out of her paper stack and tapped them straight again before clearing her throat.

"Right, so, I figured—"

"You're from London, Remus, yeah?" Chastity interrupted.

"Er, yeah."

"What part?"

"Greenwich," he answered, suddenly aware of how moist his palms had become. Some girls just did that to you—it had been the same way with Tonya until he'd gotten to know her better. Kimmy, thankfully, did not have the same effect.

"Oh really?" Chastity began twirling a lock of hair around her finger. "Someone told me it was Chelsea. I'm from Kensington. Where'd you go to school?"

"Just some boys' school."

"Well why'd you switch to Hawkings? It's terribly dreary up here. Not that we don't appreciate having you, of course." Chastity propped her chin on her hand and batted her eyelashes.

"Doesn't rain anymore than it does in London," he murmured.

"Was it because of the school's reputation then?"

"Not exactly."

"I bet it must've been terribly lonely at an all boys school."

"Er…" Remus glanced to his right where Lily was sitting and quietly fuming under the guise of a tight-lipped smile. "Chastity, I really don't think—"

"Oh, call me Chas. Everyone does." Chastity smiled broadly and leaned in a bit. "Say, would you be willing to tell me how you got—"

She tapped her nose over the spot where Remus had his scar. Before he could react, Lily reached across the table to slap the project rubric down in front of her along with a list of books.

"Chas," she said sweetly, "would you mind asking Ms. Pince which of these books are available? I know they'll be useful for the project."

Chastity picked up the list with two fingers as though Lily had just handed her a dead rat. "We'll need all of these?"

"Don't worry, if you can check them out for us, Remus and I will compile whichever ones seem most useful for your half of the work."

"So you want me to—"

"If you mind terribly, Remus can always go look and you and I can stay here and start sorting through Professor Binns' extended reading list."

Chastity's eyes became narrow like a cat's, but rather than begin hissing, she proudly got up from her seat and began stalking toward the librarian's desk, her school skirt swishing behind her and the reading list clutched tightly in her fist.

"I thought you already checked out the books we needed," Remus said, nudging Lily's elbow with his own.

"I did. I just needed her to go away. I can't believe what she said to you."

Remus looked up again, watching Chastity at the librarian's desk. She caught him staring and waved and he swallowed thickly. "She isn't any worse than Kimmy. In fact I'd rather Black date her. At least she didn't ask anything anybody else hasn't already wondered."

"Ugh, boys," Lily scoffed, scribbling in her day-timer. "You just think she's hot."

"I do not!"

"No?"

"No!"

Lily just smirked, making Remus roll his eyes. "Want to work on this Tuesday night after English?" He asked, attempting to change the subject. "We don't need to invite Chastity."

“Can’t, I have a Slug Club meeting.”

“Oh. You’re still in that? Sirius never goes.”

“Mhm. Black only comes to about every second or third meeting, but Professor Slughorn still thinks he’s some unfulfilled genius and won’t bother kicking him out. Potter goes, though. How about tomorrow?”

“No, sorry, I told Marlene I’d help her with something.”

“With what?”

“Dunno, I only half heard her when she was running to class this morning. More homework, I guess. ”

Lily clicked her tongue and gave a sly smile. “You guess?”

“Yeah, I mean what else?”

“Oh, nothing.”

Remus narrowed his eyes. “What are you smirking at?”

“Come on, Remus. I know you’re not that thick—Marlene?”

“What about her?”

Lily dropped her head back and gave a great groan. “Fine, what… colour would you say her hair is?”

“… Is this a trick question?”

“No, you dimbo! What colour?!”

“Blonde...?"

Lily held out her hands as though she were presenting him with an idea. “I think it’s more like this beautiful golden colour. Like daisies or sunshine. See, now it’s your turn. You read, try for something more romantic than just ‘blonde’.”

Remus looked around like an explanation for his friend’s sudden insanity would appear out of thin air. “What does romance have to do with a hair colour?”

“Now you’re asking me the trick question!”

He snorted and Lily smiled back at him wistfully. A moment passed, then she asked; “Have you ever been on a date, Remus?”

He blinked. “What? No.”

“Would you like to—if we weren’t at school?”

Remus looked up briefly, eyeing Chastity, before pushing the thought away and giving a short chuckle. “Wow, Evans, I’m almost inclined to accept your proposal if I didn’t worry about James sucker-punching me for it.”

“Actually I think you’re about the only one he wouldn’t sucker punch,” Lily replied gleefully, “but nice try. You know I meant Marlene.”

“Well that’s all right and good, but I’m not dating Marlene.”

“But would you?”

“If we weren’t at school?”

“No—anywhere. Like right now?”

“You’re trying to set us up, aren’t you?”

“And apparently I’m failing miserably at it, since both of you are about as observant as Professor Binns.”

Remus balked. “You mean you’ve talked to Marlene about this?”

Lily just looked at him. “Duh.”

“And what did she say?”

“I’m not going to tell you unless you’re interested.”

“So that means she’s interested?”

Lily rolled her eyes and flipped open her textbook, letting Remus slump back into a bout of thoughtful silence. Marlene was a good friend, but a girlfriend? That was news. Marlene was pretty enough of course, and her taste in music wasn’t all that bad—almost pleasant if you took away the amount of church hymns she had committed to memory.

He thought of his friends, Peter who’d been in what could only be considered a long-term relationship in teenage years, and James who'd been pining after the same girl for most of his waking memory. Sirius was nowhere close to their level, but seemed to have enough fun on his own if his and James' late-night conversations were anything to go by. And of course there was Tomny and Tonya, who both seemed to exist in the same way that the ocean met the shore, separate but moving together as though one couldn't exist without the other. They were all happy in their own way and he'd never felt jealous over it until recently. Perhaps getting a girlfriend would mean he could finally start worrying about his own relationship status and not Sirius'.

As Lily continued writing and rewriting her study notes, Remus bit his lip, strumming his fingers on the table as though he were playing his bass. It was the first few chords to "You're My Best Friend".

He sighed, pausing his fingers. "Marlene likes the Bee Gees right?"

Lily looked up and beamed at him just as Chastity returned to the table in a huff, slapping the book list back down on its surface.

"This is the suggested reading list for psychology."

"Ooh, sorry Chas," Lily frowned, "my mistake."

* * *

Later that night…

Remus winced as he hit the wrong cord and his flow was instantly obliterated, ruining his run-through of "In the Hall of the Mountain King". He might've felt less disappointed, had Sheila not been sitting right in front of him on the piano bench. Asking his teacher for a bit of extra help practising had seemed like a good idea before, but now he was just embarrassed.

"You're going for speed, but what we really want is accuracy," Sheila told him. "Try keeping your hand locked on those four frets that way you can use your third finger rather than tripping over everything with your first and second."

He nodded and tried again. This time the flourish sounded better, but he still messed up the rests.

“Here.” Sheila turned back to the piano and played each note staccato so he could hear them clearly. “You hear that?” She teased, hitting a high G several times; ding-ding-ding-ding! “That’s where you rest and begin the reprise.”

Taking a deep breath, Remus tried once more, but again he hit the wrong cord and immediately froze. “Shit. I sound terrible.”

Sheila turned around on the piano bench, her hands folded neatly in her lap. “Remus, you sound wonderful.”

“But I still can’t get it,” he huffed.

“You’re learning. It’s alright to make mistakes. Rome wasn’t built in a day.”

“And yet Sirius gets to be born a Mozart.”

Sheila smiled like she knew exactly what was going on, and he immediately regretted the snide remark.

“I’ve noticed you and Sirius have been sitting apart these last few weeks,” she said, casually smoothing out her skirt. “Do you want to talk about it?” Remus went to open his mouth but she cut him off; “Let me guess—no.”

He scowled at her and looked down at the Fender stubbornly.

“Well,” Sheila started, “I may be your teacher, but I’m certainly not a counsellor. I can’t tell you what you should or shouldn’t do to magically solve all your problems, but I can assure you that taking it out on that bass guitar isn’t going to make you feel any better.”

Remus plucked a harsh fret pointedly. “I disagree.”

Sheila laughed at him and turned back to the piano. “That’s right, not a counsellor, just a music teacher,” she said, loudly, as though she were talking to the room itself. “I wonder though, if I were to play really loudly, you wouldn’t be able to hear much, would you? Not even if someone were to shout out all of their problems. They wouldn’t even have to be talking to me, they could just be saying words. Like, how they’re feeling or how they wish they were feeling. Hmm, I wonder.”

Without letting him object, Sheila immediately started up a piece with a brisk tempo, starting as vivace and quickly transforming into vivacissimo. As promised, she played each note with such fervent vigour that the piano drowned out even the incessant noise of the room's radiator as it blared down at them from the ceiling.

"Nope!" She hollered. "Can't hear a thing! Anyone could be saying anything and no one would know!"

This is stupid, Remus thought. She's insane.

"Did you say something, Remus?" Sheila called.

"N—"

"Sorry, can't hear you!"

He growled in the back of his throat. "This is stupid!"

Sheila kept on, her back to him and swaying with every excited note.

"I said it's STUPID!" He yelled again, with no reaction. "It's stupid and I want to smack him!"

Remus had blurted the words out so suddenly that it surprised him, but their meaning was instantly lost in the noise of Sheila's music anyway, leaving him stunned and almost overwhelmed.

"I want to tell him he's being an idiot and hear it when he says the same thing to me!" He picked up, clutching tightly to the neck of his bass while Sheila practically danced to the rhythm of the piece. "I want to stop being jealous of everything! But what isn't there to be jealous about?! He's talented and popular and good-looking and—and people like him better and I do too so I don't understand what the PROBLEM IS!"

"That's it, Remus!"

He could've choked on the music. It was diving down his throat and pulling out his words as though it could throw them to the wind. If he were in a movie, he'd be whipping around in a tornado, waiting to be dropped in the Land of Oz to squish his own Wicked Witch.

"I want to understand but it's impossible," he wailed. "I want to be there and not there at the same time and I want him to just understand without me saying it! I want to be here and I want to be home and I want to pass my exams but I also want to be able to say 'FUCK IT' like I used to! I want to play guitar with James and watch stupid movies with Peter and read wonderful books with Lily and listen to amazing music with him! I want to throw bottles at walls with Lee and wrestle with Doss and see Flaky again but I can't! And I want to be with Tomny! I want to see Tonya—I want to do all of it right NOW! And I'm so tired of caring—I just don't want to care anymore but I do! AND THAT MAKES ME TIRED!"

As he finished his breathless rant, Sheila's song slowly came to a filtered end, dropping in tempo and volume until she was just tapping her fingers against the keys.

Any way the wind blows…

"I'm very proud of you, Remus," Sheila said, slowly turning around on the piano bench as he heaved in his chair. Remus sniffed, wiping his face, but her eyes were kind. Without judgement. It nearly killed him.

"But remember," she told him; "you're only sixteen, dear. It's okay to be upset, to be unsure. And it's certainly okay to be tired."

Remus bit down hard on his bottom lip to keep it from trembling. Maybe that was just it. Maybe he needed someone to say it was okay.

Something across the room drew Sheila's attention and she turned toward it with a brighter smile on her face. "You're late for your detention, Mr. Black."

Remus shot upright in his chair and spun around to find Sirius standing there, arms pressed up behind his head awkwardly.

"I didn't want to interrupt your song," Sirius murmured, not meeting either of their gazes.

Sheila popped up from the piano bench and began smoothing out her skirts, completely nonchalant. "Well, I was going to make us some tea before I set you to work, but I'm afraid I just ran out of sugar this morning. I've been meaning to make a run to the faculty office to pick some up, but I haven't had the time. Perhaps I'll go now. Provided you can promise you'll still be here when I return?"

Sirius nodded slowly and Sheila let her eyes pass over him to Remus. "Alright then," she hummed. "I'll be right back. Just in case anyone needs anything."

She left the room in the same brisk manner with which she played, stopping only to put a comforting hand on Sirius' shoulder. Remus tried not to pay attention, wiping his reddened cheeks as he turned back to the Fender and attempted to recall what Sheila had said about his fretting. Impossible.

“How do you do it?” Sirius asked, crossing the room and taking a spot back up on the piano bench. He didn’t so much as glance at the piano, just clasped his slender hands in his lap.

“Don’t ask vague questions, they only waste time,” Remus mumbled.

“But it’s like our thing. I ask ‘how do you do it’ and you say ‘do what’ and I say ‘make everyone like you’.”

“Not everyone likes me.”

“I like you.”

“Stop that.”

“See, it is our thing—stop what?”

“Stop throwing words around! You’re like a walking sudoku puzzle.”

“That’s funny, except sudoku uses numbers,” Sirius snorted. “D’you mean words like ‘I like you’ then? ‘Cause I’m not throwing it around, I do like you.”

“Fine. Do you also like Kimmy?”

“Well I should, shouldn’t I? She’s my girlfriend, and she says she likes me.”

Remus bit down hard on his bottom lip. “Is that why you date her then? Because she says she likes you?”

“You say that like it’s odd or something.”

“Well, maybe I’m just odd.”

Sirius raised his chin. “Alright, so you’re odd. Would it be so bad if I were odd too? I wouldn’t like you if you weren’t.”

“You always know just what to say,” Remus said with sarcasm.

“I know, it’s a gift.” Smiling, Sirius spun around on the bench and faced the piano. He just stared down at it as though it were stone rather than a tool for excellence. “You’re odd, Lupin… sort of like a cuckoo clock."

"… What?"

"You are! You exist in this sort of shell that only ever venture out of at certain times of the day. And when you do, no one ever ignores you. You make yourself heard, but then you're quick to snap yourself back up again. You're consistent at least, I'll give you that. But you know, every time you pop up, I sort of get this little thrill, like 'oh there he is again'—there's that Moony! God, he sure is surprising!"

"You're insane," Remus mumbled, pressing his chin to his shoulder out of embarrassment.

"Insane, odd—they're all just synonyms for one another. As far as I'm concerned, that makes us the same." He looked at him. "And I want to be the same. I do."

Remus licked his lips. I wish I could make you understand.

"Sirius… did you hear what I was saying when… when Sheila was playing the piano?"

"No. Would it have been better or worse if I did?"

"I don't know." He took a deep breath. "But I don't want to fight anymore."

Sirius' shoulders sagged with relief. "Me neither. Does this mean… that you're not mad anymore?"

"No—or yeah, I'm not mad. Lily—she… she gave me some stuff to think about."

"Oh…" Sirius looked down at his hands. "That's good then."

"Yeah, so… friends again?"

With a tight smile, Sirius nodded. "Always."

It felt like a weight had been lifted off Remus' shoulders. He still wasn't sure what it was about Sirius that cut him so deeply, but if he could at least learn to not be so jealous then just maybe things would go back to the way they were.

"Do you want to practice something?" He asked, making Sirius nod enthusiastically.

“I thought you’d never ask! My god, you should hear James, he’s brilliant! Might be a prodigy himself! C’mon, I left my guitar back at the dorm.”

As Sirius bounded away from the piano and to the door, Remus began to scramble to pack up his things. “I thought you had detention? Sheila told you to be here when she got back,” he said, setting the Fender back into its case and shoving his music sheets back into his bag.

“Eh,” Sirius shrugged, “I’ll give her an I-owe-you or bribe Evans to make her a batch of cookies or something.”

Remus sighed happily as he came to join Sirius by the door. “You think the world bends to you.”

“Au contraire, Lupin, I make the world bend to me. It’s an exhausting task really, perhaps you should try it sometime—give me a break.”

“I’ll get right on that.”

Sirius bounced up and down in place in excitement. “Can’t wait to see it.”

He turned to lead them away, but Remus reached out and grabbed his wrist at the last second, making his own heart jump in surprise.

“Sirius,” he tried as the dark-haired boy whipped back around to look at him; “Are we… Are we missing each other? Like… messing something up? I just feel like maybe something’s been… lost.”

Sirius laughed gently. “How can you have lost me? I’m right here.”

Oh.

Nodding, Remus dropped his arm. “You’re right. I was being odd again. Sorry.”

“S’okay. Now c’mon, let’s go make James and Pete be odd with us.”

“Okay.”

Together they shot out of the Bellchant building, narrowly avoiding Sheila as she made her way back up the street. Remus tried hard to reassure himself; Sirius had said they weren’t missing, so that must’ve meant they were whole.

He wanted to trust him in that, at least.

Chapter End Notes

A 'girl on the blob’ is a girl on her period.
'Vivace' is the musical direction for a fast-paced piece and 'vivacissimo' is just faster than that.

We go through a lot of emotions in this fic, don't we?

Chapter 40: Marlene

Chapter Summary

Remus gets to see a new side of Marlene. Revenge is plotted.

Chapter Notes

CW: Smoking, pining, and organised sports (though that might only be a trigger for Remus, lol)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Sunshine, lollipops and rainbows,
Everything that's wonderful is what I feel when we're together;
Brighter than a lucky penny,
When you're near the rain goes, disappears, dear;
And I feel so fine,
Just to know that you are mine!

- "Sunshine, Lollipops and Rainbows" Lesley Gore, 1963

Wednesday 1st December 1976

With the spat with Sirius behind him, Remus could finally move forward. There was still Kimmy to contend with of course, but it was at least clear now thanks to her general disdain for him that she'd told Sirius nothing of her proposition. Remus didn't mind, let her pride save him from further embarrassment. He was just happy to have his friend back, even if it came with a few unsavoury conditions.

On Wednesdays the ninth years had free-rein of the library for study hour, and so Remus met his friends in one of the large private study halls in the Flamel Block. He'd expected they'd all sit and study together as usual, but apparently Lily had other plans. A cheeky smile on her face, she'd secluded him and Marlene at their own table and made it clear to everyone else that he was 'helping' Marlene with homework and they 'were not to be disturbed'.

"She's just being silly," Marlene said, "we're only studying—we always do it together."

"Mm."

“Did you hear her going on about how I asked for help with the English homework—what English homework? Professor Flitwick agreed not to assign anything while we read the next novel. She’s just having us on. I only asked for your help to—Remus, are you listening?”

“Mm?”

Marlene followed his gaze and rolled her eyes. “Really, do they have to be so public about it? We actually do have exams to prepare for.”

“ ‘If life’s a stage…’,” Remus murmured, before blinking as he forced himself to look away. Of course he agreed with Marlene; the one time Sirius shows up for private study and all he can do is sit back with Kimmy practically in his lap, their faces stuck together in the middle. Every time a teacher came by James reached over and thumped him in the shoulder, and the pair would separate long enough for the threat to pass before sniggering and returning to their revolting show of public affection.

But, as he was getting better at reminding himself, Sirius’ relationship wasn’t any of his business.

“Honestly, I’m a bit surprised they’ve made it this long,” Marlene went on. “I didn’t think Sirius was Kim’s type. He wears more makeup than she does.”

“He’s not wearing it anymore,” he said simply, reaching for his pen as it rolled away from him across the table.

“He’s not?”

Remus shook his head. It probably would’ve taken a world-ending event for him to admit it aloud, but he secretly missed zoning out on Sirius’ colourful nails as he strummed his Rickenbacker during class or practice. But it didn’t matter, they were talking again, even if Kimmy was now making it plain that she hated him. Not that that mattered—the feeling was mutual, but he was at least thankful that she was subtle about it. Dinner the night before had been one of the first meals they’d shared together since the bonfire, and after another failed project-meeting with Chastity, he and Lily had arrived together at the dining hall to find their table already crowded with friends. While Lily immediately began sharing her woes of Chastity with James, who already had a cup of tea prepared for her which he pushed across the table with a smile, Remus took a seat between her and Moira. It had been almost startling to see their table so full, but as he’d dug into dinner, Remus found he didn't mind all that much. In fact, he'd missed it.

"You should've seen Miss Pince's face when Remus returned the books and said he'd re-shelve them himself," Lily started over her chicken and rice.

"I know the cataloging system! Only because of detention…"

"But I've never even seen her smile. It was like you'd cast a spell on her or something."

"A regular casanova," James chuckled. "Next you'll have the teachers swooning for you, Lupin."

"He already does!" Sirius exclaimed, appearing behind Remus and throwing his arms around his shoulders in a great bear-hug. "Pretty sure Sheila's in love with the handsome prick."

"Get off," Remus moaned, and Sirius obeyed, turning to Moira and Peter.

"Oi guys, budge up a bit?" They did so and Sirius slid in next to him along with Kimmy.

"Thanks," she told Moira lightly, who nodded at the popular sixth former with slightly widened eyes.

"So what'd you decide to play?" Sirius asked, meaning their upcoming performance test in music. He leaned in a bit to hear over the dining hall's chatter, blocking Remus' view of Kimmy.

"Sheila suggested I adapt a cello étude to show off technique, but I think I'm just going to find something simpler."

"Not that that isn't terribly boring, but why would you want to do something simpler? You're so good, Moony."

"Easy for you to say," Remus shot tamely.

"Well I agree with Remus," Kimmy started, her voice tight and snooty. "I mean, you'll be there, Sirius, and who would want to play piano in front of Mozart? Honestly I'd be embarrassed."

Remus had bitterly thought that it was a stupid analogy—Sirius didn't even like playing the piano—but Sirius only smiled.

“You give me way too much credit, Kimmy,” he’d said, and then he kissed her and Remus turned to James sharply, interrupting his and Lily’s conversation. As he finished his dinner he felt Sirius’ thigh continuously brush his on the bench and grew even antsier. Being conscious of Sirius Black was a lot like realising your body needed to breathe to survive. Most of the time it was so automatic that there was no reason to question it, but then there were those dreadful moments of self-awareness that you found yourself overthinking—nervous and short of breath as you counted every inhale and exhale and longed to rewind time to thirty seconds before, when you were so blissfully ignorant to it all.

Inhale.

Exhale.

“Remus?”

Inhale.

Exhale.

“Remus are you listening?”

Inhale—

“Remus!”

He straightened up in his chair, fumbling his pen and sending it skittering across the table. “Yeah, I’m listening,” he murmured, fetching it from the floor as he came back to reality.

“Then what did I just say?” Marlene asked.

“You yelled at me for no reason.”

“Ha.” Shaking her head, Marlene went back to her books and Remus watched her. That was one of the things he liked best about Marlene, she never pestered for more. She took exactly what was given and accepted it as fact—there was no digging for extra evidence or emotions. She didn’t pry. It made her the perfect person to tell a secret to, really.

“Hey Marls, if I tell you something, you promise to keep it to yourself?”

Marlene’s head popped up. “Sure, unless you’re asking me to help you hide a body, which in that case I'll have to at least tell my therapist about it."

He smiled, before wincing uncomfortably. How did one say 'my best friend's girlfriend tried to come onto me'?

"Kimmy… sort of asked me to hook up."

Well, like that I guess.

Marlene's jaw dropped. "Oh my god, really? Holy crap, I-I mean—Jesus…"

"Halloween really changed you, didn't it?" Remus snorted.

"Shut up. I can take the Lord's name in vain sometimes too. And this, well this bloody deserves it. What did you even say?"

"I said no, obviously! I'm not that insane…"

"Okay, but like, she actually asked you to cheat on Sirius?"

"Well I think in this situation she'd be the cheater not me, but I get your point. And no, not exactly. She sort of suggested that we… all do it."

He didn't think Marlene's eyes could get any bigger. "Woah. I knew Kimmy was like that but damn, that's ruthless. What'd Sirius have to say?"

"I don't know!" He squirmed. "She said she hadn't brought it up to him yet, and I didn't exactly turn her down lightly, so… I doubt she'd ever admit it now."

"Well, that's good then. Problem solved."

"Just like that...?"

"You said no, right? And Sirius doesn't know so there's no weirdness there, unless you think there is…?"

Remus began tapping his pen against his notebook awkwardly. "No, I don't think so. We had a few spats but I think it's over with now."

"Then I guess the only thing left to do is wait for them to break up."

Marlene's startling nonchalance might've once made him want to crawl inside his own skin with worry, but as he glanced back across the study hall, he found himself more relaxed.

“You’re pretty good at this,” he told her. “But you still can’t tell anybody.”

Marlene smirked. “Give me your dessert at supper and my lips are sealed.”

“Ha, deal.”

Suddenly the low ding of the school bell chimed above their heads, signalling the end of study period. Marlene was out of her chair in an instant, bag swung over one shoulder. “I asked earlier if you brought your stuff with you for today—did you?”

Reaching down, she began to help him gather his books and things, as Remus blinked in confusion. “Er, what stuff?”

“It’s fine if you didn’t, we can just swing by your dorm and get it,” she said, checking her watch.

“Marlene, what stuff?”

“For football. You promised to help me with the team today.”

“I did what? WHEN?”

“The other day—I passed you in the hall and you said, ‘yeah sure’. I figured that meant yes.” Snapping her fingers, Marlene gestured for him to stand and practically pushed him into his winter coat, roughly shoving his knit cap on his head and dropping his bag over his arm. “C’mon,” she said as he dragged his hat up over his eyes, “we only get the pitch before dinner, then we lose it to the boys.”

Grinning, she slapped him on the shoulder playfully and turned, letting her long legs carry her out of the room.

“Marlene, hold on a second!” Remus called, streaking after her. Just as he left, Lily flashed him a beaming smile and a thumbs up.

Marlene was tall and a fast walker, and despite his long stride Remus had to half-jog just to keep up with her. By the time they were marching back up House Lane he’d already passed the initial stages of shock and denial and went straight for bargaining. Marlene, it seemed, would have none of it.

“I know you don’t like football,” she started reasonably, passing Finch House and waving at another girl, “but I couldn’t ask James, he’s already so busy with his own team, and he helps out enough as is. Plus, half of the other boys are just as likely to laugh in my face if I'd asked them to play with us.”

“Why not Sirius then? He's loads better than me at sports.”

“I think he’s also a little tied up sticking his tongue down Kim Bishop’s throat.”

“And Peter?”

“Are you serious?”

“C’mon Marls, anyone but me! You have a whole school to choose from.”

“But you promised.”

“And you tricked me! Stopping someone to ask for a favour and then rushing off to class before you tell them what it is they’re agreeing to isn’t fair.”

“Life’s not fair, Remus. If it were, I’d have been born with looks like Mary, brains like Lily, and confidence like Lottie’s.”

“You’ve already got all those things and then some.”

“Ha, you’re sweet,” Marlene said, marching away. As she did, it struck Remus that her quip was more than just sarcasm—she really didn’t believe he thought she was just as good as the rest of their friends. Without letting himself think, he reached forward and grasped Marlene’s wrist, pulling her to a stop in the middle of the path. She whipped around, nearly lashing him in the face with her ponytail.

“I meant it,” he said firmly, before quickly releasing her wrist. Marlene glanced down before smiling reluctantly.

“Sure, Remus.”

“I did.”

“Okay.”

“I did!”

“Alright, I believe you!”

Remus shoved his hands in his pockets awkwardly, embarrassed by his outburst. “Well… good. You’re smart and pretty and tough—people should envy you, really. I do, when you're not dragging me to football practice, that is.”

Marlene began gnawing on her bottom lip before a smile finally peeked through. “Thanks, Remus.”

“Mhm,” he nodded gently, before noticing a small leaf had gotten caught in her hair. Reaching up, he plucked it out and twirled it in between his fingers in front of her nose. Marlene’s smile widened and for a moment it was contagious, until they were interrupted.

“I know chavs are generally too stupid to remember where they are half the time, but some of us actually have places to be.”

Remus turned to find Snape standing behind them, rucksack over one shoulder, rumpled sneer on his face. Unfortunately the dorm he’d chosen to stop and reinforce Marlene’s self-esteem in front of was not neutral ground. Just behind Snape, the great grey stone of Salazar House loomed, its serpentine insignia highlighting every surface.

Remus sighed, instantly irritated as he stepped back from Marlene. “Snape, has anyone ever told you that you have a special talent for magic? You make smiles disappear.”

“I’d almost believe that were clever if it weren’t coming from you, Scarface,” Snape said, standing comfortably on the end of his House’s stone walkway. He was clearly enjoying what he thought was a home-field advantage.

“Oh shove off, Snape,” Marlene hissed. “No one asked for your opinion anyway.”

Snape curled his lip, unfazed. “That’s right, don’t mind me, I’m just on my way to dinner. I really hope passing this much rubbish on the way doesn't ruin my appetite.”

Remus crossed his arms over his chest. “I would’ve thought you’d have an iron stomach, what with all the foul crap you regurgitate on a daily basis.”

“You’re right, I’m being completely unrealistic. You’re not rubbish, you’re scum.”

“Stop talking to us like that!” Marlene shouted.

“You were barely tolerable before, McKinnon, and now you’re hanging around with low-rents like him. Kill any more cops lately, Lupin?”

Remus scowled but it was Marlene who stepped forward first. “As if your family comes from royalty!” She shot.

“Better than the gutter.”

“Which is where, Severus? In Liverpool? Where your father is no doubt having to lay off dock workers left and right? Where they’re considering a strike that would leave your family with nothing? Tell me, how lucrative is a shipping dock no one can use?”

Snape turned a deep shade of red, a blood vessel threatening to burst in his forehead. “You don’t know what you’re talking about.”

“Then enlighten me! You’re the one who picked the fight, so how is it you’re so much better than us when your position at this school is more precarious than anyone’s? Remus is miles better than you, and you’re just jealous.”

“Fuck off.” Going around them, Snape began to march off, but Marlene wasn’t finished, shouting after him;

“You’re a coward Snape! You have nothing better to do than rag on anyone who dares have a good day in your presence because you wouldn’t know goodness if it smacked you upside the head! You’re just bitter because people like Remus are smarter, richer, kinder, more handsome, and better in every way—while you’re just pathetic.”

Slamming to a halt, Snape spun back around and advanced on them, lip lifted in a snarl. But Remus was also bigger, and he stepped between them before Snape even got close, armed with a deadly look of his own. “Just try it,” he dared him, and Snape’s nostrils flared as he pulled back.

“You’ll get yours eventually, you skiver. I know people who could make that scar look like a paper cut.”

Remus casually rubbed his nose to mock him. “If you reckon you can do any better, you’re welcome to try.”

Straightening up, Snape clutched at his bag strap and glared at them both, finally muttering another quick; ‘fuck off,’ before retreated back up the path away from them.

“He’s the most wretched thing I’ve ever laid eyes on,” Marlene swore. “Just imagine if he knew about Lily and James. It might be better even—then they could have it out and we’d never have to speak to him again.”

“Lily made us promise not to tell,” Remus pointed out.

“I know…” Letting out a huff, Marlene pressed her fingers to her temples. The tension left Remus too and he rubbed the back of his neck before smiling wryly.

“That was a lot of compliments you gave me just then.”

“I said people like you.”

He chuckled a bit. “Still, good for you. Snape deserved to hear all that and then some.”

Marlene nodded and spoke in a low voice; “I’m tired of letting pricks like him knock me around. I’m not just going to cry about it anymore. No one is any better than anyone else just because of money or politics or family. We all get eaten by the same worms when we die, it should be about what you do for others that counts.”

“You’re entirely right, Marls. Now how about you let me walk you to dinner?”

“And follow the git? No way. Besides, you’re not getting out of your promise that easily.”

“It was barely a promise!”

“Buck up, soldier,” Marlene said, before giving him a friendly tap on the arse like a true football captain and stepping past him down the path.

Only slightly flustered, Remus called after her. “We’re not on the field yet so I’m pretty sure that counts as sexual assault.”

“You can add it to my list of charges along with ‘low-rent’ and ‘gutter rat’! And keep up, we’re already late!”

“Athletes,” he sighed, reluctantly following, and praying to God that he didn’t have another horrible nickname by the end of the night.

* * *

“So…” Nicole started, “are you and Marlene, like, a thing?”

“Huh?”

“Because us and the other girls—we’ve known her a long time, and Marlene’s never brought a bloke to practice before.”

Remus fiddled with his pen and clipboard. “She just said she needed some extra help timing your drills,” he mumbled.

“We know,” Anna said, “but she never talks about guys so we figured that maybe—”

“—That maybe you’re her boyfriend?”

“No, we’re just friends,” Remus said quickly.

Both girls pushed their bottom lips out into a pout. They were younger than him and Marlene, just tenth years, but they both seemed to have about as much confidence as a middle-aged divorcee on her third martini.

“Marlene has talked a bit about you, you know,” Nicole started again, making Remus’ cheeks flush instantly. “I mean we never knew your name but now that you’re here I’m sure we’ve connected the dots.”

“W-What has she said?”

“That you’re the only guy she knows who reads for fun,” Anna said, before Nicole gently elbowed her in the stomach.

“She said she likes your eyes.”

“Uh-huh…” Shyly, Remus took a swig from his water bottle.

“And that you’ve got a cute butt.”

Instantly he was coughing, turning away from the girls so they couldn't see his eyes water in mortification.

“So what about you?” Nicole egged. “You like blondes then? I'm pretty partial to them myself, and Marlene’s got this way about her—so hot. Have you ever noticed her nose? She’s always saying how she hates it, how it’s too long and sort of higher in the bridge—” she illustrated by drawing her finger down the middle of her own nose, “but I’ve always thought it was really handsome, don’t you, Remus?”

He cleared his throat again. “It’s—It’s a nose…”

“So what’s your type then? Because we could totally arrange—”

Before Nicole could dig for more, a football came flying through the air at head level, cutting right between them as both girls gave a little shriek of surprise.

“Water break’s over,” Marlene ordered, “back to drills!”

“Yes, ma’am!” Anna answered, saluting her team captain and grabbing Nicole by the arm as she turned back to Remus.

“You never said you weren’t interested!” She announced, before the pair took off across the field, giggling.

“Not interested in what?” Marlene asked, as she fell into step next to Remus and took back the clipboard she’d given him to keep track of the girls’ times.

“Nothing—fashion. They hate my shorts.”

Marlene looked down at his track shorts and shrugged. “They aren’t that bad. A little short for December maybe, but decent.”

“Well don’t look!” Remus moaned, snatching back the clipboard and using it to cover his pasty thighs. "You're the one that wouldn't wait for me to find my track pants."

“Oh, I’m sorry, didn’t mean to infringe upon your modesty.”

“Yeah you did. You’re actually very cheeky that way, McKinnon.”

“Have me clocked, huh?”

“I have a few guesses.”

“So do I.”

They gave each other a measuring sideways glance before splitting into a pair of smiles. In truth Marlene remained as much of an enigma as she always had been. When he’d first met her Remus had thought her quiet and shy, which was true, but only to those who didn’t know her well enough. He was fully and completely convinced after witnessing her verbally thrash Snape that she, like most of her friends, was also a force to be reckoned with. Unfortunately that merciless force also extended to those same friends as well.

“C’mon,” Marlene said, nudging him gently in the shoulder, “I want you to help me with the next drill.”

Walking with her, they crossed the field to the group of secondary girls, each of them dressed up in their maroon and grey uniforms. Really the team was just a formality to appease those girls who could keep up with the boys but were decidedly not boys, as they rarely got to hold official games of their own. The girls had never been permitted to play in the mens league—a bit of blatant sexism Marlene had been contending with since she joined in her eighth year.

“We’re gonna do the three goal drill,” Marlene instructed, “set it up.”

As the girls went about dragging nets into place, Marlene turned to him and plucked the clipboard from his hands, tossing it aside and replacing it with a football. “Don’t worry,” she told him, “all you have to do is stand in the middle there and gently kick them the ball when they reach your station. It’s like a rotation.”

“It’s like speed dating,” Nicole added, skipping up behind Remus.

Marlene scoffed. “It is not.”

“It is when we have a bloke around! Say, next week can I bring someone too?”

“Stay cheeky and I’ll have Michelle make you run laps again.”

Nicole bowed out humbly and Marlene led Remus into his place.

“What if I miss?” He asked, staring down the large pile of footballs ahead of him.

“Then they chase it. It’s part of the drill actually so miss on purpose if you want—just keep the ball on the field.”

He supposed he could do that much.

When Michelle, the team’s vice-captain, blew her whistle two girls shot forward at a time, kicking a ball into the two smaller nets before racing toward Remus. He fumbled a bit in the beginning, but eventually it was a streamlined operation; he kicked the footballs wayward so they could put them in the net and the goalkeeper behind him tossed them back to replenish the pile. Some of the girls were just as awkward as he was, but they were all happy enough to be there. Nicole and Anna were among those that had actual skill so Marlene pushed them harder, clapping her hands and barking various orders every time they slacked. They both pushed back by grinning and blowing kisses at her, despite the obvious sweat of exertion on their foreheads.

“Okay,” Marlene called, after several rounds, “reset and switch net positions—except you, Remus, you stay there.”

The girls quickly set about collecting any stray footballs and switching out goalkeepers as Marlene approached him, handing him his water bottle. “Thanks,” Remus said, taking a deep swig.

“So are you interested in joining the boys team yet?” Marlene asked.

“Not a chance. You and James can keep your football religion. Also, you’re a little scary as a captain.”

“I’ll take that as a compliment.”

“Does Mary know how you are on the field? She might be impressed, you know.”

Marlene crossed her arms, a bemused smile on her face. “Because she’s not already impressed by me?”

“I didn’t mean it like that,” he said, capping the water bottle, “just that she might not drag you around as much if she knew.”

“And is that why you’re so anti-football? Because you like being dragged around by Black and Potter?”

“Low blow, McKinnon.”

Marlene smirked and uncrossed her arms, snatching back the water bottle as she turned away from him. “Michelle, I’ve changed my mind. We’re doing the three net drill again, but this time we’re doing offence.”

“What does that mean?” Remus asked suspiciously, and Marlene peeked back at him, already jogging away and leaving him in his circle of footballs.

“Means they’re gonna fight you for the ball,” she answered. “Try to keep it from them, and do stay strong, Lupin.”

“Oi,” he started, “Marlene—!”

“Her middle name's Grace if that helps!” Nicole called innocently.

“Er—Marlene Grace McKinnon—!”

“Remus—” Marlene returned, “John Lupin, stop shouting before I make you run laps!”

Defeated, he shut his mouth and the entire team giggled. A moment later Michelle’s whistle blew and the first of them raced forward.

“C’mon, Remus,” Michelle shouted encouragingly, “don’t make it too easy on them.”

Remus threw his arms out, “I still don’t understand—” suddenly Anna was there, hooking his left leg to knock the ball from between his feet, racing off with it to score her goal.

“Now that’s just sad!” Marlene sighed dramatically, making everyone snigger again.

“You can do it, Remus!” Nicole added kindly, just before high-fiving Anna as she returned to the drill line-up.

The next girl also had no trouble snatching the ball from him, but by the third Remus at least sort of understood the point of the drill. He did his best to keep the ball between his heels, awkwardly dancing around each player until they inevitably took it from him. Thankfully, the longer they went at it the easier it got and eventually he was able to keep the ball away from them for a considerable length of time, creating a clog in the drill’s line-up.

“You’re getting cocky, Remus,” Nicole laughed, just as she used the side of her foot to knock it from between his legs.

“Keep your eye on the ball, kid,” he teased, but when he turned around next it wasn’t another tenth year he was facing, but the team captain herself, standing arms crossed until she took off toward him. He instantly balked, but he reached the other football before Marlene got to him and kicked it out of her reach. Chasing after it, Remus looked back and smiled smugly.

“So he can run?” Marlene shouted tauntingly.

“He can!” Remus declared. “He can also—”

Marlene never got to hear what it was that Remus could also do, as the moment he reached the ball again she was there, sliding—actually sliding, on her side and everything—beneath him to knock the football away. Remus tripped over her and turned mid-air, slamming onto his side on the green turf and rolling onto his back with a low moan to stare up at the gym roof. As he laid there, coughing out air, Marlene bent down over him and smiled widely, wiping the sweat from her forehead.

“You okay, Rem?” She asked. “I didn’t damage you too badly, did I?” Her ponytail slipped over her head to dangle down above him and he stared at her, slightly transfixed, although that might’ve just been a repercussion of being knocked on his arse.

“You do have a nice nose,” he observed, stupidly, and instantly Marlene’s eyes widened.

“I guess you hit your head after all.”

“Nah. I’m fine.” Reaching out, Remus took her outstretched hand and climbed to his feet next to her, dusting off his shorts. “Thanks.”

Marlene nodded, sheepishly pressing her knuckles to her cheeks and muttering; “Don’t mention it.”

Instantly the rest of the team, who had abandoned their other drills to watch, began erupting into ‘oohs’ and whistles that had her looking up, redder than before. “Okay, cut that out!” She ordered, but the girls only grinned guiltily.

“You’re blushing, Marlene!”

“Nicole!”

“You are!”

Marlene began marching toward her and Nicole jumped away, dancing around the crowd of girls to keep the distance between herself and the team captain. It was amusing to note that he wasn’t the only person at Hawkings who had their own ‘Sirius Black’ to contend with.

“Look, it’s the boys!” One of the girls called suddenly, and the entire team turned as a single unit, crowding into one another as the Hawkings’ boys team emerged on the field in their pads and football boots, dispersing to the benches to drop down their bags and towels. With an irritated sigh, Marlene gave up chasing Nicole and walked up to the boys, who were of course led by their own captain, James. They knocked knuckles, a gesture Remus had never seen Marlene reciprocate off the field, and Marlene began flapping the front of her uniform for air.

“Sorry Potter, didn’t mean to run long. We’ll clean up now.”

“S’fine McKinnon. You can stay if you want even, we’re just running drills today too.” James looked up and casually tossed Remus a wave when he noticed him. “Hey, Lupin.”

“Hey, Potter. Thought you had Slug Club stuff tonight?”

“Nah, that's tomorrow,” James said with a friendly nod. Casually, he looked back to Marlene before his smile abruptly fell and he snapped back to Remus. “Lupin?! On the football field? YOU TRAITOR!”

* * *

It was rather hard to detach himself from James, who didn’t seem to believe that he’d been forced onto the field against his will, but Remus managed to duck out before he could call him a ‘seditious Judas’ and ended up joining the girls for a late dinner in the dining hall. They were as rowdy as any boys team, tossing napkins this way and that, but off the field Marlene easily relinquished her hold as captain overseer and let Michelle turn into the mother hen, making sure that each girl had drunk enough water to drown a small mammal.

“We’re going to watch a movie together in the theatre room after if you’re interested,” Marlene said, polishing off Remus' chocolate pudding.

Both Anna and Nicole had overheard and stared at him with expectant eyes until he’d finally given in.

“What movie?” He asked, defeated. Marlene shrugged, but Anna intercepted easily.

“Penny got a hold of a copy of ‘Rosemary’s Baby’ from her older sister.

We can set it up on the projector."

"That sounds nice," Marlene said. "What is it, like a romantic comedy?"

The American 'R' rated film was certainly not a romantic comedy. Marlene spent most of it hiding behind her hands or with her face pressed into his or Nicole's shoulder, squirming at the more gruesome parts as the other girls shrieked with terror or delight.

"You're never picking the movie again," Marlene told Penny when it was over.

Remus waited until her back was turned to shuffle over to Penny and nudge her. "I thought it was great," he whispered, giving her a sly high-five.

He said his goodbyes to the girls outside his own dorm. On his way inside he was stopped by another boy who told him he'd missed a call and when Remus checked the hallway board where they took messages and posted school notices he found not Giles' name but Tomny's (well—'Tommy', but still). Elated, Remus fumbled for one of the phones and eagerly dialled the flat's number, biting his lip as the call went long-distance and began to ring. Since their first call in October Tomny had reached out a small handful of times, but the conversations were unpredictable and often shorter than he would've liked. They didn't talk about the weather again though, and Tomny seemed generally upbeat (Tonya was always upbeat) which probably meant that the 'holistic healing' thing was now old hat.

It was Doss who picked up the phone, which made Remus a bit uneasy, mostly because he hadn't spoken to the older boy since Tomny had told him Doss was the only other person that knew he'd been lying about his family. But of course Doss was as friendly as ever, asking him "How's tricks?" and filling him in on every stupid and ingenious thing Lee had done since they'd seen each other.

Eventually Doss passed the phone along and he got his familiar "hey Lu" and "hello, sweet love". Tomny and Tonya seemed alright, though all the flowers that Tonya had been cultivating on their balcony had died as soon as the winter air had rolled in and she was disappointed over it. As per usual the call became a three-way conversation, with both Tonya and Tomny speaking over each other but never getting irritated by it. Remus pictured them cuddled together on the couch or Tomny's patchwork recliner with the receiver tucked between their heads. They laughed when he told them about Marlene and her team ("Thought you hated football, Lu?") and Tonya talked music for a bit, excited by the new album Queen was supposed to drop later that month.

Through it all they did not talk about Christmas, as they hadn't since Tonya had planted the seed in Remus' head just before Halloween. Their silence on the matter seemed so loud that Remus found himself unable to even bridge the topic, just as he had every other phone call since, and after they'd said goodbye to one another he set the receiver down and snatched Tomny's name off the message board, crumpling the note in the palm of his hand.

The following evening while Peter entertained Moira in their dorm room ("Oh, piss off Black, we're only playing cards. And even if we weren't it's none of your business!") and the rest of his friends attended Slughorn's club to let him lecture on about the fascinations of chemical reactions or otherwise, Remus took it upon himself to retire to the astronomy building for a bit of alone time. He'd only visited his favourite spot a few times since the start of the term, and it remained the only portion of his map he had yet to share with his friends. It was peaceful, and he took his bass and a bit of the weed they'd procured from Xeno and sat with the door cracked just enough for the smoke to escape. The telescope's vast, empty room felt like the perfect place to write songs—not that Remus was, but he imagined that Sirius would find it utterly inspirational to listen to the way every note seemed to reverberate off the domed walls.

Since returning to school Sirius' songwriting had taken a strong up-turn. No longer was he obsessing over angry metaphors or bitter wishes, and instead he wrote whatever he wanted, whenever he wanted. Remus' favourite so far was this short composition Sirius was calling "Backtrack Children". It only had a chorus, but it reminded him of his boys back home—especially the line 'Skid Row's regular Romeo'. It felt romantic in a heavy way, like the dirty sort of rock 'n' roll Sirius so desperately wanted to embody, despite growing up a proper, high-class English boy.

"It's like writing a letter," Sirius had told him one evening, chin pressed to the side of Andy's acoustic guitar. "You just gotta decide who you're writing to."

"Yeah well, not all of us can speak in lyrics, Black."

Sirius had said nothing to that, only bit his lip and scribbled something in his notebook.

It felt good to inspire him at least. They may have only been playing at starting a band—a joke which James had encouraged since he'd agreed to let Sirius teach him the guitar—but Sirius was the only one of them that was actually interested in pursuing music, and if Remus could contribute at all to any of it, even just a single note or lyric, that would be enough.

Just before curfew, he gathered his things and made his way back to the dorm. Unlocking the door he walked in to find his roommates surrounding James' bed and staring down at the same textbook.

"Not sure that's what they mean when they call it 'group study'," Remus said, as his friends glanced up.

"Moony! You gotta—" Peter started, before Sirius reached over him and snatched the book up from the covers.

"Moony! Moony! Moony! Moony! Come look at this!"

Setting down his instrument case, Remus crossed the room and Sirius shoved the textbook into his hands. "Chemistry? Uh, hate to break it to you, but I don't take chem."

"It's Snape's," James sniggered. "Sirius lifted it out of his bag during tonight's club meeting."

"No way." One by one Remus began flipping through the pages, finding scribbles in every other margin of different equations or notes on chemical properties and the like.

"He carries the thing around like a bible," Peter grinned, "ten quid he notices it missing immediately and throws a historic fit."

"Well, that would be something," Remus said, snapping the book closed and handing it back.

"You're missing the best part though," Sirius insisted, taking the book and flipping it back open. "I only thought it would inconvenience him, but I think the slimy git just handed us the key to our revenge against my darling baby brother."

"What do you mean?"

Turning the book around for Remus to see, he pointed to a single scribble Snape had left in a margin next to a list of chemical reactions and stood back, locking his arms behind him like an innocent bystander.

“Moony, my dear, have you ever heard of a thiol?”

Chapter End Notes

Author's Note: This chapter has been edited to remove the plot point of the 'Half-blood Prince'. If you are doing a reread, you will no longer find it, thank you.

(also Lesley Gore is a lesbian icon, though she didn't come out until the 2000's. We love her, and Marlene absolutely would too. Do what that with you will~)

Chapter 41: A Rather Rancid Revenge

Chapter Summary

Ah, the classic stink bomb. Yes, good.

Chapter Notes

CW: Light homophobic language.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

See the years roll on by,
Such a senseless waste of time;
What a way to reform,
Call out your number;
Who's a non-conformer,
Not me baby, oh yeah!

- "Borstal Boys" Faces, 1973

Friday 3rd December 1976

It had taken a few days of study but eventually they'd worked out how they were going to return Sirius' birthday favour to Reg and his friends. Of course though, it hadn't been enough to consider only pranking the four of them. After some eager propaganda from Sirius, it was now looking like all of Salazar House was to bear the brunt of their rancid revenge. That was if Professor Slughorn ever stopped talking.

"So you see Lumby, every hydrogen atom in your body is likely over thirteen billion years old because every hydrogen atom was created at the very beginning of the universe."

"Uh-huh."

"And even that had to wait another three hundred and eighty years for the universe to cool after the Big Bang."

"Cool…"

"Yes, very cool! Cool enough for hydrogen and helium to form. The very first elements!"

Professor Slughorn beamed at him, and Remus just blinked back. He thought agreeing to keep watch would mean he'd have to think less about the prank, which involved several chemicals and accelerants (of the non-poisonous kind—they checked) that he could barely pronounce, but he hadn't counted on Hawkings' chemistry teacher paying a evening visit to his classroom when everyone was supposed to be at dinner. The others had had just enough time to throw themselves into a classroom storage closet as Remus had scrambled to pull his lock-picks from the supply cupboard when Slughorn had strode in. He'd been initially surprised to find him there alone, but after some quick excuses on Remus' part, was all too willing to launch into a lecture on the differences between hydrogen sulphate and hydrogen sulphide.

"I'm sorry, Lumby," Professor Slughorn started, dropping his deep-set brow, "was there something you wanted to ask? I don't believe I have you in any of my classes, do I?"

"Oh no," Remus tried, wetting his lips, "I was just trying to come up with an interesting research topic for my end of term history paper, but after our chat I'm confident that I wouldn't be able to do the universe much justice."

"Nonsense, you seem to be a good listener. How are those notes going?"

Remus snapped down to the notepad he'd been pretending to scribble on. "Oh I…"

Slughorn checked his watch. "Great snakes, is that the time? Best be getting on now, else you'll miss curfew."

Remus nodded and let himself be guided out of the classroom, down the hallway, and into the chilly night. After saying goodbye to Slughorn, he walked down the pavement a bit and hid in the bushes until his friends spilled out after them into the dark, all of them giggling like school girls.

"Now where was that acting on Halloween?" Sirius demanded, spotting Remus as he stepped into the light of a street lamp with his hands in his pockets.

"Up your arse."

“You tell him, Lumby,” James grinned.

Remus scowled. “You get everything?”

“Oh yeah,” James said, as he and Peter showed off the boxes they were carrying. Inside were dozens of empty glass or plastic bottles gathered from the kitchen’s rubbish bins, balloons, duct tape, bicarb soda—everything they would need for the prank, at least according to the Snape’s notes.

“Think we should test it?” Peter asked, looking down into the box.

James nodded. “Yeah, but not in our bedroom. As long as Snivellus hasn’t led us astray then the smell is going to stick around for a while.”

“Only if we do it right,” Sirius said. “But really, how bad could it stink?”

The answer was fucking bad.

Together they had made their way back inside the Galilei Block, up to the third floor and down the furthest hallway to a girls toilet. The bathroom was always empty thanks to a rumour that it was haunted—one Sirius was all too willing to embellish.

“Apparently some year ten girl literally gave up the ghost in here,” he sniggered. “A snake crawled up the toilet pipes and bit her right on the arse.”

“We’re on the third floor,” Remus scoffed.

“Snakes can climb.”

After James had reassured Peter that Sirius was full of shit and there were no snakes hiding in the pipes waiting to bite his nob off, they got to work on a bit of trouble-shooting and were able to come up with a device that appeared as little more than a plastic water bottle with a balloon duct taped to its top. The ammonium sulphide that would make the bomb stink had been put in the bottle’s base along with the other liquid ingredients, while the bicarb soda—effectively the ignition to the prank—was stuffed into the top of the balloon and left to hang down over the rim to keep the two separated.

They tested it three times, escaping out into the hall to avoid the stench as each balloon burst with a sharp bang that echoed throughout the building. They were eyeballing the ingredients for the most part, which meant every bomb had a varying time limit before the gas build-up would cause the balloon to burst. Each one smelled absolutely horrid and by round three Remus was convinced he'd never be able to smell anything pleasant again. Naturally, they were all thrilled.

With several dozen of the bombs in hand, they packed up the rest of their supplies and loped back to the dorms, sticking the shadows to avoid getting caught out after hours. They had to move agonisingly slow so as to not risk upsetting any of their monstrous concoctions early and by the time they were making their way down House Lane it was getting mighty close to midnight.

"Lucky Kenny isn't as much of a curfew stickler as Benjy was," Peter said, checking his watch for the dozenth time.

Sirius gasped; "Imagine if one of us became dorm monitor next year—think of the pranking opportunities! You should do it, Potter."

"Why me? I'm already spending all my free time with you and that bloody guitar, where would I possibly fit in looking after a whole dorm of nobs?"

"Maybe you'd be able to do it if you weren't putting so many extra hours in at the library. Who'd have known dating Evans would come with a lifetime subscription of 'shhh'."

James puckered. "Mind your business."

"Hmph."

"Are we doing this or do you girls need more time to have it out?" Remus asked. They'd made it to Salazar House, where most of the lights were dim and quiet.

"No, we're doing this," Sirius said. "Everyone remember the plan?"

They all nodded; Sirius and James would take the upper hallways, starting at the second floor and working their way up to the fourth while Remus and Peter filled the kitchenette and common room with enough bombs to fumigate Australia. Fifteen minutes later, at exactly midnight, they'd start tipping the bicarb soda filled balloons into each bottle and leg it out of the dorm. No one was to escape unscathed; if any of them were caught before then they'd hoot twice like a barn owl (according to James this sounded a lot like a 'HOOOOOHHH- HOOOOOHHH') and once like a screech owl ('REEAAAAHHH') and trigger any bomb within reach. James did admit afterwards that he had no idea what sound either animal actually sounded like but his impressions had them in stitches anyway.

Once they'd stopped killing themselves with laughter, it was time to go to work. Carefully they carried the boxes up Salazar's front steps and slipped inside, checking that the coast was clear before they crossed the main hallway and split off at the staircase, eager to exact their revenge.

"You cover the kitchen," Remus said, "I've got the common."

"Hope the boys in green enjoy the smell of rotten eggs and arse," Peter murmured giddily before slipping away into the dark with his stink bombs in hand while Remus carried the rest of the box into the common room. The space felt distinctly un-cozy compared to Godric, decorated with cold wooden flooring, dark leather couches, and emerald-green curtains that reminded him of the window coverings in his bedroom back in London. He set a bomb behind each, knowing that the horrible smell would cling to the heavy fabric for ages and left more under the couches and tables, as well as tucked in behind plant pots (sulphur didn't kill plants right?), and even one inside the chest cavity of a tacky suit of armour. By the time he was finished there were more than a dozen bottles scattered throughout the Salazar common room. They'd be airing the place out for weeks.

"Pete?" Remus called quietly into the hall. He found Peter setting up a row of bombs just outside the entryway to the kitchenette, barely a shape in the darkness.

"Almost done," Peter said. "You set it all up?"

"Yeah. What time is it?"

Peter checked his watch. "Oh shit, it's midnight now."

"Already? Damn it, okay, just start—"

Before he could finish Peter was already tipping the first balloon's worth of bicarb soda into the bottle ahead of him. There was a fizzing sound, and the balloon slowly started to inflate. Remus turned and dashed back into the common room, doing his best to remember where he'd left each of the bombs. He ended up accidentally punting one across the room when he missed it in the darkness and flinched at the sharp sound of the glass bottle shattering somewhere, but managed to get to the rest. As he carefully skirted back into the hallway to meet Peter, his heart was hammering so loudly in his ears it sounded like a bass beat.

“Where are they?” Peter demanded, practically dancing in place as he eyed the filling balloons in the hallway around them. The bombs looked incredibly stupid, like tiny hot-air balloons made by toddlers, but they already knew better than to underestimate their power.

“They should be making their way down by now,” Remus said, equally as antsy.

“Maybe they got caught?”

“Didn’t hear James’ hoot. Let’s go get them and get out of here.”

Peter flashed another anxious look around before they both set off up the stairs. Both the second and third floor landings were quiet and they didn’t hear any noise at all until they made it to the fourth floor, where quiet sniggering drifted down through the dark.

“Oi!” Remus hissed, and both James and Sirius spun around, clutching the fronts of their shirts when they realised it was only them.

“Bloody fuck, Moony, thought you were the monitor or something.”

“What is taking so long?” Remus demanded, starting down the hallway. He had to step carefully or else risk upsetting one of the stink bombs they’d already placed.

“What do you mean?” Sirius asked.

Peter caught up; “We agreed midnight!”

“Yeah, it’s midnight now," James said, holding up his watch. “We were just about to start setting ‘em off.”

Peter snatched his wrist and yanked James forward, squinting down at the time before glancing up at Remus, open-mouthed. “Guess we should’ve checked to see if our watches were synced.”

Remus deflated. “Oh no.”

BANG!

The sound of the first balloon bursting echoed distantly behind them making each of them jump a foot in the air.

“You idiots!” Sirius hissed.

“How do you know it’s our fault?” Peter demanded. “Maybe James’ watch is off!”

BANG!

“It’s time to go,” James said, tossing the last stink bomb he’d been holding straight over his shoulder. Remus and Peter nodded quickly and the three of them started toward the stairs, but Sirius was not as quick to give up.

“We can’t just leave them! What about the prank?”

“People are going to hear the noise, Black,” James started. “Bombs are literally going off under our feet.”

“The third floor then!” Sirius pleaded. “It’s their floor! We have to do that one.”

BANG!

“Yes, okay, fine!” Remus answered for them, racing forward to grab Sirius by the arm, knocking over several bottles as he went. “Let’s just go!”

Together they rushed down the staircase and into the hallway, where James and Sirius had set up a small shrine of stink bombs outside room 3A, presumably the dorm where Regulus and his roommates were currently sitting up in bed, wondering what the noise was. Two doors down, 3C also had its own little army of bottles, which James went to first, aided by Remus.

“It’s Snape’s room,” he said, skipping the part where he was to carefully tip the bicarb soda into the bomb’s wet ingredients and just shaking each bottle vigorously before setting it back down. Remus did the same, grinning at the idea of Snape with not only his regularly greasy self, but with a pheromone to match.

BANG! BANG! BANG!

The bombs on the ground floor were now going off more rapidly, each one like a shot straight to the heart.

“Okay now it’s time to go,” James said, scrambling away toward the staircase. Remus shook the last bottle and stood up, just as the door ahead of him flew open and a light flicked on, momentarily blinding him.

“What are you doing here?!” Snape snarled, before looking down at his feet and the filling balloons, and back up to Remus, who’s stomach had been launched into his throat.

“Moony, c’mon!” Sirius hissed from the stairs. Without answering Snape, Remus turned and fled toward the stairs, joining a half-cackling Sirius as they took the steps two at a time.

Before either of them could say anything about getting caught, the stench hit them. It’d risen from the ground floor to the second and only a few stairs below them, James let out a horrible moan; “AUGH! GOD!”

“MY EYES!” Peter cried.

The smell was so powerful that they all had to pull their shirts and jackets up over their noses and sprint through the stench, eyes watering even as they tugged open the dorm’s front doors and threw themselves out into the freezing night air.

“That was so bad,” Sirius gasped, bent over on the frosty lawn.

“What was Snape thinking, writing a recipe like that down where anyone could find it,” Peter said, making them all burst into staggered laughter.

“He saw me,” Remus panted, “opened his door and I was right there.”

“What kind of pyjamas was he wearing?” Sirius asked. “Or does he sleep starkers—did you enjoy the view?”

“Oh shut up, you absolute spanner.” Remus shoved him and Sirius collapsed on the lawn, still laughing.

“Hate to be the voice of reason,” James started, pointing up at the dorm, which had come alive with not only the sound of their bombs going off, but light as well, “but I think we better split.”

“Moony already got caught,” Peter said, helping Sirius to his feet, “what’s the point?”

“Only Snape saw him,” Sirius said, “and this morning I happened to trade Kenny some of Xeno’s weed to act as an alibi in case we needed

one. I'm sure his word'll count for something."

"So you bet on our failure?" Remus asked. "What ever happened to blind faith?"

"I'm an atheist."

James reached over and grabbed Sirius by the collar, tugging him toward the road. "You're also the only one who can afford to spend the rest of term in detention so let's go before someone else catches us."

There was a short clatter from behind them; someone was fumbling with the common room windows, trying to get them open. Before they could be spotted or doused with another wave of stench, the Godric boys took off across the lawn into the November darkness, grinning ear to frozen ear.

* * *

All four of them had slept well—even Remus—knowing that no one in Salazar would be, but the real satisfaction of the prank didn't come until the following morning when they were sitting at their usual table in the dining hall, watching as every boy in a green jumper piled in looking haggard and sour. The stench radiating off of them cleared the far corner of the dining hall in a matter of minutes, and each time one of them got up to collect so much as a napkin, every other student fled in the opposite direction.

"There he is!" Sirius hissed, and they all strained their necks to watch as Regulus stalked into the dining hall. He paused in the doorway and looked directly at them with a bitter scowl, making Sirius practically vibrate with glee.

"He totally knows we did it. Think they'll retaliate?" Asked James.

"Who cares?" Sirius sniggered. "If they try we'll smell 'em coming."

Remus snorted and they all began laughing until Mary slid in beside Peter at the table, picking up her fork. "Oh my god, have you guys smelt—"

Suddenly Mary straightened up. "Jesus Christ," she started, grabbing her breakfast tray, "not you too." Without any more explanation,

Mary fled the table.

“What was that about?” Sirius frowned.

“Dunno,” James said, “but we’ve got incoming.” Nudging Sirius’ elbow, he gestured with his chin and Remus turned around on his bench to spot Snape as he stalked across the room. A girl in Dorset House-yellow spun away desperately when he passed her, clutching her nose and fanning her eyes.

“Hold on, Snape!” Sirius shouted as he got close. “Gotta prepare myself for your arrival!” Quickly Sirius began stuffing bits of napkin up his nose and Snape stopped just shy of arm’s reach from their table.

“I know it was you! I saw you!” He pointed a long finger at Remus. “You’re all ruined after this! You’ll be expelled!”

“Not sure ‘he did it’ is quite enough proof to properly convict us, Snape,” James said. “Especially considering we were held up all night. What is it we were doing again, Pete?”

“We were playing chess with our dorm monitor until real late.”

“That’s right,” Sirius agreed, his voice nasally thanks to the napkin. “Kenny’s actually a world-class chess champion, I’ll have you know, Snivelly. We were helping him prepare for his competitions this Christmas.”

“If you think anyone will believe that you’re absolutely insane. You’re already out of the Slug Club—Professor Slughorn said so this morning.”

“Oh bollocks,” James gasped, “I was enjoying those meetings of ours. Oh well. Guess we don’t need that book we found anymore, Sirius.”

“You mean this book?” From inside his bag, Sirius produced the textbook. “In that case, I suppose we can just toss it then.”

He shrugged, but before Sirius could do anything else Snape shot forward and snatched the text out of his hand.

“YOU! You mangy dickheads—I knew it, this is proof!”

“Proof?” James echoed. “How could it be proof? The book's got your name in it, don’t it?”

For a moment it appeared as though Snape might also explode into a cloud of poisonous gas.

“One day!" He howled. "One day you’ll get what’s coming to you, Potter! Soon enough Lily’ll realise what a gormless idiot you are, and we’ll see who’s left laughing then.”

"If I were you, Snivelly, I'd take a nice long shower before I even went near Evans," Sirius teased. "Otherwise she might pass out from the smell."

"You'll get yours too, Black. Mark my words." Still clutching his text like he might beat someone with it, Snape shot them all a vicious glare and stalked away.

“Ta, Scouser! Feel free to drop in for another casual chinwag sometime,” James waved before turning to the rest of them. “You hear that? He called me gormless.”

“You should’ve told him Lily likes her blokes without gorm," Peter said. "That'd wipe the sour look off his face."

James shook his head lightly. “No way. She’s my girlfriend, not fodder to throw at foul gits like Snivellus. Snape’s pathetic enough on his own, she’s too good for him.”

“But not too good for a mangy dickhead?” Remus asked.

“Guess she likes ‘em mangy too,” Sirius sniggered. They all broke down with laughter again, bent over their breakfast trays until another voice—this one more high-pitched and screechy—called out over their noise.

“Sirius!”

Cup of tea halfway to his smiling lips, Remus glanced up over Sirius’ shoulder to find Kimmy standing a ways away from their table, arms crossed over her chest and looking as though she’d just swallowed the sourest lemon known to man.

“Hey darling,” Sirius said, turning around in his seat. “Lovely morning, isn't it?”

“I have to talk to you,” Kimmy said sharply.

With a hesitant look at James, Sirius slowly began to stand up. “Alright—”

Before he could leave the table, Kimmy's hand shot out to stop him and she used the other to cover her mouth. "No, you just stay there, I can't bear it and I don't want my mascara to run if my eyes begin to water."

"Is everything alright, love?"

"No, how could everything be alright? Haven't you noticed?"

Sirius glanced back at his friends but both James and Peter shrugged. "Er… no, but if you tell me what it is I'm supposed to be noticing, I'm sure that I can compliment it or something—"

"No one is sitting within twenty feet of you, Sirius!"

They all looked around, and Remus realised that she was right; their table was currently being given the biggest berth to date. He'd thought earlier that it was because everyone already knew what they'd done and were too stunned to get close, but kids were still staring, and it wasn't in awe.

"You stink, Sirius," Kimmy said.

Gaping, Sirius immediately lifted an arm to his nose before looking at James, who did the same and shrugged; "Well I can't smell anything."

Sirius shoved his nose into his other sleeve. "Are you sure?"

"I'm bloody sure. This is the last straw, you hear me? I can't be seen breathing out of my mouth around my boyfriend and I won't date a child either! So that's it—it's time to grow up!"

"Grow up?" Sirius echoed, his expression already pinched with irritation.

"Yes—grow up! That means no more stupid pranks, no more stupid jokes, and no more stupid friends!"

"I told you already not to talk about my mates like that," Sirius said, standing. Kimmy immediately took a few steps back, covering her mouth and nose again with a little moan. Sensing a spat, every kid in the vicinity turned to watch as the school's most infamous couple had it out right there in front of their porridge.

"You say 'mates' but all I see is a group of immature kids," Kimmy said in a shrill voice.

“Yeah, and I’m the most immature out of all of them, so why do you bother with me in the first place, Kimberly?”

“I’ve told you I don’t like being called that!”

“Sorry, I must be too ‘immature’ to remember.”

Kimmy scoffed horribly. “I don’t want to hear it. It’s bad enough it looks like I’m dating the rank kid in class, I don’t need a boyfriend with chavs clinging to him like flies, too.”

“Fine, go then.”

“Excuse me?”

“You heard me. You really think I’d actually choose you over my friends? Not in this lifetime.”

Kimmy gasped and threw her hands down. “Fine! Stay with your weird friends—see if I care! You can just sit around and wank each other off every night like the bunch of sorry poofs you are!”

“And you can go back to Keith and beg him to suck on your saggy tits for the rest of eternity! God knows no one else wants to do it.”

“Ooh! Get bent, Sirius Black! You are so dumped!” Turning, Kimmy stormed off across the hall with her ponytail swishing behind her. There was a bit of stunned silence before someone whistled and James finally grabbed Sirius by the shirt sleeve and pulled him back toward his seat.

“Alright, alright,” he told the room, “that’s enough staring—shut your gobs. The show’s over now so go back to your breakfasts, please.”

As everyone turned away, whispering with fervent amusement, Sirius dropped back down onto the bench next to James with a huff.

“Well mate, I think you just got dumped,” James said matter-of-factly.

Sirius rolled his eyes. “Yeah well, I was gonna break up with her anyway. Crazy bird must've read my mind."

“You were?” Remus demanded.

“Yeah, and I did, right? I broke up with her! She didn’t break up with me.”

“I dunno,” Peter said, bringing a forkful of eggs to his nose to sniff, “she’s the one who said the word ‘dumped’.”

“But that doesn’t mean anything! Prongs?”

“What, you want me to take a poll? That shit was public, mate.”

Sirius groaned, bitterly stabbing his fork into the middle of his toast. He might’ve been crushed, but it seemed as though the sun had come out on Remus.

“I guess the early bird gets the worm, huh Black?” He grinned supremely.

“Oh so smug,” Sirius drawled. “The great lady-killer, Remus Lupin, laughing at me for breaking up with my girlfriend.”

“Is that what that was? You breaking up with her?”

“Up yours, Moony.”

“I don’t mean to interrupt your flirting,” Peter started, halting Remus mid-laugh, “but I can’t actually smell anything?” Dropping his fork with a clatter, he buried his nose in his eggs. “Like anything.”

Sceptically, Remus raised his tea and inhaled before his eyes widened in surprise. “Me neither.”

James and Sirius exchanged a slow look before furiously scrambling to get a whiff of anything they could; a cup of orange juice, the ketchup bottle, the pepper shaker—Sirius didn’t even sneeze. James went as far as to take off his trainer and stick it to his face, making all of them grimace—but even that wasn’t enough, and he dropped the shoe completely as realisation dawned on his face.

“Oh god, Pete’s right.”

“We broke our noses,” Remus said. I’ll never smell anything pleasant again.

Sirius, despite his mixed expression of astonishment and horror, coughed out a laugh; “Fucking hell, our own prank Frankensteined us!”

“So that means…” Peter sniffed his arm again.

“I’m going to shower!” James announced, shooting up from his seat.

“But you showered last night!”

“Well I’m showering again!”

“So am I,” Sirius started, grabbing his things.

“Why bother, it’s not like you have a girlfriend to impress anymore!”

“You won’t either if I tell Evans you thought babies came from space until you were fourteen!”

“That’s a vicious lie,” James said, shoving Sirius back down on the bench. “I was thirteen.”

“Shit, James, that reminds me,” Remus started, pulling a random piece of folded paper from his bag, “Lily told me to give you this note.”

He tossed the note through the air and it floated away from James, who immediately chased it and scrambled to turn it over. “All this says is ‘Sluggy thinks hydrogen and helium are cool’,” he shouted; “Moony!”

But Remus was already gone, streaking across the dining hall toward the front entrance. “Have fun in the gym showers, lads!”

Chapter End Notes

Author's Note: This chapter has been edited to remove the plot point of the 'Half-blood Prince'. If you are doing a reread, you will no longer find it, thank you.

'Give up the ghost' is a phrase meaning to die (or stop working).
‘Starkers’ is slang for completely nude.
'Bicarb soda' is the same thing as baking soda in the US.
A 'spanner' is an idiot.
'Scousers' are people from Liverpool.
A ‘chinwag’ is the UK term for a good catch-up session.

We have officially passed 200k! WOW! Someone in the comments called this fic a practice in patience, and it really is if you're looking for the instant gratification of wolfstar. I guess you could say my preferred wolfstar is the one you have to crawl, beg, and cry for (oop) so if that's you too, I thank you so much for taking the plunge into this world with me. You're all amazing <3
However, I will continue to edge you because Remus is sixteen, dumb, and a teenager in the 70s. But whether he realises it or not, he's totally head over heels for Sirius Black.

Chapter 42: Winter Aches

Chapter Summary

> The boys have made up... just in time for another problem to present itself. And present it does.

Chapter Notes

> CW: Implied sexual references.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Have pity on the young man,
They ain't got nothin' in the world these days, I said;
They ain't got nothin'!
They got sweet fuck-all!

- "Young Man Blues" The Who, 1970

There was no denying it: he'd utterly wasted November. The prank with the lads had been proof of that. The time Remus had spent being mad at Sirius could've been put towards putting shits like Snape and Barty in their place. They could've been spent on music, or actually studying for his exams like he'd meant for. In reality, Remus had spent more time in the library than ever and yet between his constant worrying and bad mood, none of it had sunk in. It was the greatest waste of his sixteen years of life.

And so, as the November chill gave way to the fluffy snowfalls of December, Remus told himself he'd do better. He'd get some real studying done, hang out with his friends like he was meant to, not just because he was avoiding one of them. Except, the final month of term came with a few more unforeseen circumstances, one of which being the revelation that while he'd been off being bitter and snarly, James Potter had proved himself a more than capable guitarist. In fact, their first real practice session in the dorm had left Remus' jaw on the floor.

"I know right?!" Sirius said, practically vibrating with delight.

Remus could hardly believe it. Where Sirius' playing ranged from delicate and bewitching to furious and erratic, James had found a home right in the middle. He was charming and humble and yet his careful fingers danced up and down the strings as gracefully as a ballerina. It would've been captivating without any sound at all.

"Wow," Remus had said when James had drawn his song to a finish. "That was… amazing."

"Thanks, Moony," James smiled shyly.

Remus looked down at his lap, where the Fender sat abandoned between his legs. He suddenly felt the need to busy his fingers with anything other than playing.

"I think your E-string sounds a bit out of tune though," he said, gesturing to the acoustic, "how 'bout I—"

"Oh, no it's okay, I got it," James said, flipping the head toward himself and fiddling with the tuning keys.

"He picked that up fast too," Sirius said. "Looks like we'll have a real band soon!"

He hated himself for it, but the next time either of them asked him to play, Remus made up an excuse and escaped down to the common room.

This is what you wanted. If you're missing out, it's your own fault, a nasty voice would ring. Your fault! Your fault! La-la! La-la!

But he'd already missed out. When Andy's guitar had first shown up in the mail and James agreed to learn a few chords, he'd been just as excited as Sirius; they'd found yet another addition to the bolshie cult that was rock and roll. He had no idea at the time how their dynamic would shift. Now why that would bother him so badly in the first place, Remus still wasn't sure. What he was sure of, was the exact moment it became apparent that he no longer needed Sirius' extra tutelage with the bass.

After the stink-bomb incident, the school's supply of tomato juice, paste, pie—anything that could get the smell out—had been exhausted and the only four non-Salazar students who smelt of steaming rubbish had been effectively pinned for the prank. Sadly for those like Snape who were praying for a more public downfall, the Hawkings' statute of limitations had played in their favour. Rather than being hung from Castle Hall by their thumbs, each of them served a light two-week detention sentence with their forms teachers before they were freed to ensure they still had plenty of time to study for their examinations.

Come their final weekend of indentured servitude, Mrs. Buchanan was promptly absent and her place had been filled by some flighty secretary who was more than content to leave them alone in the music room while she smoked and read gossip rags down the hall. He and Sirius were supposed to be polishing the brass instruments, but the moment the secretary popped her gum and strode away they'd both reached for their guitars. It was the first time they'd been alone with their music since before Sirius' birthday, and Remus was so elated by this fact that his fingers played every note like a reflex. They managed "While My Guitar Gently Weeps" all the way through perfectly on their first try and on top of it all, they sounded good.

Rickenbacker in hand, Sirius danced up and down the orchestra risers with his tie unlaced and his shirt open to the third button. "That was bloody brilliant!" He'd declared when they finished.

"It did sound cool, didn't it?" Remus bragged, suddenly desperate for Sirius' praise.

"You're a dab hand—a real musician! Now just imagine how cool it'll sound with another guitar."

And that was that.

As long as Remus was a real musician, Sirius was free to throw himself into teaching James, which he did whole-heartedly and with enough vigour even Peter was tempted to join in—though he still refused to admit it. By the time exams were upon them their private practices had become virtually nonexistent, traded instead for studying that left Remus' brain more sore than ever. Often he would return to the room after studying with the girls to find the two of them practising, and though they would always welcome him, he had begun to see a wall go up between them, brick by invisible brick. Sirius had found a new hobby-project in James, and Remus, though now more advanced as a musician, had lost his place as musical confidant.

During the moments he felt most reasonable, Remus thought to himself that it was only natural; Sirius and James were best friends and had known each other as long as they could remember—brothers in almost every sense. They deserved to find pleasure in each other's talent. It helped some to remind himself that after Kimmy's oh-so-public dumping Sirius had been left more than a bit rattled—people didn't just dump guys like him—and was just looking for the next best distraction, but still it stung. Stung worse even than the times Sirius had skipped out and disappeared with Stacy, his brief fancy after Kim that hadn't lasted more than a week and a half but succeeded in propelling his cheeky reputation even further into the school's stratosphere. Since after all, Stacy had been one of Kim's best friends. Apparently dating one's ex was club-exclusive.

Not that it mattered—Mary had already generously informed him and anyone who'd stop to listen that Sirius and another girl named Vivian had been caught snogging behind the football stands.

With nothing else to do Remus threw himself back into school work, determined that he would at least be able to get Sirius to look his way when they received their exam results. He told himself that the competition he'd constructed in his head was to make up for Sirius making a fool out of him the year before, but he couldn't deny the part of him that missed the connection that had originally belonged to only the two of them. If cigarettes had gotten him in the door with Tomny, the key to Sirius was music.

* * *

Monday 13th December 1976

"So it's A, D, D, E?"

"No, A, D, E, D. Like this."

Sirius let his fingers ripple across the strings.

"Oh, so—" James hit the riff perfectly, two strums on each fret.

"Yeah!" Sirius exclaimed. "That was perfect! There is some variation later on, but you've basically got it now."

James let out a long breath and leaned back against the side of his bed, Andy's acoustic guitar slung across his lap. He and Sirius had been working on the same chorus for hours, heads tucked down low over practice sheets and music tablatures. Peter was at the Great Hall, surely crying over his maths exam, while Remus had secluded himself on his own bed, whittling away the tip of his pencil as he tried to finish an essay. Tuning the two of them out was hard, but Lily and Marlene were in another exam and the library would surely be a whirlwind of clamour anyway as other students struggled with last-minute cramming.

So he'd stayed, and as a consequence, Remus had already imagined himself striding across the room and scattering their music sheets about a dozen times. Demanding the attention he'd been craving ever since Sirius had unwrapped Andy's guitar on his birthday, he would throw open the Fender's bass and play "Sweet Emotion" or "Stone Cold Crazy" or whatever bloody Bowie song Sirius wanted—anything to get a reaction.

But of course he didn't, and eventually he'd started to whittle the pencil from the other end too, grinding it between his teeth as his friends played up and down the chromatic scale.

"I still can't play it fast enough," James said, sourly glancing over his sheet music.

"It's not about going fast," Sirius insisted. "It's about the rhythm—hasn't Evans told you that yet?"

"Shove off."

Sirius laughed. "Sorry, that one's on me. But your fingering was great. Moony tell him his fingering was great."

"The dexterity with which you move your fingers is swell," Remus answered from his bed.

"See?"

"Rhythm was a bit off though."

"That is not being helpful."

James smiled, rapping his fingers on the body of the guitar. "I forgive you, Moons. I like this song too, it's fun to play."

"That's what it's all about, mate," Sirius hummed.

"I thought it was about fame and glory?" Asked Remus.

Sirius whipped his head around. "Don't you have a paper to finish?"

"Don't you have an exam to write? It's almost three."

"Nah, that's him," Sirius said, at the same time as James exclaimed;

“Oh shit!”

Scrambling to his feet, James set Andy’s guitar on his bed as he flew to the door where he’d left his boots in a heap with his jacket. “Sirius, I told you to remind me! I’ve got a law exam!”

“It’s not my fault you let your dad talk you into taking that class. Who takes law in year twelve?”

“It’s for uni prep,” James moaned, shoving his arms into his jacket sleeves. “Moony, lend me a pencil?”

With a tsk, Remus tossed him the one he was using and James caught it out of the air, setting it between his teeth as he zipped up his jacket. “See you at dinner,” he mumbled around it, before opening the door and rushing out.

“You’re a bad influence,” Remus said as Sirius got up from the floor to stretch. He paused with his arms mid-way to the ceiling, and Remus’ eyes fell to the bare strip of stomach that peeked out between his shirt and the top of his trousers.

“Eh, he can run. Still dunno why he even took the class in the first place. He doesn’t want to be a lawyer. S'just his dad talking.” Sirius dropped his arms and the sliver of skin disappeared out of sight, making Remus snap his eyes back to his essay. He padded his bed covers for his pencil before remembering he’d given it to James not thirty seconds before.

“You could be a bad influence too, you know,” Sirius said, casually striding across the room and leaning against one of Remus’ bed posts; “If you actually joined us once in a while.”

“No, you’re the teacher,” Remus said quickly, looking anywhere but Sirius’ face. He couldn’t stop seeing that bit of stomach in his mind; it was just under Sirius’ navel. He wasn’t wearing a belt so his trousers had sagged a bit around the narrowest part of his waist.

“But we could play together,” Sirius said.

“It’s your thing.”

“I thought it was our thing.”

“You have lots of things with lots of people, Black.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

Remus looked back at him. “You going out with Vivian Bartley now?”

Sirius pulled his head back in surprise. “What? No. Who said that?”

“Mary. Yesterday at dinner. You weren’t around. Though that’s hardly new.”

“For your information, I was in detention! Flitwick kept me behind to clap erasers like it was the nineteenth century. And Mary doesn’t know everything.”

“So she was lying about Vivian?”

Clicking his tongue in irritation, Sirius looked away and crossed his arms. “It’s nothing now.”

“But it was something.” Not a question. “Really, where do you find the time?”

“Why? You got a thing for Viv or something?”

Remus jerked back. “No, ‘course not.”

“I just thought that—”

“Can we stop talking about Vivian?”

“You’re the one who brought her up.”

Remus puckered and reached to open his bedside drawer, but there was no pencil in there either. Sirius’ gaze dropped to the floor as a stilted silence echoed between them. Finally he pushed off the post and stepped closer, hooking both thumbs into the belt loops of his slacks.

“You got any exams tomorrow?”

“No, just a final essay due.”

“That one?” Sirius pointed to the papers on his bed.

“No, I finished it already. This is just something extra I’m doing for Bilshin.”

“Well, Señor Swot, you’ve lost your pencil,” Sirius smirked, “and I do have an exam tomorrow, so why don't you forget that 'something extra' and come and be a bad influence on me for a bit?"

Remus' mouth went uncomfortably dry. "What—" he had to clear his throat; "What did you have in mind?"

Sirius wiggled his eyebrows. "Let's try playing 'You're My Best Friend' again."

Oh…

Remus blinked. "Er—yeah, sure. Sounds great."

Clapping his hands together eagerly, Sirius darted back to his own bed as Remus stood up stiffly and reached for the Fender's case. Lifting it onto his bed covers, he snapped the clasps open and opened the lid, staring down at his bass guitar dumbly. He was suddenly aware of how chapped his lips were, and his stomach felt weird, and—

Oh no… no, no, no, no, no, no, no, no, no!

Remus squeezed his eyes shut.

Stomach.

He opened them, trying his hardest to recall anything even moderately disgusting. The stink-bomb stench, the way Snape's nose hairs curled at the ends, kissing McGonagall's bare feet—

"I'm definitely going to make you sing this time," Sirius called, looping the Rickenbacker's strap over his shoulder and turning around with a pick in his mouth. "Even if it's just the 'oooh' bit. And you gotta do the high note—like your balls haven't dropped."

Balls. Nob. Skin. Stomach?

"Fuck."

Sirius looked up from his guitar. "Moons?"

"Yeah! Sorry! I'm just gonna—I-I'm gonna go to the loo first."

Keeping his back to Sirius, Remus waddled into their bathroom, slamming the door behind him and throwing the bolt into place. He had only a few seconds to breathe before Sirius knocked.

"Moony, you okay?"

“Yeah—yeah, fine!”

“You feeling sick?”

“No, just give me a minute…" He needed noise. "Er—play the record maybe? I think I’ve forgotten the bridge bit. Just need to hear it and I’ll be good.”

“Okay, sure. Take your time.”

Sirius padded away from the door and Remus sighed again, cheeks burning as he rubbed at his eyes. “What the fuck…” he whispered to himself, before glancing down at his trousers, now awkwardly tented in the front. He looked around desperately, just as a record scratch sounded from outside the bathroom door and Queen began playing in their bedroom, followed by a great 'ooooh!'

Dropping his head back against the door, Remus let out a short groan. “Please, please don’t. Just shut up you idiot…”

But there it was. Sirius began to sing along, possibly even louder than usual to ensure that he’d hear it from inside the bathroom.

“Ooh, you make me live! Whatever this world can give to me, it’s you, you’re all I see! Ooh, you make me live now, honey! Ooh, you make me live!”

Fuck it, Remus thought in frustration; He can wait then, the bastard.

* * *

Thursday, 16th December 1976

Any problem could be avoided if one tried hard enough. Unfortunately, Sirius Black wasn’t just a simple problem, he was a personified predicament.

A second ‘incident’ popped up during their geography exam, leaving not only Remus’ sanity to suffer as a result, but surely his marks as well. It was freezing in the Great Hall, but he’d still had to remove his jumper midway through the test to cover his lap after an essay question pertaining to the ‘rolling plains of East Africa’ had left him unable to think about anything other than the curve and dip of Sirius’ pale stomach. It wasn't even the boners themselves that had him frazzled—he'd been insatiable at fourteen, once popping a woody after a school matron had praised him for being so good about his yearly check-up—it was the fact that they'd been spurned by none other than one of his bestest friends.

Everyone has a stomach, this doesn't mean it's about HIS stomach, he tried telling himself. But then, no one's stomach looks like his.

It was so stupid. Remus was positive that if Sirius ever caught wind of it he'd pitch himself off the roof of the astronomy building.

As always Sirius had finished the exam first and was waiting around outside when Remus marched out, his cheeks already splotched with red.

“There’s my little bookworm,” Sirius called, tucking his chilled hands under his armpits as he fell into step next to him. “How’d it go?”

“Fine,” Remus mumbled gruffly, keeping his eyes on the ground.

“So you reckon you’ve got this one bagged then? I know you’re trying to beat me, and I swear I won’t hold back. That’d just hurt your pride, hey?”

“Great. See you later.”

“Woah, hold on. What’s the rush?” Sirius grabbed his arm, and Remus flinched back sharply.

“I’ve just got something to do, okay!” He snapped, and Sirius stared at him until the red spread further down his neck. “Sorry. I—I really gotta return this book to Lily, so you should… wait for James.”

It felt wrong to blame Sirius for a problem that was so clearly his, but even when he managed to avoid the more physical reactions, Remus was unable to concentrate. He laid awake at night drowning in intrusive thoughts he normally would’ve been able to read or study through. Music might’ve helped, but there was no way he was going to cross their bedroom in the middle of the night and camp out mere inches from Sirius’ bed.

Things had only got worse the more Sirius tried to get his attention. He’d become awfully handsy since dating Kimmy, which made sense since they’d hardly kept their hands off one another, and every time he came close to touching him Remus had to resist the urge to pull away. Then, as if everything else weren’t enough, Sirius would play the most distracting songs he could think of every chance he got; as though he was unknowingly trying to punish Remus for his indiscretions. On the same evening of their failed practice session, he'd played "Why Don't We Do It in the Road?" on repeat under the guise that the cassette got stuck in the tape deck. That did not go over so well with James, who like Remus, had been suitably anxious over his exams—though he doubted he had to worry about rolling plains in Africa and stiff peaks elsewhere. The reality was that Remus needed a distraction from his distraction or he was going to fail every test he took.

After abandoning Sirius on the front steps of the Great Hall, he trudged down the snowy lane to the girls' dorm and began tossing small pebbles at their window until Marlene's face appeared and she stuck her head out into the cold.

"Just bringing back Lily's study guide for MFL," Remus said, holding up the booklet.

"Okay, bring it up," Marlene said, and he hopped on the slick electrical box to stretch up to the edge of the window. They were almost nose-to-nose.

"Lily not in?"

"No, it's just me actually," Marlene said with a tone of disappointment. "Mary was supposed to be around, but she said this morning that Laurence MacGregor had been eyeing her up during their exam. I doubt she'll be back any time soon."

"Oh."

"Mhm." She took the notes, and sheepishly traced her finger along the binding. "So… Do you want to come in?"

Remus immediately thought of Sirius. A distraction from his distraction.

"Yup, sure."

Smiling, Marlene drew back and let him pull himself inside. He knocked the snow off his boots on the ledge and she carried them into the bathroom before they could drip across the carpet while he slid the window closed after himself. It was nice and warm inside the girls' rooms, trunks already open and lined up against the wall in preparation for Christmas holiday.

"Tea?" Marlene offered. "I made it for Mary, but she's not gonna drink it. Should still be warm. I can put some music on too if you'd like."

"Please." Shucking off his coat, Remus looked around before deciding to settle down on the floor between Marlene and Lottie's beds, leaning his back up against one of the hutches.

"I'll spare you from any ABBA," Marlene said, setting an album on Mary's turntable. Remus smiled a bit, and a second later Joni Mitchell was playing.

"This okay?"

"Yeah sure, s'great," Remus said, as she tucked herself up onto her bed and passed him a cup of tea. "Joni Mitchell's… cool."

"I think so too," Marlene gushed. "I like 'Ladies of the Canyon' best… I think listening to her is what falling in love must feel like."

"Oh… Guess I never thought about it like that."

"Lily said it first actually. James sent her a couple albums over the summer—remember when they were just 'talking'? I guess this was one of them."

"That sap, he never told me that."

"It's cute to think they can finally say how much they like each other."

"Mhm." Remus raised his cup to his lips.

"You don't have to pay any attention to what Lily's been saying, you know," Marlene said suddenly, making him pause.

"You mean like the—"

"Yeah, she… she's just being silly. She's got it in her head that you and I… well, I dunno. Don't worry about it if it makes you uncomfortable."

"I'm not uncomfortable," Remus said, choosing his next words carefully; "I… like you, Marlene."

"Oh."

"I mean, you're a great friend."

"Oh, yeah you too."

He resisted the urge to smack himself in the forehead. Idiot.

While Marlene lifted her cup to her lips, looking anywhere but at him, Remus did the same and instantly frowned at the tea's bitter taste. No sugar.

"Oh that's right," Marlene chuckled lightly, "I forgot you preferred your tea as sweet as lemonade in summer. You'd probably be able to tell me exactly how much sugar is in each cup down to the gram."

"Ha, probably..."

With a funny look, Marlene stood up from her bed and plucked his teacup from his hand. "I'll be back with something sweeter," she said, lifting the tray and making for the door.

"No Marls, it's fine, really."

"It's not a bother, you just sit tight."

As the door fell closed behind her, Remus relaxed against the hutch and listened.

'Oh honey you turn me on,
I'm a radio;
I'm a country station,
I'm a little bit corny;
I'm a wildwood flower,
Waving for you—'

He closed his eyes, smiling to himself. "Oh Potter, you're so getting bullied for this one."

When Marlene finally returned, he was in the middle of changing the album, sorting through the girls' collection after being pleasantly surprised. "Who's got the Genesis album?" He asked, turning around to find Marlene standing there with enough tea mugs for an entire party. "What are you doing?"

"An experiment! Come sit down."

Without objection, Remus set the album down and followed her over to her bed, gingerly sitting down across from her on the soft, Rowena-blue covers.

"It's a blind taste-test," she said, gesturing to the cups. "Close your eyes and see if you can guess how many teaspoons of sugar I put in each one."

"Why?"

"Oh, indulge me, we've got nothing better to do. Unless you wanted to study some more?"

He didn't, so he closed his eyes and let Marlene push the first cup into his hand. This one tasted how James usually took his tea. "Two."

"Good job."

The next one was a little sweeter, but not by much.

"Three teaspoons—no, two and half."

"Damn, I thought I'd had you. Okay, next."

The third cup made him gag and his eyes flew open as he stared down at it. "Oh my god—you put the whole damn tin in here?"

"Close. That one has nine scoops."

Remus shook his head. Most of the sugar hadn't even dissolved, just sat at the bottom collecting into a tiny white mountain.

"Last cup," Marlene smiled, handing it to him. Remus sipped it and sighed. Perfect.

"Four scoops."

"Ding-ding-ding! We have a winner."

"Now you have to try the one with nine scoops."

"No way! It'll go straight to my waist. You're the only one who can afford it, you twig."

"Ow, my twig-feelings."

Laughing, Marlene set the tray aside and picked up her own tea. They sat there facing each other on the bed, sipping it in easy silence. Marlene watched him with her blue eyes and he found himself wondering if Lily really was right after all. If he could like Marlene, then maybe he could put all this nonsense with Sirius behind him.

“Marleeeeene, my looooove!” Mary sang as she burst into the bedroom. “You’ll never guess who I snogged under the stairs—oh, hi Remus!”

* * *

Saturday 18th December 1976

Despite Lily’s vote of confidence, Remus was not excited to receive his end of term marks. He hadn’t exactly failed, per say, but the results were certainly less than anticipated.

“What happened?” She gasped, flipping through his school report with green eyes the size of dinner plates. “I-I mean they're fine, but what the heck? You studied so much!”

“I know,” he said sorely. “Guess I just tripped at the finish line.”

Lily frowned sympathetically and passed his report back, adjusting her bag as they made their way down House Lane. “There’s always next term.”

“Yup.”

“Aw, cheer up, Remus. If Black has anything to say about it just tell me and I’ll give him detention for being an arse.”

He half-smiled, kicking a stone out of his path. “Lily Evans, my knight in shining armour.”

“And don’t forget, light of your life.”

“Of course. It’s a wonder James hasn’t gotten jealous.”

Lily locked her hands behind her back, smiling shyly. “He’s odd that way—I think he loves too much. Couldn’t be angry at his friends if he tried.”

Remus was suddenly reminded of his conversation with Marlene in her dorm room. “Speaking of love…” He glanced sideways at her, eyebrows raised. “Have you two, you know, said it yet?”

“You mean have we said ‘it’ yet?” Lily bit her lip. “No. Feels a bit heavy, I think. James said it once, but I think it was just sort of on an impulse. It surprised me, and I… didn’t say it back. He said it didn't bother him and that we should take our time, but… I think I’m worried that once we do say it one of us will realise it's not true."

"You've got to be joking me," Remus replied automatically. "That's such bollocks, Lils. You and James are—"

"Are what—an expectation? Well have any of you ever stopped to consider how that might feel? The pressure it might come with? I know I'm right—James loves too much, and I don't want to be the thing that stops that."

"So you don't love him?"

"No—or I mean, I think I do, but I don't want to be wrong either. Everyone says that you just know when you love someone, like a lightbulb going off in your head. But how can you tell a regular lightbulb from a love lightbulb? I don't want to get it wrong and regret it, not when James is… you know, James."

"I get it," Remus said. "But you should know that James only has love lightbulbs, and if you asked him to, he'd happily share."

Lily laughed. "What a dumb metaphor."

"Bet James would find it funny."

"Ha, probably."

"You should ask him tonight, at the party."

"That's still happening?"

Remus nodded as they stopped outside Godric House. "James and Sirius somehow convinced Kenny to let us have the whole common room to ourselves. He wouldn't let them throw an actual party, so it'll just be us. But it's something before we all go home for the holidays."

"Sounds nice. I should go on ahead then. I've still got some packing to do before we leave tomorrow."

"You're coming on our train right?"

She nodded. "I'll get off midway at Doncaster and transfer onto Lime Street's line from there."

"And how's Snape feel knowing he'll be taking the other train alone?"

Lily bit her lip and scuffed her shoes on the sidewalk. "I haven't told him yet actually…”

“You’re just full of secrets this year, aren’t you?”

“Must be contagious.” Lily looked him up and down pointedly before stepping down the sidewalk. “I’ll see you later, then. Make sure you get all your packing done so you’re not scrambling tomorrow.”

“Yeah okay, see you.”

With a wave, Lily left him outside of his dorm and Remus ducked inside. He checked the message board—a missed call from Giles, probably just organising his trip home; and there!

A call from Tomny.

Eagerly, Remus dropped his bag to the floor in front of one of the phones and dialled the flat. A voice answered after a few rings, one he didn’t recognise.

“ 'Ello, whatcha want?”

“Is Tomny around? It’s Remus.”

“Oh blimey,” the voice said, before distantly calling, “s'Remus!”

There was some shuffling of the receiver on the other end and Lee’s voice came through, bright and cheery; “Lupin! Hey! Long time no chat, mate. How’s tricks?”

“Good,” Remus answered, “how you been?”

“Oh, just hunky-dory. You lookin’ for Tomny?”

“Yeah.”

“Sorry, he’s not actually around at the moment—Tonya somehow convinced him to take her out for the night. Right now it’s jus' me and Ian—my lil' bro. You jus' heard him there—Ian say hi.” In the background, Remus heard Ian call out a friendly ‘ello’.

“Hey, Ian,” Remus replied, “I don’t think he and I've met.”

“Ah yeah, nah,” Lee said. “He’s new fish around here. We finally found someone to replace you, Lu!”

Remus swallowed, and took a moment to switch his receiver to the other ear. “Oh yeah?”

“Oh don’t worry, the nob’s not nearly as tall or cheeky.”

“Glad to hear it. Well, I got a message that Tomny called but I must’ve missed him. I’ll be on the train back to London tomorrow, so I guess I’ll try him from home.”

“Oh yeah,” Lee started, “can’t wait to see you. When you droppin' in?”

Remus paused. “Oh, uh, I’m not sure.”

“Tom said you’d be comin' around. S'been too long—bet that school makes you want to tear yer hair out at the roots, yeah?”

Lee laughed, but Remus blazed right past it. “Tomny told you I was coming? He—he said I could come?”

“Mm-hm.”

“When?”

“I dunno, yesterday maybe? Tonya hasn’t shut up about it—did you know they never fight unless it’s about you? Most of us have money on which of them gets you in the divorce.”

It felt as though Remus’ entire body was humming. “I’ll come,” he promised. “When I get back—you can tell Tomny I’m coming.”

“Brilliant. Should be good. I’ll see you then.”

“Absolutely.”

Lee hung up and Remus squeezed the phone tightly in both hands, almost bouncing up and down on the spot. He could hardly believe it, Tomny was letting him come back. He wasn’t going to spend his entire holiday at the estate with only Giles, the dogs, and a few nameless servants for company. Everything else felt like pointless chatter—his jealousy, avoiding Sirius, bombing his exams. Screw his poor marks, nothing could ruin his good mood.

“Alright there, Moony?”

Remus turned around to find Sirius standing in the middle of the main hall, a piece of poster board tucked under one arm.

“Yeah, brilliant! You?”

Sirius looked him up and down and smiled. “Champion. Look.” He lifted the board up for Remus to see; in big block letters it read, PRIVATE PARTY—MESSERS ONLY!

“That for tonight?” He asked, and Sirius nodded eagerly.

“We get one final hurrah before we all return to our own shitty realities, so might as well make a show of it, right?”

Chapter End Notes

Lots of songs referenced in this chapter:
The opening song by The Who was originally written and performed by jazz artist Mose Allison (1957) and covered by The Who on their 1970’s "Live at Leeds" album. Both versions kick ass.
The song Remus and Sirius play is George Harrison's “While My Guitar Gently Weeps” (1968).
"Sweet Emotion" is by Aerosmith (1975).
"Stone Cold Crazy" is by Queen (1974).
The song Sirius sings is "You're My Best Friend" by Queen (1976).
“Why Don’t We Do It in the Road?” is by the Beatles (1968).

‘A dab hand’ is slang for being an expert in something.
A 'breve' is the UK term for a double whole note. 'Quavers' are eighth notes.
'MFL' is just an acronym for Modern Foreign Languages.
A 'school report' or just 'report' is the same thing as a 'report card'.
Lime Street is a large train station in Liverpool.

A/N: I believe I will make Fridays/Saturdays my post days for September. Something to start the weekends off right. Cheers <3

Chapter 43: Cherry

Chapter Summary

Final night at Hawkings before Christmas holiday. Friendships are changed and tested.

Chapter Notes

CW: Drinking and homophobic language.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Man has always wanted a woman by his side to keep him company,
Women always knew that it takes a man to get matrimony and harmony;
Everybody knows that a man who's feeling down wants some female sympathy,
Gotta have love to carry on living,
Gotta have love 'til eternity...

- "People Need Love" ABBA, 1972

Really it was kind of Kenny to hand over the common room for their last night at school. Remus doubted it made him or any of his friends very popular, but other kids stayed away for the most part, deterred by Sirius' sign and the threat that any party-crashers would receive detention and in the very least, a nasty wedgie.

All of them piled in together and turned the couches into a single ring the way Simeon and his friends had done the year before. The fire burning in the grate was doing its job of keeping them warm with the windows cracked, though they had more than enough booze for that anyway. Invites had been extended to all of their closest friends, including a few plus ones. It had seemed like a good and fair idea at the beginning, but unfortunately Mary's choice of company couldn't have been worse. While Lily and James snuggled up to one another on the sofa and Peter and Lottie brought along their own respective partners, Mary called upon a year 13 bloke she'd been seeing named Bryan. Remus thought he could see the interest—Bryan had wavy brown hair with baby blue eyes and chiselled jaw to boot—but it only took about ten minutes for the rest of them to figure out he had the personality of sour milk.

While Lottie and Mickey disappeared to share one of the spliffs Remus had rolled, Sirius had set up the common room's turntable, only slightly frustrated that the needle needed a ten pence taped to its top to weigh it down so that it didn't skip. Everyone seemed content to sit back and let Mary and Sirius have it out over the music—Mary favoured Diana Ross and Bay City Rollers while Sirius wanted Faces and ZZ Top, so naturally they compromised with The Moody Blues and The Beach Boys.

"Always thought The Beach Boys were a little too buggery to be any good," Bryan said as Sirius set Pet Sounds on the turntable.

"Tell me Bry," he said wryly, "do you prefer painting everything in black and white, or just rock and roll?"

"You call 'Wouldn't It Be Nice' rock and roll?"

"Yes. They're a rock band."

"Pink Floyd's a rock band."

"Oh, you hear that, Pot?" Sirius called. "Pink Floyd's a rock band. Did you know?"

James shook his head; "Nah, could've fooled me."

"All I'm saying is there's levels," Bryan said.

" 'Levels'?"

"Yeah, like Syd Barrett had this whole thing going on—"

"Pretty sure that was the acid actually," Remus interjected. "The last few songs he wrote for the band were unplayable."

"Yeah well, these poofters couldn't hold a candle to real music."

"Oh save me from the follies of my betters," Sirius huffed sarcastically. "This is one of the albums that made the sixties."

"And 'Dark Side of the Moon' absolutely blows it out of the water."

"Syd Barrett wasn't even in the band when they produced that album!"

"That's enough ladies, we all have ears and opinions of our own," Mary said from her spot on the couch next to Bryan. "Now get back here, Sirius, so I can finish your eyeliner."

Looking pointedly at Bryan, Sirius set up the needle and waited until the song had started before crossing back to Mary and dropping down in front of her on the rug. It'd been several weeks since Remus had last seen him wearing the makeup or polish, but he supposed going home for the holiday had Sirius wanting to push the envelope once more. He didn't mind either, it made the blue in his eyes stand out—made them 'pop', or whatever the girls were always going on about.

"Want another drink, Remus?" Marlene asked, as she divided up another case of beer. Looking away from Sirius and Mary, Remus took two and waved one at James.

"Potter, catch."

Unwrapping his arm from Lily long enough to snag the can from the air, James popped the tab and sucked up the foam before looking back to Bryan, who was still scowling in Sirius' direction. "Got something else to say, Bryan?" He asked.

Bryan leaned away from Mary's side, expression sour. "Just don't see the point in a bloke wearing makeup."

"It's fashion," Mary defended as she finished Sirius' eyeliner. "Since when has fashion needed a gender?"

"You're not coming near me with that crap."

James was on his feet in an instant. He crossed the circle and went around the coffee table to help Sirius to his feet before grabbing his best friend's face with both hands, turning it this way and that to get a good look at him while Sirius stared back with big eyes.

"I think it looks great," he announced, before releasing Sirius and pushing him toward his old spot next to Lily. "Mary, would you do mine?"

Mary's mouth dropped open into a little 'o'. "You really want me to?"

" 'Course. It's just fashion." James shot a dark look at Bryan, who just rolled his eyes and sipped his beer smugly.

Mary nodded eagerly and James dropped down to her level, barely flinching as she ran the pencil across his lower lash line. When she'd finished he stood up again, turning around to Sirius and Lily, who had cuddled up next to each other in anticipation. “What do you think?”

“Very handsome,” Lily declared, just as Sirius said; “Hot.”

“You both look great!” Mary agreed enthusiastically.

James grinned and wiped under his eyes, which despite his bravery, had started to water. “Want her to do yours, Pete?” He asked, turning to Peter and Moira who were on the next couch. Peter looked at his girlfriend, then James, and shrugged.

“Er, sure—”

“Blimey, Mary, I knew you had girlfriends but I didn’t know you were into girls,” Bryan snorted.

James whirled around, but it was Remus’ turn. He stood and held a hand to James’ chest as he stepped past him, stopping over Bryan and Mary’s couch and holding out his hand. “Mary, may I?”

Without any hesitation, Mary passed the eye pencil over and Remus pressed it to the corner of his eye, drawing a very poor line across his lid with a shaky hand before doing the same to the other. Eyes watering like James’, he passed the pencil back and glared down at Bryan again, who hadn’t moved but had straightened up slightly on the couch. “I think it’s time for you to leave, Bry,” he ordered. “This is actually a private party.”

Bryan scoffed. “I was invited.”

“And now I’m uninviting you.”

“Oh yeah? Fine then.” He looked at Mary. “Guess we should get out of here, babe.”

“I think I’m gonna stay actually,” Mary said, while casually examining her nails. “You know, visit with my friends before we all go home for two weeks.”

“What?”

“Yeah, you should totally go though. Don’t think we have any Pink Floyd to play anyway, and to be honest, I’m just not sure you’re girlish enough for me, Bry.”

Affronted, Bryan drew back and looked around the room, then up to Remus, who was still staring him down. Finally he smacked his beer down and stood up, putting them nearly chest to chest. Remus wrinkled his nose—he smelt like a mixture of sour aftershave and cheap cigars.

“Fine,” Bryan snarled, before stepping away. “Never wanted to hang around a bunch of fucking queers anyway.”

Acting on instinct, Remus flinched forward like he might lunge at him and Bryan just about jumped out of his skin before scoffing and stomping out of the common room. They heard the dorm’s front doors slam shut and instantly everyone began snorting in laughter.

“I think he about pissed his pants just then!” Sirius guffawed.

“You wouldn’t have really hit him, would you, Remus?” Asked Lily.

“If he had, the dick would’ve deserved it,” James answered, returning to the couch and squeezing in between her and Sirius.

“I think you all but ruined my eyeliner to prove your point, Remus,” Mary said, examining the makeup pencil with a look of disappointment.

“Yeah well, you’re not allowed to pick your own boyfriends anymore,” he said to her. Mary just shrugged innocently, blowing him a cheeky kiss as he returned to his own couch next to Marlene.

“I think you missed a few spots,” Marlene observed, licking her thumb and wiping it across his eyelid. Remus groaned fondly and batted her away as the rest of his friends continued their happy chatter. By the time they’d gotten through both sides of Pet Sounds they were all reasonably gassed and giggly and had come to the collective conclusion that wherever Lottie and Mickey had taken that spliff, they were unlikely to return.

“At least we know some of us are getting some,” Sirius observed, raising his beer toward the two remaining couples in the room. Moira blanched and Peter flipped him off, but James had the privilege of being closer and just shoved Sirius for the comment. Unfortunately, Sirius had been sitting on the back of the couch. He toppled backwards—drink and all—straight into the turntable’s stand. There was a record-scratching stop and the turntable went down with a bang as Sirius gave a low groan.

“Oh shit!” James yelped, jumping up. “Sorry, mate!”

“He deserves it for being so nasty,” Marlene called. She was half laying down on the couch with her legs draped up over Remus’ lap. It was hard for him not to be conscious of her since his and Lily’s conversation, but he’d had such a good day and was now decently drunk, which made leaving any anxiety at the door considerably easier.

“Yeah, don’t think the record player deserved it though,” James winced. He went around the couch to help Sirius up and then righted the player, which now had a broken needle.

“Damn,” Sirius sighed. “Okay, well, we’ve got the other stereo upstairs. Moony, come help me bring ours down.”

Remus set his beer aside. “Yup.”

“Wait,” Lily called, sitting up very quickly. “I forgot we left that gin and whisky in the fridge. Sirius, would you come and help me mix some drinks?”

“Why me? Get your man to do it.”

“James was just going to the bathroom. Weren’t you, Potter?”

James looked between the broken record player and his girlfriend. He appeared confused at first, like he was going to correct her, but then understanding bloomed on his face. “Ah—yeah. Now seems like a great time to wee.”

Lily smiled, clearly pleased. “Great. Sirius will help me, and… Marls, you can help Remus bring the stereo down!”

Marlene lifted her mouth from the drink she’d been nursing. “Sure...?”

Sirius looked around. “But it’s not Marlene’s room—”

“C’mon, Black,” Lily said, jumping up from the couch and reaching across it to grab Sirius by the elbow, leading him toward the dorm’s kitchenette. As they went Marlene withdrew her legs from Remus’ lap and stood up.

“Lead the way.”

Remus pushed up from the couch and together they unwound themselves from the circle, heading for the stairs. On the second floor, Marlene let out a loud groan.

“I forgot you guys lived on the fourth floor,” she sighed, before her foot came out from underneath her and she nearly slipped down the stairs they’d already climbed. Grabbing her forearm, Remus waited until she was steady again before letting go. “Sorry,” she half-laughed, “it’s like I’ve got two left feet when I’m drinking.”

“Better than me. I’ve always got two left feet, drunk or not.”

Marlene smiled and bit her lip and they went on to the fourth floor, Remus letting her inside their bedroom and flicking on the light.

“I’ve never been in a boy’s dorm room before,” she admitted, taking in the posters and discarded socks scattered about the room.

“It’s not usually this spick and span,” he joked, crossing to the window and lifting several albums off the top of the hi-fi.

“It’s not that bad. Much better than my brothers' rooms when we were growing up,” Marlene hummed. She’d stopped in front of his Queen poster and admired it with her hands locked behind her back. “This one your bed?”

“Mhm.”

Marlene bent down and picked up one of the books from the pile on his nightstand. “Oh, I’d wondered where this one went.”

“Sorry. You can take it back if you want.”

She set the book down. “No, it’s fine. You take your time with it.”

“Thanks.”

As Remus fiddled with the chords plugged into the stereo’s back, Marlene joined him, absent-mindedly spinning the volume dial with her finger. “It was good of you to defend Sirius and Mary.”

Remus shrugged. “Bryan’s a dick.”

“Oh yeah. Tried telling Mary that already. Guess she needed to hear it from another guy. She’s always got boys on the brain.”

“I guess not everyone can be as sensible as you, Marls.”

Marlene dropped her finger from the dial. “You think I don’t like boys?”

Remus froze. “No—er—that’s not what I meant—”

“I do,” she insisted, “but I sort of think it’s the person that counts, not their… gender…”

“Well, that makes sense.”

The hopeful expression that bloomed on Marlene’s face made a lump rise in his throat. She was tall for a girl but still had to look up at him, and Remus got a funny feeling in his gut.

“You really think so?” Marlene asked.

“Sure,” he said dimly, “shouldn’t you like someone as a person first? Before you—you know, date them?”

She considered. “I like you, Remus. As a person.”

“Oh.” He released the wires and stepped back from the stereo a bit. “I like you as a person too.”

Marlene dropped her gaze to the ground before looking up again, more hopeful than before. “Have you ever kissed anyone, Remus?”

He suddenly felt like he was holding his breath. “One or two people.”

“I’ve never kissed anyone,” she confessed.

“It’s really not all that.”

“It’s not?”

“No, I lied,” he said, quickly. “But I guess it feels better if you… like them as a person first.”

Marlene pressed her lips together and nodded slowly. She had such big blue eyes. Remus’ palms felt sweaty; he was still lashed. When had she gotten this close? She smelt like beer, but also sort of fruity.

“Are you going to kiss me?” She asked.

Remus opened his mouth, but no sound came out. He spread his palm out flat against the top of the stereo’s cool metal, and with it grounding him, leaned forward. Their lips met in the middle and they both bounced back slightly as though they’d given each other a static shock, but then the surprise wore off and they were just kissing. It lasted maybe only a few seconds before Marlene pulled away, cheeks tinged with pink. They stared at one another, and Remus licked his lips, tasting her lip gloss.

“Tastes like cherry.”

“Huh?”

“Your lipstick.”

“Oh.” Marlene held a hand to her mouth before smiling behind her fingers. “Yeah. It’s Mary’s actually.”

“Cool…” Letting out a breath, Remus drummed his fingers on top of the hi-fi.

“We should probably go back down,” Marlene said, “before Mary and Sirius riot without any music to argue over.”

“Yeah, sure. Here, you want to carry this?” Grateful for the distraction, Remus grabbed Sirius’ turntable and passed it to her before hastily disconnecting the rest of the stereo’s wires and lifting it into his arms. With the sound system between them it was hard to imagine they’d been so close only seconds before.

Marlene smiled sweetly, still blushing, and turned to leave the room. They didn't say anything on the way down, eyes glued to the stairs so they wouldn't slip, and by the time they made it down to the ground floor Remus had managed to shake off most of his jitters.

“It just feels like socially-accepted misogyny,” Mary was saying, as they strode back into the common room.

“Disliking pop music is not the same thing as misogyny,” Sirius argued, passing her a drink.

“You like The Faces, but what is Rod Stewart on his own? He’s a pop star.”

“He writes ballads!”

“You’re delusional.”

“Moony!” Sirius shouted when he spotted them. Shooting across the room, he halved Remus' burden when he grabbed hold of the other side of the stereo. “Save me! They want to play more disco-pop.”

“Disco?” Remus echoed sorely.

“It’s party music,” Mary called. She raised a Bee Gees album and Marlene’s face lit up. Remus watched her, tongue pressed to the inside of his cheek, and slowly cracked a small smile.

“Maybe it is time we diversify, Black. After all, what is glam rock if not disco?”

Sirius’ mouth dropped open. “No, don’t tell me they’ve gotten to you too? I can’t handle losing three mates in one day.”

“I only said they’re kind of R&B,” James scoffed.

“And funk is kinda fun,” Peter added.

Sirius moaned and dropped his forehead down on top of the hi-fi in Remus’ arms.

“Oh c’mon, you whiner,” Mary cackled as Marlene brought her the turntable; “It’s good to leave your options open in life. You never know what sort of fun you’ll find if you do.”

* * *

Remus was thrilled to be going home. Not only was he going to get to see the rest of his friends, but this was the perfect way to reset the clock. No more jealousy or whinging—or incidents—just good friends and good music and good times. That is if Sirius ever got on the bleeding bus.

“C’mon, Black, they’re going to leave without us!”

“You say that as if it’s a bad thing.”

Remus danced from foot to foot. How was he supposed to explain to Sirius, who held such a strong distaste for going home, that it was a bad thing. Missing the bus and having to catch a later train would only mean less time spent at the flat, and therefore less time with the friends he’d only recently learned he’d get to see again.

“If you don’t come now I’ll never tell you what I got on the geography exam," he threatened.

“Alright, alright, don’t get your knickers in a twist.” A moment passed and Sirius gave a great ‘a-ha!’ from inside the bathroom. He came out with his trunk in one hand, his chain necklace in the other. “Sucker must’ve fallen behind the toilet when I was showering last night.”

“Peachy, can we go now?”

Sirius shook his head and dusted the necklace off on his shirt before popping his top button and stringing it around his neck. As he did so, a charm on the end of the necklace caught Remus’ eye.

“That a pick?”

Sirius perked up and then glanced down before touching his collarbone. “Oh yeah,” he held up the guitar pick, which was strung on the chain as though it were some holy cross. “Put it on there myself. You like it?”

“Yeah,” Remus said, “it looks cool.”

Sirius smiled and then bit his lip before taking the chain off again and holding it out to him. “Here.”

“What?”

“Take it.”

“No, it's yours,” Remus scoffed.

“Only half. The other half’s yours technically.”

Remus looked at him, confused, and Sirius pinched the pick. “It’s the pick from last year. You gave it to me just after exams, remember? Guess it’s my turn to give it back.”

Remus was quite honestly stunned. He hadn’t even remembered doing that, and yet Sirius had been carrying the cheap and thoughtless gift around with him everywhere. “Still, it’s your necklace. You should keep it.”

“You really think it’s that tacky?”

“No, of course not! But it's clearly important to you—”

Sirius came forward quickly and grabbed Remus’ hand, folding the necklace into his palm. “Mum actually tried to take it last time she saw it. I’d rather you have it than lose it to her. Just think of it as an early Christmas gift.”

“I haven’t gotten anything for you,” Remus said slowly, staring down at the chain. It was warm to the touch, or maybe that was just Sirius.

“Good thing I’ve already thought up what you can give me,” Sirius said, strolling back to his abandoned trunk.

“And what’s that?”

He jutted his thumb toward Remus’ bed, clicking his tongue; “When you gonna make good on that promise of yours?”

It took Remus a moment to understand but once he did he glanced to his right, where Hope’s records sat quietly beneath the bed. Untouched and unplayed. “You want the records? Well… you can just have them, I suppose.”

Sirius sighed. “I don’t want to take them from you, dummy, I want to listen to them with you.”

“Oh.”

“Yeah. If you… want to, that is.”

“You sure that’s what you want for Christmas?” Remus licked his lips. “They’re just records.”

Sirius shrugged. “They’re important to you. I think it’d be cool if they could be important to all of us.” He smirked. “For now though, I’ll settle for you fessing up over that exam.”

Remus tucked the chain into his pocket and considered. “Okay. I got a sixty-five.”

“You—a sixty-five?!”

“Yup. Let’s go.” Remus turned and shot out of their room.

“Lupin!”

Sirius only managed to catch up with him on the ground floor, which was nearly empty now that most students were already down by the buses. James and Peter had gone on ahead to collect their girlfriends, both of which were accompanying them. Between them and the other girls, Remus expected the compartment was going to be rather crowded.

“I don’t need the ‘but you studied’ lecture. I already got it from Lily,” Remus insisted as he and Sirius made their way down the path short-cut to Castle Hall, breath visible in the chilly December air.

“Bet mine would be way funnier though,” Sirius said, knocking his trunk into Remus’ thigh. He paused afterwards to let out a low groan, holding his stomach and still clearly feeling the effects of the hangover he’d sworn he didn’t have.

“You should’ve avoided that whisky,” Remus told him.

“I paced myself.”

“Uh-huh, whatever you say. Just make sure you sit next to James on the train. I’m not wearing your breakfast for nine hours.”

“You’re right. And you can sit with Evans. I don’t need to witness another show like last night’s lovefest anyway.”

Remus smiled as he recollected the shift in James and Lily’s outward affection the moment hard liquor had made an appearance. “They weren’t that bad. Nothing compared to you on the pull.”

“So you’ve been paying attention!” Sirius laughed. “Good. This must mean we’re okay.”

“Why wouldn’t we be okay?” Remus asked, slowing his strides a bit.

“Oh don’t give me that. You’ve been acting funny, and I think I know why.”

“You do?”

“Yup. You were upset I was spending so much time with James. We got caught up with the music and sort of forgot about you. So I’m sorry.”

“Oh, that.” Remus let out a breath of relief. “Don’t worry, I’m over it.”

“So you were mad?”

“More like ‘casually irritated’. But it’s fine now. James sounds really good for a beginner. You’re a great teacher.”

Sirius lit up and skipped forward until he was walking backwards in front of him. “Nah, it’s all him, I swear! He’s gonna take Andy’s guitar home for Christmas to practice too. Bet he'll come back sounding like Robert Johnson or something. Give his soul for God's own talent.”

Remus smiled. “Careful, he might just come back next term sounding better than you.”

“I wouldn’t put it past the wanker. He’s just got this magic in his fingers or something! Evans’ is a lucky gal.”

“Ugh, don’t be gross.”

“What? Oh c'mon, I know you’re a bit of a prude, Moons, but one day you’re gonna get over that and when you do you’ll see that—”

“I kissed Marlene.”

Sirius stopped dead in his tracks and Remus had to side-step to avoid running into him.

“What?”

“Last night,” he confessed. “In our room.”

Sirius blinked at him before looking around with a shocked sense of bewilderment. Remus could almost see the gears turning in his head, while just a little further down the road a crowd of teachers and kids stood shuffling around in front of a long row of buses.

“What the fuck,” Sirius said finally; “Marlene? Why her?”

“Why not?” Remus rebuked.

“It’s just… since when?”

“Since when what?”

“Since when have you liked her?!”

“I’ve always liked Marlene.”

Eyes widening again, Sirius huffed and muttered under his breath; “Jesus Christ… So what, this gonna be a thing now?”

“I don’t know. Why are you getting so pissy?”

“She’s our friend.”

“Lily’s our friend too, and you didn’t seem to have much of a problem with it when you propositioned me to get her to fall in love with James last year."

"I didn't ask you to get her to fall in love with him!"

"Okay, and what about you and Mary the year before that?"

“That’s different. Marlene’s…”

“She’s what?”

Sirius pressed his lips together in a sour line. “Never mind. Let’s just go.” He turned and stalked away, trunk in hand, and Remus was left to stare after him. There hadn’t been much time since the kiss to worry about what it meant for their friend group, and though he had expected some teasing, Sirius’ reaction left a bad taste in his mouth.

“Hey, hold on!” Remus used his long legs to catch up with Sirius, who was nearly to the buses now. “Are you really this angry that I kissed a girl when you—”

“Shh!” Sirius smacked a hand to the centre of Remus’ chest to silence him.

"Don't shush me!"

"Shut up then! And bloody look!”

Following his gaze, Remus spotted Snape staring down the rest of their friends as they waited to board the bus. "Oh fuck," he sighed. "Gotta hand it to the slimy git, he never really cares much about being outnumbered."

Sirius didn't respond, only set off across the berm with his trunk in one hand. Following closely on his heels, Remus met his friends and pulled to a stop next to Mary and Marlene, who were both scowling with their arms crossed over their chest. Sirius barely glanced at Marlene, and went straight to Mary’s other side, nudging her.

“What’s Snivellus want?” He asked.

Mary whispered back; “He’s upset Lily’s taking our train.”

“Why would you want to get off at Doncaster?!” Snape demanded loudly, making James huff at Lily’s side.

“It’s none of your business, Snivellus.”

“Wasn’t talking to you, skiver.”

“Stop that,” Lily snapped from behind her muffler. “Sev, I’m sorry, I just thought it might be okay to take the other line this time.”

“You don’t have to explain yourself to him every time he comes whining,” James said.

“Shush. Sev, I really am sorry. You should come with us!”

“You're sorry? Sorry for what—lying to me?!”

“I didn’t lie, I just didn’t—”

“Tell me!” Snape howled. “You didn’t tell me! Just like you didn’t tell me you spent our last night before holiday at their dorm!” He jabbed a finger at James.

Lily’s eyes widened. “Who—”

“Bryan had some things to say when he got back!”

Remus resisted rolling his eyes. Did they put all the insufferable assholes in Salazar?

“Really,” Snape blagged on, “walking home so late—or should I say early? People are going to get the wrong idea, Lily. You don’t want anyone thinking you’re a slag do you?”

Marlene gasped loud enough for all of them, and James shot across the space between them, grabbing Snape by the front of his jacket. “Don’t you dare talk to my girlfriend like that!” He barked, and Snape’s eyes shot wide.

“Him?!” He shrieked at Lily. “You—HIM?!"

“Go ahead, keep talking, see what happens!” James growled, drawing an even bigger crowd.

“Gentlemen!” Sheila shouted, sliding through a few Byron House students who’d stopped to watch. “Oh, Jesus F. Chop—are we going to have to have this conversation again, you two?! Because I was under the distinct impression that we’d finished this last year! Mr. Potter—release Mr. Snape this instant!”

James immediately dropped Snape’s collar, and the other boy staggered back as their teacher stepped between them. Dressed in a bright blue parka, Sheila looked more like a blueberry than a teacher, but her threat cut through her wardrobe as per usual. “Whose bus is this?" She demanded.

"Ours," Lily answered, earning her an extra-nasty glare from Snape. Sheila turned on him.

"Mr. Snape, is this your bus?"

"… No."

"Where is your bus?"

Snape begrudgingly gestured down the line.

"Then shouldn't you be standing next to it?"

Jaw clenched bitterly, Snape shot one last look at Lily and James before he marched off. They all watched him go and Sheila checked her watch. "Right, well, buses will be leaving soon. I want the rest of you on board. Now." She looked at James and gave him a pointed 'go on' wave.

Nodding, James turned and walked back to Lily. "Sorry, I think I messed up," he mumbled, and Lily sighed sadly before taking his gloved hand and giving it a squeeze. He smiled faintly, and together they climbed onto the bus followed by a rattled-looking Peter and Moira.

Remus turned to Sirius, fully expecting a quip at Snape's expense, but he wasn't there, and when he looked back to the bus doors he found Sirius climbing the steps behind Mary with hands in his pockets.

"C'mon, Remus," Sheila said, smiling at him. "Don't want to miss your bus."

Awkwardly, Remus nodded and set his trunk down with the rest where the driver was busy packing them in the bus's boot. He made his way to the stairs and turned back to find Sheila waving at him. "Have a happy Christmas," she called, before turning to say the same to any other student who looked her way.

"Happy Christmas, Mrs. Buchanan," he said quietly, before boarding the bus.

* * *

Sirius did not talk to him the entire ride to the station. He took a seat near the back of the bus with Sandy Herron from music and left him to sit with Lottie, who was apparently 'immensely sad' to be separated from Mickey for the holidays but 'uber-excited' to go home to do some proper shopping and visit her other girlfriends. A seat ahead, James and Lily leaned into one another, apologising quietly and comforting each other over the fight. Remus knew Snape was a touchy subject between them, but he hoped letting the cat out of the bag would finally put his and Lily's dying friendship to rest.

By the time their bus pulled into the train station Remus had to wee so badly he was practically dancing in his seat. Unfortunately bad road conditions on the way there meant there was only time to grab their bags and rush to the platform or risk missing the train all together. They piled into a compartment—only seven of them since Peter had gone off to join Moira—and played musical chairs until they all fit. The entire time Sirius stayed as far from Remus as he could, more content to let James sit with one asscheek on his lap than to even glance in his direction. If it'd just been the four of them Remus would've demanded they have it out right there, but with the girls around he felt less willing to poke holes in their veiled friendship. So, as the train pulled away from the platform he resigned himself to the reality that the next time he spoke to Sirius might just be in 1977.

Feeling extra-stuffy and really needing to go now, Remus finally excused himself from the compartment and set off down the aisle, looking for the bathroom.

"Remus? Wait up!" Someone called after him. He turned to find Marlene, slipping out of the compartment after him.

"Oh hey, Marls. Sorry but I really gotta—"

"I just need a second," Marlene insisted, reaching him and unlacing her scarf from her neck with one hand. She was tightly fisting a book to her chest with the other, her knuckles white. "I needed to say this before I lose my nerve."

"Marlene McKinnon lose her nerve? Imposs—"

"I wanted to apologise."

Remus stopped bouncing from foot to foot and cleared his throat a bit. "Apologise? Apologise for what?"

Marlene winced a bit. "For forcing you to kiss me last night. We were pretty drunk—or at least I was—and I let this thing Lily said go to my head—"

"Marlene, you didn't force me to kiss you."

"I didn't?"

"No. I…" Remus shook his head, searching for the right words, "I kissed you too. It was fine."

"Oh…"

"I mean it was more than fine—it was good."

Marlene bit her lip. "Oh."

"Yeah, so—don't apologise." Sirius' words echoed through his memory. "You're not any different from anyone else. S'normal to kiss. Or at least, that's what I've heard…"

"Cool." Blushing a bit, Marlene reached up to tuck a lock of her hair behind her ear. "Because I didn't want you to think that I expected anything."

Remus straightened up. "Oh no. Never."

"Or that you had to—"

"Mm-mm, nope."

"But if you were interested, then I would, maybe—"

"Maybe—?"

"If you thought that—"

"We—"

"Yeah?"

"Yeah!"

"Are we talking about the same thing?"

Remus pursed his lips. "What are you talking about…?"

"Um—us?"

“Oh, yeah! Totally.”

“Really?”

He gulped. “Mhm. Sure, I suppose?"

Marlene clapped her hands together lightly. “Great. So—um—I’ll call you? Over Christmas? Or—or you can call me… of course.”

Remus thought instantly of the flat. “How about I call you,” he suggested.

Marlene nodded instantly, biting her lip. “Okay. Here.” She pulled a little slip of paper from inside her book. “Glad I have that now—felt a bit silly, but it’s my family’s number. You can call it and just ask for me.”

“Brilliant.” He took the note and stared at it lightly before tucking it into his pocket. “I’ll… I'll call you then!”

“Brilliant,” Marlene said firmly. They stood there a moment until she gestured down the aisle with her book. “I guess I should let you go now.”

“Huh?”

“Weren’t you going somewhere?”

Remus chuckled awkwardly. “Oh, yeah. Just the loo.”

“Okay,” Marlene smiled shyly. “Well, I’ll meet you back with the others.”

He nodded and she turned away, moving back down the train corridor to their overstuffed compartment. Watching her go, Remus got that familiar squirmy feeling in his gut before realising it was just his bladder screaming in distress. When he finally returned to the compartment he walked in to find all of his friends playing poker and betting with a bag of peanuts from the snack trolley.

“All I’m saying is that you and Mickey were gone for a long time last night,” Mary said. “Care to fill us in?”

“If you must know,” Lottie drawled while sorting the cards in her hand, “there are two reigning factors in why you were so sorely missing my exuberant presence last night. First, I knew I was going to get stuck with you lot for nine hours on a train today, so who needed the extra party? And second, our room was completely empty. So don’t act so surprised when one of us takes advantage of such an opportunity.”

“Oh Lot,” Lily moaned while the rest of them laughed.

“Hey, you could’ve tried Potter’s room,” Lottie shrugged innocently.

Marlene glanced up at Remus then, cheeks pink, and they shared a silent smile before she made room on the bench next to her for him.

“Want me to deal you in, Remus?” Lily offered as he drew the door closed behind him.

“Yeah, I need you,” James said. “Sirius won’t play and I'm horribly outnumbered. I can't win back our stolen dignity from Black's birthday all on my own.”

“Fat chance anyway, Potter,” Mary cackled, glancing at Lottie’s hand.

Lottie turned it over; “Straight flush. Next you’ll be streaking through the entire train, boys.”

James groaned in defeat while all the girls giggled and Remus slid in beside Marlene. He spared a chance look across the carriage but Sirius was turned away, jacket pulled up to his ears and head leaning against the window, eyes closed as though he were asleep.

Chapter End Notes

A ten pence is like a dime.
'Lashed' and 'gassed' mean to be totally drunk.
'On the pull' is like looking for a hook-up/sex/relationship.
Robert Johnson was a legendary guitarist who was said to have made a 'deal with the devil' for his talent.

LOOK—I know what you're thinking, but you just have to trust me reader. All things happen for a reason ;) Hope you're excited for year 12 Christmas.

Chapter 44: Christmas, 1976

Chapter Summary

Remus goes home. Then he goes home, home.

This chapter is dedicated to maraudmoons, who said they'd preform a sacrifice for me just to get some more of the silly words inside my head. Instead of that, I hope you (and everyone else) snuggles up with some fuzzy socks, your favourite tea, and enjoys this chapter. It's a happy one.

(Or you can just read it on toilet or the bus like the fan-fiction gremlins I know we all are. <3)

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Subway's no way for a good man to go down,
Rich man can ride and the hobo, he can drown;
And I thank the Lord for the people I have found,
I thank the Lord for the people I have found…

- "Mona Lisas and Mad Hatters" Elton John, 1972

Nothing could be trusted to stay stagnant forever, not even the dour Lupin Estate. Though little had changed in actuality. The ground was still painted in damp rather than fresh wisps of snowfall, and Lyall Lupin's preference for keeping an ever-revolving array of staff hadn't waned, though Remus was pleased enough to find that the maid who brought him tea in the morning wasn't as stingy with the milk and sugar as the last had been.

A new litter of pups had been born in late-November to the even-tempered Zenyatta and a stud from some breeder in the Midlands. Remus knew better than to name them without his father's consent, but the runt of the litter was grey all over with a spotted nose and reminded him of Dusty. Secretly he dubbed the pup Smokey.

Ever man's bestest friend, Dusty still greeted him with enthusiasm—Giles even more so. They spent his first night back loosing to each other in cards and Remus had a great lie-in the following morning.

Outside of that, the halls were quiet and the house was calm. The only agitation came at supper time, when Remus took his meals in the dining room with his only father for company. Those were usually quiet too.

On the rare occasion Lyall would put down whatever document he was pouring over and acknowledge his son's existence. Mostly Remus wished he wouldn't, but that was probably one of the only reasons he did.

"How are your classes?"

"Fine."

"I hope they're teaching you proper politics."

"What does that even mean?"

His father answered with another question. "Are they still pushing the socialists's agenda?" He asked. "Or have they moved onto things that might actually be useful in life?"

Remus stubbornly pushed his peas around his plate. "They teach us history."

"That'll be a no then."

A roll of the eyes, and; "Whatever you say, Dad..."

Lyall raised a brow and set his empty glass down, wiping his hands on the cloth napkin.

"I'll be returning to the office early. Goddamn Labour Party has ordered a thirty million pound cut to public expenditure, meaning that the whole bloody country's about to go up in flames. It's like those lunatics in office want a crisis. There'll be strikes in the streets next, I expect. As if we need the traffic. I'll be staying in the city for the duration. You'll remain here with Giles. Use the time to study. I don't want you running around the streets—not when you're about to return to school. Do you understand me?"

"Was that a rhetorical question?"

"Do you understand?"

Remus set his jaw. "Yes, sir."

Eyeing him sourly, Lyall pushed his chair back from the table and stood, gathering a fistful of documents. Remus saw it coming before it happened—he would stride from the room without another glance and wouldn't look at him until another inevitable dinner the following evening. No, 'goodnight son' or 'have a good day tomorrow'. Certainly no 'I love you's. It irked him, but not because he needed any of that. He didn't want Lyall's attention, but the urge to scream in his face—Look at me!—it was so strong. Maybe it was just acknowledgement that he wanted.

"My literacy professor liked my final paper," Remus said suddenly, before his father could leave. "He said it was the best in the entire year. That I could probably be published one day."

Lyall glanced up at him. "So now they're filling your head with nonsense. Do I really need to tell you how much a freelance author makes in this economy? And that's if you even manage to find work. Not many would hire someone who can't even manage a few measly exams. Tell me, Remus, how could someone who's 'best in the entire year' achieve a mere 'satisfactory' on three out of seven exams?"

"It was a mistake," Remus grumbled, throwing himself back in his chair.

"You mean your teachers incorrectly marked their own exams?"

"No! I was... distracted."

"Do you think that is an adequate excuse? I didn't send you to Scotland to be distracted. What could be so interesting as to keep you from your only job?"

Remus ground his teeth together. "Never mind."

"There is nothing decent in life for 'satisfactory' people. Unless you'd prefer to live penny-to-penny, with some damn labour union waiting to snatch the food from your family's mouths every time the government denies them new gloves for the winter, I suggest you learn to ignore your distractions."

"Are you a Tory, Dad?"

"I'm a realist, Remus. I think you'll find they make more money. Now don't be bothering Giles. If you need anything—sort it out yourself."

Straightening up, Lyall adjusted his collar and strode from the room.

Remus watched him go. "Merry Christmas to you too, Dad," he swore, before turning around in his seat and throwing his fork across the dining hall. He'd hoped it would miraculously stick in the wood, but it only landed with an empty clatter.

He almost ran off that night, but then—as if reading his mind—Lyall ordered him to help their head dog trainer, Sebastian, wean the new puppies onto solid food. It was a tedious affair; the dogs had to be fed every three hours and even then they still screeched for their mother's milk, but Remus appreciated the work. It kept him busy, and dogs were better company than people most days anyway.

"They're a scrappy bunch, these'uns!" Sebastian declared. The dog-trainer had a thick Norfolk accent and Remus was lucky if he could decipher every third word. "Best watch yoour fingers with Whistlejacket thurr. She'll tairke 'em roight off. Oi pity the poour bastard who's got 'er. But yow know yoour father—payment up front."

"You mean they're already sold?" Remus held Smokey close to his chest. He wasn't supposed to baby the dogs, but they were puppies. Barely four weeks old. Sebastian wouldn't rat on him.

"Yes sair, got all their pairpers sorted this mahrnin'. They'll be riddy to goo by end 'f Jan-oo-ary, oi figure. But doon' worry, we'll still 'ave plenty 'a beasts around for yow to 'alp me with. Navver a shortage of work 'ere."

Outside of caring for the dogs, he spent ample time catching up on the shows and music he'd missed while at school. Disco was officially in full-swing—it was all Top of the Pops was playing—and a sober Remus would have normally been less-likely to entertain it, but there was nothing else to do apart from listen, sleep, read, and make the trek across the damp lawn to the doghouse. He could've called James or Peter, but they were sure to be busy with their own families. Marlene had given him her phone number, but that too felt awkward. What would he even say? He hadn't read anything of substance since most of his books had gone with him to school. She would probably appreciate hearing about the puppies, but then wouldn't the sensible thing be to invite her over to see them? Remus had never had a friend over to the estate before. But then again, most of them didn't even know it existed.

There was Giles to distract him, of course. And despite what Lyall had to say, the old man was all too happy to accept a round of cards or an extra set of hands. Then, when he wasn't running his normal errands or fixing something around the house like a driver-turned-handyman, Giles could always be found in the parlour in the same burgundy armchair that had been dubbed his for as long as Remus could remember. If it was before lunchtime he'd have that morning's paper in hand. Between lunch and dinner it was the same paper, though he'd most certainly moved onto the daily crossword. After dinner it was a glass of his favourite brandy, which always smelt okay but tasted horrible. Not that Giles had ever let Remus try the drink. That would be completely irresponsible.

There were a lot of memories attached to that chair; one of them being a faint stain on its left armrest leftover from a time when six year-old Remus had knocked a vase off its shelf in the library and split his hand open trying to piece it back together. He'd balled and went straight to the old man who just lifted him calmly into his lap and pressed the sleeve of his own jacket against the cut to staunch the bleeding until Remus was coherent enough to explain what had happened. He couldn't remember so much as touching the chair, just the comfort that came with being drawn into Giles' lap. Afterwards the stain remained; enduring the years in the shape of half of a tiny hand print, splayed wide as it reached for comfort.

Now Remus was looking for comfort again, but he wasn't six years-old anymore.

It took almost three days to persuade Giles to let him leave. He could've just left on his own of course—had been doing it for nearly half his life now—but something about that Christmas felt different. It was as though there was a fog hanging over him.

What if Lee had been wrong?

What if Tomny never meant to have him back?

What if he got angry?

It was like knowingly placing a bet on the wrong horse. Tomny had been ready to let him go that very first September he'd been shipped off to the Highlands; only Remus had been blind to the fact, and he'd dumbly forced himself back into his life again and again just like a bad cold. He'd already learned to stop feeling guilty over the phone calls—those felt safe because of the distance it kept between them—but showing up again, it felt dangerous. Remus wasn't sure he could handle being forced to leave a second time, but as muddled as everything felt, those nights spent back at the estate passed as though he were racing the clock. He had a little more than a week until his return to school. So few days to do all the things he wanted.

And so, Remus did all in his power to convince his oldest friend and caretaker that he was an upstanding citizen, totally capable of keeping himself out of trouble while home. He did this mostly during the evenings, hoping that the brandy would butter-up Giles' sense of rationality, and eventually he got what he wanted.

On the morning of Christmas Eve, Giles drove him to Aldgate himself. He was quiet for most of the ride, despite Remus' excited (or nervous —he couldn't decide which) energy seeping out from the backseat, but that didn't mean he wasn't going to lecture.

"Sounds to me like you're just running from your problems," Giles said, after they'd passed through Bermondsey and started across the Tower Bridge. He was chewing on a toothpick, something he'd picked up to help kick his bad snuff habit.

"Has he even asked to see me since he left?"

There was no need to mention Lyall's name. Giles was quiet in the front seat of the Rolls.

"Well, then I'll do what I want."

"The dogs miss you."

"I've seen them."

"The ladies in the kitchen miss you."

"I've seen them too."

The driver was quiet again for a bit, then pulled the toothpick from his mouth; "Remus, son—I know you two don't always get on, but your father is just looking out for your best interests. You like that school, yeah? Well he sent you there. Tried to make it work for you after all the rest didn't."

Remus didn't bother to add how Lyall had neglected to mention that his mother had also gone to Hawkings. Perhaps he honestly didn't know, or had forgotten in the last twenty years since they were married—or maybe he just didn't care. Either way, he wouldn't be getting a thank you from him.

“I’ll still call you,” he promised, “but I want to go. At least for a few days. I have people waiting on me too, you know.”

Giles glanced back at him in the car's mirror. “It’s important to have friends, lad. No one likes being lonely, but try to take things seriously.”

“That would be becoming boring, Gil."

“What’s that?”

Remus smiled to himself. " ‘If you can’t be good, be smart’. It's good advice—wonder who gave it to me.”

Giles could only shake his head hopelessly.

Remus kept the exchange in the back of his mind for the rest of the drive. He wasn’t sure going back to the End was the smart thing—it’d certainly never been the good thing by anyone’s standards—but the rest of his school friends were enjoying their holidays with the people they loved. He wanted to, too, all nerves aside.

Luckily, it turned out that Lee was true to his word after all.

As Remus dragged his feet across the cracked pathway that led up to the flat’s steps, he heard someone shriek his name from above and looked up to find Tonya on the balcony, wrapped up in a robe and waving frantically. Even from three floors up he could see the dark circles under her eyes, the hollowness of her cheeks, and yet when she smiled at him it was as though all the worst parts of the world simply vanished.

Tonya immediately tossed the cigarette she’d been smoking over the railing and dashed back inside the flat, only to come flying out the building’s front door a few seconds later. She tackled him in a hug so fierce he almost fell over, but she was a small woman, and he used the momentum of her love to swing her around in a big circle.

“Oh, Remus, my love, I’m so happy to see you!” She gushed in his ear, before yanking back to get a look at him, hands moving from his shoulders to his cheeks. “You’ve grown! Look at how handsome you’ve gotten!” Her thumb brushed his scar. “And so devil-may-care.” She wiggled her eyebrows suggestively and Remus squirmed in her grip, embarrassed as he batted off her hands.

“C’mon Tonya, what are you, my mother?”

“Leave him be, Ton. He’s come home from school, not war,” Tomny called. He’d apparently followed her and was leaning in the building’s doorway, arms crossed over his broad chest. Remus immediately dashed up the steps and they grappled, hugging with a tight hand on the neck while clapping each other on the back.

“Happy to see you, Lu.”

“You too, Tom,” Remus said as he pulled back. His heart was slamming against his ribcage and he felt so happy that if Tomny had asked, he would've burst into song right there on the front steps. Luckily the older boy only smiled, showing off a handsome dimple.

“Glad Lee got a hold of you," Tomny said. "Been a bit busy around 'ere, sorry we haven't called much."

“It's fine—totally fine. But Lee—he said you wanted me… well that I should come by.”

Tomny nodded. “It’s Christmas, and no one pays attention around the holidays 'nyway. Not when s'brass monkeys outside and the whole country’s eatin' gingerbread and drinkin' themselves into a stupor.”

“Yeah,” Remus nodded. “But you don’t have to worry, Tom. I’ll only stay for a few days—less if you want. Promised I’d be back soon anyway.”

Tomny’s smiled tightened and he lifted a hand to cup the side of Remus’ neck again. “Yer a good lad, but don't worry too much. We missed you.”

Remus could've cried. Happiness or relief, it didn't matter.

“C’mon now,” Tonya said, appearing at his side and rubbing his arms comfortingly, “it’s freezing. Let’s get you inside and warmed up.”

Tomny took the bag he’d brought with him and they went in together, arm in arm. Everywhere in the building was drafty but the flat was still warm thanks to the amount of bodies filling it up. Remus was instantly bombarded by his friends—Doss and Lee, who tackled him with happy grunts of hello, Seesaw and Vint who nodded and bumped his fist cordially. Just like the estate there were new faces, including Lee’s younger brother Ian, who shook his hand so wildly Remus felt his shoulder pop.

“Don’ mind him,” Lee started, “ 'e’s always bouncing off the walls.

We're pretty sure s'cause he was conceived on poppers."

"You're so embarrasin'!" Ian shoved him and ended up in a headlock. "Ugh—gerroff, Lee!"

"Oi—watch out everyone he's gonna blow!"

The brothers began to tussle and Remus stood back, laughing with everyone else as Ian inevitably lost—unable to break Lee's hold around his neck. He could definitely see the family resemblance in their lanky frames and mess of freckles, but really it was their smiles that made them brothers.

"Oh fuckin' hell—now what's this?"

Tomny's cuss cut through the room, making everyone straighten up or jump as though a gun had gone off. Remus whipped around to find Tomny staring at him, eyes hard and suspicious. He stepped forward and the other guys parted around him like a ship at sea, following his back as though they were readying for a fight.

"Reckon you're bein' funny, do ya?" He asked in a low voice, looking Remus up and down.

Remus blinked. "I… what?"

"Explain, now."

"Tom, I don't know what you're…"

Tomny scoffed his laughter and raised a hand. Everyone watched him, deadly still, though instead of a fist Tomny just flattened his fingers and measured his own height. He passed over himself and then forward until his hand knocked against the top of Remus' forehead.

"You went and got taller than me didn't you, you lil' git."

Remus opened and closed his mouth, stupefied, then; "Maybe you just shrunk in your old age."

Tomny stared at him hard, until his mask cracked and a grin shone through. He began to laugh, and the tension visibly drained from the room. It was a bit unnerving how quickly it'd came and went, but Remus had no time to bask in it. Before he could say anything else, Tomny had him in his own headlock.

"Cheeky, Lu!"

"Fuck Tomny—get off!"

“He’s right though, Tom,” Lee added, “I think I see a few grey hairs even!”

“If I’ve got any greys it’s because I’m always lookin’ after dirty bleeders like you!”

“Ha-ha, yes, so funny!” Remus heard Tonya snap her fingers several times as he fought against Tomny’s bicep. “Now let me through, you nobs. I have a surprise for Remus.”

“Sorry Ton, Lu’s a bit busy at the moment,” Tomny said.

“Let me go!” Remus wailed.

“No can do, sweetheart. You’re just going to have to live with it.”

“Don’t be a dick, Tomny. Remus, look!”

With a grunt, Remus managed to lift his head. Tonya stood before him, smiling radiantly in her robe, and from behind her back she produced a brand-spanking-new album;

Queen: A Day at the Races.

“Happy Christmas, Remus.”

* * *

The initial bonhomie of his arrival had worn off by the next morning, replaced instead by the meager excitement that took hold of everyone come Christmas Day. Remus didn't mind in the slightest. It'd taken him all of one hour to realise just how badly he'd been missing the gentle existence of the shabby London flat. The humble two-bedroom had been left with its usual occupants, plus Ian, who according to Tonya had started coming around regularly after his and Lee’s mum had gotten back with their step-dad. The guy had a penchant for double-malt whisky as well as speaking with his fists and taking his anger out on sixteen year-olds with lippy mouths. And there were more than enough of those to go around.

It’d only taken one phone call from Ian for Lee to nearly put the prick in the hospital, which seemed only fair to the rest of them, since after all, Lee had spent most of his childhood playing punching bag for the rest of his mum's piece-of-shit boyfriends.

Ian's arrival wasn't the only new development within the group though; Doss had a girlfriend now who worked in a Debenhams across the city and was always hopping on the tube to go visit her. The others tried to rag on him for it of course, but they were rebuked by Tonya, who was apparently the only one he'd permitted to meet the girl so far. Remus could tell that Doss must've really liked her—his usually cool and collected expression turned shy and embarrassed at mere mention of her name—and he was happy for him. Happier still that he'd been there a whole night and not sensed a single hint of animosity from any of his friends. It soothed the fear he'd secretly been carrying ever since Tomny revealed he knew everything about his real life and family. But it was obvious—Tomny had said nothing. Doss probably didn't even know that Remus knew, and it was enough. If he had to carry the secret for the rest of his life just to ensure his friends would stay this happy, he would gladly do so.

It was late on Christmas Day when they'd all finally woken and gathered together. Tomny sat in his armchair while Lee and Ian split the other sofa and Remus relaxed on the same couch he'd woken up on. Seesaw offered him a puff of his morning spliff but he declined, too busy watching Doss and Vint help Tonya prepare breakfast. It was funny seeing the two largest guys among them squeeze into such a tiny kitchen, only to gingerly move around Tonya as though she were a grizzly bear and not simply a girl who barely came up to their chins. The telly was playing some holiday special but no one was really paying any attention. There was too much to say.

"You jammy bastard," Lee hissed, "you set off a bomb?"

"Not a real bomb. Just these stink bombs my roommates concocted."

"Wicked. Do you remember the recipe?"

"Oh no!" Tonya shouted from the kitchen. "Remus John, don't you dare say another word. I will not allow stink bombs anywhere near this place. Not in my house."

"Oh c'mon, Ton," Lee tried, "we'll only do it outside."

"Bien essayé, dickheads." She emerged from the kitchen waving a spatula threateningly. "Now come get your breakfast."

Tonya had truly outdone herself. She presented them with dutch pancakes and poached eggs, bubble and squeak and crumpets, even homemade hollandaise. In true formal fashion, they devoured the spread while sitting on the living room floor.

“Blimey, didn’t even know you could roast a plum,” Ian said as he licked his fingers.

“Those were figs,” Tonya laughed.

“Well they were fig-tastic.”

Tonya got up to collect their plates but Tomny just exchanged her seats. “Nah, I’ve got it,” he said, pressing a kiss to her temple as he passed.

Tonya smiled and dropped down into the recliner, draping her legs over one side. Remus caught her gaze and she winked before mouthing something. Unsure, he perked up and she leaned in to whisper to him. “Go help him.”

Remus nodded automatically and shot up from his seat, scuttling into the kitchen and collecting a few more empty plates as he went. He found Tomny standing over the sink, suds halfway up his forearms.

“Ah, some indentured help,” he said cheerfully; “Good. I’ll wash, you dry.”

Remus set the plates down and took up a rag, taking the next dish from him as he handed it over. "You guys seem like you're doing good."

“Mhm. Winter's are slow mostly. The others are glad you came back by the way,” Tomny said and Remus glanced at him, before dropping his gaze, a bit haughtily.

“Don’t think you’re beating around the bush hard enough, Tom. Might need a bigger stick.”

Tomny huffed in that way that meant he was laughing and Remus felt a little shudder run up his spine as he set the dried dish aside and picked up another.

“You always did have a mouth on you,” Tomny started again, “but you’re right. And I’m glad too—really. Though, I did wonder though whether you’d actually show if I wasn’t the person to tell you to come.”

“You mean this was all a fuckin' test?”

“Mm. Tonya and I took bets actually.”

“You utter asshole. Fine—what’d you bet on then?”

Tomny just smiled down at the dish water. “I don’t mind, you know—how much Tonya likes you. I don’t mind.”

Remus blinked. “Well why would you? She’s in love with you.”

“Yeah. S’pose she is. Feels good to be with the people you love during the holidays, don’t it?”

“Yeah, it does," he answered, ears burning.

“You haven’t been smoking as much,” Tomny said casually. “You quit?”

“No,” Remus answered, reaching to put a stack of plates away, “just cut back a bit. We roll our own at school.”

“Guess I should’ve gotten you something other than fags for Christmas then. Though I suppose I just ruined the surprise.”

“No, it’s fine! It’ll give my fingers a break for a while. Siri—I mean, my friends at school suck at rolling so it’s always me. And our fence has high rates—shit’s expensive up north.”

Tomny chuckled. “You got some books too, I think—and records. Don’t tell the other lads I told you, but Tonya picked it all out mostly. She's the only one with taste.”

“You didn’t have to get me anything,” Remus protested.

“That mean you have nothing for us, then?”

“No…” In truth, Remus’ bag was stuffed with several badly wrapped presents, most of which were recycled from Lyall’s extensive wardrobe. He had reasoned that it wasn’t stealing since all of it had been cleared out by the maids as part of their yearly household purge and would’ve been sent to the local refuse anyway. Most of the clothes were going to be too big on them, apart from maybe Doss, but they were clean and warm and it made Remus happy to be able to give his friends something in exchange for their generosity.

“Oh, yeah? Never gotten a gift from a blue-blood before,” Tomny said snidely, and Remus shouldered him gently for it.

“If you’re worried about how much I paid you can relax. They’re gifts of practicality.”

“Practical—? Honestly, what is that school teachin' you? ‘Practicality’, pish.”

Remus snorted just as Tonya appeared in the kitchen behind them. “Hey, we can finish clean-up later. Doss wants to visit Felicia and I’d like to do presents before he goes.”

“Okay, we’re coming,” Tomny answered, turning off the tap and wiping his hands. Remus put away his last dish and together they wandered back into the living room, Tomny’s arm looped around his shoulders.

Watching Doss exchange his battered belt and boots for new ones while Tomny tugged a new jumper over his head felt like the best gift he could’ve gotten. Lee made a crack that he’d never owned a jacket that didn’t already need to be patched in the elbows, while Vint gave Remus an approving nod for the fresh slacks, which thankfully didn’t look entirely out of place with the rest of his get-up.

“We’re like new men,” Tomny chuckled, running his hands across the jumper's soft wool.

Lee popped his jacket collar. “Hold on Tom, you sure Lu didn’t give you a frilly skirt to match? Could’a sworn I saw one.”

“Yeah and s'up your arse.”

“Gentlemen!” Tonya called from down the hallway. “Drumroll, please!”

Immediately Tomny threw himself down in his recliner and began slamming his hands down on its arms while the rest of them smacked every available surface. A moment later Tonya emerged from the hallway in a sweeping white dress made top-to-bottom out of a delicate lace. Remus hadn't realised it, but it tied daintily at the wrists and neck, making her look like some fairytale princess. She was barefoot, despite the cold that seeped up through the floorboards, and glowing as she spun around in a circle and let the skirt billow outwards.

“How do I look?” She called, twisting her dark hair up into a bun and holding it in place. “Like a proper lady?”

“Simply gorgeous!” Doss announced.

“Elizabeth Taylor would be shamed to know her!” Lee added enthusiastically.

Blowing them both a kiss, Tonya turned to Remus. “Well? What do you think, love?”

Remus’ mouth went as dry as paper.

I think you’re the prettiest girl I’ve ever seen, he thought.

“Looks… nice…” he said.

“Oh no,” Lee started, “you broke him.”

Still smiling, Tonya rolled her eyes lightly and Tomny slid in front of her, cupping her waist. “I think you look amazing.”

“Oh yeah?” Tonya dropped her arm, letting her hair untwist down her back as Tomny kissed her.

“Oi, get a room, you two,” Doss shouted as Ian and Lee gave a whistle. Tonya just wrapped her arms around her boyfriend’s back while Tomny shot them the bird, leaving them all laughing and nudging one another.

Remus sat back on the sofa, fiddling with one of the books he’d been gifted. He tried not to stare, but seeing Tonya emerge in all white had stolen the air from his lungs. The dress had been a lucky find really—lucky that the maids had found it in some back closet and decided to toss it and luckier still that the tags had still been attached and he couldn’t recall any memories of seeing Hope wear it. He wasn't entirely sure what qualified as 'tacky' but gifting someone his dead mother's clothes was probably not far off.

Before any of them had to bear further witness to more public displays of affection, Tonya sharply pulled back from Tomny and pointed at Remus with a devilish grin. She had a little slip of paper tucked between two of her fingers. “Oh Remus, I found this on the bedroom floor—think it must’ve fallen out of your bag. It’s got a phone number on it.”

Before he could take it, Tomny reached over and plucked the paper from her fingers, unfolding it. " 'Hope you have a Happy Christmas'," he read; " 'Call me when you can'. Oh and look, there's a little heart."

"Give me that!" Remus grunted, jumping up to snatch the paper. Tomny was faster, and he yanked his arm back.

"Now who's givin' you notes with little hearts on 'em?"

"No one you know!"

"Well we should change that," Tonya said, giddily. "Someone get the phone."

* * *

Of course none of them would drop it. Each of his friends had an addictive personality in their own way—after latching onto something they never let it go until each and every joke or wise-crack had been wrung dry, and in this case, the joke was Remus' current relationship status.

"I'm not calling her on Christmas," he insisted, after he'd managed to steal Marlene's phone number back and stash it out of sight.

"Why not?" Tonya whined. "She gave you her number hoping you would call! Haven't you left the poor girl waiting long enough?"

"You're blowing this way out of proportion!"

"Aw, look—he's blushing," Tomny teased. Remus swat at him with the towel he was using to dry the rest of the dishes.

Tonya got between them. "You have to call her tomorrow. It'd be cruel to wait any longer."

Reaching over her, Tomny handed him a freshly-scrubbed cooking pan; "Yeah, and don't you worry, Lu, we'll be right here for moral support."

That was how he ended up dialling Marlene's house on the evening of Boxing Day with several of his friends behind him, craning their ears to listen in. They never stopped sniggering and Remus quickly began to pray that no one would pick up and he'd just get the machine instead. Too bad he had shit luck.

“Shhh! Guys, shut up!” He snapped.

The line clicked to life. “Hello?”

“Er—hi. Is Marlene around?”

“Speaking.”

"Call her something sweet!" Tonya hissed. "Make it unique! Tell her she’s lovely! She sounds lovely! Ooh—what colour are her eyes?”

"Tonya—shut up!"

"Hello...?"

“Oh! Hey there, er—Cherry. It's Remus.” He winced the moment the words left his mouth, and both Lee and Tomny burst into snorts of laughter while Tonya smacked her forehead. Mortified, Remus swatted the air in their direction as Marlene chuckled lightly into the other end.

“ 'Cherry'? That my nickname now?”

“Too weird?” He sighed.

“No,” she answered, “I think I like it. In goofy way. So what’s going on, you numpty? Have a good Christmas?”

“Yeah, was great. You?”

“Wonderful. It’s really nice to hear from you. I talked to Lily yesterday, has she rung you yet?”

“Er—no, but that’s not really her fault.”

Lee nudged him. “Psst, Lu—ask her if she’s got any fit girlfriends looking to boff.”

“Piss off,” Remus grumbled.

“What’s that?” Marlene asked from the other end.

“Oh—not you! S'nothing, just some idiot shouting in my other ear.”

“You got family visiting?”

“Nah, just some friends.”

“Wish I could see our friends right now,” Marlene sighed. “Might be a nice break. It feels like mum invited an entire village for the holidays. I have to bunk with my nan and aunt Rosie.”

“Damn.”

“Yeah, I know. But it’s not so bad actually, most of them leave tomorrow. Just wanted to whine a bit. My brothers are visiting so that’s been nice.”

“Oh yeah, two right? Michael and—what’s the other?”

“John. His wife Anna’s actually pregnant, announced it yesterday morning. I’m gonna be an aunty.”

“Wow. Congrats.”

“Thanks!”

“Psst, Lu—”

“Shut up, Lee—”

“Sounds like you’re having fun,” Marlene said.

“Something like that,” Remus grunted, pushing Lee away from the phone by the face.

“Look, Remus," Marlene started, her tone turning very serious, "I wanted to know if I could talk to you about something before we went back to school?”

Remus switched ears with the receiver uneasily. Tonya instantly pressed her head to the other side. “Oh. Or I mean—oh yeah...?”

“Yeah. I know we kind of talked on the train, but I really don’t like leaving things muddled like that. Mary says it's how people go from liking each other to switching their shampoo for hair-removal cream."

"She's done that?"

"Oh, I suppose you weren't around after she and Darby Ellis broke up in year ten."

"Fuck, that's insane."

"Oh yeah, it totally was!” Marlene stopped suddenly and cleared her throat. “But like I was wondering… What do you think of… ehm —‘us’?”

Tonya gave a sharp gasp but clapped her hand over her mouth the moment Remus shot her a glare.

“ ‘Us’?” He echoed. “Well, we’re good aren’t we?”

“Oh sure, but I didn’t really mean just… friends ‘us’.”

“Oh.”

Tonya drew back and slapped Remus in the shoulder. “Don’t make her do all the work!” She hissed quietly.

Marlene spoke again; “I just mean that it might be nice, you know, to try it out. In the beginning I thought Lily was crazy—like we’re such good friends already—but she and James seem to be doing alright so I figured that maybe...”

Tonya slapped him again and the words tumbled out. “Thatweshoulddate?”

"Fuck yeah!" Doss shouted suddenly. Remus threw a hand up to ward off their laughter, but it didn't stop Lee from touching his shoulder and making a sizzling sound.

“You think we should?” Marlene asked.

“Sure," he bumbled. "As long as you want to.”

“Yeah, sure—I mean—yes. I think it’d be cool. An 'us'.”

Remus nodded. “Cool. 'Us' it is then."

“Wow. Mary’s gonna totally lose her head,” she giggled after a moment. “Lily too, since she called it and all. Though I suppose you’ll know all about that.”

Remus thought of Sirius, and how he’d reacted that last day on the train.

“They’re not the only ones.”

“Well, that’s great then! Us! So I’ll… see you on the train?”

“Yeah, ‘course.”

“Cool. Well, I should go probably. Mum needs help with dinner and all that, I’m sure. Ta then?”

“Yeah, ta.”

There was a final moment of nervous silence and then line clicked dead and Remus slowly pulled the receiver away from his ear. His friends all stared back at him, each of them looking right chuffed and proud.

“Holy fuck,” Tomny started. “Did our Lu actually just get 'imself a girlfriend?”

“I think 'e did,” Doss confirmed, crossing his arms.

“Not sure how smooth 'e was about it,” Lee shrugged, “but I guess it did the job.”

“He was brilliant!” Tonya declared, throwing her arms around Remus in a hug. Lee joined her, then Doss, and Tomny, and even Ian, who’d only just walked in the door with Seesaw and Vint, carrying enough booze to intoxicate an army.

“What we all huggin' for?” Ian asked after-the-fact.

“We’re huggin' to congratulate this spiffin’ tosser!” Tomny shouted, squeezing even tighter.

“You’re all crushing me!” Remus wailed.

"It's the weight of our love, Lu!"

“Alright, off,” Tonya laughed, and the boys released them. She turned and reached into Ian’s paper bag, withdrawing a large bottle of brandy. “Tonight we’re celebrating.”

Chapter End Notes

Snuff is another term for chewing tobacco.
'Brass monkeys' is a term for when it's really cold outside.
Poppers are drugs that are inhaled and give the user an instant high or rush.
Debenhams is a British department store.
Bubble and squeak is a British dish made with fried potatoes and cabbage and occasionally beef. Known as one of the ‘greatest peasant foods’ in the world.

A 'refuse' is a landfill.
'Tidy' means good-looking.
A 'boff' is a hook-up.

PS: I evidently lied about that posting schedule. Don’t trust me, I am a big fat, impulsive liar, lol.

This is chapter 1 of 2 for Christmas, 1976. Next chapter out soon. Cheers lovies.

Chapter 45: Tempo Rubato

Chapter Summary

> Remus battles his greatest enemy; time. 1976 comes to a close with love, and the barest hint of what may lay ahead.

Chapter Notes

> Had to repost this chapter, sorry! If you saw it without this notice, it was a mistake.
>
> CW: Drug use and addiction. Blood, and a slight breakdown, but mostly just feelings.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Michelle, ma belle,
Sont les mots qui vont très bien ensemble,
Très bien ensemble;
And I will say the only words I know that you'll understand,
My Michelle…

- "Michelle" The Beatles, 1965

The days following Christmas always seemed to blur together. That year was no exception.

Things around the flat were back to business as usual and everyone came and went, apart from him and Tonya. The sofa became their lonely island and they camped out on it under Tomny's duvet to keep warm in the crisp mornings and cooler evenings. When they weren't reading or watching something on the telly, they talked. Prompted by his phone call with Marlene, Remus told stories of his friends at school while Tonya draped her head on his shoulder and absent-mindedly watched the turntable spin. Being close like that never seemed to bother him, it was the dreaded quick touches that sent shivers up his spine, but just existing in one another's presence was comforting.

In the beginning they mostly talked about little things, like how frustrating it was that three out of four of them were night showerers and how Mary and Lottie had concocted this game of trying to paint his nails every time he wasn't paying attention—which Sirius had also joined in on, raising the stakes by attempting to do it while he was sleeping.

“Sounds like you love them a lot,” Tonya murmured, gently picking at the chipped polish on his left hand he’d yet to remove.

“I’ve only been complaining about them,” Remus pointed out.

“S’normal to complain about the ones we love. You should hear me whine to Doss about Tomny.”

“Oh, I do.”

She pinched him, playfully, and they scuffled on the couch before finally settling again.

“So what happened then?” Tonya asked eventually. “What’s got you feeling so guilty?”

He sighed. “It’s… complicated.”

“Complicated?”

”We fought. Sirius got lashed over me and Marlene or something. But I was a right dick all term too.”

Tonya hummed thoughtfully and kissed his knuckles fondly. “Something tells me Sirius will come around. And even if he doesn’t, I’ll still love you.”

Feeling warm all over, Remus leaned his cheek against the top of her head.

“Will you tell me more about your band?” She asked.

“It’s not a real band, we’re all just novices—apart from Sirius, that is. He’s like some piano prodigy or something.”

“He’s that good?”

“Well, I’ve haven't exactly heard him play, to be honest. He doesn’t like it anymore, something to do with his mum.” Remus looked down at his hands—at the way she cradled his fingers; “I didn’t want to pry.”

“Hm, maybe he just needs a new reason to play," Tonya reasoned. "Who says everyone has to be a Tchaikovsky or a Rachmaninoff.”

Remus tilted his head up thoughtfully. “I heard on the radio once that Billy Joel learned to play the piano from his father, but then he put all the classical stuff behind him for rock and roll.”

“Well there, maybe he’ll be the next ‘Piano Man’. Who wouldn't be happy with that?”

He knew that Sirius would have rather been ‘the only’ rather than ‘the next’ anything, but if he’d met Tonya he would have certainly taken it as a compliment.

“Ton, what makes you happy?”

The question seemed to catch her off guard. She stopped stroking his hand and awkwardly readjusted her head on his shoulder. He hadn’t meant to make her uncomfortable, but before he could apologise Tonya cleared her throat and clapped both hands over his.

“You make me happy, Remus,” she said simply. “You and all the others.”

It felt like an excuse—too simple an answer—but perhaps out of selfishness, Remus couldn’t bring himself to correct her.

“You make me happy too,” he told her.

They had more conversations like that as the days passed, with funnier stories and vaguer answers. Most nights they drank or got high, and Remus would pass out every night only to wake up to find one of the others had tucked him in with a blanket. On the mornings where he could stand without the room spinning, he helped Tonya make breakfast; soft-boiled eggs with little strips of toast to dip in the yolks. He overdid the first few but she just peeled the shells away and sprinkled on some salt and pepper and they ate them while standing side by side over the hob.

Things almost felt normal, and they might’ve been able to pass for a regular family of strays had every other conversation not been made up of whispers and subtle talk of moving 'stock' or meeting with this person or that. Remus was never directly made party to these conversations but the living space was small and any conversation spoken in even a moderate volume could be heard from every corner of the flat. He pretended he couldn’t hear it mostly, leaving the room or else answering with a ‘huh?’ or ‘hm?’ every time one of the others asked his opinion on something. They were testing him, he realised early on; they wanted to know if they could trust him or if he’d just get scared and back out. Tomny never did it, practically keelhauling anyone who tried, and every time Remus was reminded that he was doing the right thing by ignoring it when Tomny reached out and affectionately ruffled his hair or punched him in the arm.

Not all of it was sad or suspicious though—in fact most things came with more joy than the average Londoner experienced in a year. They danced and sang and lost to one another in cards, and whenever anyone was feeling tired or lethargic they popped a pill or snorted a powder that left them feeling on top of the world again. Everyone was the same, though some parts of them looked different. A bit of weight lost or gained here, a newly-chipped tooth there, fresh scars between it all. Seesaw had taken to wearing sunglasses while indoors to hide his lazy eye and Doss had gotten a new tattoo of a pair of swallows, which looked miles better than the dice-bruises on his forearm.

It was startling to realise that when compared to his friends, Remus had changed too. While Tonya had been more than willing to point out how his jaw was coming in handsomely or that his nose finally fit his face, the realisation that he'd outgrown everyone apart from Doss in height left Tomny amused and only slightly bitter.

"Must be the hair," he said. "Those cutesy curls give you what, four inches at least?"

"Says you," Remus laughed, making a swipe for the back of Tomny's head.

"I could cut it for you," Tonya said from the kitchen table. She had both feet tucked up on the edge of her chair and was painting her toenails. "Both of you could use a trim, actually."

That was how the three of them ended up squished into the flat's tiny bathroom together. Tonya clambered into the tub to save space, and ordered them to sit on its edge in front while she flapped a towel out in front of her. Remus took up a spot on top of the toilet while Tomny went first, insisting Tonya just take the clippers to it to save time.

"Pardon me for not wanting a cue ball for a boyfriend," she scoffed, buzzing the sides and cleaning up the top and neck until Tomny's mop was distinctly less-mopish.

"You're up, Lu," he said, after she'd dusted the hair from his shoulders.

Tonya shook out the towel. "While you're in here you might as well have a shave, Tomny."

"She only wants me bald in some places," he chuckled, as Remus traded him for his spot on the edge of the tub.

"You didn't cut it while at school, did you?" Tonya asked, running her hands through Remus' hair. He shook his head.

"No. Haven't had it cut since the summer when you did it."

He saw her smile in the bathroom mirror before her reflection was replaced by Tomny's, who winked at him as he wet his face and smeared shaving foam across his cheeks and jaw.

"Well, we'll just have to freshen you up," Tonya said happily. She set a towel around his shoulders and had him lean back into the tub to dampen his hair before parting it with a comb. They fell into a shared silence afterwards and the only sounds were that of Tonya's snipping and the flat's humming radiator. Tonya muttered that they should've set up the stereo, but Remus was content. As always, the flat's silence was the only kind that had ever brought him any comfort.

When Tomny finished shaving he ran a damp towel over his face to get rid of any leftover foam and turned around, leaning back against the sink. "I think you missed a spot, Ton," he said, reaching behind himself.

Tonya grabbed Remus' chin and tilted his head toward her. "Where?"

"Right—" Tomny spun around and smacked him on the cheek, leaving behind a fat smudge of shaving foam; "there."

"Oh fuck you," Remus sighed, wiping his cheek on his shoulder.

Tomny snorted and grabbed his razor, tapping him on the knee. "You're looking a bit scruffy, Lu. Best to clean you up too. C'mon, put one leg over the tub."

Eyebrows raised, Remus waited until Tonya pulled her scissors away before doing as he was told. Tomny did the same, straddling the edge of the tub next to him with a cup of foam in one hand and the razor in the other. He came forward, hands outstretched, and Remus suddenly became very aware of how close they were.

"Ah, on second thought—" He pulled back sharply only to bump his head against Tonya's stomach.

“Oi, stop wiggling,” she warned, “I’m working here.”

"Yeah, Lu, hold still. Don't wanna nick ya."

“It’s fine, Tom, I can do it myself,” Remus rattled.

“Pish, I’ll do it. Tonya’s not the only useful one around here, you know.”

Remus jerked again and Tomny’s thumb poked him in the eye.

“Ooh—that was your fault.”

“Stop bloody squirming down there,” Tonya ordered, stepping forward until Remus could feel her knees bump against his lower back.

Trapped between them, he sucked in a breath as Tomny slid even closer and began coating his cheeks in shaving foam. The razor felt cool against his skin, and he heard every graze like thunder in his ears. Each stroke left him feeling more exposed—as though Tomny were peeling back layers of paint to discover the rust underneath.

“Pull your lip down, m’gonna get that cute little moustache.”

Remus rolled his eyes and Tomny smirked, pinching his chin to tilt his head up.

“Right, I think I’m done,” Tonya announced, stepping back and brushing the hair from Remus’ shoulders carefully so as to not jar him. “I’m gonna leave you two to clean up while I get dinner started. And don’t just wash the hair down the drain, Tomny.”

“Yes, ma’am.”

Taking one last moment to fuss over Remus’ new cut, Tonya dusted herself off and stepped out of the tub, disappearing down the hall.

“She’s fussy but she means well I promise,” Tomny said out of the corner of his mouth.

“She’d have to, to be with you.”

Tomny clicked his tongue in amusement and tilted Remus’ head to draw the razor across the hollow of his other cheek. Remus watched him, unable to take his eyes off that little scar on his upper lip. For the most part all he could smell was the shaving foam, but this close he thought he could almost catch a whiff of Tomny’s tobacco.

“I do know how to shave on my own, you know. Giles taught me.”

“Oh yeah? Thought he was just your driver.”

“Giles is lots of things mostly,” Remus said, and Tomny paused his shaving to let him talk. “He’s lived at the estate since I was a kid. I used to take him broken toys and he’d fix them for me. He says that I wouldn’t listen to anyone but him, but that’s probably just him bragging. Once when I was five he saved me when I fell into this pond that’s on the western edge of the grounds.” Remus held his hands out like he could draw an invisible map of the estate in the air between them, shying away only when he realised he was rambling. “He’s—er —He's gonna teach me to drive this summer too."

“Sounds like a stand-up bloke. Dunno why you’d want to ditch him to hang out here.”

“You try telling people your only friend is your chauffeur.”

Tomny smiled wryly and wiped the razor on the towel. “Only teasing. I taught myself to shave, you know?”

“Yeah?”

“Mhm. Mum tried this one time, but she was never really interested in that sort of stuff. Or very good at it. I hardly had any hair in my pits back then anyway, let alone on my face.”

Remus licked his lips. Tomny never talked about his mum, but he supposed that sharing bits of himself was bound to pry out a few memories he’d usually keep hidden.

“When was the last time you saw her?”

Tomny took up the razor again and drew it across Remus’ jaw. “Two… three years maybe? Last I heard she was living in some public housing place in Newham. But it’s fine. We were never close. I made my own way—glad for it. Never would’ve been able to find out what I could do myself if I relied on others to do it for me, ya know? Anyway, what about your dad? Where was he when the driver was teaching you to shave and shoving greens down your throat?”

“He’s a workaholic. And a right asshole.”

Tomny laughed. “Guess fathers are useless rich or poor.”

“I wouldn’t want to be one,” Remus said. “Let someone else fuck up the next generation.”

“Hear, hear, ol’ John.”

Setting the razor aside, Tomny drew a warm towel across Remus’ face and grabbed his chin once more, turning it this way and that to inspect him. “Perfect,” he said once he’d let go, standing up and swinging his leg over the side of the tub. “Now the girls will surely throw themselves at you when you’re back at school. Ooh, but I’m forgetting—they already do.”

Tomny started making an obnoxious kissing noise and Remus chuckled half-heartedly, pulling the towel off his shoulders and reaching up to scratch the spots of his neck that were itchy from the stray hairs. “I’m sure you’d do better there than me.”

There was a pause and then suddenly Tomny whipped around to look at him, eyes narrowed playfully. “Hey, Ton!” He called into the hall. “Tooooon!”

”WHAT? I’m doing the dishes, you dolt!”

”But I gotta know! How cute is our Remus?”

There was a clatter, and Tonya appeared back in the doorway. "Wha—Whatchu on about?"

"I asked how cute Lu is."

"Oh!" She melted against the door frame, looking sly as a fox. "So cute."

"Stop it," Remus moaned.

"But how cute?" Tomny leered.

“Cute enough to eat,” Tonya answered automatically, clicking her teeth together.

Tomny leaned in. “Ah, but is he cute enough to... kiss?”

Remus shook his head as Tonya's face split into a grin; “Oh yes!"

“Well, Lu,” Tomny shrugged, “you heard the lady.”

“Wha—” Remus started, but a second later Tomny had swooped in, grabbing him by the back of the head and planting a great wet smooch directly on his cheek. “Ack—get off, you dickhead!” He cried, but half a second later Tonya was on his other side—both of them smothering him with affection. "Ohmygod—Ton, please!"

They both drew back with a loud ‘mwah!’ before splitting into a laugh. “Sorry Lu, can't help it!" Tomny cackled, pinching his nose lightly.

"You’re so cute we just couldn’t resist!” Tonya preened.

"You're so embarrassing!" He hissed, swatting Tomny with the towel and sending hair everywhere. Shrieking with laughter, Tonya fled the bathroom before he could get a shot in and Tomny began spitting hairs, quickly backing out of the room after her.

“Ooh, better get you the broom for that. Back in a tick!”

They left him there alone, still reeling, and Remus stood up with burning ears and both cheeks still damp from their kisses. Almost too nervous to look at his own reflection, he leaned on the sink and gulped down a deep breath. His legs had turned to jelly as they always did when anyone tried to pay him too much attention. In the mirror he could see his and Tomny’s hair collected in the base of the tub behind him—a muted brown mixed with chunks of ashy gold.

A sudden squeal came from the kitchen, then Tonya’s voice, high-pitched and pretty; “Tomny stop it, I’m actually trying to clean!”

“You stop it!” Tomny shouted playfully.

“I’m going to drown you in the sink!”

“You can’t—you’re too small. Like a lil' mouse—what could you do?”

“Remus, save me!”

“Oh no—that skinny lover boy can’t help you! He's too busy hanging his cute lil' head! Ha!”

“Let me go, Tomny! ACK—! Reeeemus!”

Smiling quietly to himself, Remus ran his hands through his hair once, before pushing off the sink and storming out of the bathroom.

“Don’t worry Ton, I’m coming!”

That was one of the good nights.

* * *

Tonya liked to dance. It didn't matter who her partner was or if she was alone, she would dance anywhere, anytime. The summer before Remus had watched her skip or sway home more times than she'd walked, and once when they'd come across a pair of buskers outside the local market she'd tossed her shopping aside and danced and spun to their music until she'd fallen into his arms, dizzy and glowing like the sun. They'd broken more than a few eggs that way but Remus never minded. He didn't really like dancing—or more accurately, he didn't enjoy being embarrassed. He wasn't coordinated and didn't have the confidence to just do it anyway, but like someone else he knew, Tonya was hard to say no to. On the nights he couldn't sleep and she didn't want to, they'd stay up late and listen to her records. When they danced it was always together, occasionally hugging one another in a slow sway and other times swinging around so furiously it left them panting and laughing in the middle of the living room.

Every night Remus would dance while half-expecting Tomny to appear and order him away; 'alright, you said a few days so scat'. But he never did, and eventually his time was spent anyway.

"It's Remus' last night and it's New Years! You're being a dick!" Tonya spat at Tomny as he slid his arms into his jacket by the front door. Lee, Doss, Ian, and Vint stood by waiting for him, each of them looking puckered and more than a little sheepish.

"C'mon Ton! You know we'd rather stay," Lee tried, but Tonya only scooped up an old newspaper from the dining table and threw it at him, letting the pages scatter everywhere.

"YOU'RE ALL DICKS!"

"And you've gone bloody manic!" Tomny said in his friends' defence. "Exactly how much have you already had tonight?"

"None of your fucking business!" She shouted.

" 'None of my business'? Wanna try that again?"

Tonya fumed, looking as though she were ready to implode right there in the entryway, but before she could, Remus drew her back by the arm.

“Tonya, it’s okay,” he said. She didn’t pull away, but her glare in Tomny’s direction didn’t lessen any either.

“Maybe I should stay,” Ian offered, stepping forward until Lee grabbed his arm and shook his head sharply.

“No, we gotta go,” Tomny sighed. “I’ll meet you guys outside.”

The others nodded and one by one they filed out of the entryway and down the hall, out into the cold night. Remus dropped Tonya’s arm as Tomny approached her and she crossed them. “You said we could spend tonight together,” she hissed.

“Yep, I did. Then something came up.”

“You’re a liar.”

“I'm not lyin'. You heard the phone ring.”

“Then just blow whoever the prick is off! It’s our last night together!”

Tomny sighed and reached up to finger a lock of her hair and Tonya yanked away. Over her head, he smirked sorely at Remus. “We’ll be back before midnight. Enough time for a countdown.”

“Not good enough," Tonya snarled.

“Then I guess we’ll jus' have to get by with ‘not good enough’.”

“Fuck you, Tomny.” She turned sharply and strode into the living room. Immediately the turntable's volume increased and Tomny shook his head hopelessly.

“Sorry, Lu,” he said, stepping closer to Remus; “wish we didn’t have to go.”

“It’s alright, Tom, don't worry about it."

“But we'll see you later, orright?"

"Absolutely."

Tomny grinned lazily and grabbed him by the back of the neck. "Oh, and—don’t let her stay mad.”

"Figures you'd leave me to deal with your marital problems, you lazy arsehole."

Tomny chuckled and drew him in, touching their foreheads together for the briefest moment, before mouthing a goodbye and slipping out the front door. Remus locked it behind him and sighed heavily before wandering into the living room, where he found Tonya swigging from a bottle.

“We don’t need them,” she shouted; “You’re a better dance partner anyway!”

She held out her hand and Remus took it, letting her swing him about the room off-beat and without care. He was disappointed the others were gone, but secretly also content to spend it exactly like this—drunkenly happy and possibly, ever-so-slightly in love.

As with last year, Queen became the favourite of the evening, and they screamed the lyrics off the new album until their throats were horse and they had to wet them with more booze. By the final song they were just swaying, tired and out of breath but unwilling to stop.

‘Let us cling together as the years go by,
Oh my love, my love,
In the quiet of the night;
Let our candle always burn,
Let us never lose the lessons we have learned…’

“I’m sorry our friends are such dicks,” Tonya murmured, head resting on his shoulder as they rocked back and forth.

“I think you’ve called them dicks about a hundred times now,” Remus chuckled, eyes closed as he listened.

“They deserve it.”

“Well, s'okay. I’m fine here. You’re here.”

“But it’s your last night. And it’s New Years!" She moaned into his shoulder.

“There’ll be other nights," Remus reassured her.

“Never one like this.” Tonya raised her head. “We get this night only once. Then it’s gone forever.”

“And then we get another one, right? New and exciting and all that crap.”

“Maybe one where Tomny’s being less of a dick.”

“Or more, you never know.”

Tonya jabbed him on the collarbone lightly. “Oh?” She said, before tugging down the collar of his shirt, revealing Sirius’ silver chain and the guitar pick that dangled on its end. Remus had been wearing it the entire holiday. It was still as warm as the day Sirius had given it to him.

“This is nice,” Tonya said, thumbing it.

Remus' cheeks burned. “A friend gave it to me for Christmas..."

“Sweet friend.” As the song ended she took the pick and raised it up to his nose, flicking him with it gently while grinning. “Actually, that reminds me…”

Pulling back, Tonya left him in the middle of the living room and scampered over to her small bookshelf, digging through it. A few seconds later she returned, hands behind her back.

“Ta-da!” She announced, after whipping a small leather journal out from behind her and pushing it into his hands. “You'll have to forgive me, this present's a little late.”

“I don’t need any more presents,” Remus said, flipping through it.

“Shut up, it’s more for me anyway.”

“Ha. How so?”

“It’s for you, so that you can write me a song.”

Remus’ stomach plummeted to the floor instantly and he looked up. “But I don’t—”

“But you could!” Tonya surged forward, grabbing his arm and pointing down at the book. “All it takes is a few words, and you have more than enough of those! You like listening to music don’t you?”

“Well yeah, ‘course.”

“And you like playing music, don’t you?”

“Yeah, but I—”

“And you’re good at it, aren’t you?”

“Yes!”

“Then why can’t you be good at writing it too?!”

“Because I’m not him!” Remus barked. “I’m not Sirius with some big dream and I’m not my father with his fucking money—I’m just me and sometimes that ain't enough! Everyone bloody expects you to be something you’re not and then when they figure it out—then it’s somehow your fault! Well, fuck that!”

He hadn’t meant to yell, but it came out anyway and Tonya flinched away. Instantly Remus felt a surge of guilt. "I'm..." He tried to turn away, but Tonya only pulled him back, reaching up to gently push the hair off his forehead.

“Oh Remus…” she sighed, “I’m so sorry.”

He kept his eyes downturned, ashamed. “I just… I’m tired of disappointing people, Ton.”

“You could never disappoint me, darling. Not ever.”

“I could, if you knew… If you knew what Tomny knew. You’d be upset.”

Tonya glanced around, but they were alone. Of course they were alone.

“Remus, I know,” she whispered. "I know about your family—and your school."

It was suddenly very hard to swallow. “You do?”

“Yes. Tomny told me after you left in August. I was ready to fight him when he sent you off—I couldn’t see how you’d be any better off without us, but he told me and helped me understand.”

Remus stepped back from her, completely shaken. She followed him, a look of concern on her face, and he had to hold up an arm to keep her away.

“Why aren’t you angry then?” He demanded. “I’ve been lying to you! To everyone!”

“You think I care about that?” Tonya shouted back. “We’re all liars!

We lie every day, even if it's just to save the feelings of those we love!"

"Don't say that," he pleaded; "Don't say you're not in love with him."

Tonya's shoulders drooped like all the air was leaving her. "I didn't say that," she said sadly.

Remus reached up to rub his face. It was the wrong thing to say, and now he'd disappointed her too. He moved to the couch, slumping down on its thread-bare cushions and cradling his face in his palms. A second later, Tonya was prying them apart, kneeling before him with those sad eyes of hers.

"Remus, I'm going to tell you something," she whispered again, "and I need you to believe me."

"What if you're lying too?"

"I promise I'm not."

Slowly he nodded and Tonya sniffled, before smiling at him and cupping both of his cheeks in her hands. "You haven't even met a fraction of the people that will love you in this life, Remus, and those people—those ones—they're going to be so amazed by you."

"You amaze me."

"And I love you for it. But you know, darling, the happiest we've been isn't the happiest we'll ever be…" She pressed a hand to the centre of his chest; "I know you like music, I can hear it in your soul—and I promise that other people will want to listen. You just have to let them."

Remus reached up to grasp at her wrist. He was trembling. "What if I don't know the words?"

Tonya smiled sadly. "You will, sweet love. You will."

He met her gaze and slowly she dropped her forehead against his, closing her eyes. They stayed like that for a while, clutching onto one another like the physical touch of being together could solve any problem. Finally, Tonya pulled away and he released her. His eyes were stinging—he'd almost cried, but she just wiped his face for him and stood up.

“I’m going to get cleaned up,” she said, sniffling once more. “Are you going to be okay?”

“Yeah, go on.”

Tonya smiled and kissed his temple before walking around the couch and disappearing down the hall. He watched her go as he slumped back on the cushions, staring up at the ceiling. It took him a few minutes to realise the record had stopped and a few more to find the motivation to get up and switch it. As he did, he almost knocked over the bottle of cheap scotch they’d left next to the pile of albums. Remus moved the bottle, instinctively taking a swig of it as he did, but the moment the sour scent of the booze reached his nose he was pulling it from his lips.

“Hey Tonya, want some tea?” He called, swallowing the musty taste in his mouth as he dropped the needle down on a Rod Stewart vinyl.

“No thanks! You go ahead!”

He stayed by the turntable, almost entranced by the spinning record.

“Hey Ton, what do you think of Rod Stewart?”

There was no answer, and Remus turned back toward the bathroom. "Hey, Ton!" He called, gently tapping his hands along the walls; "Is Rod Stewart more soft rock or pop?"

The bathroom door was cracked and spilling yellow light out into the hall. It swing open easily.

“ ‘Cause Sirius actually put money on—”

There was a sharp clatter as Tonya accidentally knocked the toothbrush holder from the sink to shatter on the floor. He'd spooked her, and she cursed beneath the towel she was holding to her face as she scrambled to collect the pieces.

“Careful, don’t step on it!” Remus blurted, instantly bending down to collect the scattered bits of glass. As he did so, he spotted a mirror set up on top of the toilet like a tray, white powder cut up into thin lines and a tiny newspaper straw sitting next to it. He froze slightly, before robotically picking up the chunks and rising back up to his feet, tossing them into the sink with another clatter. Tonya watched him sadly, face half-covered, but he didn’t miss the blood this time.

“They say seeing red where you want white is a bad sign,” Remus mumbled, tugging the towel away away from her. Tonya let him, fingers holding onto empty air as he took in the sight of blood smudged beneath her nose.

“Yeah, well I always thought red was a nice colour on me,” she said, almost attempting a laugh before snatching the towel back and wiping her face. “S'fine, it’ll stop soon.”

“Anything I can do?”

“Nope.” She tipped her head back and pinched the bridge of her nose. “Actually yes—pour me another drink?”

“We were just crying in the living room and you want another drink?”

“Oh, were you crying?”

“Now who’s being the dick?”

Tonya dropped the towel and smiled into the mirror. She had blood in her teeth that she sucked away with her tongue. “Tea, then.”

Remus nodded and stepped away from the door, biting his lip. He turned to go, before something inside won out and he stopped just outside that little sliver of yellow bathroom light to watch her. “Tonya, why do you take so many drugs?"

She looked to him, pretty face still stained with her own blood, and sighed. "Same reason as everyone else, I suppose. They help me forget myself for a little while."

"What's there to forget?" She was so beautiful, he couldn’t ever imagine wanting to forget her.

"Oh, sweet love." Tonya smiled again—sadly—and his heart ached.

"Are you at least... happy then?”

Just like last time, the question caught her off guard. “What do you mean, love?”

“I mean… are you okay?”

She didn’t respond right away, just looked him up and down before gently rapping her knuckles against the porcelain sink three times. Remus felt his breath hitch, and she nodded softly, mouthing to him, ‘I’m okay’.

Squeezing the bathroom doorknob tightly, Remus couldn’t think of anything else to say. “Alright, Ton…” He made to step away.

“Remus, what makes you happy?” Tonya asked suddenly.

Pausing, he bit his lip, then; “I’ll tell you next Christmas.”

Tonya’s smile broadened and she shook her head with a light laugh. “Cheeky. Fine. Call me when tea’s ready.”

* * *

In the end he'd left her there, cleaning up the mess that would exist even if he didn’t, and made the tea. They took it in the living room ("Rod Stewart is totally soft rock.") and when their friends finally returned, only a few minutes shy of midnight, Tonya somehow found it in herself to welcome them with open arms. No one mentioned the ragged looks, or the desperation with which they chugged their booze and pills, and things were normal. As normal as they could be. In a time as tumultuous and unsure as 1976, you’d have been hard-pressed to find a single person without an addiction, whether it be drugs or alcohol or cigarettes or football or porn rags. Everyone owed their day-to-day to some habitual dependency, and maybe that was why Remus didn’t say anything.

Love was blind, after all.

Years down the road, in another haphazard radio interview he’d let Gideon talk him into and wouldn’t even remember the next day, Remus would recall that the only things to do in the seventies were get high and listen to music. They didn’t have fancy electronics like VHS tapes or boomboxes and it would be years before the Average Joe was carrying around his own cell phone. The only football matches that were shown on TV were the championships or highlighted Match of the Week, and if you wanted to watch a film you had to go to the cinema and cough up a couple of quid just to sit in the dark for a few hours and forget the rest of the world existed at all. That was all right and good, but whether you were in London and poor or Scotland and rich, your options were limited.

At school he made and played music and eventually he would get real good at it too. The whole thing had mostly started as a joke—just another way to distract themselves or else skive-off studying for A-Levels. None of them knew it then but that joke would turn into the rest of their lives, messily intertwining with relationships, money, fame, and personal introspection. Things would go wrong just as many times as they went right and people would come and go until no one was surprised by anything anymore. Some things were predictable of course, like James and Lily, though they had their own fair share of surprises in store too. They should've seen the first big mess coming—there would be many—but even then they were young and stupid and Peter was hardly the only one at fault. Marlene was less shocking; by their last year of school it was clear she was never going to wait for anyone to simply hand her happiness to her. Lottie was more simple, but still brave. It took Remus a while to realise just how much he admired her for it. And Mary had also done well for herself, even if it had taken her a while to pick up the pieces.

But then there was Sirius.

Sirius and his ever-damning belief that being able to live through your suffering was just further proof that you were alive. Remus had never bought much into the idea, but what did he know? For most of his life he'd looked at everything the wrong way; upside down or backward. He was like a cup half empty. A guitar with no strings. Where others saw sunshine he saw rain. And he fucking hated the rain. It was quite pathetic—but made for a few damn good songs in the end.

The radio interview had come after most things, during that bit where he was just floating, using what was left of his talent to collaborate with friends like the Longbottoms and write cheap pop ditties for the likes of Gilderoy Lockheart. He never let the studio put his name on any of them, even though Sirius would teasingly tell him to be proud of the work. They weren't together then but they talked nearly every day, saw one another every other day, and occasionally fucked on the couch. It was an unspoken rule that the bed was off-limits until they figured out what it was they were doing. Only, Remus wasn't sure they'd ever really known what they were doing.

Eventually he would came to learn that there was a technique in music that felt a lot like this, called 'tempo rubato'. It involved speeding or slowing the traditional tempo of a song to invoke new feeling, as beautiful representation of freedom that relied completely on the discretion of the musician. If done incorrectly the technique could effectively butcher a thing of beauty—but if done right, it could award complete and utter freedom over the most expressive art known to man. That rubato was the thing one heard when an orchestra conductor briefly slowed a key moment in a classical piece. It was that breath at the end of a love ballad where your very heart felt as though it was shattering. It was responsible for every moment of emotion felt by conscious beings capable of hearing a music note played aloud.

Tempo rubato meant ‘robbed time’. That was the name humans gave to the concept. Like a word, time could not be captured, so people did the only thing they could, they attempted to defy it. They used surgeries to fix the physical flaws that came with age, and took photographs to help them remember a moment otherwise lost. People defied time by naming it. They called the past ‘memories’ and the future ‘what’s yet to pass’. They called hopelessness ‘rubato’, and in doing so, they granted themselves the illusion of controlling time.

At least, that's how he'd described it whenever someone cared enough to ask.

But still, it remained a comforting thought. If someone could speed up or slow down something as uncapturable as music—as pure emotion—then maybe time really was within their control. But everyone knew it wasn't possible. Not really. Whether as a conscious realisation or an inherent knowing, the answer was clear; time passed with or without people. With or without photographs or tempo. It always did, and it was easy to look back and desperately want to cling to it. Natural even, because what was behind was clear—it'd already been lived. It was the unknown ahead that scared people.

At sixteen Remus couldn’t have told anyone what a ‘tempo rubato’ was, but he’d been unknowingly experiencing it all his life. Being at school felt like the traditional, fast-moving tempo of the piece, and those few precious moments in the flat were his rubato. There he couldn’t play or make music, he could only listen and live. Conversations were without any real goal, the days blurred into one another, and the nights felt endless but not hopeless. There was very little action or adventure and that was how he liked it. The flat was rubato, one he’d never find anywhere else. There would be others, yes, but none the same. If he’d known then maybe he would’ve taken more pictures and less drugs so he could better commit them to memory.

But that’s the thing about memories—in the moment they’re not memories at all. They’re not even time.

They’re just life.

Chapter End Notes

'Chuffed' means proud.
'Skive-off' means skip out on something.
The song they dance to is “Teo Torriatte” by Queen, off their 1976 album ‘A Day at the Races’. It’s the final song on the album, and is otherwise known as “Let Us Cling Together”, which seems to work perfectly in this bitter-sweet situation.
So the after bit at the end feels very lethargic to me, but I've always wanted to better hint at the future, especially that of the band! (You may catch a few references to some characters you’ve been wondering about, lol) I cannot wait to give it to you. See you all in 1977!

Chapter 46: Healing

Chapter Summary

Back to Hawkings, January 1977. Remus has a plan. Sirius has a secret.

Chapter Notes

CW: Scars and allusions to child abuse.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

So where are you going to, I don't mind,
If I live too long I'm afraid I'll die;
So I will follow you wherever you go,
If you offered hand is still open to me;
Strangers on this road we are on,
We are not two, we are one…

- "Strangers" The Kinks, 1970

Monday 3rd January 1977

Three days at home after visiting the flat would've normally sobered him, but even as his stomach squirmed and his eyes twinged from the smoky smell of the burning tar that always seemed to accompany London train stations, Remus made his way through Kings Cross feeling as though every vein had been electrified. He'd just finished the best Christmas of his teenage life, and though he was heading back to school, things were sure to be different. His luck was shifting, and he'd already made a list of ways things were sure to improve;

1. He had a plan for a prank, courtesy of Seesaw.
2. He was going to fix any poor marks, probably courtesy of Lily.
3. He had a girlfriend.
4. He was going to apologise to Sirius.

The last point was certainly the most contentious, but things with Sirius had ended on a poor note and Remus couldn't stop thinking about it, despite the fact that he wasn't entirely sure what they'd fought over in the first place. It was bad enough that Lily and James' argument had divided them the year before, he couldn't imagine what living in the same room would be like if things between them were still foul after the holiday. After Remus had spent first term sour as a grape, James and Peter would have no choice but to take Sirius' side, they owed each other such loyalty. There was another thing too; he'd promised Tonya that he would find the words, and starting off with an apology sounded like his best bet.

By the time he made it to the correct platform there were only a handful stragglers left to board. He glanced through a few windows, hoping to spot the other boys, but as the train's first warning whistle cut through the station Remus threw himself up into one of the cars and began moving toward their usual section of the train. The other passengers were mostly students of course, and he waved to the occasional friendly face as he made his way down the corridor, trunk bumping between the wall and his knees.

As expected, he found all three of the other boys sitting towards the back of the train in one of the more spacious compartments and tugged the door open, plucking the toothpick he'd stolen from Giles that morning from his mouth; "Wotcher."

"Hi-ya, Remus!" James called. "Thought you were going to miss the train."

"It's called being fashionably late, Potter, look it up." He nodded to Peter. "Hey, Pete."

"Hey there, Lupin."

Remus swallowed. "Hey, Black."

Sirius turned back from the window he'd been focused on and looked him up and down. Across his lap sat Andy's acoustic guitar, which he was plucking absent-mindedly with his legs stretched out in front of him and crossed at the ankles. He was wearing his suede jacket over a white button-up and he had to toss his dark waves out of his eyes to get a good look at him. Add in a few cigarettes and a glass of scotch left abandoned on the windowsill and he could've been on an album cover.

"Hey, Moony," Sirius answered coolly.

It was as though the entire apologetic script Remus had been rehearsing in his head for the last three days had evaporated into thin air, and he was left to smile awkwardly and nod. Returning the toothpick to his teeth, he closed the door after himself and lifted his trunk up onto the overhead shelf with the others' before taking a seat between Peter and the window.

"You have a good Christmas?" James asked. He had Andy's empty guitar case tucked up between his legs and was gently rapping his knuckles against the painted leather.

"Yeah, brilliant."

James raised both eyebrows. "Anything exciting happen?"

"Er—not much."

"You got a haircut. Looks nice."

"Thanks, Prongs."

"Okay enough with the pleasantries, let's just spit it out already," Sirius said. "How long did you think you could keep such a dirty little secret?"

Remus balked a bit. There was no way they could've found out about Tomny and the others, not unless Marlene had somehow figured out how to trace phone calls—oh!

"You mean that," Remus sighed before moving the toothpick to the other side of his mouth with his tongue. He hadn't expected Sirius to bring Marlene up so quickly—or at all, really—but he supposed getting it out in the open sooner was better than later.

"Yeah," Sirius drawled, "when were you gonna tell us about Olga?"

"I'm sorry—who?" Peter snorted.

"The mail-order bride Lupin's dad got from Russia—you know, to ensure that prestigious Lupin line of theirs continues."

It took a second for all of them to realise Sirius was joking, but when they did James and Peter snorted while Remus let out a breath and then a laugh.

"You dickhead," he said, using one foot to reach across and knock him in the shin. Sirius smiled smugly and just like that any hint of animosity between them melted away.

"No, but seriously," James started, "when were you going to tell us you're dating Marlene?"

“You’re dating MARLENE?” Peter shouted, loudly enough to make Remus flinch away. “Since when?!”

“Not very long! We’ve all been on holiday and—”

Another loud whistle blew, indicating the train’s incoming departure and Remus bit down on the toothpick.

“I’m surprised Lottie didn’t tell you, Pete,” James said, making Peter roll his eyes.

“She never tells me anything. She left last week to see Mickey and I had to find out from mum after they’d already dropped her at the station.”

“She taking the other line to school then?”

“Mhm.”

Remus cut a glance across to Sirius, who had turned to tuning the guitar, expression neutral. “Oi, Sirius,” he started, just as the compartment door flew open and Mary and Marlene stood there, half-panting on the threshold.

“Made it,” Mary said, tugging her trunk inside and collapsing on the bench next to Sirius. She looked different, he realised. Her natural hair which she was always pinning in place with gel or pins was now done up in braids so close to her scalp that Remus was sure it’d hurt to get them done. She had big hoops dangling from her ears too, but the same merry-Mary smile.

“You guys look like you ran here,” Peter said.

“We wouldn’t have had to if this one hadn’t bothered to stop and flirt with the train attendant,” Marlene huffed, drawing the door closed after her. She looked the same, save the fact that she was wearing a leather jacket over her clothes that was so big it could’ve fit Doss.

“He looked just like Jermaine Jackson from the Jackson Five,” Mary defended, “I had to tell him!”

“You did a lot more than just tell him.”

“If he’d looked like Andy Gibb you’d have been asking for his autograph.”

Marlene rolled her eyes and began trying to lift her trunk up onto the shelf.

“Here, I got it,” Remus said, standing. She let him take the trunk, smiling as she lifted a satchel from her shoulder.

“Thanks, Remus."

When the trunk was securely stowed, they sat down together to find the rest of their friends staring and wearing the same shit-eating grins on their faces.

“What?” Marlene snapped, nervously tucking a piece of hair behind her ear.

“Nothing,” James and Mary said in unison. It made Marlene blush terribly, and Remus shot them the bird just as the final whistle blew and the train rumbled to life beneath them.

“Hope the trolley comes by soon,” Peter mumbled.

“My mum packed us some samosas if anyone’s hungry,” James offered.

“Oh, yes please,” Mary said; “Forgot to eat breakfast.”

While Sirius continued tuning his guitar, James produced a bin full of homemade goods courtesy of his mum and Marlene pulled her bag onto her lap.

“Remus, I got a few new books for Christmas. Would you like to see?"

“Sure."

“I’ve already read this one—devoured it, actually—but you might like it too.” She withdrew a copy of Mrs. Dalloway and passed it to him. As Remus flipped the cover open to have a look, he realised he couldn’t get past the first line. Instead his attention was being drawn across the carriage to Sirius as he pensively traced the strings of his guitar up and down. It was an odd gesture for him—for Sirius who was always looking to expel endless energy.

As the train shook and trembled beneath them on the tracks, Remus could hear Marlene distantly explaining the synopsis of the novel, but he was too distracted to do more than nod along. Instead he watched, transfixed, as Sirius’ long fingers gently plucked a few chords. He kept his left hand pressed to the top of the strings to mute their sound, and Remus felt the agony of the silenced notes like a red-hot poker in his gut.

Play, he silently pleaded. Please play something.

Finally, Sirius lifted his right hand high, ready to strum, but the moment he flexed his wrist his hand seized as though he were in pain and he clapped his fingers over the strings, gagging the life out of them. Remus sucked in a short gasp, and though there was no way he could've heard him over the noise of the train and their friends, Sirius' eyes shot to his and for a split second they were alone in the world.

Find the words.

There wasn't time.

Just as quickly as their eyes had met, Sirius looked away, setting one elbow atop the guitar's body and leaning his chin on his hand to stare out the train window in silence as the clamour of London's city-life drifted away.

* * *

It took a few days, but eventually Remus had grown sure in his suspicions that Sirius had indeed injured himself somehow. When they were finally talking without giving each other strange looks he tried bridging the subject, but Sirius just passed over the question with simple denial. Still, Remus remained unconvinced by the blasé attitude. Sirius wasn't playing anything in their dorm or in music class, and whenever anyone tried to prompt him he would also dismiss their interest with some lazy excuse. Not even James could get him to play, though Sirius hadn't cut him off completely. He let James regale him with everything he'd practiced over the holiday, supplying lukewarm congratulations and corrections where necessary as though he'd lost all interest in the art. But that wasn't even the most startling part; since returning to school Sirius hadn't played a single album.

Not one.

In fact, he hadn't even reconnected the hi-fi after they'd brought it downstairs for their end of term party. Remus hadn't realised until he went to play something himself and found the cords hanging abandoned behind Sirius' hutch.

“He’s just in a slump,” James said. They’d just gotten out of maths and were on their way to meet Lily and Marlene for lunch. So far having a girlfriend had consisted mostly of walking one another to and from classes and meeting for meals, which to Remus didn’t feel all that different from having friends. The only new bit was the kissing, which if he was being honest, they’d only done a few times and usually only as a fleeting goodbye.

“It happens sometimes,” James continued, “usually when he comes back from holiday or after his parents call or something.”

Remus glared at the ground. “I don’t fucking get it. Why do they care so much if his dad’s such a dick and his mum’s a right hag?”

“Pete and I’ve been asking ourselves that since we met him. Miles was better with it, I think. His grandfather was a mean old coot, so he could relate better than we could or—I don’t know, maybe he just had better advice..."

Remus shook his head. He knew why Sirius hadn't told them, it was why Marlene refused to let her girlfriends visit her in Southwark. James and Peter both had perfect home-lives as far as anyone like Sirius could be concerned, how could he ever expect them to relate?

“So Miles had family problems too then?”

“Kinda," James murmured. "His mum left when he was really young and his dad went a bit berserk after so he was raised by his grandparents. We never met 'em though. They were old and didn’t like making the trip up here, even when we were little. Miles always said it was the damp, made it hard on his grandfather since he was injured in the war or something. They were pretty strict though, never let him watch TV or call us up over the holidays.”

“Is that why you haven't spoken to him since he left?"

"Yeah. We tried sending letters, but never heard anything back."

"You don't think he could've..."

“Died?"

Idiot!

Remus halted in the middle of the pavement, and James stopped with him, crossing his arms over his chest.

"Sorry, Prongs! I-I didn't mean to..."

"It's fine," James said. "But do us a favour and don't mention it when Sirius is around. It upsets him, and we can't know for sure what happened, so best just let it lie."

Remus nodded solemnly, and bit his lip. “Yeah... yeah, alright. My bad... Think I’m just looking too far into things anyway. I never met Miles, but Sirius, he… something’s up with him.”

“Always is, after the holidays. I'm sure he’ll be back to normal in a few days.”

"But it's never been this bad before. Maybe he just needs a change of pace."

“Dunno where he’s gonna get that. Hawkings has existed the same way for hundreds of years, and it’s not about to change just because we want it to.”

“Never took you for a pessimist, Potter.”

“Call it the age-old January blues.”

With a shared smirk, they began walking again. But Remus' mind was still reeling.

“Still... Doesn’t have to be a big change or anything... Maybe we could just...” He trailed off, reaching up to thumb his shirt collar. Just beneath Remus could feel the silver chain and pick, strung together just like Sirius had meant for. Meanwhile James began peering at him suspiciously through his round glasses.

“Okay, you went quiet real fast... What're you thinking, Lupin?”

“Just that I never got Sirius anything for Christmas.”

“Well in that case, you never got me or Pete anything either.”

Remus began laughing, and shoved his friend lightly.

“Tosser.”

He’d spent the rest of their walk explaining his idea to James, who turned out to be pleasantly surprised. Sirius had asked for only one thing before holiday—to listen to Hope’s albums, and if they could be the thing that broke him out of his musical funk, well then maybe this was exactly what Remus had been waiting for. For so long he'd let those damn records hang over his head like a suicide note, when really they were just bits of plastic with grooves impressed into them. Break them, play them, it didn't matter, she wasn't going to come back for them. So might as well put them to some use before the memories they represented decayed any further.

Later that evening he enlisted James and Peter's help to set up the stereo while he pulled out Hope's trunk. There were fresh cracks along its corners, water damage leftover from the prank on Sirius' birthday, and he ran his fingers along them as though they were fresh joints in the trunk's history.

"He's gonna be so excited," James chimed, half-stretched out under his bed to plug everything in.

"It's gonna nearly double his collection," Peter agreed. "How could he not be happy?"

"Just remember it's about his happiness when he starts blaring the volume at all hours again," Remus said happily, lifting the trunk up onto his bed. He had the key already in hand but the moment he heard the tiny lock click open something in his chest sank and he had to ask Peter to sort through them while he escaped under the guise of needing to take a piss.

The click had been the trigger. For a split second it sounded identical to the latch on the door of the estate's stables and he'd seen a flash of Hope as she led him across the hay-strewn floor toward her own mare, Georgina. Remus had always disliked horses, even at five. They could sense nervous energy and fed into it with their own agitation. He'd cried, not wanting to go in, but Hope insisted because they'd come all the way from the house for a visit and pulled him into the pen anyway. Terrified, he'd thrown a screaming fit in the middle of his stall and Georgina matched it, nearly cracking his mother in two with a swift kick. The stable hand who'd found them had to have assumed she was half-dead thanks to all the blood, but Hope just wobbled around holding her bloodied head in her hands and ranting about how it wasn't the horse's fault and that they couldn't put her down.

Remus didn't learn until much later that the horse hadn't been Georgina at all, but an unbroken stallion Lyall was housing for a friend. The real Georgina had been Hope's horse as a little girl and had been dead for more than a decade. Silly me, she'd said later, I must've forgotten.

Remus splashed cold water on his face to help him shake the worst of it off. Perhaps the records weren't such a good idea, after all there was a reason he'd kept them shut away for so long—but he'd been so confident they would be the thing to help Sirius. Yes—he could do this. They were just bits of flattened PVC.

"Moony, which album did you want to play first?" James called through the door. Towelling off his face and neck, Remus walked out and avoided looking him in the eye.

"Nah, play whatever you want."

"Okay. Cheers!"

James had of course found the only Kinks record in the collection and put it on. A few minutes into it the front door finally opened and Sirius strode in quickly as though he were already on a mission.

"Hey mate!" James called eagerly from his bed.

"Hey," Sirius responded, entirely oblivious to the fact that his own stereo was playing and instead surging toward the jacket he'd left hanging up on his peg and rifling through its pockets. "Oh Potter, did you see where I left that twenty quid?"

"You used it as a bookmark," Remus called first and Sirius pointed at him fondly, winking, before rushing to the foot of his bed and sifting through the stack of books he'd left there—most of which belonged to Remus in the first place.

"Hey," James tried, "we have a surprise for you."

"Cool. Can't wait to see it."

James and Peter exchanged a look.

"It's a good surprise," Peter added.

"I'll bet."

James stood up from his bed. "What are you doing?"

"Sorry, just in a bit of a rush. Lupin, which book was it?"

"Maths text…"

"Ah." Sirius whipped his head back and forth before spotting the textbook on his bedside beneath an empty tea mug. He ripped the bill free and shoved it into his pocket. “Kay, see you guys later then.”

James stopped him halfway to the door. “Oi, what’s your rush?”

“I’m meeting Xeno.”

“For what?”

Sirius waved the twenty pound note in the air. “What else? Don’t worry, I promise I’ll share.”

“But Remus has a gift for you,” James said pointedly. Pausing, Sirius glanced Remus' way and he bit his lip before ever-so-slightly gesturing to the hi-fi with his chin. Sirius followed his gaze before his eyes finally settled on the stack of albums left piled on top of his bedspread. Slowly he made his way toward them and began to gently sift through, as though they might disintegrate should he be too rough.

“These…” Sirius started, before looking up, “these your mum’s?”

Remus nodded. “Thought we could mix them in with the others… if you’d like.”

Sirius looked back to the pile and flipped through a few more, stopping on Jimi Hendrix’s Electric Ladyland. “Wow,” he said, “guess your mum did have some taste.”

“More than mine, all she listens to is polka,” Peter said, making them all smile.

Sirius straightened out the album stack and patted his hands on his trousers. “This is great, thanks Moony. Would you—erm—would you mind sorting them in with the rest? I… told Xeno I’d meet him and I’m already late.”

James visibly deflated, but very secretly, Remus was relieved. He’d been having second thoughts the entire time, but Sirius’ nonchalance had saved him from having to gush and play pretend-sentiment over it all. “Yeah, no problem,” he said and Sirius flashed him a grateful smile before slipping out of the room. He took with him the hopeful mood and James immediately collapsed back onto his bed as Ray Davies serenaded him through the hi-fi’s speakers.

"What the fuck was that?" He wailed. "You would'a thought we offered him jellied eels for dinner and not three dozen fresh-fucking albums for his collection."

Remus crossed over to James' bed and set a comforting hand on his friend's shoulder. "Don't worry, we'll figure something else out, Prongs."

"Like what? If Hendrix can't solve his problems, who can?"

“Maybe his tastes have changed?” Peter suggested. “Maybe he’d just more into country now.”

James and Remus cringed at the same time.

"Pete, not all thoughts are meant to be voiced aloud, mate."

Despite the surprising failure, James only grew more invigorated than ever to break Sirius’ bad spell. He sought his best friend out one-on-one most times, but James was too kind and every time he tried to get into the nitty-gritty with him Sirius would expertly distract him by asking about the new football kit he got for Christmas or some latest win by Arsenal. When he did manage to get anywhere, Sirius would turn stony and James would have no choice but to back off. So, the term trudged on, wet, muddy, and grey, until the entirety of dorm 4A felt about as exciting as a cancer clinic.

“The rest of us have noticed a difference too, you know,” Marlene said, as she chugged from a water bottle. He’d dropped by the indoor pitch to walk her back from practice and was sweating more than she was, dressed up in his full winter garb.

“You have then,” Remus confirmed. He knew it wasn’t just them.

“Yeah. Black's been quieter lately, especially in class. I think he even let Flitwick get through an entire lecture the other day without tossing a paper airplane over his head.”

“God, he’s sicker than I thought.”

“I hope that’s supposed to be funny,” Marlene said with an arched brow. “I wish I could offer better advice but if he’s been like this for—how long did you say?”

“Almost two weeks. Since we got back from holiday.”

“That long, huh? Well I’m sorry, Rem, but I’m not sure what you should do. No one else was there with him."

At that moment, a lightbulb went off in his head. Remus shot up from the sports bench, suddenly very enthused. "That's it! Oh my god, Cherry, you're a genius!"

"I am?"

"Yes!" He jumped over a few scattered footballs and kissed her cheek. "Sorry, I'll walk you home tomorrow, promise—I just gotta check something!"

He sprinted—actually sprinted—across the dark campus until he made it to Salazar House. Pausing to cough up half a lung—he'd made a mistake smoking that fag on his way to the football pitch—Remus took a deep breath and marched up the front steps of the dorm. Salazar House was decidedly less dank and dreary-looking with the lights on, and like its fellow dorm counterparts was decorated according to its House colours of silver and forest green. The space might've even felt cozy had he not gotten several nasty looks before he'd even crossed the threshold.

Struggling to recall which dorm was Regulus', Remus had almost resolved himself to stop and ask when he heard Barty Crouch's harsh crowing from the common room. Peeking his head inside, he spotted the group of boys sitting together near the fireplace, a circle of cards set up on the table between them. Already regretting not bringing any of his friends for backup, Remus started across the room, dodging couches and other students until Yaxley spotted him and whistled in the others' directions.

"Well, look at what we have here," he called; "a wolf's fallen into the snake pit."

"Come to try out Salazar's fangs, Lupin?" Barty sneered. "I warn you we're a bit more dangerous in the daytime."

Ignoring the lame jab, Remus scowled harshly before looking to Regulus. "I need to talk to you."

Regulus kept his eyes on his cards, a teacup in one hand and a cool expression on his face. "That sounds like a you problem, Loony."

"Reg—"

"Oi Loony, how's the new girlfriend?" Barty tried, casually flipping over a card. “You know—the tall one who acts likes a bloke. Reckon she’d be prettier if she weren’t so worried about stretching pennies? I didn’t know we were still supposed to date within the same caste.”

“Shut your mouth,” Remus lashed, before turning back to Regulus again. “I said I need to talk to you.”

“You should get out of our dorm,” Regulus said dismissively, sipping his tea.

“Yeah,” Travers sneered, “I think you’re starting to stink up the joint.”

“Nah, that’s just Loony’s natural pheromone. Attracts all the little scrubbers and bag ladies to him.”

Travers leaned over to give Barty a high five and Remus took a deep breath to calm himself. Caring about Sirius’ well-being was really starting to weigh on him.

“It’s about Sirius,” he ground out, and Regulus looked up at him with a muted expression.

"What about Sirius?"

“Yeah, what—has Big Bro Black finally learned some manners? Or is he running around campus starkers again?” Yaxley ragged.

"Shut up, Yax," Regulus snapped, shooting his friend a dirty look. Yaxley froze a bit, but no one said anything as Regulus set his cards and teacup aside and got to his feet. Coat in hand, he stepped past Remus stiffly and began marching toward the door. Remus didn't have to ask whether he was meant to follow.

"Regulus?" Barty demanded, sounding confused. "What you going with this lunatic for?"

Regulus ignored him, and feeling a bit smug, Remus paused and glanced down at the table before giving one of its legs a sharp kick. Instantly all the cups on the table overturned or splashed tea over their rims, soaking the cards and several laps. The boys hissed.

“Ta, dickheads.”

He followed Regulus out to where the two of them quickly skipped down the front steps and split off the path to head around the side of the dorm. Remus frowned at the squelching mud underfoot and the distinct smell of week-old rubbish, but Regulus had finally stopped near the dorm's noisy radiator, crossing his arms over his chest. He kept tapping either arm with his fingers rhythmically, as though he were keeping time, but then switching hands and doing the same on the other side.

“Talk," Regulus ordered.

"Is there a reason we're standing next to the bins?"

“I said talk.”

“Okay, okay,” started Remus, gingerly. “I want to know what happened over Christmas. Sirius is acting funny and I think you know why.”

“Why would I know anything about how Sirius acts? I’m not his babysitter.”

“You live in the same house.”

“For three months out of the year, maybe.”

“Don’t bullshit me,” Remus snapped. “You’re not an idiot, despite the company you keep, so fess up. What happened—how’d he get hurt?”

Regulus paused. “He told you he got hurt?”

“No, but it's pretty obvious. He keeps favouring his wrist. Do you know what happened?”

“It was his own fault.”

“What was?”

“His arm. He fell out a window.”

Remus’ mouth dropped open. “He fell—a window? How?!”

“I don’t know, but I suppose you run the risk of it when you’re trying to climb out of one.”

“Well why was he trying to climb out of it?!”

“I already told you I don’t know,” Regulus scoffed, mouth puckered. “He was probably trying to run away to you lot. Sirius seems to think that choosing your family makes you better than the one you’re given, but he's just delusional."

Temper flaring, Remus looked down at his feet and then up again, letting out a long breath. Regulus watched him with the same blue-grey eyes as Sirius.

"He always has to push everything," the younger boy said lowly. "Nothing's ever good enough—he always has to pick a fight. Can't even go a few weeks without running his stupid mouth."

"Sirius doesn't pick fights for no reason," Remus replied cuttingly. "If you pushed him then that's your fault."

"I didn't push him."

"Then why aren't you ever on the same bloody team?"

Huffing, Regulus uncrossed his arms. "I'm going back inside."

As he passed, Remus grabbed his arm. "I thought brothers were supposed to defend one another."

Regulus looked up sharply. "We haven't been brothers for a long time."

Wrenching himself free, Regulus stomped away and Remus let out a long sigh, holding his forehead. He'd always known that Sirius' issues with his brother went deeper than the typical sibling spats, but he couldn't help agreeing with everything Reg had said. Sirius did run his mouth, but he also chose his family, just like Remus did, and nothing had ever felt better than that chosen family.

Making his way back to his own dorm, Remus walked in feeling tired and grumpy. He'd gotten what he wanted out of Regulus, but at the cost of his own temper, which had nearly gotten away from him. "I'm back," he called unenthusiastically, hanging his bag up on the hooks by the door.

"C'mon, Black, open the damn door!" James was shouting, while also hammering his fist on the bathroom door.

"Piss off, Potter!" Sirius yelled from the other side.

James groaned and stepped away before turning to Remus and throwing his hands up in exasperation.

"What happened?" Asked Remus.

“I pushed him,” James said, crossing to his bed and tugging his jacket on. “Figuratively, that is. His parents called today and he came back to the room all lashed and upset. I asked why, but he just pissed about again. I got tired of just taking the excuses, so I pushed him and the bloody pansy locked himself in the bathroom!”

“Did he say anything?”

“Weren't you listening?! No, he didn’t!” James sighed and shook his head. “Sorry, Moons. Don't mean to snap."

"S'okay."

James looked around, clearly frustrated, and moaned again. "Damn it —I promised Pete I would help him and Francis move the AV room stuff out. They’re getting that new clubroom they requisitioned. You staying in?”

“Yeah.”

James nodded, looking more relieved. “Kay. He’s a sulker, but if you just leave him be he’ll get over it eventually. Maybe just check on him in a bit.”

“Got it.”

“See you in a few.” Before he left James held out his fist and Remus bumped it in farewell. He thought about stopping him—telling him what Regulus had said, but in the end he let James go. Perhaps they all needed the space.

After the door closed behind him the dorm room felt eerily quiet, and Remus cast his eyes to the bathroom. “Always picking a fight,” he tsked, before shedding his jacket and falling down on his own bed.

Already ahead on homework thanks to Lily (#2 on his list was progressing nicely) he picked up the latest book Marlene had lent him. It was fine so far—some gothic parody by one of her newest obsessions, Margaret Atwood. Its plot felt maybe a bit long-winded but he suspected the bit about the feminist poetry and the main character faking her own death to flee to Italy had appealed to something inside Marlene. He’d really only agreed to read it on the promise that she would read his newest favourite, a book he’d been gifted for Christmas. It was called Carrie , a horror-thriller novel by some debut-writer from America. He’d originally thought the concept to be rather baseless and simple but it had hooked him enough that he’d read it twice before passing it on to Marlene, who appeared less than excited as she skimmed its pages.

When he finally dropped his book to stare at the bathroom door again it'd been nearly an hour. Sirius hadn't made a single peep in all that time, and glancing at the clock, Remus began to feel antsy. James hadn't mentioned if Sirius had taken anything into the bathroom with him and he couldn't smell any weed, but if he was willing to hurt himself jumping out of a window, what else would Sirius entertain if he'd been pushed to the edge?

Sitting up, Remus started toward the bathroom and gently rapped the tip of his knuckles against the door.

No answer.

He knocked harder this time, and still nothing.

"Oi," he called, "Black, open up."

He knocked again—nothing.

"Sirius? Sirius!"

He pounded.

"Sirius! Open the door!"

Sirius did not answer and quickly Remus felt his heart rise into his throat. He slammed his fist against the door until he heard its hinges begin to squeak. He used both hands, hammering until he felt as though he were punching cement.

Finally the door flew open.

"JAMES FUCK OFF—!"

Remus froze as Sirius gaped up at him. Remus gaped right back. In nearly a year and a half of living side-by-side, he'd never seen Sirius without a shirt on. For so long he'd chalked it up to insecurity; everyone was insecure about something—even self-satisfied works of art like Sirius Black. But this—he'd never expected this.

Sirius was shirtless, wearing only his pyjama pants as though he'd started getting ready for bed only to stop halfway, but his skin was far from bare. Lacing up the left side of his torso were patches of pink flesh pulled taunt over muscle, rippling with age and imperfection as though his body was a classical painting that'd been through a botched restoration. The scars stretched up across his chest and shoulder, interlacing with one another like tiger stripes, but the expression on Sirius' face was neither fierce nor undaunted. He stared back at Remus as though he were simply the edge of the world, and he was ready to tip over the edge and be swallowed by nothingness.

But Remus was just a boy, and so Sirius' shock broke and he spun around, whipping his shirt up off the floor from behind him and tugging it over his shoulders with sharp, furious motions. The scars disappeared out of sight—they were burns, Remus realised; old and healed by time but not erased entirely.

"I thought you were James," Sirius said gruffly, not looking at him.

"Sorry," he mumbled. "You didn't come out and I just… I'd wondered if you drowned in the tub or something."

Sirius fumbled with his shirt buttons. "Yeah, well, obviously not."

Twinging red in the face, Sirius did his shirt up to the last button and then they stood there, facing each other down but unsure of what to say next. Remus half expected the door to slam in his face, but before Sirius could, words came tumbling out. "I know a trick, you know. For —for when you're in the bath or just want to be left alone."

Sirius glanced up at him and raised an eyebrow expectantly.

"It's this." Swallowing, Remus raised his fist gently and knocked his knuckles against the doorframe once. "It means I need help."

"Help?" Sirius echoed. "How could that mean help?"

"Well it's... It's for when all you have left in you is a single knock. One knock is still better than nothing, you know."

"I don't get it. Sounds useless."

"Maybe, but two—" he knocked twice; "Two means, 'I'm okay'."

Sirius' eyes shifted to the door frame and Remus' bruised knuckles. "And three?"

Remus shook his head. "There is no three. Just 'okay' and 'not'. No knocks at all means 'I'm already dead, bury me with white roses'."

"Why white roses?"

“Because they’re… pure?”

Exhaling like he'd been longing for a different answer, Sirius started to close the door.

“Sirius, wait—” Remus jammed his foot in the way. “I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to—to walk in on you or pry or anything.”

Sirius sagged backward slightly. “I don’t care if you see,” he griped, though Remus got the feeling it wasn’t the truth. If it was, Sirius wouldn’t have spent so long hiding the scars under long-sleeved shirts and pyjamas. They didn’t seem like the kind one got while jumping out a window, but he knew asking right now would just make him shut down completely.

“I had an idea for a prank,” Remus tried instead. “I flagged Darby Harrison down on the train at the beginning of term—he’s been an altar boy since seventh year, right? Well, he told me that the ministers rarely check what it is they’re putting in those thuribles before communion. I brought a lot of hash back with me, and I thought that maybe it might be funny to test that theory about Jesus and weed.”

“You mean hotbox the entire church?”

“Or... try to, at least," he shrugged. "I have a friend back home who managed it when he was twelve. He tried to do it again but his friend thought it would be funnier to put gunpowder in instead. Nearly blew the priest’s arm off.”

Like a lightning flash, Remus saw the corner of Sirius’ mouth quirk up. “That’s the most ridiculous thing I’ve heard.”

“Ha, maybe…”

Sirius looked down to the ground, then back up through those dark lashes. “Do you want to listen to something later?”

Remus’ heart jumped. Oh yes. Oh dear god, yes. “Yeah, anything. Whatever you want.”

“Okay,” Sirius said, and then he closed the door.

Remus stood there for a long moment, staring at the dark wood. Had he done it then? Had he found the right words? How would he know if he had—would Sirius open the door again?

He breathed in and held it, waiting, but then exhaled when nothing happened. Perhaps he was wrong, then.

“Stupid,” he muttered to himself, turning away. But before he moved, there was a gentle knock, followed by another. Two.

I’m okay.

Remus bit his lip over a small, grateful smile. “Okay,” he whispered. “You’re okay.”

Chapter End Notes

Andy Gibb was the younger brother of the Bee Gees trio and a certifiable heartthrob in the mid-70s. He passed away in 1988.
The book Marlene lends Remus is "Lady Oracle" by Margaret Atwood (1976). It's a good read Marlene would've absolutely loved.
Also, “Mrs Dalloway” totally isn’t a queer-coded novel… not at all…

"Strangers" is an absolutely under-appreciated Kinks' song, and frankly I'm appalled that I've never seen a Marauders edit for it. Heresy. Go stream it and you'll understand.

Also as a little author's note; I wanted to say how grateful I am for all of you who are keeping up with this story as you are. I've hit a tiny creative block lately due to my own tiredness, but I wanted you to know that I absolutely read (and re-read, and RE-READ) every single comment. They're always so lovely and really motivate me to keep going! I love this fic so dearly—I love all of you even more dearly, and I'm excited to keep the story going! Cheers, babes.

Chapter 47: Band of Marauders

Chapter Summary

Remus eases into the dating life, whilst also juggling his friends and their many, many mishaps.

Chapter Notes

CW: Brief references to smoking/weed and sexual themes. Mostly cheeky fluff, which you deserve!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Johnny told his Mama,
"Hey Mama, I'm goin' away;
I'm gonna hit the big time,
Gonna be a big star someday;"

Mama came to the door,
With a teardrop in her eye;
Johnny said, "Don't cry Mama, Smile and wave goodbye..."

- "Shooting Star" Bad Company, 1975

Remus liked kissing Marlene. She was tall enough that he didn't have to bend down and risk neck injuries the way James always seemed to be doing with Lily (not that he ever complained of course). She was also honest about the things that she liked and disliked; for example she liked it when Remus greeted her with a kiss on the cheek but didn't when there were enough people around to draw attention, and she enjoyed holding hands but always preferred to let go before things got too clammy. She always smelled good—like fabric softener and mint toothpaste—and even when they were so close that her face blurred together like an Impressionist painting, he always found her pretty.

The actual dating part turned out to be easier than he'd expected too. Perhaps it was just an upside of finding a partner within the same friend group, but hanging out with Marlene as boyfriend and girlfriend didn't feel all that different from how they'd hung out before. Living at school full-time meant they couldn't just pop off to the cinema or ice cream parlour for a casual date, so like the rest of the couples at Hawkings, they had to find other ways to preoccupy themselves outside of homework or music or Marlene's football practices. After playing matchmaker for most of first term, Remus had expected Lily to put her efforts to rest once it came out that he and Marlene were indeed an item, but she'd always been an overachiever.

"I just think it's so cute!" She would gush—often. It was a taxing affair, but luckily he and Marlene were alike in more ways than one.

"We're not golden retrievers, Lils. Why don't you give it a rest already?" She would complain—equally as often.

The boys were just as bad, though their preferred method of teasing tended to involve betting on how many times he and Marlene had bunked up already. Remus finally knew how Peter was always feeling.

"C'mon, Moony! Four times? Five times? At least tell me if I'm getting close! Am I really that far off the mark?"

"You're so far off you might as well be floating in space, you arse!"

"You mean it's more than that? Ooh, you slag!"

"Oh piss off," Remus grumbled, kicking his leg up on the coffee table in front of him. Sirius smirked from across the common room and leaned forward to continue his rag-fest but James beat him to it;

"If Lupin wants to share then he will. Not everyone's as ripped-and-ready as you, Black. Sometimes people like to take care with… special matters like this."

"Nah, Moony's sneaky. Bet he's got the leg over twice as many times as you and Evans since term started."

Lily threw a couch pillow at Sirius from her spot next to James, and he snatched it out of the air. "It's lucky for McKinnon really," he started. "For a while there it was beginning to look as though she wasn't going to be able to find a bloke who could see over her head. And you, Moons—with that grumpy attitude of yours—I was beginning to think I was going to have to set you up with one of my cousins. Although I'm not sure how they'd take to dating a tree."

"Get a haircut, hippy," Remus quipped.

“Beanstalksaywhat?”

“What?”

“HA!”

“I’d date Remus,” Lily surmised, barely glancing up from the day-timer she was flipping through. Her omission instantly sobered Sirius of his laughter and he coughed a bit before clearing his throat.

“You already have Potter.”

“James would date Remus too.”

Sirius turned on James, who shrugged amicably. “Well, wouldn’t you? He’s just so cute.”

“Better get in line then,” Mary called, appearing behind Remus’ couch with Marlene in tow and leaning down to plant a kiss on his cheek. Remus accepted, only because it made Sirius roll his eyes, and both girls slid into the couch on the other side of him.

“Hey,” Marlene smiled, tucking herself into his side.

“Hey.” He kissed her.

“Really, why is that so hard to find?” Mary demanded, after watching them. “Just a simple little love—that’s all I want! One I can grow old with and retire to the countryside where we can let creamed spinach drip down our wrinkly chins in peace!”

“You are an absolute liar,” Lily called. “As if anyone could actually get Mary Macdonald to ‘retire in peace’. You love anything and everything grandiose. You’ll try it once and demand to be flown to Paris every other weekend because you miss the smell of a fresh baguette.”

“Oui! But there is a difference between grandiose and tacky.”

“Does this mean trouble in paradise with the newest beau?” Asked Sirius. “What’s his name again? Leroy? Linus? Leonardo?”

“It’s Lance.” Mary crossed her arms. “And he’s been taking pointers from you apparently. Today in class he tried singing that ‘Mary Mary’ song to me acapella.”

“I was there,” Marlene said to Remus, “it really was awful.”

“I broke up with him on the spot!” Mary cried. “But he wouldn’t stop bloody singing so who knows if he even heard me! I think I’m going to have to do it again tomorrow at lunch.”

“Shall I serenade you with a half decent song in the meantime?” Sirius offered.

“No, I’m taking a break from lead singer types actually. So, Remus, is there any chance you and Marlene are looking for a third?”

Remus squirmed a bit. “Like polygamy? Ain’t that an American thing?”

“Not polygamy—it’s called polyfidelity. Hippies do it in communes all the time.”

“Well, no offence Mary, but I think one girlfriend is enough.”

“Yeah,” Sirius said, “Lupin’s a dog person didn’t you know? He wouldn’t know what to do with two pussies.”

They all groaned and Sirius got several more couch cushions to the face for the dirty jab. There’d been a lot of jokes like that, and more since he’d come round from his beginning-of-term slump. Sirius had never outrightly admitted to hurting himself over holiday, but the day after their interaction outside the bathroom, Remus had told James what Regulus said and James had practiced a bit of tough love on his best friend. He’d marched right up to Sirius in the dining hall that same morning and clamped his hand over his wrist until he yelped and confirmed their suspicions.

“You’re a right idiot, you know that?” James had snapped, as he lovingly wrapped a tensor bandage around Sirius’ wrist. After a quick visit to Ms. Pomfrey’s medical room the injury turned out to be just a nasty sprain, but it at least gave Sirius reason enough to slack-off in class. He ended up milking the injury until Professor Bilshin threatened to give him detention cataloguing his extensive collection of foreign newspaper clippings if he so much as tried to get another student to write his next paper for him.

As if by magic, Sirius' wrist had been miraculously healed the following day and he was back to his regular wisecracking self. The teasing was not exactly pleasant, but Remus tolerated it. It wasn’t as though he was the only one feeling it and getting defensive would only lead to questions as to why he hadn’t bunked off with his girlfriend yet. They were teenagers living at a religious private institution in the bum-fuck backyard of Britain, with the only neighbours for miles being sheep and cattle—the only thing hornier was a travelling businessman or a Catholic priest. And yet they'd done little more than a bit of heavy petting. Marlene seemed to think that the best time to discuss the downsides of premarital copulation was after they'd already started snogging one another, which usually left little conversation to be had on the matter anyway.

Sexual escapades aside, neither of them were adverse to bit of peace and quiet. Their favourite spot for privacy had quickly become a quiet hallway on the second floor of the Flamel Block, just across the way from the languages department. It wasn't uncommon for couples to be found camping out in various spots across the school; the outdoor bleachers were commonplace, or the private study rooms at the back of the library—though one did run the risk of getting caught by Ms. Pince, who seemed to disappear and reappear throughout the extensive library as though she could teleport. James wouldn't admit where it was that he was always taking Lily, but Sirius had his money on the sports equipment room and Remus was inclined to agree with him.

He'd entertained the idea of taking Marlene to the astronomy building, but that was always dark and he was worried she'd think he was trying to pressure her or something. In contrast the hallway she'd shown him was brightly lit and boasted several window seats that overlooked the campus gardens and wildflower fields. Much of the grounds were still covered in a thin layer of snow and frost, but the view was always picturesque. Other students rarely came down that far unless they were heading to lessons and each seat had just enough room for the both of them to sit with their legs stretched out, ankles resting on top of one another in the middle.

These were the moments Remus appreciated most about being with Marlene. Together they'd discovered a new sort of quiet that brought comfort, and that comfort always included her, their window, and a good book. He also liked watching her from that spot, seeing the way her blue eyes flitted across the page while she read.

Marlene glanced up from her book and caught him staring. "You finish the chapter already?"

"Yeah," he nodded.

"Okay, just give me a second, I'm almost done mine."

She looked back down at the book in her lap and he leaned his head back against the wall behind him, gently picking at the peeling paint on the window's edge. A few spaced-out minutes later, and Marlene finally clapped her novel shut and sat up excitedly.

"Okay, chapter summary—twenty words or less. Go."

Remus drew his knees up and held up his fingers to count. "Lorrie skips out… leaves Jack to clean up pub… they end up at the Christening… Montgomery gives shitty apology."

"Nice."

"Thanks. Your turn."

Marlene cleared her throat. "Beatrice meets lighthouse keeper… daydreams about her ex-husband's farmhouse… hurts ankle falling off wagon… rescued by handsome keeper… storm hits."

"That was a lot of compound words just now, Cherry."

"Well, get on my level," Marlene sniggered. He smiled and they leaned forward, exchanging novels. It was all part of a little game they'd constructed—switching back and forth until the words began to blur together or they both agreed the book was dry as the paper it was printed on.

"I expect a scandalous twenty-word review of whatever Beatrice and that lighthouse keeper get up to during the storm, just so you know," Marlene warned.

He waved the novel at her. "I'm on the job."

Marlene giggled again and began flipping through the pages of her book. Remus watched her, zoning out on her hands for a moment before he lifted his arm and checked his watch. "Oh shit," he said, sitting up right and swinging his feet down to the floor.

"What's the matter?"

"It's past eight."

"Really?" Marlene clicked her tongue. "I hate winter sometimes. The sun disappears and it's just night all the time. Oh well, curfew isn't until nine anyway."

Remus stood and reached for his bag. "Actually, I promised the lads I'd meet them."

Marlene raised an eyebrow. "For what?"

"Nothing—music stuff."

"Ha, that's rubbish."

"I'll walk you back?" He tried, smiling guiltily.

"Fine." She sighed good-naturedly, getting down from the window bench and reaching for her jacket.

"Thank youuu…" Remus sang, tugging on his own. Marlene picked up his scarf and looped it over his neck, tugging him down for a little peck before releasing him.

"This better not be anything too insane," she warned.

"Oh no, in fact I think everyone will find it pretty relaxing."

A man of his word, he walked Marlene back to Rowena House and they said goodnight on the dorm's front steps. He was properly late by the time he made it back to his own dorm, only to find that the room was empty and the others must've gone on without him. Unwilling to miss out on the prank that had been his idea in the first place, Remus tossed his bag aside and set off across campus toward the church, only stopping once to avoid a pair of passing teachers on their way out for the night. He was just crossing the church courtyard when a hand grabbed him by the back of his jacket. Remus sent up a silent prayer for his eardrums, readying himself for Filch's horrendous curfew-breaking lecture, only to receive a light hissing from Sirius instead.

"Where have you been?"

Remus sighed in relief. "With Marlene. Sorry, lost track of time.

"That's all right and good but while you were shoving your tongue down McKinnon's throat, we were here putting moves on your prank."

Remus glanced around the empty courtyard. "Yeah, ball really seems to be rolling."

"Guess this is what they mean by new year, new priorities."

"Is that jealousy I detect, Black? And here I thought green was Salazar's colour."

“Yeah, bet you’d look real good in black and blue too.” Sirius raised both fists tauntingly.

“Lay off him, Sirius,” James said, appearing out of a bush behind him and dusting the frost and leaves from his wild hair. “Pete’s not here either.”

“Yes, I am!” Peter wheezed, rushing up to James’ side from the road and stopping, bent over while he caught his breath.

“Hope you two at least had fun shagging your girlfriends while we waited here freezing our bits off,” Sirius grumbled.

“When you find someone who can put up with you for more than ten minutes it can be your turn to be late,” Remus said.

“Why bother? I’ve already got you as a captive audience.”

James grinned and socked Sirius in the shoulder with a large baggie of weed. “Okay, drama queen, let’s get this show on the road.”

Shooting another disapproving look in Remus’ direction, Sirius snatched the weed—courtesy of Seesaw—and began marching toward the church. The hash was mostly seeds and stems and not all that good for smoking, but would still smoke and smell strongly enough to peak a few sinful noses during the following morning’s service.

“Wait, we’re just walking right in?” Peter asked, as they went up the steps and James reached for the front door.

“We already scoped the place,” James said. “It’s Father Minsin on confessional duty tonight and he’s already fallen asleep in the booth.”

“You still sweating over what Francis told you, Pete?” Sirius asked disdainfully.

“He said one more problem and I’ll lose my spot as club treasurer," Peter whined. "We couldn’t meet for almost two weeks after the stink bombs because half of us smelled to high heaven!”

“Well, what would you rather be known as? The guy who turned his church into the Jimi Hendrix Experience or the guy who sits around watching telly in some dark clubroom, tugging on his nob?”

Peter glowered like he’d swallowed a lemon. “Whatever, get on with it then.”

Sirius nodded to James and he opened the door wide enough for all of them to slip inside. Most of the church's lights were off, but they scooted along the wall closest to them anyway, avoiding the hallway of confessionals and ducking toward the church offices.

"One of us should be keeping watch," James said, and Sirius immediately turned to Peter.

"You heard him, Pete. You were the late one after all."

"So was Remus!"

"Watch the volume," James winced.

"Last in, first out," Sirius said firmly. "And it's Lupin's weed."

Peter huffed, but unable to argue, finally turned and trudged back the way they'd come.

"You are certainly losing the popular vote tonight," Remus said, earning himself a threatening finger in the face from Sirius.

"Best learn some loyalty or you'll be next."

Remus yanked the weed bag from his hand and hit him with it, still sniggering. They followed each other into the ministers' offices and found themselves in a large room with a long meeting table taking up most of its middle. They left the lights off, and the room remained blue-cast thanks to the winter moonlight drifting through the sheer window coverings. Someone had left a set of vestments draped over the back of one of the chairs, and Remus held it up to James, who was busy snacking on a box of sacramental bread he'd found.

"Next Halloween costume—Father Potter?"

"I'd do it," James said around a mouthful of wafers.

Sirius turned around from the front of the room. "If you're done stuffing your face with the body of Christ, I found the incense box."

Remus tossed the robes down and together they joined Sirius by a heavy wooden hutch on the other side of the room. "You sure you're feeling okay, Black? You're not normally so cranky while laughing in the face of God."

"And you're not normally so flipping oblivious," Sirius grumbled. Remus exchanged a look with James, who only shrugged and offered to share the wafers. He turned it down with a small smile as Sirius opened the incense box and they were met with the instant smell of frankincense and myrrh.

“I don’t think we should replace all of it,” James said, “or they’re bound to notice the change in smell.”

“A fifty-fifty mix then?” Remus suggested. Sirius nodded in agreement.

“Find me something to put the rest of the incense in.”

Remus looked around. There was a large array of silver and gold chalices along one wall of the office, the same ones that the ministers used in their service. He went to them and plucked one with a lid off the shelf and brought it back to Sirius, who began scooping incense into it with his hands.

“You figure anyone’s actually going to get high ‘cause of this?” Asked James.

“Nah,” Sirius scoffed, “but in the very least the church is going to be needing some airing out, just like our friends in Salazar.”

“And we get out of church early,” Remus smirked.

Suddenly the office’s overhead lights blazed to life and left each of them momentarily blinded as they spun round to find Father Minsin standing in the doorway, hands clasped in front of him. “Good evening boys,” he smiled, and Sirius visibly deflated, one hand still in the incense box.

“Fuck.”

"No need for foul language, Mr. Black," the priest said. "I believe we're in plenty enough trouble already."

Completely caught, Father Minsin made them wait on the front steps of the church until Filch showed up. The groundkeeper and self-appointed child-torturer looked about as happy as kid on Christmas as he held the bag of hash aloft like a trophy.

“Caught breaking and entering with illicit substances, eh?”

“No, Mr. Filch, we were going to smoke it all but then the voice of God came to us and we ran straight here to repent.” Despite the excuse, Sirius' delivery read as rather unenthusiastic, and Filch only smacked him upside the head before ordering them to start the long march toward Castle Hall.

"What happened to Pete?" James whispered sorely, his breath coming out as hazy puffs in the cold night air.

"The little worm must've ran off with his tail between his legs, the bloody coward," Sirius growled. "All for his fucking knob-jockey AV club. That little rat!"

"Quiet!" Filch barked.

Remus pulled his winter cap further down over his ears in silent protest. The street was dark but Filch marched just behind them with his torch. He could see someone else making their way toward them from the Bellchant building, and as he watched they slipped on the icy pavement and went down with a spectacular shriek. Filch straightened up and squinted into the dark.

"You three don't move," he ordered, before wobbling across the street to help.

"I'm freezing," Sirius said, "maybe we should just make a break for it."

"He literally knows where we sleep," Remus scoffed.

"Hey," James started, nudging Remus with his shoulder; "isn't that your guys' music teacher?"

Remus and Sirius followed James' gaze to find that he was right. Filch was helping Sheila gather up a stack of books she'd dropped in her fall, all while chattering and pointing his torch in their direction. Sheila looked to them in the dark and Remus straightened up a bit before she smiled and crossed the street ahead of of the sour old man.

"Evening gentlemen," she said. "Mr. Filch has just told me some very interesting news. Can you guess what it is?"

"It's all a lie, Sheila," Sirius said.

"Church is a very serious thing."

"So am I—'what's in a name', right?"

"You watch your mouth," Filch snapped, appearing at Sheila's side with a stack of her books in hand. Their teacher smiled anyway and turned to him.

“Mr. Filch, I’m sorry to say I have a bit of bad news myself. You see, just earlier when I was leaving the Bellchant building I could’ve sworn I heard a noise coming from one of the storage closets. I think it was Mrs. Norris.”

Filch’s eyes shot wide. “M-Mrs. Norris?”

“Yes, but I’m afraid I didn’t have the right key on me. I was going to ring your office when I’d gotten home but good thing we ran into one another here. It was such an awful yowling. If you are worried, I won’t mind walking the boys back to Castle Hall myself so you can go and check on her. In fact, I’ll make good use of them while carrying these books.”

“But ma’am—”

“Oh,” Sheila sighed suddenly, “I just realised it was the same closet with all the bass drums stacked in it. I do hope she didn’t knock them over and get trapped underneath.”

That was enough of a push for the caretaker. He practically threw Sheila’s books at them before taking off up the street.

“It was storage closet number seven!” Sheila shouted after him. “At the very back of the building!”

All three boys gaped up at her. “Was all of that true?” Remus asked, after Filch had legged it all the way up the street.

Sheila sighed wistfully. “He never really was very pleasant, even when I was a girl.”

“You went to school here?” Sirius demanded.

Sheila looked back to him and winked. “Okay, time to go home. It’s freezing and we all have class in the morning.”

They deflated slightly and turned to start up the street toward Castle Hall. Suddenly Sheila whistled at them from behind. “Boys, where are you going?”

“To the Headmistress’s office?” James said dumbly.

“Professor McGonagall is not in her office at this time,” Sheila said, “and unless you’d like to draw her from her warm bed, I suggest we go this way. Now c'mon."

All three of their jaws dropped and it took another friendly wave from Sheila to get them going again. "This is insane," James whispered as she led them back toward House Lane. "Isn't she going to punish us at all?"

"Shh!" Sirius snapped quietly; "Don't tempt her."

They walked silently behind the music teacher's clacking boot heels until they reached Godric. "Brrrr!" Sheila said, stopping just shy of the dorm's front lawn. "I don't know about you boys but I am ready for spring."

She smiled and Remus looked from her to the dorm. "Mrs. Buchanan, are you actually letting us off?"

"Yes, Remus, I am," she said simply, "but only on one condition—no more pranks in church. We have enough silliness at Hawkings without you three parading around in the middle of the night like a little band of marauders. So I want you to swear to me, no more issues with the church."

"Absolutely," Sirius agreed automatically; "We promise to be on our best behaviour from here on out. You'll not find any witches to burn among us."

"You swear to me?"

"We swear!" They said together.

"Good. Oh and boys, one more thing—don't go wasting perfectly good hash on some gag. Filch just smokes it himself, you know."

If Remus' jaw were any looser it would've fallen off. "You—?"

"If you tell anyone I said that I'll deny it," Sheila said firmly. "Now give me my books and get your sorry butts inside. If I catch you out again tonight I'll let Mr. Filch hang you by your thumbs from the gym's rafters."

"You heard her, Lupin!" Sirius scooped the books from his arms and handed them over to their teacher before yanking him up the path to Godric's front doors. Remus stumbled after him in the dark, and when he looked back Sheila was already walking away from them down the street.

“I cannot believe that just happened,” James half-laughed as they fell through the doors. “You two get to have the coolest forms teacher in the entire world, and I get stuck with Bilshin?”

“Now who’s jealous?" Sirius cackled. "But listen—who cares, we got off the hook! And Sheila thinks we swore off pranks.” Grinning spectacularly, he lifted one hand to reveal crossed fingers and James—matching his expression—revealed the same. They both looked at Remus expectantly, but he only stared back dumbly, still a little stunned by Sheila’s entire spiel.

“Oh Lupin,” Sirius sighed, “so smart and yet still so slow on the uptake.”

“Who cares, two out of three marauders ain’t bad!” James declared, locking his arms around both of his friend’s necks and leading them toward the staircase. “I think I like this new moniker too. Much better than ‘messers’ anyway. Just wait until Pete hears!”

“Wherever he went," Sirius said. "But hey—Marauders? You don't think Sheila’s already copyrighted it, do you? Because I think we just found the perfect name for our band.”

* * *

Remus was awoken early the next morning by hushed voices and short clatters. He turned over, groaning, and drew back his bed curtains to peer out. James and Sirius were standing by Peter’s bed and had somehow dragged Sirius’ entire stereo over with them. James had the Rickenbacker strung around his neck, its cord plugged into the stereo like an amp, while Sirius leaned over Peter’s snoring form with a metal baking tray.

“Wha...? What are you doing?” Remus called groggily.

“Shhh,” Sirius hissed, while James held a finger to his lips. Eyebrows shooting upwards, Remus laid back down to watch as James raised his hand in the air and the pair of them began to silently count down;

‘Three—two—’

On one, James’ hand came down and he strummed an intense note on the guitar, which was then amplified ten-fold by the stereo. Immediately Peter flew upright in bed and slammed his forehead into the baking tray, before collapsing back into his sheets with a yowl. Victorious in their scheme, Sirius and James erupted into laughter and fell back, killing themselves as the guitar's reverb echoed around the room.

"What the hell?" Peter moaned, clutching his face.

"S-Sorry Pete!" James crowed between his laughter.

"My nose!"

"Don't—Don't worry!" Sirius wheezed. "It's just a little payback—Wormtail!"

Chapter End Notes

'Polyfidelity' is an earlier coined term for 'polyamory'.

This was a comforting chapter, I feel :') And finally! A NAME—MARAUDERS! And not just that—three out of four now have their nicknames, cheers babes!

Chapter 48: Horribly Brilliant

Chapter Summary

An upset in a string of relationships leaves Remus with a rather 'boring' problem on his hands.

Chapter Notes

CW: Violence? Or really, just a few punches to the noggin. Ends well <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Treat him well, he is your brother,
You might need his help one day;
We depend on one another,
Love him that's the only way…

- "He is Your Brother" ABBA, 1973

Tuesday 25th January 1977

Sirius gave a great groan as he stretched his arms above his head. His shoulder popped and he let out a sigh of relief as he rubbed it. "I swear to bleedin' Christ, Binns gets more and more boring the older we get. The old dinosaur would probably explode into to dust if you so much as threw a pencil at him."

James wrinkled his nose in amusement. "I'll bet he doesn't even know how boring he is. He probably lost his hearing in '69 and has just been rambling ever since."

"Sight too," Peter added over a yawn, stretching as Sirius had. Both of them had elected to take a nap during the second half of the lecture.

Remus didn't mind Professor Binns' class as much. They all had it together and he was already ahead of the assigned reading, which gave him time to work on other, more trying things.

"So how's that novel coming along, Lupin?" Sirius asked, nudging Remus in the side as they made their way down the hall.

“I told you I’m not writing a novel,” Remus dismissed. Ahead of them, James spun around next to Peter and began to walk backwards.

“What is it you’re always scribbling in that diary of yours then?” He asked.

“It’s not a diary, it’s a journal.”

“Love notes for McKinnon, perhaps?”

Sirius clapped his hands over his ears. “Please, spare me.”

“They’re not love notes!”

“ 'Course not. They’re love songs aren’t they, Moony?” Peter smiled.

Sirius’ yanked his hands down. “Songs? You’re writing songs and you haven’t told me?”

“I’m going to ask Binns for a new seat partner if you keep spying over my shoulder, Pete,” Remus threatened bitterly.

“Don’t change the subject!” Sirius snapped. “C’mon, pull the diary out, I want to see them.”

“No way! Nothing’s finished yet.”

“I don’t care if they’re finished. Art's best in its rawest form anyway.”

“I’m not giving them up so you best just give it a rest.”

"Fine." Sirius reached out and grabbed Peter by the shoulders. “Wormtail, my main man, c'mon, fess up now—what’d you see? Were they any good? Did they even rhyme?”

“Don’t even try it Pete!”

“I’m not telling you anything while you’re still calling me ‘Wormtail’,” Peter rebuffed, shaking Sirius off. Sirius glowered and James slung an arm across his shoulders as they all started down the staircase toward the ground floor.

"Should'a known you were fightin' a losin' war, Black. It is Moony."

“We’re supposed to be a band," Sirius complained. "Brothers in arms—Marauders! How can we do that if we’re holding back from one another?”

James lifted a hand off Sirius' shoulder and pinched his nose between two knuckles. "Didn't realise there was such a rush."

"There isn't," Sirius said in a nasally tone, before ripping his nose free, "unless you want to leave school and head straight for Law like your dad wants."

James rolled his eyes and Sirius pinched him back smugly, before wheeling on Remus. "C'mon Moony, let us see the songs?"

"No."

"Come on! I've shown you mine, so you show me yours!"

"I really hope I heard that out of context," Mary said, appearing above them and taking the stairs two at a time until she'd caught up.

"Oh don't be jealous, Macdonald," Sirius said as they all stopped to wait for her, "not everyone can woo someone as stoic as Moony."

Uncharacteristically, Mary ignored the quip and looked straight at James, her dark eyes hard and serious. "Potter, can you bench someone from the football team for being an utter cunt?"

James blinked at her foul language. "Maybe. Why?"

"It's about Lottie," she sighed. "Yesterday she... Well, she found out that Mickey's been cheating on her."

"Oh fuck," James and Sirius said together.

"Mickey?" Peter echoed, the picture of surprise. "Mickey cheated on her?"

Mary rubbed her arm sorely. "I wasn't supposed to tell you, but Lottie won't do anything about it and Mickey's walking over her like rubbish. You should've heard him! The prick deserves something after what he did."

"What'd he do?" Asked Sirius. "I mean, aside from the cheating part."

Mary looked around the crowded hallway sorely before beckoning them all over to a quieter corner next to the seminar halls. "You know she went to visit him before school, right?"

All four of them nodded, leaning in very close.

"Well... when we came back she said she felt as though something were off. She'd found another girl's underwear in his bedroom."

They all balked a bit at that, and Sirius murmured 'yikes' under his breath while Peter just shifted uncomfortably.

"What'd she do then?" James prodded.

"She confronted him, of course! But Mickey just denied the whole thing. Said the underwear belonged to his sister."

" 'Cause that's any better," Sirius shuddered.

"Yeah, so yesterday they got into a fight and Lottie brought it up again—because it was complete and utter bollocks—and he totally fessed up! Said a whole bunch of nasty crap too."

"Like what?"

"I... can't tell you that."

James and Sirius exchanged a sorry glance, and Remus suddenly felt very grim. He hated gossip on the best of days, but if Lottie's relationship was really in such shambles and she didn't want anyone to know, then... "Maybe we shouldn't be talking—"

It was Peter, of all people, who cut him off. "Where's Lottie?" He demanded, looking like a shaken fizzy drink ready to burst.

"Should be downstairs somewhere," Mary answered. "I think she and Lily just had psychology."

Like a tin soldier, Peter did a full turn and started down the staircase again. His urgency was infectious, and suddenly the rest of them where chasing after him as well. After a bit of rambunctious searching, they eventually found the two girls sitting alone in one of the break rooms, both looking rather forlorn. Lily noticed them first and leaned down to whisper something to Lottie, who was hunched over the table with a tin of chocolate biscuits open in front of her. When she looked up her eyes were rimmed red and purple from crying, and her face was bare of all makeup, making her look startlingly young. Remus wasn't sure he'd ever seen her without painted eyelids and lipgloss, and it was the first time he could really see the resemblance between her and Peter.

"Hi guys," she mumbled, through a mouthful of sweets. Mary smiled warmly and pat her head as she pulled out a chair to sit down. James sat next to Lily, who elbowed him pointedly.

“Oh—hey Lottie,” he said awkwardly. “How was psych—”

“Why didn’t you tell me about Mickey?” Peter blurted. Instantly Lottie’s blue eyes shot wide and she swallowed before spinning on Mary, expression furious.

“You told them?”

Mary shrunk in her chair slightly. “Sorry Lot, but Mickey—”

“I can’t believe you! I told you I didn’t want anyone to know! This is mine and Mickey's business to work out, no one else's!”

"Then you shouldn't have told everyone!" Peter barked.

"I didn't!" Lottie howled. "I told MARY! Which was clearly a mistake!"

Wincing, Lily leaned in closely and reached to stroke Lottie's hand as a comfort. “Lottie, you can’t really expect to just work it out with him, can you?”

“It’s no one else’s business!” Lottie shrieked again, pulling away.

Undeterred, Peter leaned in over Lottie's chair. “You want to forgive him?” He demanded. “Are you mental?!”

Lottie spun around to glare at her brother. “It’s especially not your business!”

“Why not—why couldn't you tell me? I'm your brother!”

“Exactly! Which means you're practically useless!"

“I am not! I could—Well, I could talk to Mickey!”

“I don’t want anyone to talk to Mickey! I don’t even want to hear his name! Now will all of you just PISS OFF?!”

Peter bristled at his twin's harsh dismissal. “You—You would’ve told Sim!”

“Who says?" Lottie hissed. "Even if I did, Simeon would be able to do something about it! At least he could kick Mickey's ass or something!"

"Who says?" Peter lashed back, a perfect mirror.

"Okaaaay," Sirius tried, grabbing Peter by the shoulders; "Maybe we should take this down a notch, hm?"

"Oh, piss off, Black!" Lottie snarled. "You'd just as soon cheat on me too!"

"Ouch." Sirius released Peter and turned to Remus, sniffling sardonically. "Moons, she hurt my feelings."

"You're a troublemaker, Black, not a peacemaker. Can't fight nature," Remus chuckled wryly, putting a consoling hand on Sirius' shoulder.

"You're such a bag!" Peter ground out, as he and Lottie continued their face-off. "We're just trying to help."

With a terrible growl, Lottie launched herself to her feet, nearly knocking Peter with the chair as it clattered backwards. "And since when do you even care? God, you're infuriating! It's always 'Sim this', 'Sim that'. Newsflash, baby brother—you're not Simeon so stop trying to act like it!"

"I'm—I'm not!" Peter sputtered. "Why would I even want to act like Simeon?"

"You're asking me that? Oh, that's rich."

Peter huffed, looking about as red as a tomato. "I'm telling you now, I could do something about it. I will do something about it!"

"What will you do Petey—call him a prick? Tell him that he's a horrible asshole and a sorry excuse for a boyfriend? Well, I've already covered that! Now if you're done, I'm going back to my dorm." She shot a venomous look at Mary. "Alone."

Pausing long enough only to shove a final biscuit in her mouth, Lottie snatched up her bag and sweet tin and pushed past her brother, stomping out of the student break room and down the hall. They all watched her go, and Remus cleared his throat awkwardly. "Well, that went well," he mumbled, earning an ironic smile from Sirius that he then had to swallow.

"Screw her, she's gone mental," Peter grumbled, taking up his sister's now-empty spot at the table. Next to him, Remus pulled out another chair and Sirius promptly threw himself into it, grinning like he was having a grand ol' time.

"Thanks, Moons, you're such a gentleman."

"Stop making a joke out of this!" Mary snapped, making Sirius flinch.

"Alright, alright. Far from me for trying to defuse the tension. You could cut it with a bloody spoon. Though, I think Lot should go out for acting. She'd win an Oscar with a performance like that."

"Oh, shut it. Lupin, sit!"

Shooting a 'thanks for that' look at Sirius, Remus sat too, and a stilted silence came over all of them. Luckily they had Lily to break it for them; “You guys couldn’t have done that in a calmer manner?” She sighed, taking James’ hand.

“Was she actually considering forgiving him for cheating on her?” He asked, forehead creased with worry.

Lily frowned. “I don’t know, she’s out of sorts. Her and Mickey have been dating for over a year."

"That's like a decade in teenage-girl years," Mary interjected.

"Yes, well... The whole thing really caught her by surprise," Lily amended with another deep sigh.

“That’s generally how cheating on someone goes,” Sirius said, having moved on to picking at the dark polish on his nails. Mary noticed and swatted his hand for it, making him jump. “Alright fine, but what I want to know is what he said to her after.”

“No, it was so mean!” Lily said immediately.

“Not to mention vulgar,” Mary added.

Peter, who had been utterly silent ever since his sister's prompt exit, slapped both hands against the table top. “James, you and Sirius have gym with Mickey next, yeah?”

“Er—yeah.” He checked his watch. “In a few minutes, actually.”

Wordlessly, Peter stood up from the table with his bag and started away.

“Wormy?” Sirius called, looking around. “Where’s he going?”

“Pete? Pete, we got class! We—ah shit,” James said, getting up to follow him.

“I’ve got to go get Lottie,” Lily moaned, doing the same.

Mary, Remus, and Sirius were left to stare at one another. “Well, I’m not missing this,” Sirius declared.

“Me neither!” Mary agreed, as they all shot from the table after their friends. Peter didn't bother to wait for them as he marched from the main building and out onto the frosty lawn. They were a decent walk from the gym, but he was moving so swiftly that even Remus had to jog slightly to keep up. Despite Sirius and Mary's initial enthusiasm, a knot of dread had taken up residence in his stomach. Remus had known fighters, and Peter with his below average height and only moderate athleticism did not make par. He wished Lily had come with them and not gone after Lottie, at least she might've been able to frighten some sense into him. For now all they had was mild, tender-hearted James.

“C’mon Pete, do you really want to go after Mickey? Lottie’s already pissed at you," James reasoned, surely doing his best to sounding sympathetic without being condescending.

“Shut up, Potter, this is the coolest thing he’s ever done,” Sirius hissed, holding onto Peter’s shoulders as he strode across the grass toward the gym. "You can do this, Wormy. Mickey's all talk and no balls. I'll be he runs away at first sign of trouble. Otherwise just give him a sharp right hook! Don't let him talk too much or he'll one up you."

James pulled his muffler away from his face. “He says as if he's ever actually been in a fight."

"I've been in a fight before! Remember year nine? I went three rounds with Nick Durbey! And he was a year above us!"

"That was gym class, we were wrestling on sponge mats, and you still barely touched each other! Hooch had to push you into the middle of the ring herself!"

Sirius leaned into Peter's ear like a devil on his shoulder. "C'mon Wormy, who you gonna listen to? Me, or the guy whipped by a ginger?"

James crossed his arms over his chest with a scowl. "You’re actually the worst sometimes, Black.”

“Pete wants to be a Marauder,” Sirius announced, “it’s time he proves he can keep up!”

“Mary, tell him he’s acting like a lunatic!”

"No way," Mary answered, fingers tucking up tight in her arm pits. "I say kill the bastard. Guillotine, castration—something."

"Moony—!" James whirled around. "You make them listen!"

Trying not to huff too loudly as he kept up with them, Remus took a moment to consider. Lottie had gone for the low-blow mentioning Simeon, though he supposed Peter had brought him up first. Perhaps this could be the thing that mended that chip on his unbrotherly-shoulder. Then again, Remus had never had siblings. Honestly, James was just asking for the impossible.

“Though I rarely agree with his methods—and he is being a total nob—I think... I might actually with Sirius on this one,” he said, making Sirius practically punch the air in glee.

"HA! Take that, Potter! Moony agrees with me!"

James nearly tripped along the path in his shock. "Moony! You can't be serious?"

“Mickey... deserves whatever’s coming to him," Remus said, trying to ignore the squirmy feeling in his gut.

"That's right!" Sirius said, clapping Peter's shoulders again as they made their way up to the gym doors. "It's only right we rough the prat up a bit."

"You're gonna get our best friend killed, you daft—oh! N-Not that I don't believe in you, Pete!"

"Nice save, Potter," Sirius sniggered, while James punched him in the arm. "Ow—fuck! Save it for Mickey, mate!"

“Are you girls fucking finished?” Peter growled.

"Sorry, Pete. Didn't mean to 'take the mick'. Heh."

Peter shrugged Sirius off, who turned to grin at James, looking a little too satisfied with their friend's newfound virility. Afterwards all four of them, along with Mary, emerged in the gym's foyer.

“We’re definitely going to be late for biology, Remus,” Mary chittered, though she didn’t look anything less than entertained. Next to her, Peter was already scanning the room for any sign of Mickey.

“Anyone see him?”

“There,” Remus answered, pointing to a group of boys across the gym sitting on the second row of stands. Peter took off instantly and they all followed, though his strides did slow the closer they got to Mickey and his friends.

"C'mon, Wormy, you can do it," Sirius hissed quietly, midway across the floor. "Call him out on it!"

“Mick—” Peter’s voice cracked and he had to try again; “Mickey!”

Mickey glanced up lazily and Sirius gave Peter a comforting smack on the back. “There you go—give 'em a piece of your mind!”

“Yeah?” Mickey called, staring them down from his seat on the benches. “Whatchu want?”

Peter cleared his throat a bit. “I need to talk to you, er… prick.”

Oh dear, Remus thought, as James pressed his lips together to stifle a moan.

Across from them, still lounging casually, Mickey set his jaw. “Let me guess, this about your sister?”

“Yeah it’s about my sister!" Peter yelped; "Who do you think you are, cheating on her, you barmy dickhead?!”

“Oh good, insult number two’s got a bit more bite to it,” Sirius whispered to Remus.

“Oh get off it,” Mickey scoffed, “it’s none of your business, Puny-grew. This is between me and Lot, so you can butt-out.”

“You don’t get to call her ‘Lot’ anymore!” Peter seethed. “And it is my business, she’s my sister!”

“Hmph. I’m surprised she even told you anything. You two aren’t exactly close, right?”

Peter balked a bit. “A-As if you know anything!”

“I know enough. You always were royally gassed over not being the favourite brother, even when we were kids. You’d think things would be better now that Sim’s gone, ‘cept you’re still the bottom of the food chain with this lot.” Mickey gestured lazily at all of them, and next to Remus, James bristled.

“Oi, watch your mouth, Mick,” he warned.

Mickey shrugged, uncaring. "Not my fault you collect friends like it's a contest in charity, Potter."

That got Remus going. Not because he was one of the said 'charity friends', but because he'd never considered his friendships a contest in the first place. Grinding his teeth together, he stepped forward and nudged Peter's shoulder supportively. “Can’t believe you used to be friends with this dick, Pete. Seems like he’s got sawdust where a brain should be.”

Mickey stood, along with his friends. “I don’t gotta answer to you, Lupin. I know you’re not as dangerous as everyone else says. As if anyone would ever let you into a real gang—go ahead and take your ponce-arse somewhere else.”

“Okay, run your mouth,” Peter squeaked, enlived by his friend's show of support, “but you’re gonna apologise to Lottie for whatever it is you said.”

Mickey smirked and stepped down the stands until he was directly in front of them. “You gonna make me, you fat bastard?”

Mary gasped for all of them, but Peter didn't falter. “Y-yeah! I will!” He shot back.

“You and this crummy lot?”

“Careful, Mick,” Sirius said lowly, “we tend to fight dirty. You might lose an eye.”

“You’re the asshole here,” Mary shouted, “not Peter! Who fucking cheats on their girlfriend at sixteen? You barely got a cock to wet, you bloody pansy!"

One of Mickey's friends snorted at the jab and Mickey whirled on him with a scowl, instantly shutting him up. Then, because he hadn't already been nasty enough, he look back at Mary with a sneer; “Well if his sister weren’t so frigid—”

Before Mary could so much as gasp a second time, Peter stepped forward and drove his fist forwards and upwards. He hit Mickey straight-on in the cheek and his head snapped back, leaving him blinking and slightly dazed, while Peter just stared at his own fist in shock.

"Oh fuck! That's it, Pete! Now it's the one-two, you got this!" Sirius howled, clearly delighted.

Recovered, Mickey wiped his thumb beneath his nose. "You actually hit me, Pete?"

Peter blinked. "Er—"

Wham!

Mickey returned the punch with twice the force and Peter dropped like a bag of bricks on the gym floor. Unfortunately for Mickey, he had little time to revel in the victory. Before Remus realised what he was doing, he'd stepped forward and swung, catching the bulky boy in the jaw and snapping his teeth together with a sickening snap as he collapsed back against the gym's stands.

"Holy fuck!" One of Mickey's friends gasped, while Remus swallowed a horrendous string of curse-words and spun away, clutching his hand. The punch had been instinctive—you couldn't just let someone sock your mate without some retaliation!—but it'd been so long since he'd hit anyone for real. He'd be lucky if he hadn't dislocated a finger.

"Oh my god," he grunted. "Fuck me. Shit—augh!"

"Oh, Remus," Mary winced, crowding after him before ultimately descending into a fit of ruffled giggles. "That was so hot."

Instantly Sirius was laughing, and James finally broke free of his shock to bend down and help Peter up. "Alright, up you go, you utter ledge," he said as Peter cupped his hands to his face. Mickey stood too, holding his bruised jaw as he turned on them.

"What was that about our Lupin not being dangerous?" Sirius crowed smugly.

Mickey scowled bitterly, but Mary only raised a hand to point at him. "You deserved that, ugly twat!" She barked. "You deserved ten times that!"

“Fucking rights, he did!” Lottie shouted, appearing from behind with Lily in tow, red-faced as though they’d been running. Lottie turned to Remus and beamed, before throwing her arms around his middle. “That was brilliant,” she gushed, and he was left to awkwardly pat her on the back while he held his injured hand aloft. Peter watched them, looking less dazed but just as sore.

“Lot—” Mickey moaned, slurring as though he’d bit his tongue.

“Shut up!” She snapped, releasing Remus to whirl on her ex-boyfriend. “There’s nothing you can say to make this better! And as it turns out, I’m thankful—I was tired of pretending as though I liked hearing you talk about your dad’s shitty car dealership and seeing your skid-marked underwear. It’s fucking disgusting.”

About a dozen jaws dropped and Mickey sputtered; “Lot!”

“Oh, and I totally believe you by the way—it’s absolutely plausible that those knickers belonged to your sister. Your parents always did seem a bit inbred. Now go on, I’m done with you, you walking-talking piece of shit.”

Lottie waved her hand and Mary and Sirius burst into laughter. Mickey gave a scowl that could’ve rivalled Snape’s, but turned and together, he and his friends slunk off toward the gym showers.

“That was fucking amazing,” Sirius said. "Oh man, I wish I'd recorded that."

Lottie turned to Peter, who stared back like a scolded child. “I told you I didn’t need your help.”

“Well, I don’t have to always listen to you, do I?” He shot back.

“You do when it’s my business. All you did was get yourself punched, you idiot. What would you have done if you were on your own? You can’t use people like Remus to finish your fights for you—next time leave it alone.” Lottie grabbed Lily and Mary’s hands. “C’mon, we’re late for class.”

The girls strode away—Mary just looking thankful to be forgiven—and Peter stared after them until Ms. Hooch entered the gym from the other side and blew her whistle to start her gym class.

“Pete…” Remus tried, “I’m real sorry.”

“S’fine Moony, don’t worry about it.”

“Aw Pete, c’mere.” James made to grab Peter’s shoulder, but he only pulled away and left them there. Feeling more than just the ache in his hand, Remus flexed his fingers and winced. Nothing seemed broken at least, though Sirius did catch the gesture. He leaned over and tapped Remus’ shoulder with a smirk.

“Hey, want me to kiss that better?”

“… Shut up, tosser.”

* * *

Despite his insistence that nothing was wrong, Peter was not the same after the incident with Mickey. He and Lottie had effectively begun a Cold War and all but turned their noses up whenever the other would enter the same room. Lottie remained distinctly under the impression that her twin brother had nothing to do with her romantic relationships, an underlying issue that had been following the pair ever since Mickey and Lottie had gotten together in the first place. Peter on the other hand, refused to apologise for his brash actions. According to him, he’d done what any good brother would’ve, and if Lottie had a problem with it she was the one screwed in the head.

The issue wouldn’t have felt nearly so dire, had Remus not come under the impression that he was also somehow partly to blame for the argument. Where Peter had been rebuffed and insulted for his attempts to punish Mickey, he had only been praised. Lottie now regarded him as some sort of champion of her virtue, and had started telling anyone who could be bothered to listen that he’d personally defended her honour by cracking Mickey in the face. Remus had tried insisting that he was not the saviour Lottie was making him out to be, but that hardly mattered. Peter had heard it, and that was enough to drive a wedge between them.

“Don’t feel too bad,” Sirius told him, “if you hadn’t punched Mickey he would’ve just stood there gloating, and Pete wouldn’t have felt any better for it.”

“You still shouldn’t have done it,” Marlene said.

“It was a reflex,” Remus answered honestly.

“Yeah, you wouldn’t get it McKinnon,” Sirius said, “fighting’s bloke stuff. Plus, you're just mad you missed it.”

“I do not care that I missed it. All I’m saying is that violence is not the answer."

Scoffing, Sirius snatched away the book she was reading. “Hypocrite—you’re reading about the American Civil War.”

Marlene punched him in the arm and took her book back. “It’s historical fiction.”

“I see violence is allowed only in small doses,” Sirius grumbled, rubbing his shoulder.

To their credit, James and Sirius did try and reason on Remus’ behalf, but whenever they brought the incident up, Peter would pretend as though there was nothing wrong at all. This was especially worrisome to James, who had grown up with him and was always the first one Peter would listen to. Remus couldn't help but think that hoping that Peter would continue to 'follow the leader' was not a very sensitive response, but still, nothing else seemed to get through either.

“I’m not mad at Remus,” Peter would say. “It was nothing. Lottie’s fault really, stupid sister…”

No matter what was said or promised though, Peter only hung around them for sleep or lessons. The rest of the time he was off with Moira, who appeared more than happy to finally have her boyfriend’s undivided attention. Moira's indifference toward the other Marauders had never been an issue before then, but suddenly it seemed as though her enchantment with the youngest Pettigrew sibling had grown to be an all-out declaration of war.

"Did you hear what she said to me yesterday?" Sirius whinged. "Crazy bird told me to stuff it where the sun don't shine—and as for what she told me to stuff, well let’s just say the girl’s more creative than I gave her credit for.”

”Try not harassing her, maybe?” Offered James.

“All I did was ask her to hang out and bring Pete along! S’nothing you haven’t already done!”

"Just because she's Peter's girlfriend doesn't mean she has to want to hang out with you guys," Lily pointed out amicably. "Moira's perfectly pleasant on her own."

"I think you mean perfectly boring," Sirius scoffed.

In the end, Remus found himself stuck somewhere in the middle. Peter was Peter, Moira was Moira, and he was just himself. But he supposed that if there was any hope of getting through to his friend, Sirius' train of thought wasn't entirely wrong. So, after nearly a week of being unable to get anywhere with Peter beyond basic pleasantries, Remus finally decided to corner the Dorset House girl on her on her way to study hour.

“I’m telling you Remus, Peter’s said nothing about you,” Moira tried, while attempting to out-pace him down the hall. Remus chased her, acting desperate.

“We had to do a partner sketch together yesterday in art and he wouldn’t even look at me! I’m pretty sure he just drew my face from memory, please!” He neglected to add how Peter’s sketch had turned out twice as good as his own without even so much as a single glance. Not that Moira would've cared.

"This has got nothing to do with me!" She insisted, coming up short as he finally stepped into her path.

“Moira,” Remus said gently, “please just tell me what he’s said.”

Reluctantly, Moira sighed and looked up at him with a slight glower, clutching her books tightly to her chest. “Peter is not boring,” she said firmly.

Remus hesitated; “I-I never—”

“Don’t bother, you may be new, but I’ve known Peter and the other boys since we were kids, and it’s always been this way. Not everyone can just be a James Potter or a Sirius Black—not everyone wants to be larger than life! Some of us are just happy being average, but when you’re around people like them it’s impossible not to seem bland or boring. And even if Peter was boring, there’d be nothing wrong with that—boring is safe. Peter may not be much of a fighter, but I like him how he is and he never asked for your help either!”

Surprised by her suddenly outburst, Remus swallowed. “Alright…”

“Lottie shouldn’t have been so nasty to him,” Moira continued. "What she said—bringing up Simeon and throwing it in Peter's face? That was vicious. He was just trying to help."

"You're right."

"—And he doesn't have to forgive her!"

"I agree."

Moira deflated slightly. "I should go. I'm going to be late meeting him."

"Okay," Remus said, "but can you do me one favour, Moira, please? Can you tell him I didn't mean for any of this, and that we… James, Sirius, and I, we don't think he's boring."

Moira looked up at him through her blunt, straight-across fringe. "Fine." Then she turned and marched away, leaving Remus to wring out the back of his neck with his hands.

Moira's confession did not lead to a miraculous breakthrough with Peter, though he wasn't as quick to flee the room every morning anymore, at least. The first time he ate breakfast with them again James and Sirius were careful with their words, offering to refill Peter's tea mug or share the bits of their meal they knew he loved under the guise of not being very hungry. Their efforts were obvious, but Peter accepted naturally and when the forms bell went he stood up on his own and left the dining hall hand-in-hand with Moira.

"He's coming around," Sirius said, as James sighed. "Just needs a little time. A little push—or something."

That push—or an idea for it—came to Remus later that very same morning in forms. Sheila had allowed the class to mess around with some instruments and Barty sent a drumstick flying through the air so hard it stuck into the wall by Remus' head, making a shocked hush come over the entire class. Ready for his own fight, Remus had yanked it out and was about to throw it right back before Sheila appeared to give Barty hell and he'd hidden the stick behind his back. It was then that he remembered the conversation and Peter had shared all those months ago on Sirius' birthday, and the light bulb finally went off inside his mind.

It took some serious self-control, but Remus managed to wrangle the idea into something substantial by midday. He waited until history to bridge the idea to Peter, and poked him with a pencil the moment Professor Binns turned his back to set up the classroom's shotty projector.

“Hey, Pete.”

“Mm?”

“Do you have a few minutes after class? I wanted to show you something.”

Peter leaned his chin on his hand. “I’m meeting Moira for study hour.”

“I know, but it’ll only take a little bit. And I promise it’ll be worth it.”

“… Fine.”

It was a small win, but a win nonetheless. After class he told James and Sirius that he was meeting Marlene—not wanting them to appear and ruin his chances of mending things with Peter—and together the two of them crossed campus toward the Bellchant building, where he knew music room #2 would be empty.

“Why are we in your music room?” Peter asked, looking around sceptically.

“I wanted to show you something,” Remus answered, dropping his bag and heavy winter coat on a stray chair and making a beeline for the back of the room. “C’mon over here.”

Peter obediently set his own school bag aside and followed, only slowing when he realised what Remus was gesturing to. “You brought me all the way out here to show me some drum kit?”

“Yeah!” Remus dropped down on the stool behind the five-piece drum set and tapped his fingers against the cymbal. “It’s a Ludwig Classic. Everyone from John Bonham to Ginger Baker uses drums like these.”

“That’s cool,” Peter said, “but I still don’t understand what we’re doing here.”

“Well…” Remus bent down and picked up a pair of drumsticks, awkwardly smacking them into the centre of his palm, “I thought that you could try them out actually.”

Peter’s eyes widened. “What? Are you crazy—I can’t.”

“Sure you can, Sheila won’t mind.”

“No, I mean I can’t—as in, I can’t play the drums.”

“But you mentioned last term that you knew a little.”

“With a tenor drum.”

“Well there!” Remus pressed, pointing at Peter with one of the drumsticks. “A marching band’s tenor drums aren’t that much different from a kit, you just got a snare and a cymbal—and—and you get to sit down!”

Peter shook his head. “No, it’s been too long. I’m not a musician.”

“What’s a musician?” Remus scoffed. “I say it’s anyone who makes sound with an instrument. Who says everyone’s got to be a Tchaikovsky or a Rachmaninoff.” Those were Tonya's words, he remembered. They felt right then, suddenly.

“I’m sorry, ‘rach-min-toff’?" Peter said. "Did you just have a stroke?”

Remus grinned. “Yup, and the only way you can save me is by coming over here and beating the shit out of these old cow-skins.”

He jumped up and skipped over to Peter, forcing the sticks into his hands and turning him by the shoulders. Peter sighed but allowed himself to be pushed down behind the tiny drum kit, looking around as though Remus had just dropped him in front of the schematics of a space rocket.

“I don’t know what to do with this,” Peter said, holding a drumstick in each hand.

“Here.” Remus set up a music stand with a simple beginners tablature next to the kit and Peter squinted at it while he gestured to the first bar. “I know you know the notes. This is beat one and it’s a crotchet falling on the bass drum and the hi-hat—the hi-hat's got a pedal there, but you're supposed to tap it with the sticks. Then beat two’s the snare and hi-hat, and beat three’s—!”

“A quaver on snare," Peter finished.

“Yeah!” Remus exclaimed. “You already got it, see! You know what you're doing.”

Peter began wringing out the drumsticks in his hands. “Yeah but… it’s not the same as playing.”

“Well, we won’t know that until you try, yeah?”

Peter breathed out nervously and Remus backed away, grabbing a chair for himself.

“Pete,” he said softly, “no one else is here. You don’t need to impress me—it’s just for fun. If you want I can even turn away.” He spun the chair around and sat down. “See?” He held out his arms. “Now it’s like you’re all alone, just tryin' out something new. No need to be cool or perfect.”

Biting his lip, Remus waited in silence, and for a while it seemed as though none of it had worked and he’d just pushed Peter into something he had no real interest in—but then the faintest sound of a bass pedal thumped from the kit, and Remus suddenly found himself holding his breath.

Peter played and no, it wasn’t good. Any rhythm he might’ve had was sacrificed for nerves, and he had that same stilted playing that came with paying too much attention to the music sheet and not enough to the instrument, but it wasn’t about sounding good anyway. It was never about sounding good, not really. They were rewarded when the drums got louder, and the longer Peter played, the more the sound filled up the space; just up and up, building and building. Like a hot air balloon rising into the sky, or a sunrise cresting the very tops of the trees.

Nearly off his arse with happiness, Remus was left to stare up at the ceiling with a dopey smile on his face. When Peter finally stopped he waited a moment before turning around, and when he did he found his friend still staring nervously at the kit as though it was a monster ready to swallow him whole.

“I sounded horrible,” Peter said.

“Yup,” Remus agreed, standing, “and it was bloody brilliant.”

“It’s brilliant to be horrible?”

“You’ll get better,” he shrugged, “and eventually you could be horribly brilliant.”

Peter set both drumsticks on the music stand. “Right. Peter ‘horribly brilliant’ Pettigrew. Dad’ll be so proud.”

Peter sighed again and Remus bit his lip. “Pete, did you know not a single member of The Beatles could read or write music?"

"None of them?"

"Nope, not one. But you can—so you know what that means right? That you're already on your way to being a better musician than any of 'em."

Peter looked down and smiled and Remus felt warm victory rise in his chest.

"You're not boring Peter," he said quickly. "I just wanted you to know that."

Glancing down at himself, Peter palmed his stomach anxiously. Finally, he raised his head.

"Thanks, Remus."

"Don't mention it. Now I know I should probably let you go find Moira. Sorry this took a bit longer than expected."

Peter stood up and stretched a bit. "Well actually, Moira's meeting her roommate Candace for a project, and I was just really going to tag-along. I don't think she'd miss me for one study hour, so… would you maybe want to go smoke a spliff or something?"

Remus' eyes widened in surprise. Then he smiled. "Yeah, absolutely. Let's go get baked."

Peter grinned again and together they crossed the room, back to their things. Tossing on their jackets, they left the music room and made their way back outside. It was snowing again, but the sun had finally come out, lighting up the gold in Peter's hair and leaving their cheeks and noses warm.

"Hey, Remus?" Peter asked as they skirted the pavement. "Are you serious about this music stuff? About being better than the Beatles?"

Remus looked down at his boots. "Well, you know Pete, crazier things have happened."

Chapter End Notes

'Take the mick/[mickey]' is slang for teasing someone.
'Ledge' is slang for 'you're a legend'.
John Bonham was the drummer for Led Zeppelin until his death in 1980. Ginger Baker was a legendary drummer and the co-founder of the band Cream.

A ‘crotchet’ is the UK term for a quarter note.
A ‘quaver’ is the UK term for an eighth note.
A ‘hi-hat’ is a type of cymbal on a drum kit.

This chapter feels like a deviant from the 'wolfstar' romance plotline, but in the best way :') It has a special place in my heart, yk? xo loves.

And PS: Next chapter, Valentine’s chapter, hehe.

Chapter 49: Well Fitted in Arts, Glorious in Arms

Chapter Summary

Valentine's Day has come to Hawkings. Remus struggles with more than one kind of relationship.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

A teenager's romance is fickled or true,
A teenager's romance is red hot or blue;
You're either in misery or high on a crest,
A teenager's romance is like all the rest…
- "A Teenager's Romance" Ricky Nelson, 1957

Saturday 12th February 1977

Getting a girlfriend was supposed to solve everything. It was supposed to help things make sense, and most of all, it was supposed to take his mind off of Sirius Black's bloody stomach. Stomach, stomach, stomach —ugh! WHY stomachs?! He had no clue. And yet, all it had taken was for Sirius to roll out of bed all bleary-eyed and shaggy-haired with his pyjama shirt unbuttoned to his navel to cause another incident. Remus had stayed up late with a regular bout of restlessness and forgotten to close his curtains again, so when James' alarm clock went off early that Saturday morning he turned over to throw a pillow at him, only to catch Sirius upside the head with it as he crossed the room.

"Woah, bit early to be declaring war innit, Moony?" Sirius moaned, tossing the pillow back with a grunt. Remus caught it and didn't miss the way Sirius casually reached beneath the hem of his shirt to scratch his stomach, yawning as he continued on to the bathroom.

James turned over in his bed and smacked his hand over the alarm before fumbling for his glasses. "What's this about war, lads?"

"How dare you set an alarm on a Saturday," Remus hissed, as James popped up from bed with all of his usual vigour.

“Sorry, Lupin, got practice early today. Snow’s finally melting some so I’m taking the team on a run.”

“Bet they’ll love that.” Remus flopped back into his pillows.

“I’d say you should join us,” James said, tugging off his nightshirt and tossing a towel over his neck, “but it looks like you’ve already got your hands full this morning.”

Remus raised his head in question and James shyly pointed to the tent in the front of his night pants. Instantly mortified, he reached for his bed curtains and yanked them back while James quietly sniggered.

It wasn’t that he was terrified of his own nob or anything—living with three other blokes meant you got used to waking up every now and then to find your friend had popped a woody—it was just the ridiculousness of it all. If you’d have told a girl you got off on seeing her bare stomach you’d certainly be branded a freak, and it wasn’t even the only instance he’d found himself indisposed in front of others either—Marlene had once put her hand on his inner thigh while snogging and that had been enough to leave them both blushing. But why stomachs? They were just skin! Really he was lucky Sirius wasn’t the exhibitionist James was, though now he supposed he knew why.

Sirius had not bridged the topic of his scars since that night in the bathroom and Remus figured that if he wanted to talk about them he would. It wasn’t his place to push him into anything, and a part of him was almost afraid to do it. No normal injury left scars that deep. The only thing that brought comfort was that the burns seemed old, and he could only hope that whatever had happened, had truly been an accident.

“Oh, Remus,” James called through the bed curtains, “I don’t mean to interrupt—”

“Piss off!”

“—But did you happen to ask Xeno about that sherry last time you saw him?”

“Potter—Piss. Off.”

“C’mon Moony, it’s for Valentine’s! I need it to impress Lily.”

“…"

"Moony...?"

"... Yeah, s'fine, he can get it."

"You're amazing, you are! Say hi to lil' Lupin for me."

Remus punched him through the curtains and heard James grunt, though he was not all that satisfied. Both James and Peter had been yammering about the shallow holiday since the beginning of the month—under the impression that if they didn't make a good impression, they'd both be very single come the 15th. Remus had tried being optimistic, but their anxiety had only turned him more off from the idea. Sirius was always claiming that James was a romantic—and Peter had to have had his moments too, if Moira's loyalty to him was anything to go by—but Remus had never so much as given a valentine himself, let alone planned a date. He considered saying as much to Marlene, but luckily her frankness seemed to solve the problem.

"Valentine's?" She echoed, staring out across the indoor pitch at her team. "That's what Potter's having such a fit over?"

"Him and Pete," Remus amended, while unfolding and refolding the clean towels on the football bench. "Apparently there's not much romance to be had so far from the nearest flower shop."

"You'd think that'd give everyone an excuse to forget about it. I mean, it's just another day—NICOLE! WE'RE DOING HIGH-KNEES NOT MEDIUM-SHINS! TRY AGAIN!"

"Tell me about it." Remus glanced up to see Nicole flop forward dramatically before rejoining the rest of the girls in warm-up. "Wait, does this mean you don't want to do anything?"

Marlene shrugged. "Not really. I mean, it's on a Monday this year, innit? And I never really got why we needed some special day to celebrate 'love' and all that. Shouldn't people be doing that all the time? Seems silly."

"So you don't want to do anything? At all?"

"Nope. I mean we could study for that biology test."

"Oh... Brilliant! Two birds with one stone then."

Finished with their warm-up, Marlene's team of girls rushed the bench together and flopped down among their water bottles.

“How come you’re the only one who gets to slack when Remus comes around?” Nicole pouted. “I want to sit on the bench and shoot the bird with my pals.”

“I think it’s ‘shoot the shit’ actually,” Remus said.

“Well there, maybe I’d know that if I got to participate in some conversation every once in a while.”

“Try participating in practice first,” Marlene said, playfully shoving Nicole by the shoulder. Nicole grinned back and snatched Marlene’s hand out of the air, kissing it lightly before giving a playful shriek and shooting away across the pitch.

“Honestly, where do you get off being so cheeky?!” Marlene lashed, streaking after her. Content to watch, Remus leaned back against the bench as Anna sat down next to him.

“They’ll never change,” she sighed wistfully. “I swear, if one of them had been born a boy—”

“I wouldn’t have a chance in the world,” Remus finished for her. Anna instantly perked up, eyes wide.

“Oh! I didn’t mean anything by that, Remus…”

He chuckled. “No, it’s okay.” There was a level of girl-friendship that Remus was never going to be able to understand. And frankly, that was just fine with him.

Beyond the pitch-line Marlene had given up the chase and was now being taunted by Nicole as she ran backwards around her in circles. Finally, Marlene stuck her foot out and Nicole sprawled, grabbing onto her at the last second and taking them both to the ground. They came up laughing and Remus couldn't help but feel a twinge of envy, but as he sat there observing them, he couldn’t quite put his finger on what it was he was so jealous of.

* * *

Remus could’ve sworn he’d avoided the whole Valentine’s debacle, and had been quite content to join his friends for dinner that evening only to learn that he wasn’t out of the woods at all. In fact, James and Peter had just about lost their minds the moment he told them of Marlene's reaction.

"Are you insane?" James demanded.

"What?! She said it was fine."

"Moony," Peter gasped, "please don't tell me you actually believed her!"

"Why wouldn't I? Why would she lie?"

"Girls always lie—especially about holidays!" James dropped his head onto the dining hall table hopelessly. "I can't believe you've made it this far in life without a semblance of sense!"

"It's like when a girl says she isn't angry," Peter explained, "she's just saying she ain't angry, but in reality she wants to rip your balls off."

Remus looked down at his dinner, confused. "So she… wants to do something for Valentine's Day?"

"Yes!" James gasped. "She's just trying to make it seem like it isn't a big deal—but it is a big deal! If you don't do something she's going to think you don't really like her."

"But I do… like her."

"Well, you gotta show her then!"

"Show her what?" Sirius asked, sitting down next to James with his dinner tray in hand. James turned to him immediately.

"Marlene told Remus she didn't want to do anything for Valentine's."

"Oh, yeah I know." Sirius began spooning potatoes into his mouth. "Moony told me earlier—while we were practising."

"And you didn't tell him he was mental for believing her?!"

Sirius swallowed. "Why would I? It's not like McKinnon's the romantic type. Outside of her books, anyway. Heh."

Sirius look down at his dinner, indifferent, but the comment struck a sour note with Remus. He might've said something, were James not already several blazing steps ahead;

“Everyone knows that when a woman says one thing she really means the opposite! Any girl who says she doesn’t want something romantic on Valentine’s is lying!”

“What about if she says she does want something romantic? Is she lying then?” Asked Remus.

“Er—No, they all want something on cupid’s day. It’s just, like—part of being a girl.”

“Well there’s your answer then,” Sirius chuckled, “McKinnon’s barely a girl, so no Valentine’s distress for Moony.”

“What are you talking about?” Remus asked lowly.

Sirius shook his head with a smile. “Nothing, don’t worry about it.”

“No, you think you’re so funny so why don’t you just spit it out.”

James and Peter exchanged a careful glance but Sirius just looked up from his dinner, appearing almost confused, and pressed his tongue to the inside of his cheek before continuing; “Oh come off it, I know it’s not your fault the blokiest-gal in school started making eyes at you. But if that’s your type then, hey, who are we to judge?”

Remus coughed out a laugh of disbelief. “You dick. What the hell are you going on about?"

“Aw, don’t be so uptight, Moony, I was just having a laugh.”

“Does it look like I’m laughing? That’s my girlfriend.”

“We’ve noticed.”

Remus couldn't believe it. “What’s your problem?”

“Nothing.” Sirius said this sharply; Nuh-fin, and Remus’ temper flared.

“Oh-kaay,” James started, nudging Sirius in the arm. “Joke’s not funny so it’ll stop now. Right, Sirius?”

Sirius dropped his gaze and bitterly turned back to his food, but Remus was too prickled. Sirius had poked the bear and he was going to learn just how short his stick was.

“You’ve been like this since the start of term,” Remus shot, making Sirius’ head snap up again. “Rude and ignorant and—”

Sirius laughed mockingly. “That’s gold coming from the guy who’d rather hang out with anyone other than his best mates.”

“What are you talking about, I’m here now aren’t I?!”

“For now.”

“You are such a prick! You know, we’ve been tip-toeing around you for over a month now, trying to make sure you’re fine and well and you’re still not done rocking the bloody boat! It’s not our job to nurse every hurt feeling—we’re not your damn mother!”

“Remus!” James gasped.

“No!” He snarled, standing. “You want to coddle him—fine, but I’m done. Find someone else.”

Dinner in hand, Remus strode away from the table to where the girls were sitting, huddled together.

“Hey,” Marlene said, as he dropped down next to her. He grumbled a response and she furrowed her brow. “Everything alright?”

“Yeah, jus' fine.”

“You bicker with Black again?”

“Wha—? No! Not everything’s got to do with him you know.”

Marlene laughed a bit. “Alright.”

Sweetly, she took his hand under the table before returning to her conversation with the other girls. More irked than he'd been in a long time, Remus began shovelling dinner into his mouth, but he couldn’t help but let his eyes drift back to his friends’ table. Sirius was now sitting with his back to him, engrossed in a heated conversation with James and Peter. Just watching boiled his blood enough to make him want to avoid talking to all three of them. Luckily, the girls did not mind another tag-along.

After dinner he returned to Rowena with them and they snuck him in through their bedroom window like usual. He spent the rest of the evening draped out across Marlene’s bed, correcting an essay for Lottie while she checked over his maths. Mary was attempting to teach Lily how to French braid and was using Marlene as a model, though every time Lily gave it a try Marlene’s hair would always end up droopy on one side.

“It’s just not working,” Lily sighed. “Petunia never lets me practice on her and my fingers aren’t dexterous enough. You might as well teach Remus.”

“Okay,” Mary shrugged. “Remus get over here and show Lily it’s not actually that hard.”

He looked up from the paper; “I can’t braid hair. I’m a guy.”

“Shove the sexism. I’m gonna teach you, numpty. Then you can braid your girlfriend’s hair yourself.”

“That’s so cute,” Lottie moaned.

He cast an unsympathetic glance at Lottie, but Marlene just waved him over. “C’mon, afterwards I’ll do yours in little pigtails so we can match.”

“Ha—ha,” he scoffed, before rolling off the bed and handing Lottie back her essay. “Here Lot, it was pretty good but mind your thesis and careful you don’t mix up ‘affect’ and ‘effect’.”

“There’s a difference?” She asked, before shaking her head and tossing the essay aside to pick up a magazine.

He crossed the room to Mary’s bed and squeezed in next to her with Marlene sitting on the floor in front of them. “Here,” Mary said, handing him a brush, “you gotta get all the knots out first.”

Gently, Remus began guiding the hairbrush down through Marlene’s hair. The fine strands fell apart like silk and she leaned back to smile up at him until Mary shoved her head down again. “The first bit’s always the hardest,” she instructed, taking her polished fingers and gathering up the hair at the front of Marlene’s head. “Three pieces—you’re just crossing them over one another and picking up more hair as you go. Like braiding a rope.”

“This might be a bad time to tell you I was never in scouts, so—braiding a rope? Not my forte either.”

“Honestly, why do we even keep you men around for these days?”

“Remus is the exception,” Lily said from her own bed. “We should just recycle the rest.”

“I’m telling James you said that,” he smirked.

Lily winked. “I’m counting on it. Maybe then he’ll find it in him to pick a fight. You don’t know how hard it is dating the embodiment of a modern saint.”

“Nope, I don’t.”

Marlene elbowed him in the shin. “I heard that!”

Mary elbowed him in the gut. “Remus, pay attention!”

Rubbing both, he did his best to follow Mary’s instructions but when it finally came to his turn all he was able to manage was a loose homage to a braid that was more akin to a loopy ponytail. Still, Marlene kept it in.

He left before they could start putting rainbow elastics in his hair—that would be going too far, surely—and loped back to Godric in the dark. The dorm was quiet and when he walked back into his bedroom he found Sirius tucked up on James’ bed, while James was folding laundry next to it. James nodded politely to Remus, who returned it before crossing back to his own bed and stripping out of his winter clothes. James and Sirius began to whisper behind him (“do it!” and “I can’t—” and “don’t be a—”) but he ignored all of it.

“Well,” James announced just as Remus was hanging his jacket and scarf on his wall peg, “Pete’s really taking his time with the tea, so… I should probably go check on him.” He promptly crossed the room to the door, but just before he left he looked to Remus and smiled ruefully. “Lupin—”

“Four sugars,” Remus said sarcastically. James’ face instantly turned into a scoff and he shook his head, though he was smiling as the door eventually fell shut behind him.

“I feel bad for your teeth…” Sirius called finally. “Having to acquiesce to those tastebuds of yours.”

“I feel bad for your ears,” Remus said without turning around, “having to listen to you all the time.”

Sirius whistled. “That was a good one.”

With a sigh, Remus turned around. “What are you doing? I’m still pissed off at you.”

“That’s okay, I’m still pissed off at you too.”

He threw his hands up. “You’re impossible.”

“Not impossible—just an arse.”

“You know, self-deprecational humour doesn’t really work for you.”

Sirius cracked a smile. “I know. Can’t have everything I guess.”

He hated himself for it, but he smiled, squeezing his eyes shut as he kicked his boots under his bed.

“So where were you?” Sirius asked, swinging his legs off the edge of James’ bed and casually leaning back on his hands.

“With the girls.” Remus looked up, almost daring him to say something about it, but Sirius only nodded.

“Doing what?”

“Studying, mostly.”

“That it?” The word ‘boring’ seemed to hang in the air.

“No,” Remus said quickly, “we had tea and well, Mary she—er—nghnn..."

"What's that?"

He sighed. "She taught me how to braid hair.”

Sirius’ mouth quirked like he wanted to make a joke but again he swallowed it. “You any good?”

“Terrible.”

Sirius dropped his head down to hide a smile. “Well—uh—hey, I got you something. Just a little peace offering to, you know, say sorry and all that.” Jumping up, he crossed the aisle to his bed and lifted up his winter jacket he’d obviously neglected to hang up, revealing a limp bouquet of purple flowers that looked as though they’d been plucked right off a bush. Looking slightly abashed, Sirius brought them over and held them out to him, leaving Remus slightly stunned.

“You got me flowers?” He said. “How kind…?”

“They’re not for you,” Sirius scoffed, “they’re to give Marlene for Valentine’s Day.”

“Oh.” Remus took the flowers and looked them over before realising that it was February in the north of Scotland. He hadn’t seen a flower in months. “Where’d you get them?”

“Let’s just say Professor Arbor needs to up the security on her greenhouse.”

“You stole them?”

“You can tell McKinnon you stole them yourself if you’re worried about your reputation.”

Remus smirked and stroked the soft petals. “Thanks.”

“I have a few ideas for Valentine's if you want to hear them,” Sirius said, biting his lip. “I mean, I was going to use them on Darcy from chem but it hurts to see an unromantic sod like you flail so miserably.”

“Do you mean Darcy Adamson? She's already dating Mike Young.”

“I thought they broke up?”

“And got back together.”

“Oh. Buggar.” Sirius clicked his tongue. “Well, I guess that means it would be a waste not to help you.”

“Yeah, no thanks,” Remus said. “The flowers are enough I think.”

“Oh don’t be such a toff—what girl doesn’t want to be serenaded on Valentine’s?”

“I am not singing.”

“You are so boring.”

“And you’re insane.” Half-chuckling, Remus turned away and set the flowers on his nightstand, scattering little purple petals everywhere. He could still feel Sirius’ eyes on his back, and as he stood there he found himself remembering the final entry on his list from the beginning of term; ‘apologise to Sirius’.

He licked his lips. “Hey—”

“I never thanked you, you know,” Sirius said very suddenly.

Remus spun around. “For what?”

“For letting me…” Sirius stopped halfway and held up a finger before retreating back to his side of the room. He came back, shyly holding an album in front of himself. It was Blue Train by John Coltrane, one of Hope’s favourite jazz records.

“I listened to this the other day,” Sirius said, licking his lips. “It was really good. Your mum did have good taste.”

“Yeah, she liked all sorts of music,” Remus said, just as shyly.

“I know it must’ve sucked—playing these. You must've kept them shut away for a reason and I... I’m sorry I spent so long trying to push you into it.”

“I’m not,” Remus said honestly. “Sure, it did sort of suck—but not because I didn’t want you to hear them. Always knew I was gonna have to do something with them eventually, and mixing them in with your collection seems better than throwing them out, or setting them on fire or something.” Leaning back a bit, he drummed his hands on the top of his thighs. “It’s kinda nice to see them mixed together, too. Now I don’t know which ones yours and which ones were hers.”

“You should call them ours,” Sirius said. “It can be our collection. Prongs and Wormtail too, if they contribute a little more.”

“Good, I want James’ copy of ‘Revolver’.”

Sirius smiled. “Thank you, Moony… for trusting me with something that meant so much to you.”

Remus matched it. “Thank you for enjoying them.”

Glancing down bashfully, Sirius hugged the jazz album to his chest a little tighter. “So, you wanna maybe… listen to it together?”

“Yeah,” Remus said eagerly, “but actually, I think I can do us one better.” Leaning off the side of his bed, he reached behind his wardrobe hutch for A Day at the Races, the album he’d been most wanting to share with Sirius but could never seem to find the right time. He held it up like a trophy and Sirius sighed happily.

“You’re always holding out on me, Moony.”

They put the record on and listened to it as they had its predecessor the year before; laid out on the bedroom floor, staring up at the ceiling. Just like that, Remus felt himself melt into the music. It was like being at the cinema and having the edges of the screen disappear as you lost yourself in the story—only when Sirius finally said something halfway through “Millionaire Waltz”, it was not the rude awakening one got when they realised they were actually just sitting in a dark room surrounded by strangers. Instead Remus found he’d been secretly waiting for Sirius to say something—anticipating hearing his opinion on the music he’d come to covet so closely.

“I’ve been trying to find the right word for this feeling,” Sirius said softly. He shifted a bit and Remus felt the top of his head brush his own. “But I don’t think I can quite capture it with words, really.”

“Four languages and you can’t come up with a single word to describe some music?”

“It’s not just the music, dafty."

“What is it then?”

Sirius was quiet for a moment. “It’s something like… astre, in French, maybe. And then, struggimento, in Italian. And perhaps… vorfreude, in German.”

Remus tilted his head back. “And in English?”

“Not sure yet, but maybe… glorious?”

“Well... That didn’t seem so hard.”

Sirius tilted his head back too, until they were looking at one another. “You’re sort of glorious too, you know.”

Remus’ lips parted. Sirius just watched him with those cool grey eyes, and when his cheeks began to burn he sat up, scratching the back of his head. “Don’t be stupid.”

Sirius turned over onto his stomach. “But I’m not—”

The bedroom door creaked open and a hand slipped in, waving a white dish rag in surrender. “Is it safe to come in?”

“Don’t be idiots,” Remus answered and both James and Peter appeared in the doorway, grinning and holding a tea tray between them.

“Oh good, you’re listening to music!” Peter said. “Must mean you’re done fighting.”

“Never,” Sirius announced, shooting a smirk in Remus’ direction.

James and Peter came forward, abandoning the tea by the door and squeezing in between the two beds beside them. “What we listening to?”

“Queen,” Remus and Sirius said together.

“Great,” James said, tucking his hands behind his head. “S’pose we should tuck in then, Pete—those guys never write a song shorter than six minutes.”

* * *

Monday 14th February 1977

Marlene took the flowers with a slightly furrowed brow. They were a bit droopy after having been picked nearly two days before, but still better than nothing.

“Thank you?” She said, looking them over with a small smile. “Where’d you even get them?”

“Er—Xeno.”

“Xeno fences flowers now too?”

“It was a special order.”

Her smile broadened and she held them up to her nose. “They smell wonderful. Will you wait for a moment while I go put them in some water?”

“Sure.”

Watching as Marlene slipped back inside her dorm, Remus shoved his hands in his pockets and stepped down onto the lawn to wait. The morning frost crunched under his boots and the cold was making his nose run but the chilly air was a welcome aid to his warm cheeks. “Thanks for waiting,” Marlene said once she'd finally emerged.

She held out her hand and he helped her down the icy steps before tucking both his and hers back into his pocket for some warmth. Together they made their way up House Lane, toward the dining hall.

“How are your friends back home doing?” Marlene asked. “You heard from them much?”

Marlene's curiosity over Tomny and the others had been piqued ever since the beginning of their relationship, when he’d called her from the flat. At first Remus had been sceptical—he’d hardly even talked to the boys about them—but eventually he began to realise how easy it was to avoid the big stuff. Marlene wasn’t expecting him to regale her with stories of drugs or cops or gangs, she just wanted to know what they were like and why he liked them so much.

“They’re good,” Remus said. “I talked to them the other day. A few of them had this nasty cold but they’re still good.”

“That’s nice. Maybe I should meet them when we go home for Easter. Could be fun?"

“Ha. Maybe.”

“Lily told me the boys ragged on you about today,” she said as they walked.

“Guess James told her.”

“Mm. But I’m glad you didn’t make Valentine’s into this big thing. It’s just another day.”

“You mean that?”

Marlene looked up. “Why wouldn’t I?”

“Knew those fuckers were lying,” he grumbled. “You still want to study for that biology test?”

“Yup.”

“Cool.”

They kept on, until a voice called out to them from across the berm and Michelle, Marlene’s vice-captain, raced up to them, half-panting. “Oh my gosh, you two! I can’t believe it—did you actually do that Remus?!”

“Do what, Michelle?” Marlene started.

“Castle Hall—the sign! Did you hang it? Oh—did you say yes?”

“What are you talking about—what sign?” Remus babbled.

“So it wasn’t you? Oh my—still! You gotta see it!”

They exchanged a look, before abruptly changing course and heading toward the campus’s main building. Michelle went with them, refusing to say anything until they saw it for themselves. As they approached the building from behind they both realised a small crowd had begun to form. Frankie Vasili, president of the photography club, had his camera out and turned just in time to snap their picture, momentarily blinding the both of them with its flash.

“Bleeding hell, Frankie,” Remus cursed, rubbing his eyes, “when they say ‘take a picture’ they don’t actually mean—”

“Sorry Lupin, just needed a photo of the happy couple,” Frankie snorted.

“Wha—”

“Oh my god,” Marlene moaned, and Remus dropped his hands to blink in the daylight. Hanging from the roof of the hall and at least thirty feet across was a ginormous white banner bearing the words;

MY DEAREST MARLENE, WILL YOU MARRY ME?
- YOURS IN UNEQUIVOCAL ADORATION, REMUS LUPIN

“I’m gonna fucking kill him,” Remus promised.

“Not if I do it first,” Marlene ground out.

“Now, now, shouldn’t you be giving all your firsts to each other?” Sirius asked.

They spun around to find him grinning proudly.

“You made a mistake coming back to the scene of the crime, Black!” Marlene bellowed. She made to grab him but Sirius only danced away, weaving through the other kids who had begun to huddle around and laugh.

“What are you talking about—it wasn’t me! Besides, you have more pressing matters, don’t you McKinnon—have you even given poor Lupin your answer?”

“You spelt ‘unequivocal’ wrong!” Remus shouted. Sirius stopped immediately and held a hand over his eyes to squint up at the banner.

“No I didn’t.”

“I knew it was you!” With a sudden cry, he took off after him and Sirius whooped before dashing away.

“I know love makes people do crazy things—but I think you’re chasing the wrong person, Moony!”

“Get back here you idiot so I can hang you with your own marriage proposal!”

“There are worse ways to die—OOF!”

Remus slammed on the breaks just short of Sirius, who had sprawled on the ground after running head-long into Professor McGonagall. Like a brick wall, the Headmistress had hardly flinched even as Sirius bounced off of her, and afterwards simply crossed both hands ahead of herself, thin mouth drawn into a tight line.

“Good morning, Mr. Black,” she said lightly. “Glad to see you appreciating the holiday. Though I fail to see how such a display is conducive to a proper learning environment.”

“It can’t be helped, Professor,” Sirius said, recovered as he leaned up on his elbows with a leering expression. “I had to help Lupin get his feelings out before he went insane.” He popped up to his feet and held a hand to the side of his mouth. “And between you and me, McKinnon’s lucky—I hear he’s a real animal in the sack.”

Every kid around them burst into stilted laughter and Remus wailed, reaching over to grab Sirius by the back of his jacket and yank him away; “You did NOT just say that to the Headmistress!”

Before he could completely throttle him, McGonagall cleared her throat and everyone puckered. “I expect the banner to be down by the end of breakfast hour,” she said calmly. “By whomever put it there. Otherwise I will be forced to take action with all those present.”

Every one of the students let out a moan of protest and Sirius looked away to feign innocence before Remus pinched him hard on the back of the neck.

"Ow! Okay, fine! Jeez."

"Good. Now, unless anyone else would like to have a chat in my office?" Professor McGonagall glanced around and several people shook their heads adamantly. "Then I suppose I'll see you all at breakfast. Happy Valentine's Day."

The Headmistress turned and proceeded up the pavement, her heels clicking on the cement. Remus turned away along with the other kids only to have Sirius grab his jacket sleeve. "You gotta help me," he said.

"Why? You put it up there, you get it down."

"The roof door locked behind me. Can't get it open."

"You're such a liar," Remus grumbled.

Sirius only grinned.

Sighing, he turned to Marlene, who was already shaking her head, face still red. "You wanna come, Cherry?"

"Not a chance," she scoffed. "Something tells me if I go up there Black'll end up taking the fast way down off the roof."

"Love you too, Mrs. Moony," Sirius cheesed.

"Okay," Remus said, "I'll meet you at breakfast then."

Marlene nodded and shot Sirius the bird for good measure before starting back toward the dining hall with Michelle and several other kids.

" 'Marlene Lupin' doesn't sound all that bad actually," he heard Michelle murmur.

"Michelle, I will bench you!"

Sirius flew at him, locking his arms around his shoulders from behind. "C'mon, let's get this over with! I'm hungry and they're serving drop scones."

Shoving him off, Remus looked back up to the banner once more.

“How did you even fit so many letters on one bloody sign?”

“Oh you’d be amazed what you can do with neat handwriting, Lupin. Want me to give you some lessons in that too?”

“Marlene’s right—maybe you should take the fast way down.”

“I’ll do it if you catch me.”

“… Tosser.”

Chapter End Notes

This chapter's title comes from a quote from Act II of Shakespeare’s "Love’s Labour’s Lost". The full quote essentially translates to 'he's perfect—but he's got a mouth on him'. Hehe.

Sherry is like a brandied wine.
Drop scones are like pancakes? Lol.

I just love making wolfstar spicy without actually doing something about it. Communication? At sixteen? Never knew 'er.

Chapter 50: Game of Détente

Chapter Summary

> The Marauders venture out, plotting a night of maraud-er-ing... lol. A game of questions follows, then another, both possibly leaving Remus with fewer answers than before.

Chapter Notes

> C/W: For 'f' slur used in a smoking context, references to sexual content, and references to child abuse.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Wouldn't it be nice if we were older?
Then we wouldn't have to wait so long;
And wouldn't it be nice to live together,
In the kind of world where we belong?

- "Wouldn't It Be Nice" The Beach Boys, 1966

Friday 18 th February 1977

How—oh how—had he failed so spectacularly to learn his lesson? James had repeated it like a mantra their first year; never underestimate a Black. Remus could've socked himself in the face; either he had gotten complacent, or he was still somehow under the impression that Sirius cared less for his own relationships than he did for teasing him for his. He wasn't entirely sure why Sirius' fascination with the sleepy village of Craigtyre had suddenly hit a new height, but if he'd known what it would kick off, he might've been more opposed to the idea of sneaking out.

"I'm telling you," Sirius announced in the middle of their Literacy silent study; "it's a solid plan. There's this pub—Xeno says they'll serve us booze if we don't wear our uniforms, and there's a corner shop! Just think, Lupin—real cigs with real filters, no more hand-rolls!"

Not bothering to take his eyes off his book, Remus lifted an indifferent brow. He still had most of his Embassys leftover from Christmas, courtsey of Tomny, and wasn't all that bothered to get more as long as Xeno was still padding their stash. Clearly Sirius was more desperate.

“Why does it feel like you’ve suddenly become extra stir-crazy?” James whispered. “Is the end of winter really getting to you that badly?”

“Kenny said ‘no parties for no reason’,” Sirius grumbled sourly. “Git of a dorm monitor finally agrees to let us throw one in the common room and then goes and ruins it by saying we gotta wait for some tosser’s birthday or something.”

“It’s so he doesn’t get in shit,” Remus mumbled out of the corner of his mouth.

“That is so boring. Does no one take risks anymore?”

“Does it have to be one of our birthdays?” Peter reasoned. “Why not just find a random kid and throw one for him?”

“Shhh!” Remus hissed, as Professor Bilshen passed by their table, looking down his nose at them sceptically. Only pretending to be engrossed in his school work, Sirius waited until he’d moved on before continuing.

“Tried that. But the next kid in our dorm having a birthday is some puny seventh year named Alfred, and Kenny wouldn't believe that a group of sixth form students would throw a party for someone who looks like he’d cry the moment you held a spliff in front of his nose.”

“So naturally we skip town instead,” James sniggered.

“Just for the evening,” Sirius smirked. “We can go tonight.”

“So, what then—” Peter started, “We just walk?”

“Why not?”

“It’ll be dark out.”

“You have a torch.”

“It’ll be cold out.”

“Bring Moira then—she’s always breathing down your neck anyway, maybe that’ll keep you warm enough.”

“Oh, so it’s like a group thing?” James added, sounding even more enthusiastic.

“Small group thing,” Sirius clarified. “Bring whoever you want but remember we gotta be stealthy or we’ll never make it to Moony’s glory hole.”

Remus snapped his book shut. “If you ever call it that again, I will dig your eyes out with a grapefruit spoon.”

They all started laughing but Peter’s guffaw cut through it all and their teacher immediately had him in a verbal chokehold; “Mr. Pettigrew! The thing about silent study—it’s supposed to be silent. Do not let me hear you again!”

“Sorry, Professor Bilshin,” Peter mumbled, ducking his head in shame. James just winked at him before nudging Sirius.

“I’m on board.”

“Me too,” Peter agreed in a hush.

They all looked at Remus pointedly.

“Don’t let me ruin your fun,” he said simply.

Sirius leaned over the table toward him. “Are you saying you don’t want to go to the village?”

“Are you saying you want to be caught? You’ve basically broadcasted this insane expedition of yours to the entire room.”

“This better, princess?” Sirius asked, lowering his voice to a harsh whisper.

Ignoring him, Remus looked to James. “Do you really think Lily will agree to breaking curfew and breaking out?”

James looked down and innocently began tracing his finger on the table top. “Well, we don’t have to tell her exactly…”

“I think she’ll figure it out the moment she sees the hole in the school wall.”

“Then he can just rugby carry her the rest of the way,” Sirius amended.

“Yeah!” James said. “And she won’t care once we’re on the outside,

right?"

Remus held up his hands. "Don't ask me, she's your girlfriend. For how long though, who knows…"

James dropped his mouth open, sorely wounded, and Sirius swallowed a smile. "Moony, do you need a time out, or are you just feeling more cranky than usual?"

"Yeah, what about Marlene?" James prompted with a pout. "You think it's gonna be any easier to convince her?"

"Who said I was gonna ask her?"

"So you're not going to take her along?" Sirius asked.

Remus raised an eyebrow. "Since when do you care? I would've thought you'd have been gutted playing seventh wheel again."

"Who says I'm gonna be playing seventh wheel?"

"You're dating someone, Sirius?" Peter asked very quickly.

"No—but that don't mean anything."

Remus gave a satisfied 'hmph' and opened his book again, leaning his face on one hand. He'd just found his page again when Sirius covered it with his hand.

"What was that?" Sirius demanded.

"What was what?"

"That—the 'hmph'."

"It was nothing." Remus tried pulling the book away, but Sirius snatched it and held it out of reach.

"Wasn't nothing. C'mon, big man, spit it out."

"As if it's actually that easy to find someone to date," Remus replied hotly. "Only you would be so smug."

"Oh? Reckon I can't do it?"

"I didn't say that, now give me—"

“He thinks I can’t do it!” Sirius announced, tossing the book to Peter, who scrambled to catch it.

“Mr. Black!”

Sirius jumped and waved at their teacher, who’d gone slightly red-faced. “Sorry, Bill, my bad!” Turning to James, he dropped his voice to a whisper; “Prongs, can you believe this tosser? He thinks I can’t find myself a bloody date.”

James shrugged. “It has been a while.”

“A while since what?”

“Since you were on the bloody pull,” Remus finished, taking his book back from Peter. Instantly, Sirius made a face while James gave a snort.

“He’s right, you know,” he said. “It’s almost a new record. Is it your heart, Sirius? Did someone break it while we weren’t paying attention?”

“No one’s broken anything! I was alone on Valentine’s by choice, I'll have you know.”

Remus smiled smugly. “Oh, so it’s not just a dry spell?”

“Christ, leave me some benefit of the doubt, won’t you, Lupin?” Sirius groaned.

“Never said it was a bad thing,” Remus said casually, “s’good even—reduces the risk of teenage pregnancy. The world couldn’t tolerate another one of you running around anyway. We don’t have the space for another head of that size.”

“Ha—ha. Suppose we don’t have to worry about that with you. Bet you’ve carried the same crusty condom in your wallet since you were in year eight, you bitter virgin.”

“Oh make up your mind—am I a filthy slag who gets it in every other day or am I a bitter virgin?”

“Knowing you, you’d find a way to be both. Maybe you’re just a dirty voyeur.”

“The only thing I’m observing is your daily show of stupidity.”

“Getting too repetitive for you, is it? Maybe I should switch it up—fancy knife throwing? But I’ll need a volunteer for target practice. How ‘bout you?”

“What’s the prize?”

Sirius smirked, entirely riled up. “A big—FAT—”

“Mr. Black!”

They all froze, even Peter and James, who’d just been watching the back and forth as though it were a primetime drama. Professor Bilshin stood up from his desk and marched over to their table, scribbling on his pad of pink slips and slapping one down in front of Sirius.

“Detention, Sirius. My office—Saturday.”

All their other classmates started giggling as Sirius scowled down at the slip and Bilshin walked away. He flipped the teacher’s back off angrily before turning back to shoot a nasty glare at Remus, who'd only just swallowed a smug expression of his own. ‘Fuck you’ Sirius mouthed, and Remus felt the corners of his mouth twitch again before he simply shrugged and opened his book once more.

* * *

Surprisingly, the girls were not at all that adverse to making a trip down to the village. Lily was sceptical of course, and after they’d led them through the bushes and revealed their hidden escape route, she spent several minutes inspecting the wall as though it were a magical trap door that would disappear at any moment.

“So this is how you guys got out last year?” Lottie asked, slipping through the hole to the other side and bouncing back, flipping the torch light up onto her face and turning her amused grin into a ghoulish mask. They’d confessed to attending the concert last June on the walk over, which had only ended up making the girls more envious and excited to break the rules themselves; though Mary couldn't seem to help but point out the stark differences between sneaking out for a rock concert and sneaking out for a mediocre pint from the local pub.

“Yup,” James announced proudly. “Moony found it.”

“How’d you manage that?” Marlene asked, looking up at Remus in the dark.

“Oh, you know. Walking.”

She smiled and tugged his cap down over his eyes playfully.

“Ugh—where is Sirius?” Mary moaned, blowing out a hazy breath and tucking her hands into her armpits. “I’m going to freeze to death before we even leave school.”

“He said he needed to stop and get something,” Remus said, fixing his cap.

“Get what?” Lily asked.

“Dunno,” James answered, “but he said it’d be quick. Figured it was something to do with Xeno.”

“So he wants to break curfew, sneak off grounds, and get high? What’s he trying to do—set the record for longest detention ever?”

“Doubt it,” Peter said, “he already holds that record.” Holding onto his arm, Moira giggled and covered her mouth with a gloved hand.

“If he doesn’t show up soon he’s also going to hold the record for worst slap in Hawkings history,” Mary grumbled. “It’s bad enough I’m tugged out into the cold by a group of love-sick twosomes—”

“You didn’t have to come,” Lily laughed.

“Of course I had to come, but I'm still going to complain! Without Sirius here I’m the only single one, it’s pathetic!”

“I’m standing right here,” Lottie snapped.

Mary sighed. “Alright fine, you and I will hold hands, but you know we’ve let you whine over Mickey for weeks. It’s my turn now.”

“I’m allowed to be upset, Mary. Mickey and I dated for nearly two years!”

“Yes, yes, and we understand that, but you’ve had one shit boyfriend in two years—I’ve had four in five months. Lance, Bryan, Victor, Nick —all of them shit.”

“Maybe you should take it easy then,” Marlene said. “Find a way to enjoy some alone time."

"Why, so you can get me to try and read one of those romance books of yours? No thanks, not my idea of fun. I prefer my affairs to be of the tangible variety."

Marlene rolled her eyes and turned back to Remus. He smiled reassuringly and nudged her arm. "You finish that book I gave you yet?"

"You mean 'Carrie'? No, it's taking me a while," she shuddered.

"Why, you're a fast reader."

Marlene gave him a pouty smile and mumbled something he couldn't hear.

Remus leaned in closer; "What?"

"We've been busy with school," she quietly, "and I... well, I can't read it at night."

"So you're... scared?"

"Remus. It's a horror novel."

"I didn't think it was that bad."

"Then I'd hate to see what your nightmares are made of!"

Remus leaned back. "Don't really get nightmares."

"Oh. Never?"

He shook his head. Nightmares required a certain level of deep sleep, which he was half sure he never got, and besides, no nightmare could be as shitty as the things he couldn't forget during the daytime anyway. He'd take a zombie or a murderous prom queen over one of those any day.

The sound of rustling bushes came from behind them and Remus and all his friends turned just as Sirius strode into their small clearing, holding branches aside to make way for himself. "Hey!" He breathed, eyes alight in the darkness. "Sorry I'm late."

"What took you so long?" Mary snapped.

“Had to make a pit stop,” Sirius replied, looking back and reaching his arm out. Just then Chastity Bell stepped through the bushes, flipping her dark hair over one shoulder.

“Hey,” she smiled.

The silence was abrupt and startling. Sirius had apparently succeeded in surprising every one of them, and as Chastity plucked a small twig from his hair and stepped up to take his arm, Remus felt his insides twinge. He’d been questioning all along why Sirius hadn’t been more adverse allowing girlfriends in on a plot, but suddenly things made much more sense.

“You… brought a friend,” Lily said, “and it’s… Chastity. Wow.”

Chastity grinned and looked to Sirius, who appeared pleased enough. “Yeah, well, figured it would be fun to show Chas the village.”

“I’ve already been before,” Chastity confessed, “and it is a bit, you know, dull and mucky, but Sirius said we’re sneaking out so that definitely makes up for things, yeah?”

“Must make up for something…” Marlene murmured.

“So, you lot already look chilly,” Sirius beamed; “Should we get going?”

They did, making their way outside the wall and skipping across the road until they'd made it into the endless pastures and some of the giddiness that came with sneaking out had been replaced with the crisp reality of the chilly night air. In the dark, and with only three torches to split amongst the ten of them they were risking twisted ankles and the occasional cowpat, so they walked behind one another in pairs. Everywhere they stepped was damp and spongy since it was still that part of the year where the ground melted during the day only to refreeze at night. It took them nearly forty-five minutes of trekking, but finally they managed to crest the top of the last hill and spotted Craigtyre from above, the only thing lit up for miles in every direction.

“Finally!” Mary sighed, as they skirted down into town where they traded dirt roads for cobbled pavement. “I thought it was never gonna end.”

“I told you we knew the way!” Sirius said. “You lot have so little faith.”

“Yeah? Then why’d you feel the need to drag us straight through a field of cow shit?”

“Thought I smelled something funny. Don’t tell me it’s you, Macdonald?”

“No!”

“Can we get on with this?” Remus said, feeling as haggard as the rest of them. “Where’s this pub?”

“It’s this way,” James said, taking a shivering Lily by the arm and shooting off down the street. It only took a short while longer for the little brick cottages to give way to shut-up shops and quiet street corners. Along the way they passed a closed corner shop (“Sorry, Moony. I’ll ask Xeno to bring you some brand-name fags next time.”) and a small bakery that still smelt mouth-watering despite its darkened windows. They didn’t spot their first local until they’d turned a corner and the yellow lights of the tiny village pub drifted into view.

Tired and half-frozen, they made their way inside The Three Broomsticks and took a seat at one of the big round booths near the back where they could avoid any curious eyes. It was a tight squeeze with ten of them, but James was able to pull up a few extra chairs and they all settled in. It didn’t take long for the pub's landlady to notice. She strolled over to the table, wiping her hands on her apron.

“Hello there. Don’t think I recognize you lot.”

“We’re from out of town,” Mary replied boldly.

“If you say so.”

“Say, I remember you,” Sirius said, flourishing his hand as if to flatter. “Madam Rosetta, wasn’t it?”

“Rosmerta,” she corrected, “but everyone just calls me Rosie. This is my pub, so what’ll it be?”

“A round of pints,” Sirius said.

“And some tea,” Marlene added. Sirius looked at her, appalled.

“What? It’s freezing.”

“How about some warm ciders then?” Rosmerta offered. “I’ve got some steaming wassail in the back."

"That sounds great," James nodded, and she tossed a few napkins on the table and strode away.

"That was too easy," Lily said.

"I told you," Sirius said smugly, "they don't care that we're here as long as we can pay up afterwards."

After the landlady had returned with their tray of drinks, they distributed the pints and cider amongst themselves and drank deeply until their insides were warm and a light flush had come to each of their cheeks. The last of them had just finished shrugging out of their winter coats when Mary pointed across the room.

"Oh my god, is that Greyson Kent?"

All ten of them strained their heads to get a look. On the other side of the pub, a group of year 13 boys were crowded into a corner.

"Yep, it is," James said. He and Greyson were on the football team together. After some prodding from Mary, he called Greyson's name and they exchanged a friendly wave.

"Over there, it's Holly," Lily said, pointing to another small group of students. "I can't believe she's here. She's a prefect, you know."

"Oh good. Now you're not the only one breaking the rules," Chastity said. James nodded as if to agree with her, making Lily scoff while pinching him on the arm.

"Right, that's enough then," Mary said, before unceremoniously downing half her pint. "I'm going to say hello."

"To Greyson?" Marlene said. "But we just got here."

"Exactly, which means I won't be buying any more of my own drinks. C'mon, Lot, let's go."

Eagerly the two girls wiggled out from the booth and strolled across the room, stopping behind Greyson and his friends and smiling until the boys ultimately pulled up a few chairs for them.

"Gotta hand it to her. She knows what she wants and she goes for it," Chastity said.

“Reminds me of someone else I know,” Sirius added keenly. He and Chastity exchanged a flirtatious look, while Remus glared hard at the bottom of his pint glass.

“I see Rachelle. She lives next door,” Moira said, nudging her boyfriend. “I want to say hi too. Petey, are you coming?”

“Yeah, alright.” Peter gathered their drinks and together they got up from the table.

“Don’t let those girls eat you alive, Wormy,” Sirius called after them. Minus the four extra bums at the table, there was finally enough room to shimmy around the booth. Remus and Marlene found themselves at its centre, with James and Lily to their left and Sirius and Chastity across from them.

“I can’t believe there’s so many other students here,” Lily said.

“I can’t believe you’ve really never been,” Chastity replied.

Lily bristled. “Not everyone’s so keen on breaking the rules for a bit of fun.”

“Right.” Chastity sipped her pint. “So how’d Potter know the way?”

As if the thought hadn’t occurred to her, Lily turned to James, who quickly busied himself by swishing his drink around. Finally he caved.

“It was that time with Simeon. After the… you know… party.”

“You told us that the party was in some dirty old barn,” Marlene said.

“We came to the pub after,” Sirius amended. “Sim’s idea.”

A sudden consideration came over Lily, as though she’d suddenly found the bottom of her cider glass very interesting. “Oh. Well, that’s fine, I suppose.”

It was clear to the rest of them that she was merely swallowing her pride, and the sour memory that came with it. Too bad Chastity wasn't in the loop.

“You should’ve seen how sloshed Potter was,” she giggled. “Had to practically drag his arse out, didn’t you?”

“You were there?” Marlene gaped, while James looked very guilty.

“ ‘Course. I knew Simeon. He dated my cousin Bethany when they were our age.”

“I don’t actually remember seeing you,” Sirius said to her.

“I remember seeing you,” Chastity smirked. “I can see why you wouldn’t remember. You were pretty busy. You know, with that girl’s hand down—”

“Rosie!” Remus chirped, raising his glass as the barmaid passed. “Another round please!”

* * *

Remus didn’t know what time it was, but so far he’d downed two full pints, half of Marlene’s pale ale, and a warm cider. He’d been pushed and squeezed and shoved as other students came and went from their table, visiting and exchanging pleasantries like they weren’t all breaking over a dozen school rules just by being there. Unluckily for Remus, he’d found himself sucked into a conversation with Chastity that had no way out. Sirius was still planted starkly on her other side, while Marlene had slid over to Lily and was refusing to speak to him.

"Piss off, you called me drunk," she snubbed.

"I didn't," Remus tried reasoning. "I just said you were being a bit silly."

Marlene just stuck her tongue out at him.

So, he was left with Sirius and Chastity, and it occurred to Remus that never had he so strongly wished that women came with an off switch. Chastity talked like she was on a late-night talk show and everyone else was merely there to listen or entertain her. It frustrated Remus to no end, and not just because it was probably exactly what Sirius found so enamouring.

“Your fingers are so long,” Chastity giggled, busy holding her hand up against Sirius’ in comparison. “I guess what they say about musicians is true—you are mutants.”

“You should see Moony’s,” Sirius said. Face lighting up, Chasity turned eagerly and grabbed Remus’ wrist just as he was about to polish off his third ale. She pressed both his and Sirius’ hands together in front of her, examining them as though she'd just discovered a new species.

"Wow, Sirius," she exclaimed, "your hand looks like a baby's next to his!"

"An elegant baby's!"

Remus pulled his hand back. It was clammy from holding Marlene's hand under the table and he didn't want Sirius to feel it.

"Remus' fingers totally dwarf yours," Chastity teased, but Sirius just leaned across her toward Remus.

"Your hands are so bloody soft, Moony," he said. "You gotta build up those calluses more."

"Why do you call him Moony?" Chastity asked suddenly, putting Remus instantly on edge.

"Oh, haven't you heard?" Sirius grinned, sitting back. They made eye contact over Chastity's head and Remus prepared himself for the incoming embarrassment, but Sirius only paused and ran his tongue over his top lip.

"Sometimes this guy has trouble sleeping," he said lowly, so only the three of them could hear, "and he sneaks over to my side of the room to listen to music." Sirius mimicked putting on headphones. "But I have the window, so when he's sitting down on the floor and we've forgotten to shut the curtains the moon comes through the glass and reflects off the top of his head like a little halo. So he's Moony."

Remus didn't know what to say, the story was so ridiculous, it was laughable. Not that Chastity minded.

"That's so cute," she declared. "I want a nickname."

"Stick around long enough and you'll get one," Sirius confirmed, before reaching across the table to nab Remus' hand again. "Though maybe we should be calling this one mutant fingers, ha!"

"Gerroff," Remus slurred, shaking himself free. Chastity giggled (Christ, did she ever stop giggling?) and turned her shoulder into Sirius' chest again—she'd been doing it all night, sidling closer to him until she was practically in his lap. Sirius didn't seem to mind. All it took was one sly upwards glance from her and they were kissing.

Instantly apprehensive, Remus slid toward Marlene. “I’m gonna go have a smoke.”

“Okay,” she said, “just don’t stay out long. We still gotta walk back and it’s cold out.”

He nodded, and she and Lily slid down to let him out of the booth. After a quick pit stop at the loo, Remus shrugged his jacket on and stepped out into the cool air.

Moving past the small crowd of local smokers, he skirted down the lane until he’d stopped beneath one of the pub’s windows. It was cracked slightly, allowing warm air and the faint sound of a radio to drift out into the night. Only slightly comforted, Remus lit a cigarette and inhaled deeply. He held that first golden puff inside, mind drifting to Sirius and Chastity. By then his lungs were screaming for air. When he finally exhaled, he coughed until his eyes watered.

“Need me to get you another pint to help wash that down?” Sirius asked, appearing beside him in the dark.

“Shit. What—you doing—out here?” Remus said, in between hacking.

“I came to join you.”

Recovered, Remus cleared his throat, refusing to meet Sirius' gaze. “You looked pretty busy before.”

Sirius didn’t rise to the bait. “It was getting stuffy inside anyway. Can I bum a fag?”

Remus handed him the pack of Embassys, which Sirius took and admired before popping a cigarette out and setting it between his lips. “Light?”

“Lost mine,” Remus lied, because he felt like it. The weak joke didn't seem to go over well with Sirius, who glanced up at him sharply before reaching out to grab the front of his jacket. In one deft move, he pulled Remus down to his level and held him steady as he lit the cigarette off the tip of Remus’ own. They were so close Remus could see the faint orange glow of the cigarettes reflected in Sirius’ eyes.

“You’re such an idiot,” Sirius sighed, releasing him and blowing out his nose.

Entirely rattled, Remus imagined himself grabbing Sirius by the front of his coat and shaking him. How does that not freak you out? He'd demand. How can you just do that?!

Like this, the imaginary Sirius would say, and then he'd... Well, who knows what he would do. Sirius was weird like that. Entirely unexpected.

In an attempt to calm his frazzled nerves, Remus straightened the front of his jacket and nearly fumbled his own cigarette. “Grab someone like that in London and you’re likely to get slammed over the head with a bottle," he mumbled.

“Eh, I’ll try anything once,” Sirius shrugged.

“Like dating Chastity?”

“Never said we were dating. Just brought her along, s’all.”

“So you’re not gonna date her?”

“Never said that either.” Sirius looked up again and they shared a cool look.

“Is this because of what I said this morning?” Remus asked.

“No.”

“You don’t need to prove anything to me.”

“I ain’t trying to prove anything,” Sirius said sharply. “For your information, Chas asked me to hang out last week.”

“But you said yes today.”

“We were going somewhere today. Since when do you care so much anyway?”

“I don’t.”

“Fine, be that way then.”

“Fine.”

They both looked away, smoking side-by-side in silence and Remus turned his glare to the wall across the street. Someone had graffitied across its brick, but the paint was so faded he couldn’t make out what it said. It reminded him of his friends back home. How many hours had he spent running around the End with the boys, tagging everything from cars doors to street signs? It'd been so long now, before he came to Hawkings, and Tomny didn't even bother with that stuff anymore anyway. Maybe their tags were faded now too.

"You've got that look in your eye again," Sirius said, snapping Remus out of his daze. "You always look so far away, like you're on autopilot."

"I'm only thinking."

"About…?"

"Stuff."

"Mm-hm." Sirius took a pull off his cigarette. "And does that 'stuff' have anything to do with what you get up to at home?"

Remus sucked in sharply and sent himself into another coughing fit; "Get out—" he wheezed; "How is it you're always in my fucking head?"

"So that's where you were then? Astral-projecting yourself all the way back to London?"

"Oh shut up. You don't want to hear about home anyway."

"Yes, I do."

"Why?"

"Because I'm bored," Sirius said. "And because you're an enigma I want to crack. So, I'll trade you, a question for a question."

"What sort of question?"

"Any question. Multiple questions, provided we take turns of course." Sirius held his half-smoked cigarette aloft. "Let's say we have until this fag burns down to nothing."

Remus looked from the cigarette to Sirius. If it were anyone else he would've told them to stuff their stupid game, but it wasn't any else.

"Fine."

Sirius grinned victoriously and asked his question; "What's your friend's name—the one you're always talking to on the phone."

“Tom,” Remus answered, before scrambling for a question of his own. “Why… er—why do you insist on calling every teacher by their first name?”

“Because they’re human and one day they’re gonna die and decompose the same way as me. Who taught you to roll your spliffs?”

“Seesaw. Why’d you keep the letter I wrote you in the summer?”

“Because you wrote it for me. Who’s Seesaw?”

“A friend. Why don’t you ever call me Remus?”

“I like Moony better. Now what’s with the sudden fascination with James’ cuffed trousers?”

“There is no fascination, I only asked him why he did it the one time. Were you… Were you telling the truth about the ‘Moony’ thing?”

“Obviously. You get this little glow on the back of your head in the shape of a moon. Sort of makes you look bald actually.”

“Okay, smartass."

Sirius smiled. “How drunk are you right now?”

“Not drunk enough… Did you really tell Pete to cheat off of me during our last maths test?”

“No, I told him to cheat off of James. I told him to cheat off you in history. Where’d you get those fags? Xeno always says he only brings in loose baccy.”

“Tom—for Christmas. Why’d you bring Chastity tonight?”

“To check something. Is McKinnon a good kisser?”

“Yes—”

“Really?”

“Yeah, but she doesn’t… like tongue.”

Sirius snorted and Remus pushed him lightly. “Oi, careful,” he moaned, indicating to his cigarette, “don’t want to knock any extra ash off our timer.”

Remus shook his head. “To check what?”

“Huh?”

“You brought Chastity—to check what?”

“Oh.” Sirius sucked his lips. “If I liked her.”

“Do you?”

“It’s my turn. Where’d you get your height from—mum or dad?”

“Dunno. Dad, maybe. You actually like Lily, right?”

“What sort of question is that?”

“I dunno. You're always on her arse about something.”

Sirius rolled his eyes. “Of course I like her. Evans and I might not always see eye to eye on everything, but she makes James happy. And I like seeing James happy. Do you like Lily?”

“You know I do.”

“No, I mean like, did you ever ‘like her’ like her?”

“No! God, you’re bloody ruthless.”

“Maybe, but I had to check. Now go on, it’s your turn," Sirius smiled, patting him on the arm. The touch was gentle enough that Remus found himself staring down at his arm afterwards as his next question materialised in his mind.

Why is it so easy for you to touch me?

He almost said it out loud, but then it occurred to him that there was a chance Sirius would ask him to explain the question—which felt impossible, because he wasn't entire sure where it'd come from in the first place. They were a friendly group, them Marauders—especially James and Sirius—but Remus had always felt a bit on the outside. Touching Sirius never felt like it did with Tomny or Lee or Doss. It was always different somehow, like he was too aware of him. And that frightened him.

"Earth to space cadet," Sirius called. "I said it was your turn."

"I..." Remus sighed. "I can't think of anything. You go."

"Can't. S'against the rules. You gotta ask something."

"Fuckin' hell, fine. What's your... er... favourite colour?"

If he thought the question was stupid, Sirius didn't say it. Instead he just smiled, acting almost shy, and in a small voice he said, "Brown."

"Brown?" Remus echoed. "Why brown?" He'd expected Sirius' favourite colour to be something as loud and obnoxious as he was, like electric blue or fandango purple.

"Dunno," Sirius said, "I just like it."

"Oh. Er, alright. Your turn, I suppose."

"Do you trust me?"

"Blue—" Remus stopped himself, and Sirius' face began to crease with laughter.

"Did you think I was going to ask your favourite colour, Moony?"

"Shove off. That would be the normal thing to do, wouldn't it?"

"Ha, you're funny. I can ask your favourite colour anytime. What I want to know, is if you trust me."

Still a bit caught off guard, Remus' eyebrows knit together in puzzlement. "Yes," he said finally, "I think so. Do you trust me...?"

"Always." And then Sirius stared at him, hard and genuine. "How old were you the first time your dad hit you?"

Oh.

So it was like that then.

Remus shuffled awkwardly on the spot, rolling his cigarette between two fingers. "Lyall—or... My dad, he... He's never hit me."

"Never...?"

"No. How old were you?"

"Can't remember. How about your mum?"

Remus felt his jaw tighten. "Dunno, can't really remember either. She probably didn't. At least I don't think she did. How'd you get your burn scars?"

Sirius took the question in stride. He'd been expecting it. "Boiling water. I was eleven. How'd you get yours?"

Almost immediately a phantom ache split across Remus' nose and he reached up to rub it. "Broke my face on some guy's fist. Do yours hurt?"

"Not anymore. At least yours sounds more badass. Why'd you lie about it?"

"It was easier. Why do you hide them?"

"It's easier. Do they scare you?"

Remus' expression turned resolute. He was still buzzed, but his answer would've been the same drunk or not. "No."

"Good," Sirius said, looking down. Still watching him—as if he could do anything else—Remus brought his cigarette back to his lips.

"Why'd you jump out that window—hurt your arm?" He asked, inhaling.

"Wanted to get away," Sirius exhaled. "Who told you I jumped out a window?"

He blew out the smoke. "Regulus. Why don't the two of you get along?"

"It's complicated."

"That's not an answer."

"Sure it is. What happened with your mum?"

"It's complicated."

Sirius sighed again. "Right."

"Right," Remus said. "Why won't you go near the piano?"

"I do go near it—"

"Why won't you play the piano?"

“You know why.”

“No, all I know is that it has something to do with your mum. Which is why I'm asking.”

“Fine. It’s ‘cause it’s always for her. Or for someone else,” Sirius said, voice tight. “The guitar’s for me. And for you.”

Remus glanced down, digging the toe of his boot into the pavement. “Your turn,” he mumbled.

“Why won’t you show us the songs you’ve been writing?” Sirius asked.

“Because they’re not finished.”

“Will you ever show us?”

“Maybe." He looked up again. "Will you ever play the piano again?”

“Maybe. Dunno what it’s gonna take.”

“You gotta find a new reason to play,” Remus said without thinking. “I mean—make it for you, right? Someone told me that.”

“Who?”

“Sheila,” he lied, surprising himself again. Tonya wasn't a secret... right?

“Huh,” Sirius said, biting his thumb as though lost in thought, before indicating for Remus to ask another question.

So, he did.

“What happened with Miles?”

Instantly Sirius’ lips parted in shock and he dropped his hand. “What?”

“I asked what happened with Miles.”

“I… how…?” As if suddenly lost on the spot, Sirius looked down but drew back slightly and raised his cigarette, which had burned down to nothing and gone cold in the night. “Damn,” he said quietly, “I guess time’s up. You’re pretty good at this game, Moony.”

Remus couldn't help it. The disappointment washed over him like a wave. "You cheated."

"No, I definitely played by the rules," Sirius said.

"So you're not gonna answer my question?"

"Can't. Time ran out. That would be cheating."

Bitterly, Remus flicked his cigarette stub away and Sirius did the same, before ultimately smiling and throwing an arm up around his shoulders. "Aw, don't be angry, Moons."

"You're a prick."

"Naturally, but still, it feels good to get some information out of you for once."

"That makes one of us," Remus grumbled. He let Sirius turn him around so they could make their way back toward the pub's entrance.

"I was perfectly forthcoming," Sirius said.

"You're a manipulative bastard, Black."

"Put that in a song and I'll believe it. Until then, good game."

And that was that. They walked back inside together as if nothing more than a cigarette had been exchanged between them.

But Remus could already feel the shift.

Sirius was now the keeper of the most secrets he'd ever revealed—maybe even more than Tomny—all because of some silly little game.

He wondered if it was the same for Sirius. Did Remus now carry more of him than James did? No, there was no way. Competing like that would only mean a loss, and Remus didn't feel like playing loser again. If he was alone he might've entertained the thought more, but that wasn't Sirius. Sirius lived like emotions were just part-time work. Like they were a simple nine-to-five, and could be shut off at the the end of the day in favour of easier, more light-hearted fun. It was a form of resilience, he knew, and one of the things Remus would always admire most about him. He envied it too, and very secretly, feared it.

But that was Sirius. Loved, feared, and envied.

* * *

“Count yourself lucky Bilshin had a meeting and was too busy to actually give you detention,” Remus said, as they were making their way up the path in front of their dorm the following evening.

“He gave me a bloody book report,” Sirius hissed.

“So read the book.”

“But it’s due Monday! Did you hear that? Monday! I can’t read an entire book and do a report on it in a day and a half!”

“You could if you actually tried focusing for longer than five minutes.”

“Impossible. It looks about as interesting as sawdust, plus I told Chas I’d hang out with her tomorrow."

"Guess you'll just have to postpone."

"She's gonna hate that." Sirius rubbed his forehead with a moan. "Oh! I got it—will you write it for me?”

“Ha!" Remus barked. "Nice try.”

“Oh why not, Moony?” Sirius whined. “You read sawdust for fun all the time.”

“I’m not doing your homework for you.”

“What if I pay you?”

“With what money?”

“Oh, you didn't hear? I got my stipend back from mum and dad.”

Remus' mouth dropped open. “How’d you swing that?”

“Told McGonagall I had holes in all my trousers and that I couldn’t afford to place an order at the commissary," Sirius replied smugly. "So she wrote home. Man, I wish I could've seen the looks on my parents’ faces when they heard that their precious Black heir was too poor to afford school slacks.”

“You embarrassed your parents into giving you an allowance?” Remus snorted.

“Yeah, and it totally worked. Should’ve thought of it sooner really. So, will you do it?”

Remus considered, hating himself for it. “Fine. Clear my debt with Xeno and I’ll write the bloody report. And you owe me two packs on top of it.”

“Deal.”

They went to shake on it just as another boy named Greg passed them coming down the front steps. “Oi, Lupin!” He called, turning around as he walked. “You got a call earlier!”

“Who from?” Asked Remus.

“Dunno, check the board.”

“Kay, thanks Greg.”

Greg held a hand up in a wave before turning away down the pavement. Remus turned back to Sirius, who had stopped on the top step to wait for him. “Is it those friends of yours from home again?”

“Maybe,” Remus shrugged, “or just Giles.”

They went inside and walked straight up to the message board, searching for his name amongst the notices. “Here, this one's got your name,” Sirius said, plucking a little yellow slip of paper off the board. “Hold on, who’s ‘Tonya’?”

“Don’t be nosey,” Remus said, snatching the paper.

“Moony, are you cheating on McKinnon?” Sirius asked, looking almost impressed.

“No! God, shout that louder would you? She’s just a friend. And she’s got a boyfriend already.”

“This is too juicy," Sirius said, looking him up and down. “I think it’s time you filled us in on these London friends of yours. Like, I wanna know how good the competition is—that way I get to be the one to tell James and Pete.”

“Considering I’m stuck with you lot for ten months out of the year I’d say you have nothing to worry about," Remus quipped. "Now buzz off while I make my call."

"Alright, but we're just upstairs in case you start getting homesick and need a shoulder to cry on."

After dodging a sharp smack, Sirius gave a cheery thumbs up before starting for the staircase. Even with him gone Remus felt nervous. He strolled to the phones and dialled the flat, waiting impatiently as the tone went long-distance and then began to ring. The noise went on forever, drilling a hole in Remus' temple, but just as he'd given up hope someone on the other line picked up.

"Tonya?" He pressed the receiver tighter to his ear. "It's me, Remus."

"Oh hello, love." It was her; he could hear the smile in her voice.

"Sorry I missed your call. I was just out with some friends."

" 'Course you were," she said, "it's Saturday, you should be out having fun with your friends. I wasn't thinking."

"No, it's fine, don't worry," Remus replied hastily. "You sound better. You finally over that cold then? You sounded horrible last time you called."

"What? Oh—yeah, it's all gone now." Tonya punctuated the statement with another cough, cold and wet. "For the most part anyway."

"Tomny okay?"

"Yeah, you know him. Bounced back immediately, the tough shit."

Remus smiled. "Where is 'e now?"

"Oh, he's… sleeping. Had a late night, you know how it goes."

"Things are good though?"

"Mhm. Not much's new, sorry to say. Just wanted to hear your voice a bit."

"Don't let my friends hear you. All it took was seeing your name on the message board for Sirius to think I was cheating on Marlene."

"Oh yes, him. He around now?"

“No, went up to our room.”

“Pity. I would’ve liked to hear from the infamous Mr. Black just once. Bet the parties would be fun.”

“No way, I won’t ever let him and Tomny meet. Can’t risk the two of them banding together—you neither, only ‘cause you’d just fight over who chooses the music. Though I s’pose you’d actually be more dangerous paired up with James.”

“That’s the one who likes football and your Lily friend right?”

“Yeah, that’s him.”

“Right, so now this is the part where you admit you lied ages ago about dating her.”

Remus sighed. He'd actually managed to forget that tiny, embarrassing detail.

“C'mon Ton, can’t I have anything?”

“You know what they say, ‘the truth will out’!”

“You sound like Sirius.”

“Hm. Maybe Sirius sounds like me.”

Remus bit his lip over a smile and suddenly the words were flowing out of him. “He got himself a girlfriend. Chastity. She’s… a handful. Better than his last but not by much. Lily and the other girls were fine with it mostly, but I don’t know how long it’ll last.”

“Why, he that popular?”

“The opposite actually—I think he chose the only girl in our entire year none of us can stand.”

“None of us, huh?” Tonya echoed. “You included.”

”Well, she is annoying.”

”Right. And… how does that make you feel? Sirius having a girlfriend, I mean.”

Remus huffed, annoyed at himself for bringing it up. “Chastity’s fine enough, I guess—a bit nosey but so’s Sirius.”

“So you’re fine with it? Him dating her?”

“Why wouldn’t I be?”

“No reason…” She hummed a bit, like she didn’t believe him. Remus chose not to notice. “So, tell me everything else that’s been going on. School, relationships, good marks, bad marks—I want to hear all of it.”

“Why? It’s so boring.”

“Just humour me.”

And so he did. He talked until the common room grew quiet behind him, other students emptying out and filing up to bed one by one. The hallway was drafty but Remus hardly felt the cold. Occasionally he heard his name called by a passing friend and would quickly wave only to turn back to the phone. Tonya continued to interrupt whenever a question or funny anecdote came to mind, but really she was just there to listen. More than once he had to stop to make sure she was still there, and each time Tonya would reply with a soft ‘mhm, go on, love’.

Around the thirty-minute mark the phone chimed a warning that meant it was about to sever the connection to save on charges, cutting him off mid-story and snapping Remus out of his daze.

“Oh uh, so I only meant to say that I guess Lily isn’t much of a hiker.”

“I think it’s funny that James took her on a hike for Valentine’s,” Tonya giggled lightly.

“In his defence it really was more of a really long walk—they stayed on school grounds and there aren't many mountains around here anyway.”

“Oh, you should see the mountains in Germany, they’re so beautiful—especially in the wintertime.”

“You mean you’ve been to Germany, Ton?”

“Oh sure! In fact, once when I—” The phone chimed again, and somehow managed to sound more angry this time around. “I guess I should let you go now…” Tonya said. “You ate right? You have to make sure you’re eating.”

“I eat. Nothing as good as your cooking though, promise.”

“How’d you know I was fishing for a compliment?”

“ ‘Cause I know you.”

“Ha. You’re so cute. It’s almost not fair.”

“What’s not fair?”

“You being so far.”

Tonya was quiet for a moment, before coughing again and clearing her throat.

“But listen to me whine—you’re getting an education! It’s good! Means you won’t end up in some tiny flat with creaky floorboards and odd stains leaking through the ceilings. I still haven't figured out what that spot is over the hob... But nah, you’re going to be a musician—if that’s what you still want of course! I mean, I suppose you could do something sensible like be a bank teller or go into real estate, but somehow sensible never really made for the most exciting stories. Hm… I wonder.”

Remus thumbed the phone cord. “I…” he sighed, rubbing his face. “I started writing in that journal you gave me, you know. Songs and all that.”

The phone let loose another irate chime, which Tonya just blazed through; “Really? Oh my—would you sing something for me?”

“I don’t—”

“Or don’t sing! Just read it to me!”

“It’s not finished,” Remus confessed, “nothing’s finished. Can’t read it yet. It’s mostly just words on a page—hardly a song, really. Sort of embarrassing…”

“Ah,” Tonya said, “that’s alright. I’m sure I’ll hear it someday.”

“Sorry.”

“Don’t be silly, you don’t have anything to be sorry for.”

“If I… If anything turns out half good I promise I’ll share it with you.”

“That’d be nice.”

“Just you though.”

He heard Tonya give a little chuckle into the other end.

“Oh you… Best be careful, flatter me like that and it’ll just go to my head.”

“That’s fine. I won’t mind.”

“Ah. Sweet love.” She sighed. “Do you remember what I told you last time we saw each other, Remus?”

“You said goodbye, and then you started yelling at Tomny for listing off things that make girls go crazy in bed—”

“Ah—tat-tat-tat-taa… I meant before that. Your last night—New Years. I told you that I—”

“That you love me,” Remus finished for her.

“Yup. And that I’m not lying,” Tonya told him. “So I hope you write whatever you want, Remus. And if you don’t want to write, then I hope you find something you want for you—not for anyone else. But also, a little bit more advice if I have the time?"

"Yeah, go on."

"Don’t rush it. Take your time. We take everything one day at a time.”

“Okay, Ton.”

On the other end, Tonya gave a little sniffle. “God, this cold really is still mowing me down. Haa…” She breathed. “Okay. This is good. I’m going to go now.”

“Tomny’s not gonna be happy we ran up his phone bill,” he said, trying a smile. Tonya just coughed out her laughter before sniffling once more.

“I think he’ll understand. Eventually.”

“I’ll talk to you soon, then.”

“… Okay.”

Remus bit his lip. “Bye.”

“Goodbye, sweet love.”

He brought the receiver away from his ear, but for some reason couldn’t bring himself to set it down on the phone box. Instead he paused, waiting for that familiar click, but nothing happened. Tonya hadn’t hung up.

“Tonya…?” He whispered.

There was a hitch in her breath. “Yes?”

“I…” He gulped. What had Sirius said?

“You’re... glorious.”

“Ha,” Tonya laughed lightly, “I love you, too.”

He had a bad feeling—like an instinct—but he was already drawing the phone away from his ear. Remus set the receiver down, cutting the connection and leaving his fingers warm and tingly. His stomach hurt.

Why did his stomach hurt?

Chapter End Notes

> ‘On the pull’ means you’re trying to find someone to date/have sex with.
> Wassail is a hot drink that is made with wine, beer, or cider, and also spices, sugar, and apples. Close to what is thought of as ‘hot apple cider’ in North America.
>
> This chapter always gets my heart-rate up somehow. But wow—fifty chapters! Feels like another milestone. Thank you for sticking with me this far <3

Chapter 51: Make an Abortion of It

Chapter Summary

Sex-ed has come to Hawkings. Fervent teenage hormones plague the campus.

Chapter Notes

CW: Sexual references, sexual innuendoes, awkward teenage tension, and [undescriptive] heterosexual sex.
(Don't read too much into chapter title, no one gets an abortion.)

If you're curious about the video they watch in class, I've based it of this one: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=qWEyjBT2I-I

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I can dim the lights and sing you songs full of sad things,
We can do the tango just for two;
I can serenade and gently play on your heart strings,
Be your Valentino just for you;

Ooh, love, ooh, lover boy,
What're you doin' tonight, hey, boy?
Set my alarm, turn on my charm,
That's because I'm a good old-fashioned lover boy...

- "Good Old-Fashioned Lover Boy" Queen, 1976

Monday 21st February 1977

Remus set his pencil down and groaned, pressing his palms into his tired eye sockets. He couldn't do this. Tonya had so much faith but it was clearly misplaced.

Oh, could that be a lyric?

Faith? Misplaced?

He wrote it down, but the moment it appeared on paper he hated it. Every time he tried to add anything to the composition it felt wonky. 'Tonya's Song' was quickly becoming the bane of Remus' entire existence. None of the verses seemed to fit together right, and the only parts he actually liked felt too weepy.

You can stay up all night,
Figuring out what to do next;
And everything seems alright,
'Til you run out of cigarettes;

Raven-haired,
Midnight dancer,
If I could give you everything,
Would you ask for me?

Star of those rainy nights,
Now night is through;
You've asked your questions,
I've asked for you.

Songwriting was definitely how musicians went insane, he'd decided that early on. It took all of Remus' brainpower just to place a few rhymes together until they fit—but they never fucking fit! They always felt like they were trying too hard or reaching too far. He needed a smoke, or a spliff, possibly both and a shot of vodka and rubbing alcohol to polish it off, but sadly it was Monday morning and he was sitting in the music room waiting for the bell signalling the start of forms to chime.

Oblivious to his turmoil, Sirius bounded up the music stands in front of him and Remus flipped the little journal shut. Sirius eyed it like he wanted to say something, but sat down next to him instead, lightly drumming his hands on his thighs.

"Do you want to practice tonight?" He asked. "I've been wanting your opinion on a few different licks. I want them to sound good but not like an exact replica of Clapton or Richards, you know? We need to leave room for some spice if we ever want to make our own music one day."

"Can't," Remus said over a yawn, "told Marlene I'd meet her."

"Oh. Tomorrow then?"

Remus considered. He wanted to call Tomny but that wouldn't take all night anyway. "Sure. But we gotta fit some studying in there somewhere."

Sirius sighed. “Why?”

“Because I gave up my Sunday to write your bloody book report, and I’m still determined to kick your ass come exams.”

“How about I just throw the tests again and we play ‘Stairway to Heaven’ in peace?”

“You do that and I’ll snap a guitar string on your face while you’re sleeping.”

“You’d rather risk the front man of your band going blind than miss an evening of studying?”

“So that’s it, you’re the front man?”

“Unless you wanted the job.”

“What about James?”

“A front man needs to be a sex symbol,” Sirius lectured. “Potter’s got the looks sure, but how’s he supposed to appeal to an audience when all he’s got is ginger-on-the-brain?”

“He’s a romantic,” Remus said snidely, “I thought chicks dug that?”

“They do, but I’m not playing in a pop band.”

Remus nudged him and Sirius nudged him back and then the morning bell was ringing. Sheila strode out of the tiny office in the room’s far corner, dressed head-to-toe in vibrant magenta, and organised all of them into their chairs before flipping through the list of morning announcements.

“Good morning, class. Lunch today is chicken korma with a side of rice or jacket potato. Dinner is braised beef and Yorkshire pudding with treacle for dessert. Headmistress McGonagall has asked all teachers to remind students that toilet paper is school property and must remain on its dispensers within the lavatories and not decorating the gym foyer.” Sheila paused as a few of the kids snickered, before carrying on; “The following list of students have outstanding work for various professors; George Kelley, Bartemius Crouch, Samantha Harold, Bradley Wilkens, Jacqueline Hobbs, and Sirius Black. If you’re unsure of what it is you are missing please see me after announcements.”

“It’s probably that stupid paper for Slughorn again,” Sirius muttered when Remus glanced at him. “I keep telling the bleeder, the statute of limitations for January’s homework has passed.”

Remus swallowed his smile as Sheila finished.

“Lastly, all year twelve boys will report to classroom 3C of the Galilei Block with Professor Loughty for period one, where you will have a mandatory health lesson. Girls will report to the same room during period two with Ms. Hooch. Do not worry over your first or second period classes, all of your professors have been informed.”

“You know what that means,” Sirius said loudly, “we get the age-old abstinence lecture!”

There was a chorus of laughter and moans, while Sheila tapped her papers straight on the podium. “Yes, Mr. Black,” she acquiesced, “Professor Loughty will be delivering a lecture on sexual and bodily health, and I implore you to take it seriously. While it may seem a little funny or awkward, it’s important information that might help all of you better understand how your body works.”

“Pretty sure Black already knows how everything works,” Barty announced from the other end of the music stands. “He’s so attuned with his body he’ll show it off for a ten pence.”

“Mr. Crouch!” Sheila snapped, but Sirius took the jab in stride.

“Oh yeah, and don’t you worry, Bartemius, I’ve asked Hooch to take you off the list for next year on account of your vow of celibacy and how well acquainted you are with your right hand. Wouldn’t want to break up such a beautiful relationship after all.”

While Barty scowled and everyone else snickered, Sheila raised a tambourine and shook it enthusiastically. “Alright, alright, you know what time it is, so who’s ready for Monday morning mash?”

After forms they made their way across campus and found James and Peter already camped out together at the back of the classroom. Mickey was turned around in his seat, too busy glaring daggers at them to be aware of his surroundings, and so when he passed Remus smacked his fist on his desk to make him jump and then carried on, perfectly pleasant.

“Hey, Moony,” James said as Remus dropped down next to him. “You in this block too? Suppose Black got stuck with another group then.”

“No, he’s right—” Remus turned around to find that Sirius hadn’t followed him into the room, despite walking the entire way with him. “Well, he was right here.”

“Maybe he went to the loo?”

“Nah,” Peter said, lifting his head off his desk, “here he comes.”

Sirius marched into the room, sporting a thick pen-moustache to match their biology teacher’s. Swinging his school tie around in one hand, he stopped to peer out over the group of boys with narrowed eyes. “Alright!” He announced, in the deepest voice he could manage. “File in you filthy little horn-dogs, we’ve got some serious terrain to cover today, and we’ve already filled our quota for coat-hanger abortions this term so you’s all better listen up!”

Another boy named John Kelly raised his hand; “But Professor, are you sure you’re qualified to be teaching us this stuff?”

“Absolutely!” Sirius announced. “I did my dissertation on the Kama Sutra. Any other stupid questions?”

Vince Wood raised his hand; “Uh, yeah, so I talked to your mum last night and she says I got all this stuff covered so can I be excused?”

Sirius slapped his thigh. “That’s funny Vince, ‘cause I was chatting your mum up last night and she said you’re still having trouble fitting a condom on a banana.”

“Will there be snacks?” James called. Sirius pointed to Vince.

“Well, Wood? Care to share your banana?”

The whole class laughed and Sirius snatched up a piece of chalk. With it he wrote the letters ‘S E X’ across the entire board, before dropping it and dusting his hands. “Get ready to pop a nob lads because you’re about to get up and close with some real anatomy.”

“Please keep your anatomy to yourself, Mr. Black,” Professor Loughty said, sounding already exhausted as he strode in and set his briefcase down on the podium. “And have a seat, before I ask you to tell me the function of the epididymis and you’re forced to crack what I’m sure will be another completely inappropriate joke.”

Taking a little bow, Sirius skipped to the back of the class and dropped down next to Remus, turning to wiggle his pen ‘stache at all of them.

“Right,” Loughty continued, walking to the corner of the classroom and rolling a mounted telly into the centre of the room. “Today we will be going through the male reproductive system and its functions. I will also be addressing the issue of underage copulation, the importance of abstinence, as well as the measures that can be taken to prevent contracting sexually transmitted diseases such as genital herpes and yes,” he glanced around lazily as most of the boys snickered, “it is a serious issue. 'Better to protect than regret'.”

Loughty turned to the television and hit the power switch. “The school has organised two films for today, the first being a short little skit on the importance of contraception when engaging in sexual intercourse. Please remember to be mature, as this could very well be you one day.”

“Or tomorrow,” Sirius said, elbowing Remus.

Their teacher hit play and turned off the lights, plunging the classroom into darkness as he took a seat at his desk and picked up a book of crossword puzzles. Remus leaned forward on his desk, using one hand to prop his head up as the film’s title intro rolled across the screen and the credits turned into a couple romping beneath their bed covers.

'Hold it, hold it a minute,” the narrator said, “I think there are a few facts you should know. Did you know that in 1969 there were ten-thousand legal abortions? And that last year, over twenty-thousand teenage girls had illegitimate children? Did you know that one in every three happy teenage brides is pregnant?’

“Hey Frankie, is your girlfriend up the duff yet?” Someone heckled.

“Yeah, but she ain’t happy about it!”

“Quiet,” Loughty called lazily.

The film went on, ending with a title card bearing the words, ‘There’s no need to make an abortion of it!’ that felt a lot cheerier than it should've, and from there they continued on with the video on reproductive organs and so forth. By the end both Sirius and James had their heads down on the table, most likely asleep, and Peter had busied himself by drawing and erasing little stick figures on the desktop. They left class feeling tired and world-weary, with slogans like ‘it’s never too late to wait!’ and ‘don’t be a louse, wait for your spouse!' stuck in their heads like a bad holiday jingle.

"That was almost as bad as the puberty video they showed us in year eight," James sighed, rubbing the sleep from his eyes as they crossed the grassy quad, heading away from the science building.

"But not as bad as the one from year ten with the guy in the condom costume," Peter added.

"They didn't show us anything last year, did they?" Sirius said. James looked at him and they matched smiles; "Budget cuts," they said in unison. Snickering, they clapped each other's hand lightly and James suddenly perked up.

"Did you see Andrew pop a nob during the girl bits?" He said.

"Oh yeah," Sirius sniggered. "Tried hiding it with his bag like no one would notice. Amateur."

"Like you've never been publicly compromised," Remus shot.

"Oh, got a personal stake in this, do you, Lupin? Okay then, where's the craziest place you've ever got a stalk-on?"

Remus suddenly felt very grey. "Piss off."

"Ho, ho," Sirius laughed. "That bad, huh?"

"Leave Remus alone," James grinned knowingly.

"I already know yours, Pot," Sirius said. "Christmas dinner when you were twelve and your cousin's girlfriend wore that top so low the potato mash went right down her shirt."

"I've seen you get one in church, Sirius," Peter added.

"Well of course! Gotta show Christ my love somehow! Oh and hey, look what I snagged from that basket on Loughty's desk." One handful at a time, Sirius produced dozens of condoms from his pockets, shoving them into his friends hands as they stared in shock.

"What are all these for?" James demanded.

"What else? For your alone time with Evans! Remember, 'don't be silly, wrap your—' "

"You're absolutely insane," Remus said, cradling the condoms to his chest and half-terrified that Marlene would just appear out of thin air and spot them.

“Oh c’mon,” Sirius blagged, “enough of the innocent maiden acts—we’re all mates so time to fess up. Especially you, Potter. I know you’re just dying to spill the beans.”

“Lily and I haven’t done anything actually,” James said simply, and Sirius’ mouth dropped open in shock.

“Nothing?”

“No, not past snogging anyway. Why, got a problem?”

“No,” Sirius said dumbly, “I just thought that after—what, six months—that surely something must’ve happened?”

“Well, it hasn’t,” James said firmly, “and it’s also no one else’s business.”

Sirius put his hands up and looked at Remus. “Just surprised s’all, aren’t you, Moony?”

“No,” Remus said, “Marlene and I haven’t done anything either.”

“What? But you’re always sneaking off together!”

“Yeah, to study or read.”

“To read?” Sirius sputtered. “Oh my god. Fine—cool—whatever. Guess that just leaves Pete and me.”

“Actually Moira’s family’s really religious,” Peter said lamely.

“You dirty little liar. You told us that you and Moira had already bunked up before!”

“Well we’ve done other stuff!”

“What about you two then?” Sirius demanded, rounding on James and Remus. “What other stuff have you done?”

“Our ‘stuff’ is none of your business,” Remus scoffed.

“So you’re all total virgins then?”

“Sorry to disappoint you. Not all of us need to be promiscuous to prove a point, you know."

Sirius pulled back as though he were genuinely offended. "Don't tell me you're jealous, Lupin."

"Of what—you?"

"Yeah, and the fact that I've put a condom on more than just a banana. At least I've done the stuff I say I have."

"In that case you can keep these," Remus said huffed, passing the handful of condoms back and clapping Sirius on the shoulder. "And hey, if Chastity's not interested in all that 'stuff' then I'm sure you'll find something else to do with them. Maybe you can blow balloons—throw a party—no virgins allowed."

Striding past him, Remus started across the rest of the berm with his hands in his pockets.

"Oi, don't walk away, you coward!" Sirius called. "I want to know what sort of 'stuff' you've done! Augh! Potter, did you just throw a condom at me? Ngh—Ow!"

The health class shenanigans persisted through the rest of the day, only emphasized by other students' engagement with the class content. By lunch, several of the school signs had been decorated with limp condoms—which Sirius had nothing to do with, he assured them—and Professor Loughty's portrait in the science hall had been defaced with a speech bubble reading, 'Can't spell underage copulation without abortion!' only whoever had done it had misspelled 'copulation'. By dinner the 'sex on the brain' attitude had spread to almost all upper-secondary years, and a betting war had started over which teachers were getting it on after hours.

"My bet's on Ms. Pince," Mary said as they all met after class and headed for dinner. "I mean nobody could be as uptight as her without letting off some steam somehow, right? I'll bet she wears an entire get-up under those old-maid dresses of hers."

"Ooh, maybe she's a dominatrix," Lottie suggested.

"A what?" Marlene echoed.

"Oh, you know, Marls," Mary preened; "Means she gets off by dominating men. Sadomasochism and all that. Maybe you and Remus should give it a go."

Marlene's jaw dropped open, horrified, and she looked to Remus, who just shook his head in desperation.

"Or maybe Ms. Pince just takes bubble baths at the end of a long day," Lily cut-in mercifully. "Really, you guys are insane."

Mary pushed her playfully. "We're nothing compared to Black, Lils. You should've heard him in history. He started talking about the Egyptians and how they used to—"

"I don't want to know." With a sigh, Lily looked up at James, who was walking next to her in guilty silence. He smiled, and she just took his arm, leaning her head on his shoulder.

As Mary and Lottie fell back into more scandalous chat, Marlene drifted back to walk alongside Remus. He almost wished she hadn't—the awkwardness was nearly palpable—but at least once they made it to the dining hall, the rest of their friends broke off on their own, leaving them in relative peace.

“I don’t know why everyone loses their minds after a health lesson, it’s just basic biology," Marlene tutted. "Completely natural—it’s existed the same way for thousands of years."

“The exact same?” Asked Remus.

“Well, I’m sure there’s been some variation, but I mean, what’s so funny about the word ‘penis’? If anything it sounds a bit ugly.”

“I’m so glad we’re about to eat dinner."

“Sorry.” Marlene continued down the dinner line, examining the canteen’s food tables while Remus carried both meal trays and meandered after her. “It really shouldn't be so embarrassing. You want gravy?” He nodded, and she spooned gravy onto both their Yorkshire puddings. “Does it not bother you then, Remus? The ‘sex’ stuff?”

“Haven’t given it much thought.”

“Really?”

Remus raised an eyebrow. “Do you want the truth, Cherry, or should we just eat?”

Marlene shook her head and dropped several sausages onto their trays with a pair of tongs. “Okay, sassy-pants. You get the silverware, I’ll get the drinks."

He nodded and left her at the end of the canteen line, crossing the dining hall to scoop a few napkins and two sets of utensils onto their trays. As he did, he noticed Chastity and Sirius sitting a few tables down. Reaching across the table, Chastity spoon-fed Sirius a bite and he stole her fork before holding it out of her reach and making her come around to his side to get it back. She slid onto the bench beside him and they kissed for a bit, before Sirius noticed him watching and tried to flag him down.

"Ready?" Marlene asked, appearing at his side with two cups in hand.

"Yeah," he mumbled, flashing a weak wave in Sirius' direction before following Marlene out of the dining hall. Trays in hand, they made their way one building over, to their secret spot on the second floor of the Flamel Block. It'd become a habit of theirs to sit at the window and eat, and they always did so while reading or else talking about their day. Today though, Marlene did not bring a book, nor did she seem very talkative. Instead they sat together, staring out their window as the late-winter sun dipped down over the trees.

"We could you know," Marlene said eventually. "I mean, just to get it over with. It doesn't have to be a big deal."

Remus didn't have to ask what she meant. "Wasn't it a big deal to you before?"

Marlene puckered a bit. "I'm not a little kid."

"I wasn't saying that."

"I know." She sighed, biting down on her fork. "It's just, I do like you, Remus. I do."

"I like you, too."

"And I would rather it be you than anyone else."

Remus pressed his lips together. "I've never done anything either," he confessed. This seemed to be the correct thing to say, because Marlene nodded earnestly.

"So we'd be each other's firsts then?"

He nearly winced—how did people just talk about this stuff?—but

Marlene was staring at him expectantly, and Remus didn't want to seem lame.

“Alright," he swallowed. "We’ll just do it then.”

“Okay," Marlene agreed. "I mean, the first time should be a little—you know—but all first times are, right? At least this way we could stop worrying about it. I’d rather get it over with and move on.”

“Yeah… get it over with.”

“Brilliant. It’ll have to be when the others are…”

“Yup.”

She reddened slightly. “Wednesdays the girls are always busy after dinner. Lily’s got prefect stuff and Lottie took up dance as her spare this term so she’s got practice. Plus Mary’s already got a date.”

"She has a date every Wednesday?"

Marlene's blush deepened. "Normally I'm the one who has to the leave. Why do you reckon we're here right now? Mary called dibs on the room after dinner."

Suddenly wishing he hadn't asked, Remus scratched his head. “So, I’ll just come over Wednesday then?”

“Yeah… Is this weird—planning it?”

“I don’t know,” he confessed. “Does it feel weird?”

“A bit.”

“Well… we don’t have to tell anybody.”

“That’s right!” She straightened up. “It’s just for us anyway. And everyone does it, right?”

“Er… yeah.”

Marlene nodded. “Brilliant, then.”

* * *

To their credit, they did not fold under sheer nerves. The air felt awkward, and without even realising it they'd spent the days before avoiding being alone together, probably because that would mean having to talk about it. Remus had half-expected Marlene to show up at any given moment and tell him that she'd changed her mind, but as always her will was resolute, and come Wednesday evening he told all his friends they were studying and that he'd see them later. On his way out he'd secretly raided the small trove of condoms Sirius had piled into their bathroom cabinet as a joke. He wasn't sure how many to take so he ended up stuffing a handful in his back pocket and shooting out of the room as though he'd just lifted from a corner shop.

When he got to the girls' room Remus found Marlene waiting for him in a pretty skirt she'd borrowed from Lily. She'd even put on some make-up, which he nearly said she didn't need before realising that that was probably not the smartest move. He called her pretty instead, and Marlene seemed pleased. There were candles lit that left the entire room smelling of vanilla and also made Remus' nose itch, but it went away when Marlene broke out a small bottle of rum, which they downed to calm their frenzied nerves. Remus kissed her first, because that was what he thought he should do, and thankfully Marlene followed his lead, curling into him on her Rowena-blue covers with slow and anxious fingers.

The beginning bit was really what took some finessing. He'd never seen a bra before—at least not one being worn—and the little hooks were really the bitches Lee was always saying they were. Up until that moment the most he'd ever felt of Marlene was her hands, neck, and face, and it surprised him how soft she was all over. But that was just girls. It was exciting—of course it was exciting—even if Remus spent the entire time feeling like his head was in an oven. When they finally started ridding themselves of the rest of their clothes, he pulled his shirt over his head and Marlene eyed the necklace Sirius had given him, thumbing it lightly before kissing him again. She was good at not dwelling on the awkward, at least, and eventually they got the motions down.

Sometime during the middle of it all, Marlene tapped him on the back lightly; "Um, Remus?"

He froze. "Are you okay? I'm not hurting you, am I?"

"I'm fine, but you're leaning on my hair."

"Oh, sorry!"

Afterwards they sort of just laid there, staring up at the top of Marlene's four-poster. He didn't think either of them had been good at it—really 'it' was just a jumble of sweaty limbs that'd only lasted for about fifteen minutes from start to finish—but the whole thing still made his heart race in an umcomfortable sort of way. Remus kept waiting for the feeling to disappate, but when it didn't he just accepted that that was how things went your first time. It felt easier.

"Well…" Marlene said finally; "that was…"

"Sweaty," Remus finished.

She laughed—thank god—and took his hand, bringing it up to her mouth. "I'm sure next time'll be better, right?" She whispered, lips just barely grazing his knuckles.

"Yeah. Next time."

And so Remus dressed, kissed his girlfriend goodbye, and made the trek home. His stomach still felt funny, and the entire way all he could think of was how badly he wanted to talk to Tomny, but when he made it back to Godric and dialled the flat, there was no answer. Frustrated, Remus slammed the receiver down on the machine, and turned for the stairs. It made him bitter to be ignored; enough so that he didn't even notice he wasn't alone when he walked into his own dorm room. It took until someone deliberately cleared their throat for him to whirl around, where he got an eye-full of Chastity's bare back as she straddled a half-naked Sirius over the covers.

"Augh—!" Remus covered his eyes; "You've got to be fucking kidding me!"

Chastity let out a girlish shriek and fell off of Sirius, sliding under the covers to preserve her modesty.

"Oh hey, Moony," Sirius said, slightly out of breath as he sat up in bed. Peeking through his fingers, Remus was relieved to find he still had pants on, though Chastity had the covers up to her chin. "Potter told me you'd be out today. Said McKinnon needed help with biology, yeah?"

"Marlene helps me with my biology homework," Remus said before he could stop himself.

"Well, I didn't actually mean 'homework', you dimbo," Sirius said cheekily, making Chastity giggle. "But don't worry, it's a natural progression after health class. Even Evans has seemed more frisky lately."

"I'm leaving," Remus said quickly, reaching for the door.

"C'mon, don't be too angry, I'm pretty sure she and Potter got stuck with the sports equipment room."

"Leaving!"

"Can you at least bring a light when you come back?" Sirius called after him. "Can't find mine!"

He escaped down to the common room, where everyone else was mercifully going about the rest of their evening in complete and utter normalcy. After his heart had stopped hammering—he'd already given up on trying to eject the image of Sirius and Chasity in bed together from his mind—Remus pulled a random book from the common room's shelves and slumped down on one of the empty couches. Did it bother him that Sirius and Chastity had been dating for less than a week and already she'd seen his scars, while Sirius had felt the need to hide them from him for over a year? Probably. But that was normal, right? It was normal to be worried about his friend and also annoyed with him when he invited girls back to their room without saying anything.

So why was it Remus couldn't bring himself to concentrate long enough to read more than a page in his book?

It was agony, actually, just trying, and eventually he gave up entirely, leaving the book open over his face as he slouched back on one of the common room sofas. He was almost asleep when he felt a nudge on the bottom of his foot. Lifting the book, Remus found Sirius standing at the end of the settee, smiling shyly.

"You can come up now," he said. "Chas's gone home."

"You sure? Might want to air out the room first."

Sirius snorted and stepped up, snatching up the book and tossing it aside. "Come upstairs with me. I've got the stereo going, and there's weed and tea. We can snuggle too, if that's still not enough."

"You know," Remus started, sitting up, "you think you're so bold, but really you're just foul."

Sirius' eyes glittered. “Am I?”

”Yeah, you are. And I'm getting real sick of your shit.”

“Aw, Moony,” he grinned, “you're so cute when you lie. Now c'mon, tea's getting cold."

Taking a moment to lean down and pat him on the thigh, Sirius turned and strolled away with his hands in his pockets. Conflicted by his anger and the desire to follow him, Remus paused long enough to watch him go. His mouth had suddenly gone dry, and his heart was racing again as though he were back in Marlene's bedroom. But he wasn't in Marlene's bedroom at all, and as Sirius stopped in the common room's doorway to beckon him forward with another one of his cheeky smiles, Remus began to feel nervous all over again.

Chapter End Notes

A jacket potato is like a baked potato.
Idk if it's necessary to add, but 'outstanding work' just means overdue homework.
'Up the duff' is slang for pregnant.

Sommmmmme people might disagree with me, but I believe in stories like this that it's really important that Remus and Sirius find love and intimacy outside of one another too. In my experience, couples who've only ever had each other lack that quintessential portion of comparison when it comes to physical and emotional issues. If you've only ever been with one person (at whatever capacity), who do you have to compare yourselves to when things go awry? How do you know when things HAVE gone awry?
Anyway, that's just my explanation for this chapter. I hope you can see the tension I'm trying to build here, hehe. 'Til next time, loves! <3

Chapter 52: Mondegreen

Chapter Summary

Sirius asks for a surprising favour.

Chapter Notes

CW: Smoking.

A sort of continuation from last chapter; picks up a few days later.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I was in a trance,
When I kissed the teacher;
Suddenly I took the chance,
When I kissed the teacher;

Leaning over me,
He was trying to explain the laws of geometry;
And I couldn't help it,
I just had to kiss the teacher!

- "When I Kissed the Teacher" ABBA, 1976

Friday 25th February 1977

Remus was astounded. Not once had Marlene ever hated a book he'd recommended. Maybe she wasn't in love with all of them, but never had she flat-out refused to finish a book she'd already started.

"But the ending is the best part!" He pleaded, gesturing wildly to Carrie's cover, tattered from the amount of times he'd read it and re-read it. Tonya had opened a door for him over Christmas, introducing him to the gruesome genre he had no hope of satisfying among Hawkings' bland library pickings.

Marlene just turned her nose up. "The opening was traumatic. I felt so bad for the poor girl!"

Remus winced. "I know—but she gets revenge!"

"Doesn't her own mother try to kill her?"

“Yeah, but she kills her first.”

“How is that any better? It’s just miserable.”

“It’s horror.”

“Oh yeah, hor—ri—ble!”

Half-smiling, Remus shook his head with a tired sigh. “You’re killing me here, Cherry.”

“Better me than Carrie.”

Marlene tossed the book back across the outdoor picnic table and Remus caught it in the gut, letting out a long sigh. At least they were outside. The weather hadn't been so nice in weeks, and he was more than done with winter.

"Ah, finally! Someone else you can torture with chat of homicidal teenagers," Marlene said out of the blue. Perking up, Remus looked around and spotted Sirius just as he slid in next to him on the bench.

“Hey-up," Sirius smiled. "What are you two up to? Are you skiving off together? I'm not interrupting a snog-sesh, am I?” Sirius leaned into Remus, lips puckered, and Remus quickly pushed him away by the face.

"We're just having lunch, you lunatic."

“And we’re talking about Remus’ terrible new favourite book,” Marlene finished.

“It’s not terrible,” Remus insisted.

“Sorry, terribly gruesome.”

“It’s actually written really well. You might find it interesting if you actually gave it a chance.”

“Oh, I will. Just as soon as you read a book about the horrors of male puberty.”

“I have," he snarked. " ‘Lord of the Flies’ was a great read.”

Marlene scoffed at him while Sirius reached over, taking the book and turning over the cover. “ ‘Carrie’? Is it anything like ‘Emma’? How about ‘Heidi’?”

“It’s a horror novel,” Remus told him.

“Oh? So that’s what she’s contending with, then—the terrors of puberty...?”

“And also telepathy and mass-murder.”

“Sounds romantic,” Sirius said. "Maybe I should give it a go?"

Remus smiled, trying not to appear too pleased. "If you'd like. They actually just released it as a film last year.”

“And that’s my cue,” Marlene said, grabbing her bag and standing up from the table. “I’ll see you at dinner.” She reached across to give Remus' hand a little squeeze before turning and leaving them alone under the oak trees. Remus watched her go, keenly aware of how little they’d touched one another since that day in her room. He thought he should’ve been more disgruntled, but the bit of distance was somehow comforting. He’d grown weary of always being on hyper-alert around Marlene and questioning if he should be sitting closer or holding her hand or kissing her on the cheek or the lips.

“You two totally bunked up,” Sirius said plainly. Remus shot upright on the bench and whirled on him.

“What? Who told you?!”

"You did, just now," Sirius said, passing the book back. Remus took it, grumbling under his breath, but Sirius never missed a beat. He simply started twirling a lock of hair between his fingers. “And there were like half a dozen condoms missing from the bathroom. Seems a bit tenacious but I admire your ambition.”

Remus scowled and Sirius dropped the piece of hair, looking sly. “Haven’t seen you two kiss much recently, does that mean the whole thing went badly?”

“No,” Remus lashed, “it went fine, thank you. Don’t you have any other relationships to worry about—like your own, maybe?”

“That’s what I wanted to talk to you about actually.”

Remus’ eyes widened. “Oh? You breaking up with Chastity then?”

“No. Way to jump the gun,” Sirius scoffed, looking up at him with a funny expression. “She's just been bugging me over something for a little while.”

"What's so bad about that? You bug me all the time," Remus said, opting to hide his embarrassment with a jab. Again, Sirius took it in stride and leaned his head against one hand, looking up as though he were a cat and Remus was his favourite ball of yarn.

“She wants to get to know my friends better,” He explained. “So we can all—you know—get along and stuff.”

“She does?” Remus found it hard to believe Chastity cared all that much about getting along with anyone.

“Yeah," Sirius nodded. "And so Chas mentioned this idea of like, a double-date or something."

"A double-date?"

"It's a thing—they do it on the telly programs all the time."

“Uh-uh. Well, have you asked James?”

“Oh, you know Prongs," Sirius dismissed immediately; "always busy with this or that. Evans is even worse.”

Yes well, Remus imagined asking Lily to hang out with Chastity outside of class or prefect duties would’ve gone over like a ton of bricks anyway.

At his silence, Sirius leaned in. “We could do it tomorrow—just you and me, Chas and McKinnon.”

“Marlene and I are supposed to study tomorrow.”

“Well, that works. Call it a study date then.”

“You, Sirius Black? On a date with actual books, and actual studying?”

“Yes, numpty, I can concentrate when I feel the need,” Sirius snorted. “So whaddya say?”

Remus rubbed his neck, feeling a chill in the late winter air. “I dunno, Marlene’s sorta…”

“She’s a big girl,” Sirius supplied. “C’mon, it’ll be fun. And we haven’t studied together in so long.”

“Okay,” Remus caved almost immediately. “But not in the dorm—we'll never get anything done. We’re studying in one of the library rooms.”

“Oh… Now I see why you were so reluctant. Wanted some privacy, did ya?”

“No! God, I already said you could come, idiot.”

Sirius grinned. “Brilliant. Can’t wait to be taught by Professor Lupin.”

“Keep it up and I’ll fail you,” Remus said, gathering his things. Sirius popped up next to him, biting his lip, and snagged his copy of Carrie from the picnic table again.

“Mind if I borrow this?” He asked.

Remus felt a warm feeling rise in his chest. “No, go ahead. It’s really thrilling.”

“Tell me about it on the walk back to class?” Sirius turned to go, looking handsome in the early-afternoon sun, and Remus hurried after him.

“Okay, so I won’t spoil it but there’s this girl Carrie, and she’s being bullied in school but she finds out she has these crazy psychic powers and…”

* * *

Saturday 26th February 1977

Giving Marlene a decent head’s up about the double-study-date probably would’ve been the safe thing to do, but as they made their way toward the library that Saturday morning, Remus found himself growing more and more reluctant to fess up. Maybe Sirius and Chastity could stumble by and just casually join them, as if the whole thing was some big coincidence. He might’ve felt better about that plan, had he not also been troubled over another matter. Remus had tried ringing the flat again before he’d left Godric and still nothing. Just an empty dial tone and a crackling message box. Marlene was at least good to talk about it with, she always kept a level head about these things.

“It sounds like they’re just busy, Remus,” she reasoned, as they made their way into the private library study room and flicked on the lights. “You said they work a lot, right? Well, my dad says things haven’t been going well for a lot of businesses lately. Lots of lay-offs and trouble with the unions. What if they’re just worried about losing their jobs?”

“Yeah, maybe that’s it,” he said, though he doubted lay-offs would mean bad business. If anything, the more down-and-out the general population seemed to be, the easier it was to siphon drugs and other narcotics around the streets. People had to curb their depression and hopelessness somehow.

Marlene began spreading her school things out on the table. “Don't be too worried. I'm sure they're fine."

"Yeah. You're probably right..."

She smiled at him kindly before plopping down in her seat. "Right, so I figured we could cover the geography stuff first, and then those short answer questions for modern languages, and afterwards we could maybe read over each other’s essays? I promise not to nitpick your punctuation again but—”

“Sirius and Chastity are gonna study with us,” Remus confessed suddenly. Hearing Marlene list off their itinerary had apparently ignited that crucial bit of honesty within him, but it only left her open-mouthed and put-out.

“Why?”

“Apparently Chastity wants to… get to know us. She suggested to Sirius that we should double-date, and I told him we were studying today so…”

Marlene threw her arms up. “So nothing’s going to get done then. Brilliant.”

“We can still study,” he promised.

“With those two in the room? We’re as likely to get all our work done as being hit by an asteroid.”

“Well technically an asteroid is only an asteroid as long as it’s orbiting the sun. If it hits the earth it becomes a meteor.”

“Glad to see you paid attention during the space unit at least,” Marlene quipped. “Remind me to name a star after you someday. I’ll call it, ‘the most gullible boyfriend under the sun’.”

“The name might not fit on the certificate.”

“Oh sit down, you twat.”

He did so, and a few minutes later Sirius and Chastity appeared in the doorway, Sirius looking distinctly chipper, with Chastity clutched tightly onto his arm, more sceptical.

“Hi ya!” Sirius said, shutting the door and sitting down across from them.

“Hey,” Remus said, while Marlene answered with an apathetic; “Morning.”

“Moony you’ll never guess what James told me earlier,” Sirius started as he threw himself down into the chair; “One of the blokes on the team told him that a few ninth year kids heard about the church-weed thing, and they snuck in and nabbed a shit-ton of incense and were caught trying to smoke it behind their dorm.”

Remus split into a laugh. “Incense? You can’t get high off of that crap, I’m pretty sure it’s just perfume and sage.”

“Apparently no one told them that—they thought we actually put the weed in it!”

“Maybe Sheila’s right, it would’ve been a waste—” Remus paused his snickering as Marlene touched his arm, looking at him pointedly. “Oh,” he swallowed, “right, well, we were gonna start with geography, since Durrin assigned that workbook.”

“You mean we’re actually doing homework?” Chastity asked. She hadn’t so much as pulled out a pencil and had only been examining her nails.

“What else?” Marlene said. “You asked to study with us.”

“I asked?” Chastity echoed, and Sirius immediately put an arm around her.

“It’s okay, we can do some homework now and when it’s finished, something fun. Right, Moony?”

“Er—yeah, ‘course.”

Chastity huffed daintily. “Fine. But I don’t take geography so I’ll just wait for you to finish.”

“You didn’t bring anything?” Marlene raised a brow.

“No, I didn’t think we’d actually be studying on a Saturday, to be honest.”

Marlene looked at Remus, who looked at Sirius, who just looked happy.

“Here, Chas,” Remus said, passing along the rubric for their foreign language homework, “you take languages right?”

“Oh, yeah,” she said, “cheers.”

It at least took care of Chastity. Remus already knew ahead of time, but like with most things, Sirius was a chatty studier and it instantly clashed with Marlene’s preferred method of stringent silence. Not even one page into the workbook, Sirius looked up and began peppering them with questions on this or that. Remus did his best to field most of them while Marlene turned away like a dog with its hackles raised.

“How’d you do the diagram, Moony?” Sirius asked, standing up to get a view of his work from the other side of the table.

“Like this.” Remus turned his workbook around to show him, and Sirius squinted at it before scoffing.

“Can’t see. Hold on, I’ll come to you.” He grabbed his own book and stood up, coming around to the other side of the table and pulling his chair directly up next to Remus’, peering down over his shoulder at his poorly drawn diagram of the hydrological cycle. “Oh I see, that makes perfect sense. But why did you draw a little Christmas elf in the middle of your page?”

“It’s supposed to be a guy holding a shovel,” Remus said, slightly red-faced.

“Oh. Thought it was a hat.”

“It’s still a library you know,” Marlene muttered, and Sirius looked up at Remus, wiggling his eyebrows. They set back to work, elbows resting against one another’s, before Chastity leaned back in her chair with a heavy sigh.

“This is stupid. It’s the first beautiful day we’ve had all term and here we are shut up inside like a band of recluses.”

“You could go,” Marlene said. Chastity smiled and rolled her eyes at her like she was a hopeless dandy. Then she also got up, only she went to Marlene’s side and immediately grabbed her hand, lifting it to examine her nails.

“Oh my—Marlene, do you bite your fingernails?”

Marlene ripped her hand away, red-faced herself. “Don’t!”

“I bet you’d have really beautiful nail beds if you stopped.”

“Just mind your own nail beds!”

Chastity flipped her hair back and lifted one of Marlene’s pale braids next. “You have nice hair too. Don’t you ever think of doing anything with it? I see it’s a little thin around the top but enough mousse and no one’ll notice.”

Marlene snatched her braid back and snapped at her; “Do you always have to be so pushy?”

“I’m not pushy,” Chastity retorted; “I’m just trying to give you some pointers.”

“Who asked?”

“I bet Remus would appreciate it if you took a little more pride in your appearance, wouldn’t you, Remus?”

Remus balked; “Er… I think Marlene looks fine.”

“Well ‘fine’ never won any awards.”

“Why’d you even come today?” Marlene demanded. Her face had gone extremely red now, and she leaned away from Chastity as though she were afraid her callousness was contagious.

“You asked us to," Chastity answered scornfully.

“No, we didn’t! Remus and I would have twice as much work done already if we weren’t catering to you.”

Chastity scoffed and put up a hand. “God, this is why I hate you people. It’s all about school and marks—you think you’re so much better than everyone else because you’d rather be enslaved by homework than do something even moderately cool or fun.”

“You’re such a cow!”

“Wow, creative much? I think that might’ve hurt my grandmother’s feelings.”

“Okay,” Remus said, putting a hand on Marlene’s shoulder. “I think we should just stop and reevaluate for a second.”

Marlene just shook him off. “We do plenty of cool things, for your information.”

“Like what?” Chastity drawled.

“Well—we don’t have to explain ourselves to you!"

“Aw, is the swot running out of steam?”

“Just admit you can’t do the homework then,” Marlene snarled. “It’s too hard for you so you pretend like it’s uncool rather than ask for help from some ‘swot’.”

“You calling me stupid?”

“If the high-heel fits.”

“Fine,” Chastity growled, “but you have to admit to rejecting beauty only because you think it’s unattainable! You’re just afraid that if you try acting like a girl for once, you’ll fail at it and everyone’ll make fun of you! You’re just as fragile as the rest of us, princess. Don’t pretend.”

“Ooh, I knew we shouldn’t have let you come!” Marlene barked.

“As if I ever wanted to!” Chastity lashed back.

Half afraid that Chastity was going to end up with a broken nose or Marlene was going to lose an eye to one of her perfect fingernails, Remus stood and pulled his girlfriend’s chair backward. Marlene jumped up immediately, but Sirius came between them, hands up.

“Woah, woah, I don’t think I like this ‘cat-fight’ thing as much as I thought I would, so how ‘bout we just calm down, yeah?”

Marlene thrust a finger in Sirius' face, making his eyes bulge. "Next time your girlfriend has the bright idea of a double-date, read the audience first, Black!"

"For the last time, this was not my bloody idea!" Chastity snapped, standing up behind Sirius and grabbing his arm. "And I'll have to be out of my mind to ever hang around you people again! Sirius, let's go, we're leaving."

Chastity tugged him back sharply, and Sirius deflated before looking to Remus. "Moony...?"

Remus shifted uncomfortably while Marlene spun away and tossed her hands in the air. "Maybe you should just… you know, go…" He said.

Sirius frowned and Chastity shoved his bag and jacket into his arms, before taking his hand and throwing the study room door open.

"O-okay, see you guys later?" Sirius tried.

He waved lightly in answer and Sirius finally shut the door. Sorry to see him go, Remus dropped his hand to awkwardly rub the back of his head. "Well, that was…"

"The worst," Marlene huffed; "Absolutely fucking horrific."

"I was gonna say—"

"That it was awful? Horrendous? Harrowing?!"

Remus cracked a faint smile. "Well, I did learn one thing from this study session at least."

"And what was that?"

"That you're definitely scarier than Carrie when you're angry."

"… Not funny."

"… It's a little funny."

Marlene sighed again and leaned her forehead against his shoulder. "I just can't handle people like her."

"Me neither."

She was quiet for a moment. "Do you think I don't look like a girl?"

“Marlene, as someone who has seen you with your clothes off, I assure you, you’re no bloke.”

Marlene pulled back sharply and punched him in the shoulder. “Cheeky git,” she grinned. Remus matched it for a moment, before dragging her chair back to the table.

“Do you want to try and get some of this work done? For real this time.”

She nodded and they sat down together, drawn close to putter over each other’s notes as they always did. Despite the girls’ nasty row, it didn’t take them long to find their groove again, but the entire time Remus held Chastity’s words in the back of his mind.

When they finally broke for the afternoon, he walked back to his dorm to find Sirius lying upside down on his bed. He had Remus’ teashades on, with a spliff between his lips. The stereo was going—T. Rex to match his mopey mood—but he turned it down when Remus walked in.

“Wanna smoke?” Sirius asked, offering the half-finished joint. Glancing at it, Remus dropped his bag by his bed and walked over, before sitting down on the floor next to James’ bed and accepting the weed. He took a long draw, exhaling and resting his head back against James’ maroon bed covers.

“Why’d you say the study-date was Chastity’s idea?”

Sirius visibly winced, like he was hoping Remus would avoid the jugular for more than thirty seconds. “Dunno,” he muttered lightly, eyes hidden behind the sunglasses.

“Did you want them to fight?”

“No! I just, dunno… Wasn’t thinking, I guess.”

Remus examined the joint. “Liar.”

Sirius huffed and turned over onto his front, lifting the shades up onto his head. “So what do you want me to say?”

“How ‘bout the truth?”

“The truth?” He echoed. “The truth was, was that you’re spending all of your damn time studying and reading, and reading and studying—and it's always with your bloody girlfriend!"

Remus was partly stunned. "That's what you're supposed to do with a girlfriend, innit?"

"No—well, yeah—but not all the time! Not so much that you forget your friends!"

"I haven't forgotten anyone!"

"James and Pete have noticed it too. You know, they wanted to tell you that story with the incense themselves, but you were nowhere to be found."

"I was just eating breakfast with—"

"With Marlene!"

Remus ground his teeth together, feeling heat spark in his cheeks. Had he really been avoiding his friends? No, not consciously of course, but between the need to beat Sirius in school and prove to himself that he was good enough to have a girlfriend it'd just been easier to play pretend-study with Marlene. They were so alike, but had enough differences to keep it interesting. Just like him and Sirius, he supposed.

Seemingly irritated by his silence, Sirius sat up and reached across the gap, plucking the joint from his fingers. Remus watched as he inhaled, those sharp cheekbones turning concave before he blew the smoke out the corner of his mouth and reached up and behind himself to tap the ash out into an ashtray he'd left on top of the stereo.

"Why didn't you just tell me all this?" Remus asked.

Sirius thumbed the joint's paper filter. "I don't know. Felt weird."

"It isn't."

Sirius glanced at him, eyes scanning him from head to toe. "It isn't...?"

"No. I didn't mean to ignore you, Sirius."

"I know." Sirius dropped the teashades down over his eyes and took a drag. "Don't flatter yourself—you're incapable of ignoring me on purpose."

He could've shot back a witty retort, he always had one, but instead

Remus just smiled, because Sirius was right. “Next time you want to hang out, just tell me.”

Sirius lifted the shades again; “Yeah?”

“Yeah.”

“Okay, I want to hang out.”

Remus blinked. “Like… right now?”

“Yeah!”

“O-okay. What do you want to do?”

Sirius stopped, like he hadn’t considered getting this far. Finally he flopped back onto his stomach and held his hands out, waving them as he spoke; “You know that book thing with McKinnon that you're always doing?”

It took Remus a moment to understand; he'd forgotten he'd told Sirius about it. “The chapter-reading thing?”

“Yeah! I want to do that.”

“Oh, you’d probably just find it boring though.”

“No, I want to, really!”

“Okay… got a book?”

Sirius grinned and held Carrie aloft. “I’ve already read the first few chapters. It’s… interesting.”

Remus smiled and stood, crossing to his side of the room to pick up a book of his own from the ever-growing pile next to his bed. “You’re going to have to apologise to Marlene, too, by the way.”

Sirius slid down onto the floor and stretched his legs out. “Yeah, I know. Chas was a bit out of line.”

“A bit? Anyway, it’s not just that. Pince overheard the two of them arguing. We’re banned from using the study rooms for a month.”

“Aw, fuck. Reckon she’s likely to beat me now.”

“You do sort of deserve it.” Remus dropped down across from him, placing his legs just on the outside of Sirius'.

"So, what now?" Sirius asked, smacking his book on the ground lightly.

"Well, we read a chapter and then summarise it in twenty words or less, and then we trade and read the next chapter."

"Doesn't that get confusing?"

"You get the hang of it. It's really only something Marlene and I do for fun."

Sirius smirked. "Swot."

"Git."

They matched grins and each opened their books. It only took about ten pages for Remus to come to the conclusion that the book he'd picked, which had seemed a promising horror story, turned out to be a mere mash-up of cheap clichés and the odd sexual taboo or two, but he didn't get much further than that anyway. Two minutes in Sirius had begun to bob his leg incessantly, and Remus ended up staring at it more often than he did the page.

"Are you done yet?" Sirius asked eventually.

"You've finished the chapter already?"

"No, but… 'Pops' is showing a rerun tonight. Supposed to be Jethro Tull, 10cc, and Smokie."

Remus squinted at him, before shutting his book. "Okay, go on then."

"Yes!" Sirius jumped up, setting the book aside and gently tapping out the second spliff they'd lit before grabbing his jumper. "Say," he chirped, just as Remus got his boots on, "so long as we're being honest, I have got this other question."

"Shoot."

"Why is it McKinnon's always calling you 'Rem'? I just mean, what's that about?"

Remus stood up and shrugged innocently. "It's a sports thing, I think. Like how the guys sometimes call James 'Pot'?"

“It’s weird.”

“That’s rich, coming from the guy who came up with ‘Moony’, ‘Wormtail’, and ‘Prongs’.”

Sirius threw the door open and clicked his tongue. “Aw, it’s cute of you to pretend you don’t totally love it. Now c’mon, I’ve been missing you and we’re not going to waste this evening by sitting together in utter fucking silence.”

“Heaven forbid.”

Chapter End Notes

> Short, innocent little chapter, mostly because I've been so busy! Hope you guys still liked it, and happy Halloween. I think it's actually so fitting that Remus is a horror fan, even if I'm a big wuss myself, hehe.
>
> In case you were unaware, a 'mondegreen' is a misunderstood or misinterpreted word or phrase resulting from mishearing of the lyrics of a song. Felt fitting somehow, since Remus and Sirius keep misunderstanding one another. (Things change soon though, I swear it!)
> Next chapter's gonna rock some socks, but the one after that is... hmm :) <3

Chapter 53: People's Parties

Chapter Summary

March passes. Remus' comfort comes with a surprising confession.

Chapter Notes

CW: Allusions to child abuse, mostly manipulation and neglect. Smoking and drinking.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

On the dry and dusty road,
The nights we spend apart alone;
I need to get back home to cool, cool rain,
I can't sleep, and I lay, and I think;
The night is hot and black as ink,
Woo, oh God, I need a drink of cool, cool, rain…

- "Love Reign O'er Me" The Who, 1973

March 1977

Remus knew his friends meant well, but his birthday had never really been of much interest to him. In fact, he loathed it. The whole thing made his stomach twist with uneasy memories and having to pretend that he was having an even-moderately good time was exhausting. The year before the girls had all but tricked him into having a party, but even then it was more about James and Lily getting over their spat. And seeing as how the pair were only more in love than ever, a sudden break up seemed unlikely.

Stubbornly, Remus had already flat-out refused to let Sirius use his birthday as an excuse to throw a party in the common room, which he acquiesced to—bitterly—perhaps only because James' seventeenth was a few weeks away and on a weekend anyway. It was a small mercy, and afterwards even the girls gave up pestering him. Suddenly all talk of his birthday became null. Remus could hardly believe it—they were actually listening to him.

Ha, complete bullshit. Sure, Remus didn't want to hear about any chatter over his birthday, so what did his namby, over-achieving friends do? They planned a surprise party of course.

Now, with surprise parties, the ‘surprise’ bit tended to be crucial; but none of his friends were known for being particularly proficient at lying, and they all talked too much anyway. The real shock came when Lily was the first one to give up the ghost. Her agenda had mysteriously disappeared (it turned up later in James’ bag) and she was scrambling to remember her meticulously planned school week on a piece of scrap paper.

“When did we say we were going to compare history essays again?” She asked, her face flushed with worry.

“Wednesday night?” Remus supplied.

"Uh-uh, I've prefect stuff!"

"Thursday?"

“No, that’s the night of your party!”

Lily had immediately shot upright and Remus sighed, already tired. “Party?”

“Oh, don’t tell anyone I told you!" She moaned. "It was supposed to be a surprise.”

“I thought we agreed no parties.”

“It’s just a small one! We were gonna do it in your guys’ room. We have to do something, Remus, it’s your birthday!”

He was irritated, but Lily just batted those big green eyes of hers and he caved. “Fine, but I’m not going to pretend to be surprised or anything.”

Lily had to accept that, but her accidental confession got the gears turning in his head. If it was that easy to get Lily Evans to fess up, how would his other friends fare?

Peter and Lottie were easy of course. Neither of the twins could keep a secret to save their life, but James had been slightly tougher. He’d finally broken when Remus turned the tables, making it sound as though he was sad his friends were willing to forget his birthday all together.

“Yeah, I dunno. I guess I’m just a little bummed, but my birthday is on a Thursday and we're all so busy, so I get it."

"No, Moony!" James tried. "I swear we haven't forgotten!"

"Oh I know, it's just…" he sighed, "but it's okay, we'll do something real grand for your birthday."

"We're doing something for yours too!"

"Oh… really?"

"Yeah! It was supposed to be a surprise, I swear!"

"A surprise?"

"Mhm! So you don't have to… worry…" James stopped, because he'd noticed the evil grin on Remus' face. "You dick," he hissed immediately. "Who told you?"

"You did, just now."

James put his head in his hands. "Don't tell Lily," he mumbled.

And he didn't, because it was so funny that they all thought they'd spilled the beans on their own. The last one he managed to get to fess up was Mary, who did so with little effort on his behalf, as she was too busy defending her favourite pop group to notice.

"There's an ABBA song for everything," she'd declared.

"Even funerals?" Remus had sassed.

"Sure. Send off your grandma with 'Hasta Mañana' and I guarantee there won't be a dry eye in the room."

"And yet I remain unconvinced."

"Fine, I'll just have to prove it to you tomorrow."

"Hmm, can't. I'm busy tomorrow actually."

"No you're not, you'll be with us celebrating your—fuck."

It was funny, but the only ones who refused to crack were Sirius and Marlene. They'd been considerably good at dancing around the subject of his birthday, even when he got weepy over it like he had with James. Remus was fully prepared to call them on their icy hearts, only he hadn't planned for the significant derailment. If he had, things would've gone a lot differently.

On the morning of his seventeenth birthday Remus woke up to a friendly dog-pile and a delicious breakfast organised by James and his favourite lunch lady. He was sung to, congratulated, and then afterwards, guided around by an unsuspecting Marlene.

"I still don't see why I can't go back to my room and get my other coat," he pushed cheekily. "It's freezing out here."

"Here, you can have mine," she offered quickly, shrugging off her oversized leather jacket and draping it around his shoulders. She did her best not to look chilly without it, but they were on a walk around the lake to undoubtedly kill time and it was already getting dark.

"I know, you know," Remus said, taking off the jacket and passing it back. Marlene took it, her mouth dropping open into a sour 'o'.

"How—who told you?"

"All of them," he smirked. " 'Cept Sirius."

Marlene moaned and checked her watch. "Fine, whatever, it's about time we got back anyway."

"I promise to act surprised," he told her as they turned around.

"You'd better!" Marlene said, jabbing him in the arm with her finger. "I was counting on it being funny, Lily was going to snap a picture!"

"Well how's this?" He threw up his hands. " 'Oh my god, I had no idea —you guys really got me'!"

"Try for a little less sarcasm."

"Now you're just asking for the impossible."

They took the evening trolley back to the dorms, where Marlene stopped him, checking her watch once more. "Just do us a favour and hang out in the common room for a bit. Black's got detention and he wanted to be there when you came up, and considering he's the only one who didn't blow the gaff, I think he deserves to be in on it."

"Of course he does," Remus smiled. "It's fine, I was gonna make a call anyway."

She beamed. “To your friends back home? Say hi for me.”

“Kay.”

Stretching up onto her tiptoes, Marlene gave him a quick kiss on the cheek before escaping up the stairs to their dorm, shrugging off her jacket as she went. Remus watched her go before he crossed the hall to the phones, where he picked up the receiver and pounded the flat’s number. It’d been over two weeks since he’d heard from Tomny or Tonya, but today was his birthday, dammit! And he was determined to keep calling until someone bloody well picked up.

The phone rang once in his ear, then clicked on and Remus huffed, ready to give his friend a piece of his mind.

“Tom! Hey! Why you been ignoring—”

‘We’re sorry, the number you have reached is not in service, or is temporarily disconnected. The number you have reached is not in service at this time. This is a recording.’

Remus’ stomach dropped to the floor as the intercept message droned on in his ear.

‘If you feel you have reached this recording in error, please check the number and try your call again. Goodbye.'

The line clicked dead, and Remus faltered. It was a mistake, had to be —he’d just entered the number wrong. The number he’d had memorised ever since Tomny had given it to him. He'd just entered it too fast. That was it. He dialled again.

‘We’re sorry, the number you have reached is not—’

His hands were shaky that time. Again.

‘We’re sorry, the number—’

Again.

‘We’re sorry—’

“No!” Remus wailed, slamming his fist against the wall beside the phone. He couldn’t listen to the message anymore, so finally he set the receiver down, jaw clenched so tightly his teeth ached. There were plenty of reasons why the phone wasn’t working; maybe Tomny had forgotten to pay the bill—he did that sometimes with the gas or electric, but it hadn't happened since Tonya had come. Maybe they'd gotten drunk and busted the phone, or maybe they were having issues with the telephone company. There were so many unexciting, mundane reasons why he shouldn't be worrying, and yet, there were just as many horrible excuses to do just that. Problems with money, a fallout with Burrin, a break-in at the flat, a fight amongst themselves. All were just as probable as the mundane, but none scared him as much as the thought that they were all gone—that the flat was sitting empty or now had new tenants. That they'd said nothing and left him behind. That someone had...

Marlene would've told him he was jumping to conclusions—worrying himself for no reason, but at least she knew something about it—not a lot, but something. She and her family understood what it was like to live near the bottom. They'd struggled to make ends meet before, followed the politics that affected the little people. She'd understand. He just needed to talk to Marlene.

Practically running, Remus threw himself up the stairs to the fourth floor, arriving wide-eyed and out of breath. He only stopped—right before his bedroom door—when it occurred to him that six of his friends were just on the other side, waiting to shout and cheer and have a good time. He could hear the girls' laughter as ABBA seeped out from beneath the door like a poor joke;

'Knowing me, knowing you,
There is nothing we can do;
Knowing me, knowing you,
We just have to face it, this time we're through;
Breaking up is never easy, I know but I have to go,
Knowing me, knowing you,
It's the best I can do …'

Remus was instantly sobered. Mary was right; there was an ABBA song for everything.

"You gonna stand there all day or are you going in?" Sirius asked, a merry ring in his voice. Remus looked up to see him walking toward him, hands in his pockets and a happy smile on his face. "Did ya lose your key? I got mine right here, just say the word."

Deadly quiet, Remus stepped back from the door and marched down the hallway, blazing past Sirius and reaching the stairs in an instant.

"Woah," Sirius called; "Where are you going? We—there's something

__”

“I know about the party, and I’m not going in there,” Remus snapped, slamming to a halt on the top stair.

“A-Alright…” Sirius pulled his hands out of his pockets, “but you know we didn’t mean to upset you or anything.”

“You didn’t!”

“So you’re pissed off for no reason…?”

“No!” Remus grunted. He felt like he might explode if he stayed any longer. “I just can’t go in there.”

Sirius bit his lip. “Okay… What do you want to do?”

“I don’t know—go. I need to get out of here.”

“Well, do you mind if I come with you? You just… no one should be alone on their birthday, right?”

Remus was a little stunned, but he turned away sharply and took a few more stairs down. Finally he looked back. Sirius was still standing in the middle of the hall, rubbing the back of his neck sorely. “Well?” He demanded. “You coming or not?”

Eyes wide, Sirius sprung forward. Together they wordlessly continued down and out, marching across campus one behind the other. They walked aimlessly at first, Remus sharply changing directions every few minutes to keep his mind from wandering back to the flat. Sirius never questioned it, and didn’t speak either, which he was grateful for. Finally, Remus figured out where it was he wanted to be, and started toward the right building with long, purposeful strides. Sirius had no trouble keeping up.

When they made it to the astronomy building, Remus popped the lock. The cool air inside was a relief. He’d felt stifled in the dorm, but the openness of the night sky had made him feel as though he were going to drift right up into open space. He needed something to ground him, and the dark, wide space of the telescope hub did just that.

Sirius gawked up at the domed ceiling of the circular room. “Bloody hell, Moony, you’ve really scoped out every hiding spot on campus, haven’t you? I never saw this place on that map of yours.”

Partly ignoring him, Remus crossed the room to the far wall and collapsed against it. “Shut the door,” he said, and Sirius did so, leaving them in near-complete darkness apart from the faint glow of a single desk lamp spilling through the glass window of the research room next door. Remus withdrew the couple of spliffs he’d been keeping in his pocket for the party and lit one. A moment later Sirius came to join him against the wall and after a long drag, he passed the joint along.

“That’s a big telescope,” Sirius said, observing the ginormous device that took up most of the centre of the room. He held the spliff to his lips before speaking around it; “Maybe I should take astronomy next year.”

“Would’a thought you Blacks knew enough about stars,” Remus quipped. There was no humour behind it, but Sirius laughed anyway.

“You’re probably right. Every time I cracked a book to study I’d be reminded of some horrible second cousin or something.”

“As if you study.”

“Touché.” Sirius passed the joint back. “So do you want to talk about what’s got you so wound up?”

“No,” Remus answered, leaning his head back against the wall. “I just… want to be quiet for a bit.”

“Alright then.” Sirius leaned his chin on his hand and began bobbing one foot, but he was quiet.

“Tell me a story,” Remus said suddenly.

“Thought you wanted quiet? You’re being contradictory.”

“I’m a contradictory guy.”

Sirius sat up a bit. “Do you want to ask each other questions again?”

“No, I just want to hear you talk.”

“Okay,” Sirius breathed, taking a second to think. “Did I ever tell you about Gisela?”

“Who’s she, another girlfriend?”

Sirius chuckled. “No, she was mine and Reg’s governess when we were kids. She watched us before we went away for school and again whenever we came home for holiday. We adored her. She would always hide sweets under our pillows for when we woke up and sometimes in the summer they'd melt and just make this horrible mess but she still did it. And she used to let us use the maps in the drawing room as play mats and we'd make little army men out of sticks and bits of rubbish and argue over who took over what country. Mum hated it of course, but Gisela thought it was 'good for our development'. Made us resourceful or whatever."

"And what happened to her?"

"Dunno." Sirius pulled his knees up to his chest. "When I was about seven or eight she and the gardener disappeared."

"It's always the gardener."

"Yeah," Sirius chuckled. "And they took with them the twenty-thousand pounds they'd stolen from my father's safe."

Remus paused, joint halfway to his lips. "She robbed you?"

Sirius shrugged. "Didn't feel like she was robbing me. Dad maybe, but Dad's pockets always felt like black holes. I was smart but I didn't have any real concept of money."

"Wow. Just when you think you know someone…"

"Oh, I knew. I was the one who gave her the code."

Remus blinked. "Hold on, you helped her rob you?"

"Guess it was a big thing back then, but obviously it didn't put much of a dent in the Black family fortune. And I didn't care. I just wanted to make her happy." Pausing, Sirius bit his lip. "You know, I've never told anyone that…"

Sirius began scratching at the floor with his fingernails and Remus stared down at the joint, before offering it. "I used to go on these treasure hunts for my mum," he said quietly. "That's what she called 'em anyway."

Looking up, Sirius raised a brow and took the spliff. "Treasure hunts? What sort of treasure?"

"Not the kind that would excite a kid. It was medicine—pills mostly. I don't think Dad wanted her to have 'em. These men—sometimes they were 'doctors' other times they were other 'buccaneers'—they'd come 'round the house when he was away and leave packages in the mailbox or hide them in the bushes." Remus chuckled darkly, shaking his head at the ridiculousness of it all. "I'd go down and get them and sneak them back inside for her. Eventually I had to start hiding them under my shirt or Giles would take them. I didn't always know what was inside but I didn't really care."

"So why'd you do it then?"

"I guess... because I wanted to make her happy."

Sirius took a deep breath. "It's fucked up, man."

"Yeah. But we turned out alright in the end, right? You're a genius, albeit a lazy one—"

Sirius' arm shot out, wagging a finger at him. "And you're the only person on planet earth, Remus Lupin, that can make someone feel better about themselves by making them feel worse!"

Smirking, Remus lit another spliff and held it aloft. "Cheers to that, Black."

Sirius shook his head. "Oi, toss your lighter here."

He did so and Sirius stuck his hand in his pocket, withdrawing something. Remus had to squint in the low light to see what it was, but when he realised he couldn't help his surprise. "Is that one of Bob's firecrackers?"

"Yup," Sirius smirked. "I was gonna freak the girls out by playing at putting it on top of your cake, but guess since we don't have one of those around…"

He jumped up to his feet and Remus followed suit, stepping in close as Sirius lit the fuse and it sputtered to life. "Make a wish," he said, before chucking the little firework across the room. It cleared the whole space and bounced off the other side of the circular walls at least twenty feet from them before going off with a noise so loud it reverberated around the room like trapped thunder. Sirius whooped, punching the air as dots of light covered Remus' vision.

"Yes!" He shouted. "Fuck silence!"

Remus coughed out his laughter and Sirius was right there, pushing a second firecracker into his palm. “Do it, Moony,” he said. He passed him the lighter, their fingers fumbling against one another in the dark, and Remus flicked the flame to life, bringing the fuse toward it. He held the firecracker for a few long seconds, entranced by the way the flame desperately licked down the wick toward its inevitable doom. In it he pictured Tomny, running in a life that would only lead to rougher and rougher landscapes. He pictured Tonya, a born traveller who’d willingly locked herself up inside a flat she hated and for what —love? He saw his father and the misery he’d embraced as his everyday, and his mother who’d gone and left him instead.

Remus threw the firecracker. It exploded above their heads, without even making it to the other-side of the room. The noise was deafening and wonderful.

“Fuck yeah!” Sirius screamed.

“Fuck!” Remus wailed. “Fuck you!”

“Yeah, fuck you!”

“FUCK YOU!”

Sirius clapped him on the back, grinning sadly. “Fuck them.”

“Do you have another?” Remus breathed.

“No, sorry. That’s it, mate.”

He sagged against the wall, half in disappointment and half in relief. “It’s alright. I just… I needed that.”

“I know.” Sirius came to join him at the wall, tucking his hands behind him. Remus scooped the joint he’d dropped up off the floor and relit it, sucking in and passing it along to him. Sirius held it to his lips, before pausing; “Have you ever just wanted to get something off your chest so desperately it feels as though you’re drowning?”

“Yes,” Remus said, truthfully.

“Do you remember the last question you asked me outside the pub?”

Remus’ heart jumped. “ ‘What happened with Miles’.”

“He was... sick,” Sirius said after a long pause; “That wasn’t a lie, but there was other stuff too. He and I… we used to write each other these letters. We'd write all the things we couldn't bring ourselves to say out loud and then trade. It was like a game at first. 'You couldn't say it but you could write it down'. It made stuff feel… I don't know—safer."

"Like Gisela."

"Yeah, and other stuff too. Anyway, one day when he was home for Christmas I guess his grandparents found one of the letters or something. They almost didn't let him come back to school, but he did and we… man, I really liked Miles."

Sirius brought the spliff to his lips sharply and breathed in. His hand—his perfectly steady musician's hand—was trembling.

"I get it," Remus said.

"You do?" Sirius' gaze snapped to him.

"Well, yeah. He was your friend."

Sirius deflated. "Then you don't get it. I liked him—and he liked me too. That was the problem, don't you see?"

Remus felt something twist in his gut. "So that means you… oh."

"Yeah."

"With… boys?"

"And girls." Sirius crossed his arms haughtily. "So you get it now, why I couldn't tell the others?"

Remus was stunned into silence. Never before had he considered… Sirius was a boy, and Miles was a boy, and… Jesus.

"Well say something!" Sirius pushed.

Remus scrambled; "I… Wow. I just didn't expect that… I mean, you date a lot of girls, Sirius."

Sirius scoffed. "What about you? You mean to say that there's nothing going on between you and that 'Tom' guy?"

"What? Tomny—no! He's dating Tonya."

"You're always on the phone with him."

“Not always.”

Sirius knocked the ash off the end of the spliff. He handed it back, not looking at him. “Oh.”

Remus stared down at the weed before taking it. Sirius’ fingers were warm.

“Their phone’s down,” he confessed. “I was… I am worried. It’s never happened before and they’re—they’re not like you and me. I think they’re part of a gang now.”

Sirius’ mouth pinched together like he wasn’t sure if he should be impressed or apologetic. “A gang? That’s who you’re friends with?”

“They weren’t into all of it when we met. It was just fun, then.”

“Well, guess that explains a lot about you,” Sirius said. Remus looked at him questioningly and he tapped his own nose so he understood.

“Oh, yeah." Remus reached up to run his fingers across his scar. "It was awful. Tomny blamed himself for it.”

“I hope he at least killed the guy who did it. It’s such a shame—marking up your face like that.”

“You saying I’m ugly now?”

“Nope, not saying that at all. Handsomest Lupin around.”

“I’m the only Lupin around.”

“That’s convienent, isn’t it?”

Remus tipped his head forward to hide a smile. Sirius watched him and when their eyes met again he bit his lip. “I won’t tell anyone about you and Miles. I swear.”

“Didn’t think you would, but thanks,” Sirius said, crossing his ankles. “I mean it’s cool right? You’re with McKinnon and I’ve got Chas, so… it’s cool. All of it.”

“Yeah… cool.”

“And I trust you, you know,” Sirius said, knocking him on the thigh, “I do.”

“I trust you too.”

“Good. Oh, and Remus?”

He looked up in earnest. “Yeah?”

“Happy birthday.”

“Thanks, Sirius.”

They sat together for a long time and when they’d run out of weed and the darkness began to feel stifling they walked. All over the campus they went, killing time until midnight had come and gone and rather than being Remus' birthday, it was just any other early morning in late winter. When they finally returned to the dorm during those wee hours, they found their friends waiting for them. None of them were happy, but his and Sirius’ quiet moods were enough to cue in on, and each of the girls simply kissed him on the cheek and left.

"Sorry guys. Didn't mean to ruin the night," Remus said, while his friends slipped into bed. James turned around, shaking his head kindly.

"Don't be. We're just glad you're okay."

"Yeah," Peter yawned. "Besides, we got to eat all your cake."

Everyone snorted, and James took off his glasses while Peter pulled his bed curtains shut. Sirius, who had been reclining on his bed, sat up and reached for his own curtains. Catching Remus' eye, he raised his chin and winked before shutting out the light. A second later a chorus went up; "Happy birthday, Moons."

"Yeah, happy birthday to Moony."

"Happy birthday, mate!"

Remus laid down in his bed. His voice was a whisper; "Thanks guys."

He tried the flat several more times after that. The line was never reconnected.

Eventually Remus stopped calling.

* * *

On the day of James Potter's seventeenth birthday, the sky over Hawkings opened up and poured like the heavens themselves were in mourning. The water came down in sheets so heavy that the moment you stepped outside you were soaked to the bone. And it just kept coming. All day it rained, battering the windows of their dorm with the ferocity of a thousand Big Bad Wolves. The rain was so incessant that it would end up washing out the bit of road behind the science building, forcing the trolley routes to change for the remainder of term while also flooding the football pitch so badly players were slipping around in mud for weeks afterwards. It was a Sunday, which meant no classes at least, but the trek to breakfast was miserable and by the time they reached the hall their wellies were filled up from the top down.

"If April showers bring May flowers, what do bloody March downpours bring?" Peter asked dolefully.

"Good luck," James answered, shaking out his soaked curls and beaming all the while.

James truly was brilliant, Remus knew. The rain would've ruined anyone else's mood—and it did—but not his. No rain could dampen James Potter's tenor, not even on his own birthday.

Like the rest of them, Sirius had been less excited about the weather, thinking mostly about how it would dull the affairs they had planned for the evening, but by the time they were loping back across campus after class, he'd given up the bad mood and tipped his head back to feel the water spatter him on his cheeks and eyelids. He'd waited until they were outside Godric to stop and do this, and each of his friends yelled at him from the front steps to come inside.

"No!" He called. "You have to feel this! It's like—like rebirth! This is what it means to start over, I know it! To get another chance!"

"The only thing you're gonna get is a cold!" Remus reasoned.

"I don't believe in coincidences! What song were we just playing yesterday—'The Rain Song'! 'Upon us all a little rain must fall—just a little rain'!"

"He's finally gone mental," Peter moaned over the noise of the rain. "He's quoting Zeppelin in the middle of a storm."

"No, I think I get it," James said, shucking off his coat and skipping down the dorm's steps to join his best friend in the rain. Sirius jumped when he saw him, throwing his own jacket aside and taking James' hand as he let loose a war-cry of pure exhilaration. James matched it, and they swung each other around through the lawn's grassy puddles until they were both sprawling and laughing.

"Oi," Kenny said, sticking his head out the front door; "What are they doing? They're not drunk already are they?"

"No," Remus answered, "they're being reborn."

Kenny shook his head like they were all crazy and ducked back inside as a shivering Peter did the same. Remus stayed, and eventually he sat down on the steps, pulling off his jacket hood and leaning his chin on his arms. They probably were mental, but if Remus understood anything, it was that what Sirius and James were experiencing at that very moment was as close as any of them would ever get to feeling like gods.

So he watched, and he thought the same thought he'd been thinking for the past three weeks, because it was impossible not to think about. It was a revelation that he hadn't seen coming and yet after a month of thinking, he was still unable to comprehend how he'd missed it. Sirius must've done it on purpose just to mess with him. Just to make it so the few hours of sleep he got a night were plagued with wild thoughts and even wilder dreams. So that wherever he went, whether it be alone or in the company of others, he was always thinking about him. And it worked.

Sirius Black liked girls.

And boys.

And apart from the mysterious roommate who'd disappeared late their tenth year, he was the only person on earth who knew.

Fucking hell.

Remus had never put much stock in being gay. He'd never known anyone who was—probably. It was an out-of-sight, out-of-mind sort of thing, wasn't it? He'd thought once that maybe Lyall was a bit buggered, after all he'd never remarried, but at the time it was just another way to slander his father in his head. Now it made him feel guilty—he would never have said anything like that to Sirius, though he supposed that Sirius wasn't gay, not as long as he liked both guys and girls. He wondered if there was a way you could be both, but he couldn't fathom how that would work. Tomny had had a girlfriend once named Viola who claimed to go both ways, but she only ever kissed other girls while drunk. It seemed to him at the time that she only did it to show off to other guys, but Tomny never seemed to care and he'd only dated Viola for a few months anyway.

Remus tried not to think about Tomny much. He'd told himself after the third week of zero contact that Tomny had moved on, or was gone —anything to keep from dwelling, but that too, was impossible. There were too many unanswered questions, too many unknown variables. Several times he'd almost considered just up and leaving—hitch-hike to the nearest train station and catch a ride back to London to see for himself what had happened, but eventually he'd started confessing these ideas to Sirius who was always somehow able to talk him down. Perhaps it was because Sirius claimed they were moments of strength.

"They should be grateful for your loyalty," he'd always say. And afterwards Remus would be able to sleep, for a little while.

It was a strange dynamic. By day Sirius was his worst nightmare—a plague of cheeky remarks and grudgingly handsome looks—and by night he was his saviour. He'd tell more stories about Gisela or things that had happened to him and the boys as they grew up at school, and for once he did not dance around the mention of Miles. Remus learned that things between them hadn't changed until their tenth year. Before then they'd been best friends like anyone else, but unlike James or Pete, Miles understood what it was like to not enjoy going home for the holidays. Sirius had grappled onto that.

In exchange for his honesty, Remus told him bits of what it was like living at the flat. Sometimes it was hard—just getting the words out felt like he was regurgitating glass—but other times it was easy. He mostly talked about Lee and Doss and Seesaw, and also Flacky who'd died too young. He mentioned little about Tomny or Tonya, perhaps only because they confused him the most now, but also because he blamed them more than the others.

Soon it became clear that they'd unintentionally become each other's secret-keepers. It wasn't as though James, Lily, Marlene, or any of the rest of them weren't trustworthy, but in the early hours of the morning when he couldn't sleep, the only one he wanted to talk to was Sirius. Because, as he was coming to realise, Sirius understood. He knew what it was like to be left behind, to ache in the absence of someone. But where he now had Sirius, Sirius had had no one. It made Remus want to swear undying loyalty to him, and so he did—silently. He promised himself that girls or boys, he would always be there for Sirius, because that's what a good friend would do.

"C'mon, Moony! You have to feel this!" Sirius shouted. His voice carried across the heavy rain, aided thanks to James, who had lifted him onto his shoulders in a great hurrah. Seeing them so happy together didn't require much more convincing, and a moment later Remus had peeled out of his coat (it was already soaked through anyway) and joined them on the squelching grass. James high-fived him and Sirius tipped forward, sprawling off his friend's shoulders and forcing Remus to catch him, which he did, badly. They went down onto the muddy lawn in a heap and James piled on top of them. It was exhilarating.

It made him wonder if maybe he didn't hate the rain so much after all.

* * *

Walking into their room, Remus found James adjusting their waterlogged shoes over the radiator to ensure that they were all drying as efficiently as possible. He'd been confined to the bedroom since they'd returned from breakfast while the rest of them set up downstairs. They'd done a spectacular job, if Remus said so himself. Red and white streamers in honour of James' favourite football team had been taped to every surface and various banners had been constructed bearing the words 'Congratulations on completing rehab!' and 'So glad you beat the blow!' There were a few obligatory happy birthday's too, but those were much smaller.

The girls on the other hand had enlisted the help of the baking club to bake not one, not two, but seventeen birthday cakes—which was just as well, really, since Sirius seemed to have invited half the school. Remus had taken it upon himself to organise the music, hauling Sirius' stereo down to the common room along with his vinyls and impressive collection of 8-track tapes. He'd meticulously organised the albums in order of playability—starting off strong with Exile on Main St. and following it up with James' favourite, the Kinks' Face to Face . After that he'd allowed himself a little wiggle room to read the crowd's vibes, but all in all it was a strong lineup.

"Can I bloody well come down now?" James grinned when he spotted him. "We all know today's just an excuse to party."

“No, we’re celebrating the birth of our dearest friend,” Remus said, feigning distress.

“Well this ‘dearest friend’ is going stir-crazy. All I can hear is rain pattering the roof and you took all the music.”

“Alright, you can come down, but there’s one more thing.” From behind his back Remus pulled a party hat, lovingly constructed by Peter with a pair of paper antlers extending from either side. James looked at the thing with a mixture of shock and disappointment before sighing and holding out his hand.

“You really are such a good sport, Prongs,” Remus snorted, coming forward and looping the hat and string around James’ chin himself. He reached up to bat playfully at one of his antlers, a joke he knew no one else apart from the four of them would get, and James shook his head hopelessly.

When they made their way downstairs, past the tower of rain boots and coats, everyone was waiting. They exploded with a huge rally of ‘HAPPY BIRTHDAY JAMES!’ to which James responded by throwing his arms up in the air and screaming back with equal amounts of energy. Sirius bounded forward, punching him in the arm affectionately and everyone else followed up with pats and congratulations of their own. The record player started, and Marlene appeared at Remus’ side with a drink for him and they cheersed before downing the entire thing in one go. Marlene belched immediately, embarrassed, but Remus only pulled her close and blew a raspberry on her cheek.

If the rain did anything, it dulled the noise. From the outside the dorm looked almost average, with hardly any indication that there were over a hundred kids inside, smoking, drinking, and behaving in a rather non-religious manner. A dance floor had opened up in the middle of the common room and at one point Sirius and Peter began aggressively shaking a beer can each, before cracking the tabs to let the foam spray out over the heads of everyone within ten feet of them. Lottie, who’d supposedly spent hours taming her curls against the humid rain, just about throttled her brother in the middle of the dance floor. Around them people cracked windows to let out the smoke and younger kids weaved in and out, stealing booze and smokes as though they were pick-pockets on the street. When the girls brought out the cakes James nearly passed out at the sheer number of them, each one decorated with seventeen candles each. He blew them out one by one and everyone cheered, crowding around to get a slice.

“Remus!” Lily called over the guffaw. “We have something for you!”

He turned to find her and Marlene standing together, holding a chocolate cake between them. “Another cake?” He asked. “I think you’re immensely overestimating James’ sweet tooth.”

“This one’s not for James,” Marlene amended. “It’s yours, to make up for the birthday you skipped out on.”

Remus laughed awkwardly. “Oh, thanks. You didn't have to do that.”

"We know," Marlene grinned.

“And don’t thank us just yet,” Lily said. It sounded like a warning, but before anything could be done, she and Marlene grabbed hold of the back of his head and yanked him forward, slamming the cake into his face. Remus moaned, temporarily blinded by icing while plenty of people turned to laugh.

“So how’s it taste?” Marlene sniggered. Remus dug the chocolate from his eyes and sighed before sucking even more off of his thumb.

“Delicious. Want to try some?” He surged forward for a kiss and Marlene shrieked, shooting away with Lily.

“Need a towel?” A high-voice chimed, and Remus turned to find Pandora of all people. The towel in question was in fact not a towel, but a crochet doily, which he took anyway and thanked her for. She smiled and handed him a drink, knocking her own against it before flouncing back to a set of maroon couches where Xeno was sitting amongst a group of kids, looking even more hippy-ish than normal in an open-chested poet’s shirt.

As he cleaned himself up best he could, Mary passed him on the arm of some guy—Grayson Kent, he realised. “Oi, Remus, your tape’s skippin’!” She shouted, and he strained his ears to find that she was right. Picking his away across the room, he finished his drink and passed off the empty cup before crouching down in front of the hi-fi. He found, irritatingly, that his carefully curated album piles had been messed with, throwing everything out of whack. Unable and unwilling to reorganise everything in his inebriated state, he instead began searching for one of the LPs Andy had gotten Sirius for Christmas, but couldn’t find anything among the mess anyway.

“MOONY! PSST—OI, MOONY!” Sirius wailed from the corner of the room, where he and Chastity were tucked up against an open window, sharing a cigarette. “PLAY SOME RAINBOW!” Sirius continued, making Chastity giggle and whisper something in his ear. “S’a rock band!” He slurred back. “Their guitarist was in Deep Purple!”

Suddenly disinterested, Remus grabbed a random tape from the piles that he thought belonged to the Doors, and slammed it into the stereo, hitting play. He was about four steps away when the first moan cut through the air, making him and everyone around him slam to an utter halt.

“What in the Black Sabbath insanity is this?” Another kid said aloud, but it was too late, the sex tape picked up mid-shag—exactly where it’d left off all those months ago in their eleventh year, when they’d discovered it inside the borrowed hi-fi while hiding away within the guts of the church’s organ balcony.

Remus scrambled back to the stereo as the whole room burst into staggered laughter and slammed his finger on the eject button, yanking out the tape like it was a bomb about to go off.

“Blimey!” Sirius announced. “I thought I’d lost that!”

Chastity gaped; “That’s yours?”

“What? No! I just—Moony tell her!”

Remus threw the tape at him and Sirius scrambled to catch it.

“C’mon Black, if you’re going to engage in such filthy hobbies you should really keep them to yourself.”

Remus turned away, cuing up another album while feeling mightily pleased with himself. As Sirius did his best to convince Chastity that it wasn’t his sex tape (“Look at the tape’s date, Chas—1972!”) Remus scanned the room for Marlene. He spotted her on one of the sofas, tucked up between Nicole and Anna. The entire team had been invited —James’ orders—and Remus was glad for it as he bent over the back of the sofa and dangled a joint between the girls’ heads.

“Ladies, care to partake in some of the 'devil's lettuce'?”

“Oooh, yes please,” Nicole said eagerly. Marlene looked sceptical—she wasn’t usually one for weed—but nodded along with Anna and the four of them stood, making their way out into the hall. Remus realised halfway to the back door that he’d leant Sirius his lighter and turned around to get it, only to come to an abrupt halt as a drunken James stood up on a chair, shouting over the crowd.

“HELLO! YES! EVER’ONE SHUT UP I HAVE SUMTHIN’ I WANNA SAY!”

The record scratched off, courtesy of Sirius, and James cleared his throat; “Firs' of all, thank yeh to my idiot friends, wherever you may be, for the wonderful decor. I’m sure my mum's so proud I kicked that nasty blow habit—and I know nunn'of yeh will tell 'er about the drinkin' problem because we all got one!”

Plenty of kids snickered and held up drinks—'Hear! Hear!’

“Thank yeh to the girls for the many, many cakes! And of course thank you tah ever’one for showin’ up!” James continued, nearly tripping off the chair. “Now n'gonna play you all a song, and I want to dedicate it to my beautiful girlfriend, Lily!”

“Oh my god,” someone nearby moaned. Remus looked to his left to find Lily, a drink in one hand and the other pressed to her pink cheek. She was wearing James’ party hat.

He smirked and sidled up next to her, bending over to obstruct her view. “You’re looking a little redder than usual, Evans.”

“Buzz off,” Lily chuckled weakly.

“Maestro, the music please!” James called.

“Yes, sir!” Sirius announced, before hitting play on the hi-fi. Remus wasn’t sure what he was expecting, but it certainly wasn’t “Let’s Get It On”.

“WRONG SONG, SIRIUS!” James threw himself down from the chair while everyone laughed and Remus put his arm around Lily as she just about folded in on herself from embarrassment.

“Those idiots,” she moaned.

“Could always be worse,” Remus reasoned; “He could be playing you a song on the guitar himself in front of everyone.”

Lily dropped her hand from her cheek and held her heart instead. “Oh thank Lord he’s not. I couldn’t take it. I’m already so embarrassed, I knew I should’ve waited to tell him.”

“Tell him what?”

Lily pressed her lips together before blurting out; “I told him I loved him.”

Remus gasped. “You did not!”

“He was so happy—and I wanted it to be special so I thought I’d do it on his birthday—ah! It’s so embarrassing.”

The song shifted and James got back up onto his chair, holding a hand over his eyes and scanning the room until he ultimately spotted the two of them. “DAISY! This one’s for you!” He pointed at Lily with his beer. “I love you too, babe!”

James had chosen a Fleetwood Mac song, and it floated out around the room;

‘Sweet wonderful you,
You make me happy with the things you do;
Oh, can it be so,
This feeling follows me wherever I go…’

Listening like the rest of them, Lily sighed, too happy and too embarrassed.

“You’re gonna marry him, right?” Remus asked teasingly. “ ‘Cause he might die of heartbreak if you don’t.”

“Only if I don’t kill him first. It’s a good thing he’s cute.”

They shared a cheeky look while Sirius raised his drink in the air; “To Daisy!” He shouted. James did the same and everyone cheered; “TO DAISY!”

Sportingly, Lily held her drink aloft before downing it all as Fleetwood Mac sang directly to her;

‘I never did believe in miracles,
But I’ve a feeling it’s time to try;
I never did believe in the ways of magic,
But I’m beginning to wonder why…’

James launched himself off the chair, streaking toward them. Other kids parted automatically to let him through and when he made it to Lily he scooped her up so she could wrap her legs around his waist and kiss him.

Lifting his fingers to his mouth, Remus whistled and Lily broke apart from James to swat the air in front of his face. Undeterred, James peppered her cheek with kisses instead, the complete and utter embodiment of a man in love.

The rest of the night went off without a hitch. The rain continued to pour, and Remus did not think of Tomny or London even once.

Chapter End Notes

> To ‘give up the ghost’ means to give up or stop working.
> ‘Blow the gaff’ means to reveal a secret.
>
> Sorry if it feels like I'm teasing you, but I did say this chapter would rock your socks. Next one is gonna be... fun :^)

Chapter 54: Charity Case

Chapter Summary

Baby cows! Bad friends! unBelievable realisations!

Chapter Notes

CW: Discussions of classism and bullying.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Oh, you're the best friend that I ever had,
I've been with you such a long time;
You're my sunshine and I want you to know,
That my feelings are true;
I really love you,
Oh, you're my best friend…

- "You're My Best Friend" Queen, 1975

Monday 4th April 1977

Calving season had come early to Hawkings. Just a few days before they were all scheduled to head home for the week-long Easter holiday, it was announced that Professor Kettleburn had invited all the twelfth year biology classes down to the Agricultural barn for the chance to witness a calf being born.

"I think Loughty just wants to push us off onto someone else for an entire afternoon," Mary commented, as she, Remus, and Marlene marched across campus to collect their packed lunches from the dining hall and then down to the school farm. As they got close the smell of manure wafted up on the spring breeze and Mary covered her nose, lining up behind a row of students while an older student wrote a number on the back of their hands in marker.

"That's your group," he explained. "You'll be going into the barn only a few at a time so the animals don't get spooked."

"Wonderful," Mary grumbled, examining the crudely drawn '4' on her hand.

They found their other friends waiting by one of the fences, all scattered around a flattened patch of grass. Lottie, Peter, and Moira were a few feet away, petting a goat through the fence, while Sirius and James sat on top of it, swinging their legs back and forth. When he spotted them, Sirius jumped down from the fence to compare group numbers, only to be soured upon finding out that his ‘5’ did not match Remus’ ‘2’.

“Charlie and Erik J. are taking bets on which group’s gonna catch the calf being born,” Sirius said. “Guess I have to change my bet to group two now.”

“Bet on your own group,” Remus said, stepping past him to swing himself up on the fence beside James.

Sirius leaned on the fence post next to him. “But you’re our lucky charm!”

“Never been lucky a day in my life,” Remus corrected, stifling a yawn. He’d slept more poorly than usual the night before and after tossing and turning for hours he’d finally slunk across the room and set a vinyl on the turntable. That was all it took to wake Sirius up these days, and as always they ended up on the floor with their backs against the hutch, sharing the headphones between them until that fateful shit-all hour of the morning became a little less shitty.

“Lily’s in group two,” James said, glancing at his hand, a '3' to match Marlene. Next to him, Remus put a hand over his eyes, scanning out over the rest of the kids.

“Where is she?”

“There.” James pointed across the grass, to where Lily was standing next to Snape, looking rather ruffled. “She’s trying to convince him to take our train home for the holiday.”

“God, why can’t she just give it up?” Sirius blagged. Remus smacked him lightly on the shoulder with the back of his hand.

“No friendship-shaming,” he said. "Lily means well. Even if it is Snape."

Sirius gave him a hard look but then nodded reluctantly and turned around to lean against the fence. “Well, it doesn’t look like she’s being very convincing.”

That at least, appeared to be true. Snape had his arms crossed haughtily while Lily stared up at him, using her hands to illustrate whatever point she was making. As they watched, another agricultural student shouted across the small field that group two was on deck and would be heading into the barn in a few minutes.

“Guess I should go get her,” Remus sighed, sliding off the fence.

“Godspeed, soldier,” Sirius said, saluting him.

He trudged across the yard, stopping a few feet from the pair, who were still arguing quietly. “Lily?” Remus called. “It’s almost group two’s turn to go in.”

Surprised by his appearance, Lily looked back. “I’ll be right there!” She said, before turning back to Severus, who was only glaring at him over her shoulder.

“If you were just willing to work it out, Sev—”

“As long as you’re hanging around them, I don’t want anything to do with it,” Snape snarled, “so leave me alone.”

Turning, Snape stalked off, leaving Lily looking deflated and haggard. Remus walked up to her side and scowled after him. “Did you really think it was going to work?” He asked softly.

“Let’s just go,” she sighed, turning toward the barn.

Lily was quiet for the most part, even as Professor Kettleburn gave an ecstatic lecture on the miracles of calf-birth. The air inside the barn was slightly too warm to be comfortable and Remus found himself stifling yawn after yawn. If Lily noticed his fatigue she didn’t say anything. He knew the Snape-thing still bothered her and had ever since Snape had given up his role as a prefect at the start of term. His departure left not only a hole in the ranks, but also meant that Lily had no choice but to flounder with other undesirable partners like Chastity. Remus would’ve thought that that would’ve finally marked the end between them, but something about Snape ignited the righteous part of her, and no matter what anyone tried to say, she refused to let herself be hated by the boy she’d known most of her life.

When their twenty minutes of observation was up and no calf had been born they emerged out into the mid-morning sun once more to trade places with the next group.

“I’m gonna go to the bathroom,” Lily said placidly, turning toward the school buildings. Remus continued on and passed Mary, Lottie, and Peter on their way into the barn, flashing them an unenthusiastic thumbs-up. When he arrived back on the patch of grass with his friends he found James and Sirius ripping open their packed lunches as well as his, peeling sandwiches apart like some field experiment.

“Er… What are you doing with my lunch?” He asked.

“I tried, Lupin!” James snapped. “I bloody well tried, but whatever maniac thought that fucking toff up really went to town on the ‘audacity’ and the ‘dickheadishness’!”

“Anybody got something to say that makes sense?”

“He tried to talk to Snape for Lily,” Marlene said, observing the boys from her spot on top of the fence. “It didn’t go well.”

“I swear to god that asshole won’t be happy until we break up!” James growled.

“Yes,” Remus said, “that’s exactly right.”

James stood up. “Well tough nuts 'cause it ain’t happening!”

“I would hope not. You only just openly declared your love for her in front of half the school last week.”

James shrank back slightly, still embarrassed by his drunken birthday proclamation, but Sirius only popped to his feet, grinning as he held up a baggy of peanut butter they’d scraped off the sandwiches.

“Snivelly told James to eat shit, and now he’s going to know how it feels,” he announced. “Good thing you prefer your jam sandwiches with enough peanut butter to choke a horse, Moony.”

Remus was unimpressed. “I was gonna eat that.”

“You and your grumbling stomach are just going to have to forgive us,” Sirius said, patting him on the shoulder and tossing the baggy to James, who continued filling it with handfuls of grass and mud. He passed it back to Sirius when it was full, nearly bursting at the seams with muck.

“What is the goal here?” Remus asked, slightly unnerved.

“We’re gonna trick Snivellus into thinking he’s really stepped in it,”

James told him. “We considered using a real cowpat, but decided it would be funny enough to watch him dance around with peanut butter on his head instead."

"You're so merciful," Marlene said sarcastically.

"I know, right? Ready, Black?”

“I await your signal, Prongs,” Sirius grinned, before he disappeared across the field with his cow-bomb in hand.

“You sure this is a good idea?” Remus asked. James glanced at him, mouth pursed.

“I’ll give him one last chance,” he said. “He can either get over himself and accept that Lily and I are together, or he can eat muddy peanut butter.”

“I think you’re asking for a little much. Snape’s not just going to start being tolerable because you want him to—or because you played some stupid prank on him.”

“Then he’s made his own bed.” Decisively, James set off toward the pig pen where Snape and a couple other Salazar boys were leaning over the fence, taunting the animals or poking them with sticks.

Remus looked back to Marlene. “I can’t believe you’re just sitting back.”

“You didn’t hear what he said,” she told him. “I say, let him eat shit.”

“Well are you coming then? I’ll give you a ride.”

Marlene looked him up and down. "You sure you can carry me?"

"I'm skinny not entirely useless," he scoffed.

She smirked lightly and reached out for him, and Remus pulled her up onto his back, smiling as he took off after their friends. They caught up to James just has he stopped to face the pig pen, clearing his throat. “Snape,” he called, drawing the other boys' attention away from the pigs, “I changed my mind. We've still got stuff to talk about.”

Snape sneered; “You never know when to give up, do you, Potter?”

“Lily wants us to get along.”

“And I told you—never gonna happen. I'd rather be drowned in the lake than pretend to be friends with the likes of you.”

That can be arranged," Remus said, letting Marlene slide from his back.

“Gonna hit me too, Loony, like you did Mick Truman?" Snape leered. "Go ahead, try it, there are enough teachers around. Maybe they’ll lock you up for good, you lunatic.”

The other boys laughed like some maniacal audience and Marlene bristled; “The only one who deserves to be locked up is you!”

“Ugh. Do us a favour and muzzle your bitch, Loony.”

Only Snape could make anger bloom so quickly. Remus stepped forward again, stopping only when Marlene grabbed his arm. “Don't. Just look up,” she muttered lowly, and he did, instantly spotting Sirius, who was lying on his stomach on the pig pen’s roof. In his hands he held the bag of mud and peanut butter, extended out over Snape’s head.

Seemingly unruffled, James crossed his arms over his chest. “I used to think everyone was worthy of forgiveness, Snape, but then I met you and I’m just not so sure anymore.” He sighed as if disappointed. “Can’t have everything, I suppose.”

“Are you finished?" The nasty boy snarled. "If I wanted to listen to bullshit all day I’d ask for your opinion.”

“It never gets any easier,” James groaned. “Okay, that’s it. Black, bombs away!”

“James?”

They all turned to find Lily standing there, her expression worried. Unfortunately, there was no stopping what came next. At the same moment, Sirius threw down the bag and it promptly exploded over Snape’s head in a great mucky mess, spattering him, his friends, and the pig fence to boot. In impact, Lily’s hands flew to her mouth while Snape let out a wail of disgust.

“What the fuck?!”

Rolling off the pig’s roof, Sirius dropped down next to James and both of them stared in a mixture of shock and victory. “This feels familiar somehow," Sirius grinned; "The cow shit's new though."

Realisation dawned on the Salazar boys' faces and Snape immediately began to gag, whirling away to resist hurling.

"James!" Lily shouted, streaking forward. "What are you doing?"

"Don't worry," he said, trying not to laugh, "it's not real cow dung."

"It's only mud and peanut butter, Lils," Marlene said.

"Peanut butter?" Lily shrieked. At her words, Snape straightened and pulled a handful of muck off his head, holding it up to his face. He turned an ashen colour and then began to hyperventilate as though he couldn't breathe. It looked almost comical, even as Lily shot toward him and grabbed his arm. Snape tried to throw her off, but she only withdrew her prefect's help whistle from her pocket and blew it hard, making everyone around them turn and look. A moment later, one of Professor Kettleburn's students appeared, staring at them in shock.

"Er—What's the matter?"

"He needs to go to the medical room," she explained, while Snape wheezed next to her.

"What's that all over him?"

"Peanut butter—he's allergic!"

"Oh fuck," James winced.

The older student took Snape's arm and began quickly leading him away as he heaved-in breaths like a popped balloon. Lily started after the pair before whirling on the rest of them, her face a mask of vexation. "What were you THINKING?" She roared.

"We didn't know he was allergic!" Sirius tried.

"Don't you DARE try and act like this wasn't on purpose! This was premeditated! You three can't handle it when someone else wants to do things their way! You always have to have the last word!"

James suddenly looked very nervous. None of them had seen Lily so angry since Remus' birthday the year before. "Daisy, I swear," he sputtered; "we didn't mean to—"

"You never mean to! And yet you DO! You must have cow dung for brains! Why can't everyone just get along?" With that, Lily threw her arms down and raced after Snape, her wellies squelching in the mud. The rest of them were left stunned into guilty silence, while every other student looked on in uncomfortable bewilderment. Remus was pretty sure none of them had cow dung for brains, but after listening to Lily scream it for all to hear, he was almost convinced.

“Did we just kill Snape?” Sirius asked, making Marlene seize up and smack him sharply on the arm.

“Don’t say that!” She wailed.

Shoulders slumped, James stepped forward and stared after Lily like a broken man—or in the very least, one that knew exactly how badly he’d messed up. “I am such a fucking idiot,” he moaned. No one seemed quick to correct him.

“Hey!” Peter shouted, appearing from the barn's direction and skidding happily into Sirius’ side. “You guys missed it—the calf was just born!”

“She’s so cute!” Lottie gushed next to him in a baby voice. “All wittle and tiny!”

Mary strolled up to them, arms crossed and looking almost as ashen as Snape had. “I swear I’m never having children. All slimy and disgusting, eugh!”

“It was just a baby cow, Mary,” Lottie insisted.

“It came out in a grey sack—they had to cut it out! It’s not a cow, it’s an alien.” She shivered lightly then looked them all up and down; “What’s wrong with you guys? Not like you just had to watch a live birth.”

“Pretty sure we just killed Snape,” Sirius repeated blandly, making Marlene shriek in horror and cover her face.

Mary crossed her arms. “Well, sounds like you had a much more productive afternoon then.”

* * *

They did not (thankfully—regretfully? Debatable) kill Snape. Having not actually ingested the peanuts, the wanker wasn't ever in any real trouble, though he'd put on quite a show on his way to the medical room. The school nurse, Ms. Pomfrey, did give him a shot of adrenaline just in case, but by mid-afternoon it'd become clear that Snape was going to be just fine.

James and Sirius were not so fortunate.

They were marched down to the Headmistress's office where the severity of their actions were outlined with an unmerciful punishment consisting of four week's detentions as well as James' removal from the football team for twice that. Really he was lucky not to be kicked off the team all together, but tournaments began in June, and Hawkings still needed its star player. Snape, of course, wasn't satisfied with this. In his eyes every one of them were just as culpable and deserved punishment, most of all James, who'd plead guilty to inciting the prank. Snape wasn't convinced of his regret, but according to Sirius, McGonagall couldn't reach his parents to discuss proper punishment and refused to take his bias or anger into consideration when punishing another student. They were, however, to write Snape a letter of apology each, which they were to read aloud in front of him and the Headmistress.

Neither James nor Sirius fought the punishments, both too guilty or too afraid of Lily's wrath to even consider it. A creature of habit, she ignored them for a short while until James had worried himself into a frenzy thinking she was simply going to break up him; but rather than that, Lily took the incident as an opportunity to make amends. With only a day left at school before everyone returned home for the Easter holiday, she gathered all four 4A boys to her and ordered that they march down to Salazar House with her and formally apologise to Snape.

"But why do Remus and I need to go?" Peter whinged. "We had nothing to do with it."

"You're doing it to clear the air!" Lily shot back. Next to her, Sirius sighed dramatically.

"It'll never work. There's too much bad blood between us. He hates us, we hate him, it's just the way things are."

Bitterly, Lily smacked him in the shoulder. "And I've had enough of it, so we're all going to apologise and you better bloody well mean it!"

"We will," James promised eagerly, shouldering his best friend in poor attempts to get him to shut up.

“Snape’s not so innocent just because he’s got a shitty immune system,” Sirius started indignantly, “James might be willing to forgive him for you but he’s still a shit-eating wanker and you’re making a mistake trying to stay friends with him, Evans.”

Lily gave Sirius a look that either meant she was about to explode or burst into tears and James reached forward to grab him firmly by the shoulder this time. “I’m willing to be the bigger person,” he reasoned. “And I do regret pranking Snape. I wouldn’t have done had I known he was allergic, and neither would you, Sirius.”

Sirius looked away, but it was obvious James was right. Together they made their way up the street toward Snape’s dorm, dragging their feet over the freshly-mowed lawn while Lily pestered another boy sitting on the front steps to go and fetch him. Snape emerged along with an entire brigade of boys that included the two he’d been standing next to at the farm (Remus had learned their names were Drake and Ainsley after they testified to McGonagall on Snape’s behalf) and even Barty Crouch, who was never one to miss out on drama.

“You made a mistake coming here,” Crouch called, like a cheesy TV villain.

“Sev,” Lily started, ignoring the other boys with all the prefect courage she could muster, “we’ve come to apologise. James and Sirius regret what they did, we all do.”

“I don’t,” Snape said, “from what I heard they’re going to be mucking barn stalls for the next month.”

“I think I can smell them already,” Drake answered. “Yeah, that’s it—eau de shit.”

Laughter echoed and all four boys flexed their hands agonisingly at their sides. Remus heard James take a deep breath while Sirius cleared his throat, no doubt itching to throw a snarky response right back.

“We’re not here to argue,” Lily pushed, “we’ve come to apologise.”

“But why? I’ve already got your apologies right here!” From his pocket, Snape produced the letters James and Sirius had been forced to write and began reading them off while those around him grinned and sniggered; “ ‘To Severus, I’m so, so sorry we attacked you with peanut butter—there is absolutely no way things would've turned out that way had we known you were allergic. We feel most awful for what we did, and if you'd just consider forgiving us, we swear to spend the rest of our days seeking repentance for our most heinous sins—"

"I think you're skipping the part about using jam instead next time," Sirius said blandly. "Can you not read sarcasm?"

"Oh shut up, Black," Snape sneered. "I haven't even gotten to the part where you grovel to McGonagall."

"Sev, please!" Lily begged.

"No!" From his place atop of the dorm's stairs, Snape threw the letters in the air and Lily flinched as they fluttered down around her. "I don't give a shit about some stupid apology! Your shitty boyfriend almost poisoned me and you expect me to forgive them?"

James stepped up to Lily's side and grasped her arm, a gesture that only made Snape appear more livid. "You don't need to forgive us," he said, "but we don't need to fight anymore either."

"Easy for you to say," Snape snarled, "you got the last laugh!"

Lily pulled away from James; "No one was laughing, Sev! We've said so many nasty things to one another, don't you think this is finally the time to put it all to rest?"

"Put it to rest?! He almost put me in a grave! And you're still defending him! Honestly, isn't the righteous act getting a bit old, Lily? I wouldn't be his friend for all the money in the world, and you're doing it for free even though you can't even afford the tuition here!"

Lily snapped back like she'd been slapped but Snape wasn't finished. He pushed in front of the others and stepped down a stair, eyes wild.

"I've kept your secret for years and you repay me by dating and befriending the most intolerable pieces of crap imaginable! I was on your side when they were still pulling your hair and calling you a swot all day long! I didn't care if your family had no money or you could only get into Hawkings on a stupid scholarship! I was the one who told you about it in the first place so we could go to school together but the moment you got here you decided that popularity was more important!"

“Sev…” Lily’s lower lip had begun to tremble.

“Don’t you do that!” Snape lashed. “You always cry when things don’t go your way, but not this time! You’re just embarrassed that everyone else here comes from proper stock and you’re just a middle-class nobody who couldn’t get anywhere if you didn’t sleep with your bloody textbooks open!”

The silence was staggering. Snape’s admission had taken all of them by surprise, most of all Lily, who obviously hadn’t counted on him being so vicious. Snape was insufferable at the best of times and spiteful the rest, but he’d never turned his poison on her.

Almost panting from all the shouting, Snape drew himself up to his full height. “Well there then,” he hissed. “Maybe everyone else can keep your secret now too, you pitiful charity case.”

Like lightning, Lily turned and took off across the grass toward her dorm, eyes covered and already crying. James was the first of them to react—shooting toward Snape with one fist outstretched; “YOU—!”

“Now!” Barty wailed, and a second later all four of them were being bludgeoned with bags of peanut butter, which without the added mud and grass, mostly bounced off of them like lumpy rocks. Shocked and instantly sore, they all staggered back while Snape dove for cover.

“You little shits!” Sirius cursed, covering his head. “You’re gonna pay for this!”

“Hope none of you are allergic!” Someone shouted.

As they began to retreat, fresh peanut butter now staining their school clothes, the Salazar boys chased them right off the lawn, hooting in victory. Remus was almost glad Snape hadn't given them the chance to properly apologise; none of them deserved it.

“Ow…” Peter groaned, once they’d made it two dorms over and were no longer being pursued. “What’d they do—freeze the peanuts first?”

“Fucking dicks,” Sirius sighed, wiping muck from his jumper. Next to him, James was quiet, bent over with his hands on his knees and staring at the ground like it might crack open and swallow him.

“You okay, Prongs?” Remus asked, and James looked up.

“Did you know Lily was a scholarship student?”

Remus shook his head, but he would've been lying if things didn't suddenly make much more sense. One of the first times he'd ever hung out with Lily on their own, she'd asked him if he'd come to Hawkings with 'help'. At the time he'd rebuffed her, thinking she was pitying him for being poor, but now he knew she was just trying to see if they had another thing in common. If he had said yes, or at least explained himself better, maybe she would've trusted him with the secret; but instead he'd reacted like any other snob. It meant Lily had been left with only Snape, her childhood best friend who no matter what she did, would never be able to assimilate into the life she'd built for herself at school.

"She never told me…" James murmured. The shock on his face was clear as day. He and Lily had been dating going on seven months, not counting the whole summer they'd spent talking over the phone. "How many times did I invite her to the summer house… or—or to London to see the sights. I even offered to buy her train ticket! And for Christmas I sent all these books mum got as first editions and—and I got her that stupid bracelet for her birthday—but what if—what if she thought I was rubbing it all in her face?"

Sirius set his hand on James' shoulder. "She didn't, mate."

"Then why wouldn't she tell me? I'm her boyfriend."

"I get what you're saying, Prongs, I do. But I think right now what she needs is a friend. So let's be upset later, kay?"

It was the most reasonable thing Remus had ever heard Sirius say, and it was enough to leave James speechless.

"Sirius is right," Remus said. "Worrying about why she didn't say anything won't make her feel better. She probably just didn't want to ask for help."

"Yeah, Evans is stubborn like that," Peter shrugged. "Though, I dunno why 'cause she's always helping us. I'd have failed every maths class I've ever taken if not for her."

Slowly, James nodded, his mouth drawn together in a tight line. "Yeah, yeah, you're right. We just gotta tell her it's okay."

With a comforting smile, Sirius indicated down the street in the direction of Rowena House; "C'mon then, before her eyes get all red and puffy from too much crying."

They started forward together and Remus fell into step next to Peter, who had started staring down at the ground like he it was a puzzle he'd yet to sort out. “Moira isn’t a scholarship kid,” he murmured, “I don’t think, at least.”

“Thought you said her family was in real estate?” Remus asked.

Peter visibly relaxed. “Yeah, that’s right, they are.”

Remus pat him on the back.

Once they reached the girls dorm they went around the side and threw rocks at the girls’ window until Marlene appeared, opening it and sticking her head out. "What happened? I thought Lily went out with you—why's she so upset?"

Before they could answer, Mary appeared at her shoulder. “What the bloody fuck happened? Lily's in here balling her eyes out. Potter you better have not dumped her."

"I didn't!" James insisted. "Just let me—"

"You must've done something! Haven't seen her cry like this since eighth year Christmas when she—"

“I can hear you!” Lily wailed from somewhere inside the dorm. Flinching, Mary immediately buggered it out the window, dropping down onto the electric box beneath and then onto the lawn, Marlene not far behind her.

“Spit it out,” Mary lashed; “She’s in there crying like Sirius if Jagger died.”

“That bad?” Sirius asked, clicking his tongue.

“Snape said some stuff…” Remus started. Passing the girls, James climbed onto the dorm’s electrical box.

“I’m gonna go talk to her,” he said, “will you guys stick around for a bit?”

Sirius waved him on; “Yeah no problem, mate. Holler if you guys need anything.”

James nodded and hauled himself up onto the window ledge, closing it after he slipped inside.

“What happened?” Marlene asked again, and they all settled down on the grass while Sirius retold the story of the affair. He handled the topic of Lily’s scholarship carefully, but it still came as a shock when they realised that not even the girls knew. Lily had somehow managed to keep her mysterious scholarship a secret from everyone, including her closest friends. Marlene and Mary kept sharing the same look, communicating telepathically the way Remus knew girls could, but they let Sirius finish his story. The ending and the details about Snape came with more venom, but that was to be expected.

“That fucking wanker,” Mary growled from behind her teeth. “Maybe we should put peanuts in his food for real.”

“Killing Snape’s not going to make Lily feel any better,” Peter pointed out.

“It’d make me feel better," Marlene added woefully.

As they all lapsed into uncomfortable silence, Remus leaned back on his arms and continued picking grass to pass the time. Eventually, as the sun was beginning to dip down toward the trees, Lottie appeared, having spotted them under her window from her walk up the road. She flopped down on the grass and they relayed the same story, though this time Mary and Marlene interjected with their own tidbits until they all trickled back into silence once more. Remus hoped James was at least getting somewhere with Lily, but he had no way of knowing since he’d shut the window.

“It’s freezing out here,” Lottie said eventually. The street lights had turned on behind them and James had yet to emerge.

“Here, Lot, take my jacket,” Sirius said, shrugging out of his coat.

“Thanks Sirius, but you’re really not my type.”

“I literally just offered you my coat.”

“Hm. Okay then.” Lottie took the jacket and snuggled into it. “Ooh, you do smell good though. Not like eau de shit at all.”

“Hmph. Thanks.”

Marlene shifted closer to Remus on the grass, leaning her head on his shoulder. “I can’t believe she didn’t tell me,” she whispered sadly. “I mean, me? My family doesn't have money or influence or...”

“She might’ve just been embarrassed.”

“Maybe…”

A rumbling sound came from above them, and they all looked up to see James poke his head out. “Moony, she wants you.”

Remus blinked. “Me?”

James began climbing out the window. Slowly, Remus stood and changed places with him, clambering up the side of the dorm and swinging himself over the window ledge with a groan. Inside, he found Lily tucked up on Marlene’s corner bed, hugging one of Lottie’s fuzzy pink pillows and clutching a fistful of tissues.

“Hey… you…” Remus started, lowering the window whilst feeling extremely awkward.

“You can sit, Remus,” Lily said, her voice tight with congestion. He did so, gingerly taking a spot at the foot of the bed while Lily blew her nose. “Thanks for coming up.”

“ ‘Course. Are... you okay, Lils?”

She nodded at first, but then descended into a rigorous head-shake, covering her face with the pillow. “I’m just so embarrassed.”

“Of what?”

“Of everything! You guys tried to tell me I couldn’t fix things with Sev but I just thought that he’d listen to me eventually. I didn’t mean for it all to go to crap like it did.”

“Trust me,” Remus promised, “it was definitely not your fault.”

Lily blew her nose again. “I don’t mean to cry, but I can’t help it. Sev’s right.”

“Well, Snape’s a dick—” Remus caught himself; “I mean, it’s fine to cry. Everyone cries.”

“Do you cry, Remus?”

“Er—yeah, sometimes..."

Lily nodded in consideration. “I guess everyone knows about my scholarship now.”

“Yeah… but it’s nothing to be ashamed of, you know.”

“It just sucks sometimes to be in a place full of one sort of people and still be different. I didn’t mean for the secret to go on as long as it did, but one year turned into two and then I got top student and then prefect—I just didn’t want to be known as the ‘scholarship swot’.”

Remus rubbed the side of his neck. He understood better than Lily would ever know, just how it felt to keep a lie going with all your friends. “Well what about Marlene? She’s not rich or anything.”

“I know,” Lily sighed, “but she’s so much better at handling it than me. She’s actually really tough.”

“Oh I know,” he said, and Lily gave a small smile.

“I wish I had told them and not just Snape.”

“He shouldn’t have done that,” Remus said firmly. “I don't care how angry he was, you don’t just go shoutin' someone’s secrets out for the whole world to hear, and especially not like that. He was talking like you have something to be ashamed about, but it’s actually bloody impressive. You got into Hawkings without anyone’s help but your own—you set the curve Lily. No one else could’ve done it but you. Not me, not James, not Sirius. You.”

Lily glanced down at Marlene’s bed covers shyly. “Wow, Remus.”

“I only meant to say that you should be proud,” he said sheepishly. “Don’t let tossers like Snape or anyone else take away from your achievements. You’re better than that, Lils.”

Lily pulled a fresh tissue from the box near her feet and used it to wipe a bit of stray peanut butter from his shirt. “You’re pretty good at this,” she said. “You should start a club or something—offer relationship advice. Bet you could even charge for it.”

“Ha. Very funny.”

“I’m serious—well, partly. But you do actually give really good advice, Remus. Like James.”

“And I’m sure he’s much better with this stuff than me.”

“You’re both good, but I did chew him out again for going after Snape, just you know."

"I wouldn't expect any less, to be honest."

"Still, I'm lucky to have both of you. All of you."

Remus smiled. "Does that mean you're feeling better then?"

"Well… I don't feel any worse, so I suppose yes, I must be."

"Good."

Lily returned his smile as another rock hit the bedroom window. Remus stood up and crossed the room, lifting it and sticking his head out.

"Is she feeling better yet?" Sirius asked. "Because the sun is gone and we're freezing."

"They can come in," Lily sighed, tossing her tissues away and smoothing back her mussed curls.

One by one the rest of them climbed inside. The girls instantly dove on Lily, doing everything from coddling her with baby talk to kissing her cheeks. She batted her hands at them but eventually hugged back, and James let out a sigh of relief.

"Seems a shame to go home," he said, rubbing the back of his head sorely. "Maybe I should stay."

"You don't care about getting caught?" Remus asked.

"Nah. I've already got detention for a month, who cares."

Remus smiled slightly before glancing around the room. "Say, Prongs, do you remember Xeno's room—what they did with all the beds?"

James glanced around, and then perked up as though a lightbulb had gone off. "Ah, now that's not a bad idea, Moony."

Nudging Sirius and Peter, they filled them in and began pushing furniture out of the way one by one, while the girls looked on in question;

"What are you doing with our furniture?" Mary asked.

"You'll see," James grunted, shoving Lottie's bed toward Marlene's. Eventually the girls got it, and no one objected as they set the four beds side by side against one wall. Blankets and pillows came out in full force, scattering between them for ultimate comfort and they all settled in next to one another in a row. Remus didn't argue as Mary and Marlene pulled him down between them, but did catch Sirius giving him an odd look before he tucked in on Mary's other side.

“A slumber party!” Lottie cheered. “On the last day before holiday, how brilliant!”

“We don’t have to stay the whole night,” Remus said, setting his hands behind his head, “we’ll fix it in a bit.”

“Don’t bother,” Lily said, “I sort of like it.”

“You want us to leave your room looking like you’re about to have a massive orgy?” Sirius said aloud, earning himself an elbow in the gut from Mary. “Ow! Sorry, sorry, I know.”

They all laughed, staring up at the roof of the beds until one of them hit the lights. Mary muttered that they could’ve used some music, but none of them wanted to bother setting up the stereo, so instead they just talked. It went on like a game of telephone, each of them recalling a story or a short anecdote until another interjected with something else. Lily talked a bit about why she’d hid her scholarship for so long and Remus could tell they all understood. Mary ended up confessing to already dumping Grayson, who was still too hung up on some girl he knew from back home to be of any real interest. Sirius made James congratulate himself for finally being able to tell the difference between rake and sweep picking and Peter told them all about his Uncle Morris, who had given him lessons on the drums when he was a little kid. Both Sirius and James were floored—then ecstatic. Finally Peter had managed to surprise them.

When it was his turn, Remus’ friends let him sit in silence for a while, mulling over all the secrets he’d kept and coveted in his short seventeen years of life. One secret leapt out glaringly, but Remus had never said that one aloud before, not even to himself. For so long he’d held onto the hope that as long as he kept silent then that horrible thing wouldn’t be true—couldn’t be true. And though he loved his friends more than ever in that moment, Remus was afraid that letting go of that hope now would doom him forever. And so he distracted himself with the one thing he knew would do the trick.

Tomny.

The moment he started talking about the London boys Remus knew he’d made the right decision. His friends were ecstatic. The room was instantly alight with a flurry of questions, until it seemed like nothing was off limits. Luckily he had his secret-keeper there to reel them all in.

“One at a time, you lunatics!” Sirius cried. “Let the man breathe!”

“I knew it!” James practically shouted over him; “I knew that gang rumour wasn’t all rubbish! You should’ve heard him the first time we went to see Xeno, Sirius! He was talking like the bloody Godfather!”

“A gang? That’s how you broke your nose?!” Lily hollered after James.

“Imagine that,” Peter mused, “my friend, Remus, a drug dealer.”

Marlene put her hands together in prayer. “Our Father who thou art in heaven, please forgive Remus for his past sins. He was being stupid—just a great big fucking idiot.”

"Hear, hear!"

Once they’d managed to move past the illegal drabbles of the East Enders, the girls grappled onto any tidbit of Tonya, especially the stories Remus relayed about her travels and every man, bloke, and beggar she’d managed to swindle along the way.

“She sounds like a real queen bitch,” Mary said, and Remus hesitated before figuring that it must be a good thing.

And that was it. When he was done talking, his friends simply stopped. It was obvious there were more questions, but there was also more time. It was as though they trusted him enough to know that he wasn’t just going to run off and leave them hanging. And for Remus, who had done nothing but run for the last six years, it was peace.

As they cycled on to new talks of Easter plans and travels home, Remus lapsed into a bout of quiet tranquility. No one questioned it. Marlene held his hand and Mary’s shoulder pressed up against his own fondly. He was happy. Just like with music, his friends’ voices put him so at ease that before he knew it, Remus had fallen asleep.

* * *

Maybe it was the chatter, or the fact that he’d been operating on little more than glimpses of shut-eye lately, but whatever it was, Remus had never slept so soundly. They'd left the window open so the girls' room was still cool, and Marlene's hair smelt good even as it tickled his nose. She must've changed her shampoo—instead of fresh linens and hints of lemon Remus detected sandalwood and the sort of burnt-sugar aroma that came along with hand rolled cigars. Smiling lightly to himself, he shifted and Marlene gave a muttered groan—only it was a much lower noise than he'd ever heard her make. Masculine almost.

Oh god.

Remus' eyes shot open.

No. No way.

He was pretty sure the last time he'd seen Marlene her hair was pin-straight and blonde, not a mess of pitch-black waves that looked like spilt ink on a pillow. He was also sure that Sirius had been lying on Mary's far side, and yet he was right there next to him, dozing with a relaxed expression. This close, Remus could almost count every one of his eyelashes. It was horrifying. His heart was hammering so loudly he was half-convinced Sirius would hear it and wake up. He could already imagine his eyes whipping open—that split-second of seeing himself reflected in their pooly grey colour before everything came crashing down.

Desperate, Remus made to pull away only to freeze again when someone nuzzled him from behind. It was Marlene, he realised. At some point while sleeping he must've rolled away from her toward Sirius, banishing his peace from the evening before. With his best friend at his front and his girlfriend at his back he was utterly trapped. If he dared move so much as a single muscle, he was sure Sirius would wake and they'd have to acknowledge the closeness. And then something would change. Their relationship would shift again. Like a barrel over a waterfall.

Remus tried to mentally reason with himself; Sirius wasn't—okay maybe he was—but he wasn't!

But who was he kidding? The girls, the squirmy sensation he got in his gut when they were alone together—the bloody incidents? It was undeniable. A change so subtle it'd become as natural as breathing before he'd even realised it. Maybe that's why it took so long to notice. Feeling almost light-headed, Remus looked down again. Sirius' lips were gently parted in his sleep. His own felt dry and chapped, but Sirius' looked pillow-soft. And they were right there. All he'd have to do was reach across that short space and—

Squeezing his eyes shut, Remus went rigid as a board, refusing to even breathe in Sirius' direction. He waited for what felt like hours until mercy finally shone on him. With a little grunt, Marlene turned over onto her other side in her sleep and he seized his opportunity immediately, flipping over and breathing in until linen and lemon drowned out all hints of Sirius. It helped some, but still his mind wouldn't shut off. He and Sirius were friends, best friends even. They were each other's secret keepers—future bandmates. They both had girlfriends who they liked and they stayed up late listening to each other's favourite music, comforting one another when reality got to be too much. Sirius knew how to push boundaries just enough to make him feel better but not so much as to make everything bad again. And things were never bad around Sirius because Sirius made everything good. Sirius didn't think that about himself, but Remus knew it. Sirius was good. He was funny and handsome and infuriating and Remus loved—

He loved Sirius.

Oh no.

I love Sirius?

It was like a punch to the gut, and Remus' eyes flew open. Of course. That was it. That was everything. Everything wrong with him and everything so, so right. Sirius Black with one of his bestest friends in the world, and Remus was also indisputably—irrevocably—in love with him.

Well, the voice in his head said, good luck with that one, mate.

Chapter End Notes

A/N, as of 10/18/22:

This chapter has been edited to take away from the usage of a particular slur, once uttered by a character in hatred. I recognise that the slur is actively used as a vehicle for violence against other human beings today, not just in 1977. That word has since been removed from the fic, and will not appear in any further versions of my writing (actively condemned by character or otherwise). I apologise to anyone who might've been hurt by my usage of this word, even in a fictional context. Words are not fictional, and in my own privilege I lost sight of that. Thank you for those who spoke their mind and helped me see how it was actively harming real people, not just an added plot-line in a fictional story, and my sincerest apologies for committing to the act in the first place.

Chapter 55: Detach

Chapter Summary

The return home before Easter holiday, 1978.

Chapter Notes

moonyfrog told me to take a break from my mental health and finish this, LOL (all jokes—shoutout to them) so you can... "thank" them for this chapter, hehe. Wanted to post it early because it's a shorter one, next chapter will still be out sometime this weekend.

PS: For those of you on tik-tok, the opening of this chapter reminds me a lot of "Wake up Gromit! C'mon Gromit, we've got to hide the body! There's no cheese and crackers in prison, Gromit!" and it just makes me chuckle.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Tommy, can you hear me?
Can you feel me near you?
Tommy, can you see me?
Can I help to cheer you?
Oooh, Tommy,
Tommy,
Tommy,
Tommy…

- "Tommy Can You Hear Me?" The Who, 1969

"HOLY FUCK, WE'RE SO LATE!"

Remus shot upright in bed. All around him, his friends awoke in varying states of distress. There was no time for any of them to wonder how Sirius and Mary had mysteriously changed spots—there was no time for anything. In some sick show of comradery, all of them had fallen asleep in one massive pile, and now they were late for their bus home.

"Fuck—fuck—fuck." James continued to curse as he flew off the bed, bouncing across the room to collect his trainers. It was his incessant internal clock that saved them, which meant there had to be at least one upside of having a morning person for a best friend.

"How much time do we have?" Lily demanded, all while rubbing her eyes, which were still red and puffy from the day before.

"Not much!" Peter answered, white-knuckling Lottie's alarm clock. "Has anyone seen my other shoe?!"

Still slightly dazed, Remus got up after Mary and immediately bungled it, tripping over the corner of Lottie's shag rug. He sprawled with a great 'omph!', knocking both his elbow and head sharply against the floorboards. While his ears rung, he became aware that someone was calling his name, but only snapped to when he come face-to-face with Sirius, who had bent over to help him up.

"C'mon, Moony. We don't have time for your theatrics, we're gonna miss the bus!"

Remus was a deer in headlights. His toes curled. His mouth dropped open. And then he remembered.

I like Sirius Black.

The thought crashed into him like a freight train. He wanted to flee—to find the deepest hole he could, crawl into it, and never come out again. Sirius looked so perfect, he couldn't take it! All sea-stone eyes and sleep-mussed hair and—

No! Bloody-fuck no! This is insane! Who thinks like this?!

Sirius was his friend—dammit! He didn't have the time or willpower for this. How had he even managed to fall back asleep? Was it sheer nerves? Had he simply passed out in shock instead?

"Moony? Earth to Moony!" Sirius grumbled, irritated that Remus had laid there like a dead fish rather than take his hand.

He's calling you, that cursed, sing-song voice said. Maybe snap out of it, hey?

"MOOOONY!"

"Okay!" Remus wheezed, grappling onto his arm and letting Sirius swing him back up to his feet. James and Peter were already outside, having left through the window while Remus was still having his internal melt-down. Sirius promptly followed them, before looking back at Remus with an odd look.

"Are you okay? You look more freaked out than usual."

"I'm fine," Remus grunted, not meeting his eye.

"Did you actually hit your head?"

"No! Now go on!"

Sirius looked him up and down once more before swinging his leg over the window ledge and gracefully dropping down onto the electrical box below. Stomach in knots, Remus hesitated. Would he be able to survive nine hours on a train like this?

“Fuck, my hair!” Mary wailed from behind. “Has anyone seen my sleeping bonnet?”

“You left it in the bathroom,” shouted Lottie.

“… WHO GOT IT WET?! IT’S SILK!”

Screw the train, he wouldn't survive another thirty seconds in here. Practically holding his breath, Remus swung both legs over the window.

“Remus!” Marlene called, just before he could throw himself off the ledge. While the rest of the girls flew about their bedroom collecting last minute packing, she scuttled forward. “I meant to ask you something yesterday.”

“LUPIN!” James barked from outside; “LEG IT OR LOSE IT!”

“I’m coming!” Remus lashed. When he turned back he caught an eyeful of Mary as she whipped off her shirt without a shred of hesitation. Moaning, he quickly covered his eyes to preserve both their modesties. “Look Cherry, can this wait until we’re on the train or something?”

"Well, I meant to ask yesterday but with everything going on—"

"LUPIN?!"

"HOLD ON!"

“I just didn’t want to put you on the spot in front of everyone!”

That got his attention. He peeked out between his fingers and Marlene relaxed, adjusting the rumpled school shirt she'd neglected to change out of the night before.

"I wanted to know if you'd consider coming to mine for Easter?" She asked quickly. "You don't have to! S'just a thought really...."

Remus opened and then closed his mouth in surprise. "Oh. You mean like your house… with your family?"

"Yeah, I don't think the drive is too far from yours in Blackheath, and my dad already offered to fetch you himself if you'd like. Really, it was my mum's idea. She was the one who suggested you come by for dinner. They… They really want to meet you, is all."

"MOONY!" Sirius wailed behind him. "I personally don't mind staying but unless you want to camp out at school for the next week, get your arse down here!"

"Alright!" Remus cleared his throat a bit. He hadn't really considered what he was going to do to pass the time while at home. Under normal circumstances he would've gone straight to Tomny's, but it'd been weeks since the telephone line had been disconnected, and a part of him was afraid to find an empty flat. And now with this Sirius-headache, he needed to find a new distraction or he would surely go insane.

"I'll come," he promised, and Marlene smiled with relief. It instantly made him feel guilty. First for considering his girlfriend a distraction, and second for every thought he'd ever had about Sirius.

"Cool, okay, we can talk more about it on the train then."

"Okay, see you there."

"Don't be late," she chuckled, waving as he dropped down onto the grass outside.

They ran back to their dorm, just to stumble across the bedroom's threshold and continue the race to collect their things. Remus had only enough time to change his clothes and grab his trunk before James was ordering them out again and they were weaving down the staircase along with a few other lagging students. On their way out, he distantly heard one of the phones ring, and then his name was called.

"Lupin, wait up! Phone's for you!"

James hit the breaks just as he made it to the front door, jacket sagging on his shoulders. “Oh bloody hell—Lupin, the bus leaves in twenty minutes!”

“So I have twenty minutes then?”

“It takes fifteen just to walk to Castle Hall!”

“Then I’ll run,” Remus reasoned, despite the cramp already forming in his side. “Don’t worry, it’s probably just Giles making sure I’m getting on the bloody thing.”

“Give us your bag then,” Sirius said, taking his trunk from him.

Remus handed it over, and his fingers brushed against Sirius’. A shiver shot up his arm, like an electric shock and suddenly he was drowning all over again.

I like Sirius Black. Sirius fucking Black.

"Moony, hand your bag over!"

He pushed the thought away. Now was not the time for another freak-out.

“Sorry! I—I mean, thanks,” he stammered. “I’ll... I'll be right behind you! Just don’t let the bus leave without me.”

Another strange look from Sirius. He was forming a collection, it seemed.

While his friends all nodded and threw themselves out onto Godric’s front lawn, Remus hastily turned back to the phone. He found it unhooked and waiting for him and quickly raised it to his ear, smoothing out his hair while he cleared the lump from his throat.

“Yes? Hello, what is it?”

“Hey, Lu.”

Another shiver ran up Remus’ spine, this one much different from the one the gentle brush of Sirius' hand had given him. With a shaky breath, he glanced around himself, as though it were a cruel joke and someone was waiting in the corner to jump out and scare him. Finally he switched the receiver to the other ear, hands trembling slightly.

“Tom...?”

“Yeah," Tomny's familiar brogue answered. "Haven’t heard from you in a while. Er... How've ya been?”

“How have I…?” He began to sputter. “What the fuck Tomny!”

“Oh, damn..."

Remus felt his temper flare. “Haven’t heard from me—how ‘bout haven’t heard from you! What the hell happened to your phone line?”

“Was jus' down for a while,” Tomny mumbled, completely apathetic.

“I thought you were dead!” Remus lashed. “Instead you just—what—couldn’t bother to pay the damn bill?!”

Tomny sighed into the other end. “Wasn’t like that. Sorry to worry you.”

“Fuck your sorry,” Remus grumbled, though his anger was already waning. This many emotions so early in the morning—he wasn't going to make it to lunch. “What’s been going on then? I’m about to come home, dammit. My bus leaves in a few minutes.”

“I won’t keep you then.”

“Shut up. Just say what you want and I’ll gas you for the rest when I get back.”

“Okay. Tonya’s gone.”

He'd had a response ready—another vicious insult—but suddenly all coherent thought fled his mind.

“What...?” Remus held his stomach. “What do you mean she’s gone?”

“She left.”

“Left... where?”

“Left the flat, Lu.” Tomny’s voice had an edge to it. “It was a while ago. February.”

Remus looked down at his shoes. The last time he’d talked to Tonya was February. Then everyone had gone radio-silent.

“Do—Do you know where she went?”

“No. She didn’t say goodbye actually. Didn’t leave much behind either. Jus' this letter for you.”

“For…” Remus trailed off in disbelief. “You sure it’s for me?”

“S’got your name on it. I can post it, if you give me your school’s address or whatever.”

“O—Or I could come and get it?”

“I’d rather just post it,” Tomny said. “Don’t really want it around 'ere anymore, ya know?”

“Yeah. Yeah, okay. You... got a pen then?”

He waited until Tomny was ready before relaying the school’s address. He’d expected him to say something stupid about the dorm's name or the fact that the street the school was technically on was called ‘Bell End Road’, but Tomny was quiet the entire time.

“Well, I’ll post it when I got the time,” he said finally.

“Okay. Are you… alright, Tom?”

“Mm. Jus’ fine.”

“You don’t sound fine.”

“I’m excellent then. Tonya’s old hat anyway. Sorry you’re just finding out now.”

“Yeah, but it’s okay,” Remus said, trying his best to sound upbeat, “I’ll come by and we can talk about—”

“I don’t think that’s such a good idea.”

“… What?”

“I don’t think you should come by the flat anymore, Lu. Lots of stuff’s happened. Ian cut a guy last month and we're still cleaning up the mess. Don’t think it’s such a good idea for other people to start comin’ round again.”

"You mean he... killed someone?"

"Well, it was'na exactly a knick."

“Holy fuck.” Remus forced a breath in through his nose. “O-Okay, but maybe once things have calmed down a bit we can meet and talk. Tonya said some stuff when she and I talked—”

“God fucking dammit,” Tomny said lowly. “Don’t you get it, Remus? I don’t want you comin' around! No one does—me, the boys, we got shit goin' on. Can’t sit around pretending things are fine and dandy jus' ‘cause you got a holiday from school. So you jus' stay away, and life’ll bloody go on like it always has, okay?”

Remus had never felt so fragile. Tomny never yelled at him—not unless he really deserved it. Hearing him say he didn’t want him around was like a sucker-punch to the gut.

“Did you—” Tomny coughed sharply before letting out a staggered breath. “Did you hear me?”

“Yeah Tom…” Remus whispered, head down, “I heard you.”

There was silence, then Tomny coughed again to clear his throat. “Good. I’ll post the letter, just… we’ll talk later.”

A lie. “Okay, Tom.”

“… Bye, Lu.”

The line clicked dead and Remus felt cold all over. He dropped the phone from his ear and leaned his forehead against it, sucking in a breath so sharp it sounded as though he were in pain. Then he realised—he was in pain. The cold became an ache, one he hadn't felt in a long time. When he finally realised what he was doing, he had no idea how long it’d been since James and the others had gone on ahead. Wiping his face, Remus hung up the receiver and turned, staggering out the front of the dorm toward the short-cut that led to Castle Hall. The reality that Tonya was gone and Tomny had finally said the words he’d been dreading most didn’t really hit him until he was walking across the pavement, staring as James waved his arms frantically for him to hurry.

“He’s here!” Remus heard him holler at the bus driver. When he turned back, James’ expression went from irritated to concerned. “Blimey mate, you okay? You look like your dog just died or something.” James’ eyes widened suddenly. “Your dog didn’t just die, did it?”

That would really be the cherry on top, Remus thought bitterly. He shook his head.

Gingerly, James pat him on the back and together they stepped aboard, the bus doors squeaking closed behind them. Going on ahead, James sat down next to Lily while Marlene waved at him from the seat behind her and moved her bag so he could sit. Remus lumbered down the aisle toward her, feeling strangely disconnected from his surroundings. He almost sat, before spotting Sirius near the back, tucked up tight next to Chastity.

"Remus...?"

He looked down. There was concern on Marlene's face.

“Sorry,” he said, clutching the back of the seat until his knuckles went white; “I just really need to talk to Sirius right now. See you on the train?”

“Yeah, sure,” she answered lightly, obviously reading his expression.

The bus was already moving by the time he’d made it down the aisle to Sirius. Chastity noticed him first, glancing up from her window seat and muttering something under her breath to her boyfriend, who looked up with a smile that made Remus’ heart lurch.

“Oh, hey Moony, glad you made it. Thought you were gonna have to mail yourself back to London.”

“Can I talk to you?”

Sirius’ smile disappeared in an instant. He looked to Chastity, before leaning in and whispering something in her ear.

“Noooo,” Chastity started to pout, but Sirius only cupped her cheek and murmured some more, still wearing that handsome look that not even Remus could refuse. Finally she rolled her eyes and stood up, squeezing out inside the aisle. She made sure to shoot Remus a nasty glare, before stalking off down the aisle.

“It’s fine,” Sirius said, standing up and indicating for Remus to take the window seat, “I’ll find her on the train.”

Remus slid in ahead of him and was instantly thankful. Each limb felt as though it were made with lead and he felt sick, like the rumbling motion of the bus had knocked something inside of him loose. Dropping down next to him, Sirius glanced around to make sure no one was listening in. Remus instantly loved him for it.

“So what’s up—who was on the phone? Was it…?”

As per usual, Sirius was already inside his head. “Yeah,” he croaked, “it was Tomny.”

“Well, about time. What did he say? Did he at least have a half-decent excuse for disappearing off the face of the earth?”

Remus turned away, rubbing his face. His eyes stung, and he didn’t want Sirius to see him cry. “He said Tonya left.”

“Oh…" Clearly it wasn't what Sirius was expecting. "Damn... She just left home?”

“Yeah. In February. Maybe right after we talked.”

“Do you know that for sure?”

“… No.”

“Then don’t say that.”

Remus felt a sob well up in his throat. What makes you happy? If he’d said he would tell her on Easter, would she have stayed?

"Hey," Sirius tried, leaning in close, "what's all this? It's okay. You're gonna be okay. You just need to see Tom, right?"

“No," he whimpered. "He told me not to come back, Sirius. He said don't come back to the flat.”

Anger bloomed on Sirius' face. "That sodding git—he’s blaming you?!”

“No, I just—I dunno. Someone died. Not anyone I know, but… God, I bet it’s a mess.”

“And he’s blaming you,” Sirius said again. “Man, fuck him.”

Remus flinched and Sirius pulled back. “Sorry,” he mumbled, before slowly placing his hand on his arm. “I’m sorry, Moony.”

“It’s what I get,” Remus murmured, “for thinking I could play both sides.”

“Aw, you poor idiot. You weren’t playing both sides, you were just existing. What’s wrong with that—with just being happy?”

But Remus wasn’t happy. For nearly two years he’d been torn, never fully in one place. And now Tonya was gone and Tomny had outgrown him and he had no way of catching up to either of them.

"I wish we weren't going home," he breathed.

"Trust me," Sirius said softly, "where we're going? It ain't home."

Oh, Sirius.

With his head in hands, Remus bent forward, and finally the tears came. It was like opening the floodgates. The rumble of the bus hid all noise, but it was like a thunderstorm had hit inside his chest.

“Aw, Moons,” Sirius said, rubbing his back. “It’ll be okay. It just sucks for a little while. I know, I know.”

Just the day before, Lily had asked him if he cried. He'd hesitated then. But now, with Sirius doing his best to cover him from view, Remus wasn't sure he would ever be able to stop.

Chapter End Notes

:^)

(that is my suss face. sorrz)

Chapter 56: Easter, 1977

Chapter Summary

Remus returns to London for Easter, short a few friends. Luckily the McKinnons have invited him for dinner.

Chapter Notes

This chapter took a while to edit, so it's out a little later than I would've preferred. Hope you enjoy it though!

CW: 'F' word used in smoking context. Brief mention of sexual content. Some not so nice undertones of homophobia and vague references of suicide.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Yesterday,
All my troubles seemed so far away;
Now it looks as though they're here to stay,
Oh, I believe in yesterday...

- "Yesterday" The Beatles, 1965

Number twelve, Grimmauld Place of Widcombe, Bath, stood three hours away by train and a little more than four by car. Remus knew this because he'd spent his first day back in London measuring the distance out on the maps Giles left tucked in the seat pockets of the Rolls. It was as though he needed to convince himself on paper that simply running away to Sirius was not a feasible option. Even if he did make it all the way to Bath, Sirius wasn't even permitted to use the phone over holidays—Remus doubted he'd be allowed so much as a glimpse of his friend if he went. Though, the rebel in him couldn't help but imagine throwing stones at Sirius' window, then climbing some trellis until they were nose to nose and he could look him in the eye as he asked him to run away together. He knew without a second thought that Sirius wouldn't hesitate. They'd climb down that trellis with little more than the clothes on their backs and they'd be off. They could busk on street corners for pennies like they'd always talked about, and stow away in freight trains to warmer weather the moment it grew cold again. Sirius would never complain, too busy enjoying the moment, and that gave Remus courage.

Except it was only ever a fever dream, and foggy London mornings culled those quick enough.

Maybe if he'd had Sirius he would've been able to pluck up the courage to visit James or Peter's—but alone, Remus couldn't even pick up the phone, let alone accept invitations to mother-made suppers or Piccadilly Circus. He knew James and Peter would understand if he told them, but the mere idea of trying to explain what Tomny had said made him sick to his stomach. They would feel sad for him, then rage as Sirius had, but it would be misplaced. They didn't know what had gone on before, not really—how he'd lied to everyone and stuck his nose in where it didn't belong. How he'd used Tomny as an outlet for all the anger he felt for his parents, and Tonya as a comfort. How he'd fallen in love with both of them and then treated it all like a vacation from a life without any real hardship. It was guilt beyond measure—and James and Peter would never understand. Sirius came the closest. He already knew the 'before' stuff, which made the 'now' bits easier. But Sirius wasn't around.

On his second day, Remus wrote a letter.

Dear Sirius,

I called the flat again from my house. I know you told me not to, but I did it anyway. I was hoping the line would be dead again, but it rang and someone picked up. I think it was Ian, but I couldn't really be sure because I hung up the moment they said hello. I guess a part of me wanted to think that things would stop for them too. But Tomny was right. Life just goes on.

In the end he didn't post it. Instead Remus shoved the letter in a bottom drawer with the rest of his things; books, albums, cigarettes—everything that'd ever come out of the flat. He told himself that he would burn it. That way there wouldn't be anything left and he could truly put it all behind him.

When he'd reappeared on Tomny's doorstep last Christmas it'd been thanks to a sliver of hope that Tomny hadn't truly meant what he'd said when he'd gotten hurt in August. Now that sliver was inflamed. Infected and slowly poisoning the rest of him with anger and hurt and bitterness, enough to drown out some of the guilt. Tomny had given up, and wherever she was, Tonya had given up too. They weren't his friends, maybe they never had been. What sort of friends ran away or gave up on one another so easily? Sirius wouldn't have given up—

James or Peter neither. The phrase ‘give up’ didn’t exist in any dictionary they owned, and you’d probably have to break a few legs to get any of them to leave you behind. It made Remus wonder where he fell on that spectrum. He didn’t want to give up either, but if Tomny hated him so much, what else was there to do?

The only calls he took were from Marlene, his girlfriend and possibly the most reliable person he knew. She made things easier, even if he did feel guilty every time he so much as thought of Sirius in her presence. If Tomny’s phone call had done anything, it’d distracted him from the sudden Sirius revelation. The distance felt good too, in that way. Surely Sirius couldn’t occupy his every waking thought all the way from Bath.

Marlene visiting the estate had been Remus' idea, surprisingly enough. They had several days before he was due to visit hers for dinner and he’d suddenly grown antsy in the absence of his friends. Unlike James and Peter, Marlene knew some bits about Tomny—mostly the innocent stuff—and so confessing to her what had him so rattled was easier too. Always making sure to invite her over on the days Lyall was at the office, he sent a car and Marlene became the first friend he’d ever had over to his childhood home.

“Bloody big enough, isn't it?” She said, staring up at the looming ceilings of the foyer. Suddenly, as if remembering where she was, Marlene clapped her hand to her mouth. “I-I mean, it’s beautiful.”

“You don’t have to do that,” he smiled; “You can just be yourself, Cherry.”

She seemed grateful for that at least, and truthfully, he was grateful for her. They took their time walking the grounds, where Marlene met all the dogs and laughed when they leapt up to lick her face. She seemed to like the horses best, and though Remus had no personal interest in, he enjoying seeing the way her face lit up outside the stable.

Giles loved her, naturally. He’d grown up in Battersea not far from hers and was more than delighted to discuss how the area had changed since he was young. Other topics of conversation included football matches they both followed and of course Remus himself—though he was pretty sure Giles was making up most of the embarrassing stories he was able to ‘suddenly remember’. It was almost startling how well the two of them got on. Marlene had that sort of quick and witty disposition Giles admired, and the second time she'd come to visit, he went himself to pick her up.

Eventually Marlene had the idea that they should go and see a show. It was just by happenstance that her local cinema was showing the film version of Carrie, and though she seemed less than excited over the content, Mary had suggested to her that they should catch a movie at least once as a couple before they headed back to school for the rest of term. Mary was actually supposed to meet them there with some guy her cousin had introduced her to, but at the last second she'd declared him a creep and bailed on their plans.

"I don't know what's wrong with her," Marlene grumbled as they paid for their tickets. "It's like she's gone completely off the rails. She hops from guy to guy like there's a prize to be won—except the only prize I can think of is being called a slag. I don't know how she gets away with it."

"She doesn't sleep with all of them, does she?"

"No, but that hardly matters—they'd just lie and say they did get with her. Most boys are disgusting that way."

After the usher ripped their tickets they made their way inside and Marlene left him to go to the toilet while Remus got in line for the concession. When it happened he was mostly spaced-out, staring at the movie poster showing Carrie's actress bathed in blood on the wall next to the theatre hallways. Another movie had just gotten out, and a small crowd of people were shuffling toward the doors, scattering bits of popcorn on the floor as they went. He saw a flash of familiar golden-brown and abandoned his place in line immediately, shooting toward him with his hand outstretched.

"Tomny! Tom!" He called, hardly believing that he'd spotted his friend in some tiny picture house in East Dulwich of all places, but as he clasped his hand on the guy's shoulder, he turned and Remus realised that it wasn't Tomny at all, just a guy who slightly resembled him from the back.

"Sorry, mate," he breathed, "thought you were someone else."

The guy just looked at him funny before shambling off with the brunette girl he was with, and Remus had the bitter thought that Tonya was much prettier.

"Remus?"

He turned to find Marlene, her blue eyes wide with concern.

“Sorry, I… got distracted.”

“It’s okay,” she said kindly. “Did you still want that popcorn?”

The theatre was dark, which Remus was grateful for, and Marlene spent most of the film with her face turned into his shoulder, jumping every time the music clashed or anything moderately gruesome appeared on screen. He tried his best to focus on the film, but the incident with the almost-Tomny had him too rattled to really enjoy it —which was a shame too, since he’d heard the filmmakers had used actual pigs’ blood in the finale.

Giles was waiting to drive Marlene home when it was over. She sat in the front and used her extensive vocabulary of ‘ibles’ (‘horrible’, ‘terrible’, ‘incomprehensible’, that sort of thing) to regale the driver with her impression of the film while Giles interjected with tidbits such as how Remus used to be afraid of everything from pigeons to his own shadow.

“You had your eyes covered during that part!” Remus protested from the back seat, after Marlene complained about the way Carrie effectively cut two students in half like ground beef by slamming them in a door.

“Says you,” Marlene laughed. “You were staring at the wall for most of it! What, starting to rethink this whole interest in horror and gore?”

He let her have it, only because he didn’t want her to think he was too distracted to have a good time with her.

When they made it back to Marlene’s house—a very modest-looking row home on a very modest-looking street—he got out and walked her to the door. Giles was watching them and Remus had to turn around and wave an arm at him in exasperation to get him to drive up the street a bit, which he did, only after honking obnoxiously.

“I like Giles,” Marlene said; “I see where you get your sass from now.”

“Yeah, he’s good,” Remus said, putting his hands in his pockets.

Marlene looked down at her shoes. She was wearing trainers and a pair of flared jeans, which had shocked him at first since he’d grown so used to seeing her in her school clothes. She had no makeup on and her hair was in a plain ponytail, but she’d worn these jangly bracelets on her wrists and a large flowy wrap-shirt which made her look a bit like Stevie Nicks.

“I had fun tonight,” she said shyly. “It was nice to go out on a real date.”

“Yeah it was,” he shrugged. “Too bad we can’t really see movies at school.”

“It’ll be summer soon. Though, who knows what that’s gonna look like. Lots can change between now and then.”

“Yup.”

Marlene opened her mouth like she was going to say something else, but just closed it again, smiling. “Well, I guess I’ll see you tomorrow.”

Remus nodded. “You’re sure I don’t need to bring anything? I could always—”

“Nope, don’t worry about it. Mum’s got it all covered. She’s excited to meet you by the way—Dad too. And my brothers are coming, so you’ll see them.”

“Right, no pressure then.”

Marlene pushed him lightly on the shoulder. “Don't do that thing."

"What thing?"

"The 'Remus worry'."

Remus managed a genuine smile. "The what?"

"You fret like an old woman, Remus. Sometimes I wonder if you're a teenage boy at all."

"Harsh, Cherry."

She shrugged innocently. "I'm serious, though. Mum’s a little pushy but if you just be yourself, you’ll be fine. Maybe polish up your table manners a bit though, they’re a bit lax.”

“Oh, you’re so funny."

Smiling, Marlene pressed up onto her toes to kiss him before turning and unlocking her front door. “Bye,” she said, closing it and leaving him on the doorstep.

Turning, Remus made his way back down to the pavement and up the street to where the Roll's brake lights were shining. If he were back at Hawkings he'd probably have heard crickets chirping, but it was just London, so all that could be heard were the nearby sounds of late-night traffic. Giles tucked away the paper he'd been reading under the car lamp as he slipped into the backseat. It was the same one he'd read cover-to-cover that morning, which meant he hadn't been reading it at all and had definitely been spying instead.

"Ready for home?" He asked.

"Yeah," Remus said, "let's get back."

That night he wrote Sirius another letter.

Sirius,

I saw Tomny today. Okay, you can relax, I didn't actually see him. Just thought I did. Made a stupid idiot out of myself walking up to some random bloke who I mistook for him, too. But now I gotta know. After Miles left, did you ever think that you saw him again, but it wasn't actually him? Was it all just wishful thinking? Did it ever stop?

I don't really know who else to ask about it. Marlene was with me but she doesn't deserve to deal with all my shit. You though, you kinda owe me. A question for a question, right? I suppose James might have some insight—I'll bet he sees Lily everywhere when they're not together. Every ginger girl from here to France could be her in disguise.

I never thought I'd say this, but I'm ready to go back to school. The city's suddenly too quiet. I might be going crazy, but I miss your noise. Or maybe I just can't sleep without hearing Pete snore anymore.

Hope you're doing okay. Don't jump out any more windows, the Marauders still need you as a guitarist, and I'm just not sure you can get away with only playing the harmonica. You're no Mick Jagger yet, mate.

Remus.

He let Giles post that one, even though it was embarrassing. He told himself not to expect a response, but Sirius was always doing the unexpected anyway—and even if Tonya had been the one to push him into it and all he wanted was to scream in her face, if he was going to stick with this songwriting thing, he might as well get over his aversion to the fucking postbox.

* * *

Sunday 10th April 1977 — Easter Sunday

He brought flowers because Giles said he couldn't turn up empty-handed to meet Marlene's family. He combed his hair because Giles said he looked like a yob when he didn't. He'd almost worn a tie because Giles said so, but had drawn the line there and shoved the thing in a bush on the way up to the front door to ring the bell.

Marlene answered, looking pretty in a blue dress and matching barrettes in her hair. "Don't you look spiffing," she said. "And you brought flowers. How cute."

"Giles' idea," Remus said bashfully.

Marlene smirked. "Well, you came all this way, might as well come in."

"Wow, thanks."

He passed her the bouquet and took off his shoes in the tight entryway as Marlene hollered down the hall to announce his arrival; "Mum, Remus is here! And he brought flowers!"

"How nice!" Mrs. McKinnon hollered back from deeper inside the house.

"Dining room's this way," Marlene said, gesturing down the hall.

"Hey," Remus asked quietly, stopping her before she could lead him further into the house, "your family isn't gonna, like... ask me about football and stuff, are they?"

"That's what you're worried about?" Marlene sniggered.

"That and other things. It just would be great if they didn't."

"Well, no promises," she smirked. "Now c'mon." Looking far too pleased with herself, Marlene turned and led him down the yellow-papered hallway and into a dining room. The table was made up for eight, set with floral-covered china dishes and a lacy table cloth. The dining room's walls were scattered with pictures and photographs of the McKinnons and their family, along with several holy crosses and a large portrait of Christ.

There was a short clatter and Marlene's mother appeared through the doorway separated the dining room from the kitchen. “Oh, there he is!” She cried, while wiping her hands on a dishcloth. Apart from being shorter than Marlene, she was almost the spitting image of her daughter, all fair and rosy. “It’s so nice to finally meet you, Remus,” Mrs. McKinnon said, immediately pulling him into a rib-cracking hug. “Marlene’s told us all about you, of course, but she never said you were so tall, my oh my.”

“It’s a pleasure to meet you too, Mrs. McKinnon,” Remus winced. She had a grip like iron.

“What good manners. But oh please, call me Joyce!” She declared, finally releasing him. “And these flowers—” she took the bouquet from Marlene as Remus subtly stretched out his spine; “they’re lovely! We can set them in the middle of the table. Now, dinner’s almost ready, so I’m going to get the boys. They’re out back smoking. Gracie, will you go check on Danielle? Her feet were feeling sore so she laid down in John’s old room.”

“Kay,” Marlene said, taking his hand while Joyce turned and retreated back into the kitchen. “Do you wanna see my room?”

“Sure,” he shrugged, and Marlene led him back out into the hall, dodging a rather large china cabinet and a second painting of Jesus nailed to the cross. “They call you Gracie?” He asked, absent-mindedly staring at Marlene’s hand in his as she led him up the staircase.

“Yeah,” Marlene said, “since I was little. 'Grace' is my middle name.”

“Oh. Right.”

“I was named after my dad’s aunt Gracie actually—the one who paid for my school and all that. Only you guys call me Marls.”

They stopped outside the first bedroom on the second-floor landing and Marlene knocked before poking her head in. There was a bit of mumbling, but she came back out with a smile. “Danielle’s my brother John’s wife. She’s six months pregnant and apparently has had a pretty miserable pregnancy so far, so I’m pretty sure everything still sucks for her right now.”

“And I suppose everything’s gonna suck for John too, in about three months.”

“Shhh!” Marlene hissed, but she was still smiling. “C’mon, my room’s just down here.”

They kept going, the floorboards creaking beneath their feet. Everything was tight in these sort of row homes, he knew, but Marlene’s house felt more lived-in than any of those he’d visited with Tomny in their early days. Each room seemed to smell of candles or cloves and every surface had some sort of crochet doily draped over it. Remus had never met any of his grandparents, but it made him wonder if this was what their homes might've looked like. The feel of a grandmother's doily, the smell of a grandfather's cigar—that sort of thing.

Down the hall, Marlene's bedroom was tiny, with only a closet, desk, and a single bed decorated with pink and blue flowers. There wasn’t much else apart from a few bits and bobs here and there and some old photographs of her and her family. She had a more recent photo of her and the girls framed on the desk and a small cross hung on the wall over her bed, but it was clear that the space was only occupied for about four months out of the year; Marlene’s school jumper was draped on the back of her desk chair, next to a stack of books and assigned reading.

“I’ve never had a guy in my room before,” she said.

"What d'you mean? I've been in your dorm loads."

"I meant my bedroom. Feels sorta different, don't it? More... private."

“Oh. Well, I’ve... never been in a girl’s room before either,” he told her. It was almost a lie—he’d been lots of places with Tomny, but as Marlene had so kindly pointed out—never in a girl’s room alone.

“Do you want to sit down?” Marlene asked, indicating to the bed.

“Okay,” he said. Like the floor, it creaked beneath him on squeaky rails. He expected her to sit next to him, but instead Marlene came forward and straddled his lap, thumbing the collar of his blazer. He stared at her a moment, at the blondness of her eyelashes and the light spatter of freckles that fleeted across her nose, and then just like that, they were kissing.

It was warm and wet, not unlike any of the other times they’d snogged one another. Remus never bragged, but they'd tried shagging again since their very first too. Just a few times; never enough to be deemed insatiable—neither of them seemed interested in it that much—enough to keep up. Or at least, that was what it felt like. Remus told himself it was normal. After all, they'd gotten more comfortable with each other. Marlene didn't shy away when he touched her anymore, and he'd grown used to lying with her afterwards. It didn't feel bad to leave, simply a 'right, see you tomorrow'. It was normal. Normal. And every part of Marlene was soft, the inside of her mouth even more so. This is what it's supposed to feel like, he told himself. Marlene was smart and attractive and she liked the things he liked, and he liked her—he did!

As Remus drew his arms up her, cupping the gentle curve of her waist with his eyes closed, he tried picturing what might come next. How he'd fumble with the zipper of her dress and then the clasps of her bra before tracing the soft ridges of her spine. It'd be easy, he'd done it before, except this time his brain didn't obey. Instead he found himself imagining a different back, a different waist. One that didn't broaden into female hips but narrowed into a smooth pelvis, and lips that weren't sylph-like and pink, but full and cupid-shaped. Blonde hair became dark, baby-blue eyes turned to silken-grey, and then everything was sandalwood and burnt-sugar hand-rolls and him—

Remus' eyes flashed open immediately. He pulled away, too ashamed to look up or say anything at all. If only Marlene knew. Maybe then she'd just hate him and some of the guilt would finally ebb. Except that would require admitting it aloud.

Hovering above him, still breathless from their kissing, Marlene bit her lip while she scanned his face with her eyes. “Sorry,” she mumbled. It only made Remus feel worse.

“You don’t have to be sorry,” he murmured. "You're my girlfriend..."

“Right. I meant, sorry I nearly jumped you at my parent’s house.”

Remus deflected; “Thought that was normal for a couple of horny teenagers.”

“I’m not entirely sure you are a teenager though," Marlene said, her mouth quirking up at the corners. "You’re more like a cranky old man trapped in a seventeen year-old’s body.”

Her humour worked, and Remus relaxed slightly, hearing the bed squeak beneath him. “If I’m a cranky old man then you’re a crazy old bat."

"Huh. Does that make us old before our time or young in our old age?"

"Both, I suppose."

Marlene chuckled and leaned forward, hugging him tightly while pressing her face to the side of his neck. Letting out a sigh, Remus reached up and cupped the back of her head. It hit him then that this was all he ever wanted from her. Her laughter—her acceptance. Except he was pretty sure boyfriends were supposed to want more from their girlfriends.

"Okay," Marlene said finally, pulling away and sliding off his lap to fix her dress. "Let's get down there before someone notices we're gone."

Another thing to appreciate about Marlene, she always cut out the torturous bits.

Remus stood.

"After you."

They encountered Danielle in the hall, stopped at the top of the stairs as she cradled her round stomach. "Oh, you must be Remus," she said, before holding out her hand. "Be a doll and help me down the stairs? My feet are killing me."

He did so, following behind Marlene while he guided her pregnant sister-in-law down to the first floor. When they emerged back in the dining room, they found four others waiting for them; Joyce, Mr. McKinnon, and Marlene's two older brothers. Remus shook his hand, finding it just as firm as wife's, though considerably rougher around the knuckles. He was tall too, certainly where Marlene got her height from.

"Michael," one of the brothers said, reaching across the table to shake Remus' hand as well. John, the eldest, was next, after he'd helped his wife into her chair and they'd all tucked in around the lovely Easter dinner Joyce had prepared.

"I hope you like ham," Michael said. "Mum's gone the full monty for ya, it seems."

"It looks great," Remus answered, both honestly and to be polite.

“Remus, since you’re the guest would you consider saying grace?” Joyce asked, opening a napkin over her lap.

At her request, Remus shifted in his seat slightly. He couldn’t remember having to say grace in his entire life. Luckily, Marlene caught on to his discomfort early and leaned toward her mother’s place at the end of the table.

“Mum, I told you Remus doesn’t pray,” she murmured.

“Oh yes, that’s right,” Joyce said, and Remus got the distinct feeling she hadn’t forgotten whatever her daughter had told her at all. “Well, that’s fine dear. Gracie told us about your family, and I’m so sorry about your mother. John, will you say grace instead?”

Remus froze in place. The comment about Hope struck him as so completely out of left-field that he had to be prodded by Marlene just to take her hand. To his left, Michael also thrust his open palm forward and Remus swallowed the stale air in his throat as everyone closed their eyes and John began reciting his prayer.

“Bless us, oh Lord, for these gifts that we’re about to receive from thy bounty. Through Christ our Lord, we pray, Amen.”

“Amen,” everyone else chorused.

The swift sound of clanking silverware followed as everyone dug in, spooning themselves generous helpings from the large dish ware. As he robotically did the same, Remus felt his mind begin to float. Your mother, Mrs. McKinnon's voice kept echoing. So sorry. Sorry for what? Why mention it? What did Marlene tell you? So much of what he’d told her had blurred together with his conversations with Sirius. Suddenly Remus found himself desperate to recount every bit of information he’d relayed about his family or his friends.

"Pass the potatoes, John?"

"Here's the butter."

"Has anyone got a spare napkin?"

"Remus?"

He snapped out of his daze, turning to find Marlene staring at him while offering a basket of dinner buns. "Do you want a roll?" She asked, presumably for the second time.

"Oh. Er—yeah, thanks." He took it, and quickly ripped into it with his fingers.

“So, Remus,” Joyce started, while the rest of her family picked away at their dinners, “how is your father? I hope he’s not missing you tonight. What is it he does for work again?”

“Remus’ father is a state minister,” Marlene said quickly.

“Let the bloke answer for himself,” Michael quipped, making his sister scowl lightly.

Stuffing his face with the bun to stall for time, Remus choked it down and managed a sip of water. His face felt hot. “She—ahem—She’s right. He works for the Ministry of Agriculture.”

“Doing what?” Joyce asked, spooning extra potato mash onto Michael’s plate for him.

“Well—er—he’s head of the department for animal welfare so he spends a lot of time at the office. It’s a lot of bill passing, I think. They’re responsible for food production and imports. A lot of trade, mostly.”

“I see. So he’s away a lot?”

“Yeah. He stays in the city centre a lot.”

“You poor thing. And what do you do while he's away?"

"We're at school a lot of the time," he answered, shooting a questioning look at Marlene, "but mostly I help with the dogs."

"Remus' father raises hunting dogs," Marlene explained.

"Hunting dogs, eh?" John mused. "You get out to shoot much then? Ride your horse down to the foxholes?"

Remus tried not to take the jab personally. "Actually, I don't hunt."

"What good's a hunting dog if you don't hunt?" Michael asked, raising his thick eyebrows. He had darker hair than the rest of his family but the same sort of strong nose as Marlene and their mother.

"I see friends too," Remus said, pointedly looking back to Mrs. McKinnon. "It's good being home. Most of the time."

"Oh, well in that case," she smiled, "if you're ever looking for a good group of people to spend your time with while at home, I'm sure our parish would be happy to host you."

"Mum, please," Marlene groaned.

"What? I'm only offering Remus a place to soothe himself and find a good sort to mingle with. Don't think I haven't caught on to your little attitude lately either, young lady. You can't be stingy with God."

Clearly embarrassed, Marlene glowered down at her dinner and Remus began pushing the roasted broccoli around his plate.

"You keep up with football much, son?" Mr. McKinnon asked. Having feared this question for most of the night, Remus glanced at Marlene, who turned her sullen look into a guilty smirk.

"Not really, sir…"

"You mean Gracie found herself the only bloke in London who doesn't have a team?" John snorted.

"People can have hobbies other than sports, John," Marlene said pointedly. "And Remus is hardly the only one."

"And where is it you're from again, Remus?" Michael asked, nudging him lightly in the arm.

"Blackheath."

"Hm, nice area. Lots of big houses. I worked on one once—building a fence. You ever been out this way much?"

"A bit," Remus said. "But mostly around the Tower Hamlets—Shoreditch sort of area."

"Ah, you're on the wrong side of the river then, mate," John interjected with a chuckle.

"I guess," Remus said, attempting a shallow laugh.

"What brought you out that way then?" Michael pushed, leaning forward slightly as though he could snatch Remus' answer right off his lips.

"Mates, mostly. They get around."

“Ah, ah, yeah, that’s right. Gracie mentioned that you had a few pals out that way. Fancy that, a posh boy from Blackheath with friends east of the river. Guess I’ve seen it all now.”

“Shut up, Mike,” Marlene grumbled over her fork.

“Marlene!” Joyce snapped before huffing and resuming her smiley expression. “I must say though Remus, when Marlene told us she met a boy at that school of hers I assumed you would be a bit different. More… French maybe.”

Marlene gaped at her mother; “Mum!”

“What? I only meant I find him refreshing! Not at all like what Mrs. Pierson’s daughter said the school was like. You remember Lacy—she graduated when you were still small. She was always saying that the boys there were rather full of themselves and their money and clearly Remus isn’t, so I’m just relieved!”

“You mean you’re relieved he ain’t a poofter,” Michael snorted.

“You mind your mouth at the table,” Mr. McKinnon warned, and Michael instantly turned stony.

“That is not what I said,” Joyce corrected.

“Thank the Lord,” John added, eyeing his wife as she spooned a second helping of potatoes onto her plate.

“You ever do much work with your hands, Remus?” Mr. McKinnon asked.

Remus squeezed his fork. Did rolling your own fags count?

“Remus is a musician,” Marlene supplied. It was probably the worst thing she could’ve said—Remus knew this even before he saw her father and brother’s face tighten in suspicion. What sane working man wanted to know that their only sister and daughter was dating an artist.

“I dated a musician once,” Danielle supplied around her chewing. “He’s a plumber now.”

“Now there’s a respectable profession,” Michael said, “ ‘cept every day you come home smelling like—”

“How about your mother, Remus?” Joyce interrupted; "What did she do before she passed on?"

"Well, she um…" Remus took a deep breath, "she was sick for a long time when I was a kid so, mostly just took care of me and other stuff."

Joyce frowned; "I feel for you, I really do. It's so hard when a family member just refuses to get better. Didn't she try seeking any help for her problems?"

Refuses? Problems? "She had lots of doctors."

"Oh of course, but when someone's sick like that we really should be looking toward—"

"Mum, please," Marlene tried, "can't we just eat dinner?"

"I thought you wanted us to get to know Remus?"

"This is private," Marlene pushed. It made Mrs. McKinnon click her tongue in disappointment and turn back to him.

"I'm sorry, Remus, I must sound just terribly pushy. These things are of reasonable concern though, you understand. You're both so far away at that school, it makes me nervous. I've read that it can be genetic, and if you and Marlene continue on together it's just as well that we be open about—"

"Joyce," Mr. McKinnon interrupted gruffly, while clearing his throat. "Food's getting cold."

Mrs. McKinnon sighed, but nodded her head. "Oh, listen to me ramble. Must be embarrassing for you kids. All I meant to say is that you have help here, should you ever need it. Alright, Remus?"

He was stunned. Livid, possibly. All he could manage was a grim 'thank you', and that only brought another one of Joyce's sickly-sweet smiles. By the time everyone was finished eating, Remus had been reduced to brief or else, one-word answers. He could tell the family was becoming unimpressed—Michael just about said as much—but he was too astonished and too irritated to care.

Once the girls got up to start clearing the dinner plates to make way for dessert, Remus whispered to Marlene that he was going to have a cigarette and stepped out the front door by himself. The more he thought about Mrs. McKinnon's words, the angrier he got. How could someone like Marlene have come from such an obtuse, unpersonable group of people? And how could she have thought it was a good idea to tell them anything about him? It was exactly why Remus didn't share stories back and forth. Hope was one thing, but the music and stuff about Tomny was too much intersection. It made him sick just thinking about what they'd all really been thinking while they sat there around the table.

"Whooh," Marlene said, stepping out the front door behind him and awkwardly rubbing her arms. "Sure got chilly. I thought we were done with winter, but guess not."

Grunting in response, Remus lifted his cigarette to his lips and took a long drag. So far the nicotine had done little to tame his foul mood.

"I brought you your jacket," Marlene said, offering it up. He took it and slipped it on without a word, turned away from her and glaring at the street.

"Sorry if that was uncomfortable," Marlene continued, trying to edge her way into his eye-line. "My brothers and I normally get on, but Michael's gotten almost intolerable ever since he got this job laying sheet metal. All he does is work and hang out at pubs now. It's turned him into a right jerk most of the time. And Mum, well... you know how it is."

"Do I?" He replied dryly. Marlene frowned quietly and got closer, waving the smoke away from her face.

"Are you alright?" She asked gingerly.

"Fine."

"You don't sound fine. You sound a bit upset actually."

"Nah, just peachy."

She sighed; "Remus, I'm sorry for what my family said—"

"Oh no, they were totally fine, or at least I was surviving their fucking interrogation. It's what you said, actually."

"Me?"

"Yes, you." Remus pulled his hand down and blew smoke out his nose as he rounded on her. "Why would you tell them about my family? My mum—my friends?"

“Because… you’re my boyfriend,” Marlene started, eyes wide.

“So that just gives you free rein to ramble on about someone else’s business? I didn’t come here on Christ’s bloody birthday—”

“Christ was born on Christmas.”

“Oh for fuck’s—I didn’t come so your family could rag on me for my dad's money while also pitying me for being the poor mum-less bleeder. ‘Least of all your lunatic of a mother!”

Marlene gasped, clearly astonished by the insult. “Is that really what you think that was—pity? Remus, I know my mum might not have the smoothest delivery, but her mother passed when she was young too. I’m sorry if she was insensitive, she just knows how it feels, s'all. Don't you want somebody to relate to?”

"No!" He snapped. "In fact, I don't! Actually fuck that!"

"Don't swear at me!"

“I'm not!" He croaked. "But what the hell was with all that shit about ‘doctors’ and ‘help’ and 'problems'? Excited for dinner—as if! She just wanted to see how much crazy got passed down so she could call the damn loony bin to have me carted off and committed!"

"No, she wasn't!"

"Then what the fuck, Marlene?!"

“You never talk about what happened,” Marlene whimpered, suddenly a lot more hesitant. “Maybe if you did then we’d be able to—”

“To what, pity me even more?!”

“Damn it, Remus—we want to sympathise with you! All of us!”

“Yeah well, who fucking ASKED YOU TO?!"

She was quiet for a moment, lips pressed into a thin line. “I’m gonna let that one slide only because you’re right, she was being too nosey—but just that one. You don’t get to yell at me at my own home, Remus Lupin. You don’t get to—to insult me and my family.”

“I wasn’t insulting you," Remus scowled.

“And yet I feel insulted.”

“Sounds like a you problem, then.”

“Oh, where’d you hear that?” Marlene lashed. “From Sirius? Funny how he always ends up cutting in. Figured London would be far enough away but guess not.”

“It wasn’t Sirius,” he snapped. “I just don’t know why everyone feels the need to talk about other people’s damn business!”

“You may not talk to your family, but that doesn’t mean everyone else wants to cut them off! You’re the odd one out here—not me!”

Remus scoffed and threw his cigarette away. “Fucking fine. Whatever.”

Marlene gave a great sigh and pinched her forehead. “I should’ve seen this coming. Mary said we were due for our first fight anyway.”

“Oh, so you’ve been telling Mary everything too, then?”

“No, of course not! But you tell Sirius everything and she’s my best friend!”

“Really, ‘cause all you do is complain about her! You never like anyone she dates and you always have to have a bloody opinion about it—”

“And you hate everyone Sirius dates!”

“That’s different!”

“How so? You complain about him just as much as I complain about Mary and you’re still friends, so don’t talk to me about relationships, you bloody hypocrite!”

Furious, Remus turned away but Marlene only grabbed his arm and drew him back. “Remus, I’m sorry. I didn’t mean it. We’re just angry. If you’ll come back inside we can yell and scream at each other later when we’re both feeling a little less stressed. I’ll tell Mum no more talk about family or friends or whatever.”

“No,” he started, pulling away; “No, I think I’m just gonna go.”

“What? You can’t just go,” Marlene said, reaching for him again; “What are you gonna do, walk home?”

Remus quickly backed away. “I’ll call Giles from a booth, just… I’ll see you on the train."

"Remus? Remus!"

Marlene kept shouting his name but he was already turning, starting down the dark pavement and away from the row of tiny houses. She chased him in her house slippers, but finally stopped once he'd crossed the street and slipped between a few parked cars. It wasn't hard to find a phone booth, but Giles was less than impressed when he asked him to come get him, not only early but several streets from his girlfriend's house. He came anyway and Remus threw himself into the back of the Rolls feeling just as irritated as before, but a lot chillier.

Back home, it was easy to feel angry over Marlene's admission to guilt. It was as though his childhood home was seeping into him, feeding the rage and feelings of betrayal as it always did. The things he'd told Marlene, he'd told in confidence, even if he didn't outwardly say it. Someone like Sirius would've known that—it would've been automatic in his mind—so why wasn't it for her? What made her parents so worthy of such information? What made anybody?

To try and forget some of the grief, he listened to the radio. That only made him miss Tonya and Sirius. And since he couldn't have either, he went for walks. All day he stayed out, tracing the same path around the estate until he could see the clear outline of his boots in the mud. The dogs were noisy and happy enough for the both of them, and eventually he wasn't angry anymore. Or he was, and rather the fatigue of it all had dulled everything.

"Don't feel down, lad," Giles would tell him, "women are fickle things —impossible to please. It's why I never married. Never had any interest in the heartbreak of it all. And lemme tell ya, stay a an eternal bachelor, and you'll live a long life. Get married, and you'll be down and out by the time you're forty."

"You know, Gil," Remus sighed. "I actually think I believe you."

"You should make up with the girl though," Giles instructed right away. "Whatever you said couldn't have been that bad. Besides, I liked her. She could definitely keep your cheeky arse in check."

Remus tried not to agree, and at night, he tried not to think about Sirius. It was proving hard. Does he think about me? Remus would wonder. Did it happen with Miles? Does he torture himself like this? But Sirius had Chastity, and seemed perfectly content with the way things were. For all the things he was and wasn't, Sirius must've been a good boyfriend at least. Girls always seemed interested and it wasn't often that he got broken up with. How did he balance it all? How did he keep everything normal? He did it somehow—but how?

The problem was with Remus then. It was him who couldn't figure it out, not Marlene or her family or their friends, it was... it was hopeless. Without his anger to distract him, Remus just felt guilty again. Maybe things would become easier if he just resigned himself to being a better boyfriend. If he could just be like the rest of his friends, then perhaps things would finally settle into place. He could make boundaries, find a better confidant in Marlene, and put his feelings for Sirius aside for good. All he had to do was avoid that cursed 'L' word. Sirius and 'Love' could never meet. It was as good a plan as any.

Bounding into the parlour, he found Giles astride his maroon armchair, the daily crossword open in his lap. "I'm gonna apologise to her," Remus promised.

Giles looked up, his white tuffs of head returned to their original carrot-orange thanks to the fire that was glowing gently in its hearth behind him. "You are then?"

"Yeah. We'll work it out... or something. I like Marlene. Don't wanna lose her."

"I see. You gonna call her then? She can't whap you one through the phone."

They both glanced at the parlour phone, sitting ominously a few feet away. "I thought it might be better on the train," he mumbled. "Besides, I might deserve a whap."

The old driver smiled. "Smart lad."

He spent the rest of his time at home constructing a script, the same way he had with Sirius when they'd fought the Christmas before. It featured many apologies, but also boundaries, which Remus was proud of. And with any luck, Marlene would accept it.

Then, on the morning when he was about to leave to see his friends in person, a single letter arrived, expedited and addressed to him.

Dear Moony,

You're a shit.

Now that that's out of the way, the answer is yes. Yes. Abso-fucking-lutely, yes. I saw Miles everywhere—even heard him in the way James or Pete called my name. Still do, sometimes, but I wasn't lying to you either. It'll always suck, but it'll suck a little less later. You'll forget what the sting is supposed to feel like until eventually you've grown so used to it that it just feels like everything else. And maybe if you're lucky, you'll find some tosser who'll sit with you and share stupid stories and fags and tell you all about their favourite crazy books. (I finished "Carrie" by the way, and I'm never going to an American prom as long as I live.) Maybe that tosser will enjoy noise just as much as you do, and you can tell them all the secrets you've told me. And maybe if you're really, really lucky, you might even like them just a little bit.

I did.

Hope you're having fun with McKinnon. James says that Lily says that that's all you've been doing. (Ha—get the double meaning?) At least that means you're keeping busy.

See you at school.

Sirius.

PS: I already told you once, didn't I? One day Mick Jagger is going to wish he was me.

He folded the letter up tightly and tucked it into his jacket pocket, right over his heart. Then Remus picked up his trunk and made his way down the Lupin estate's front steps to where Giles waited next to the boot of the Rolls, all the while cursing Sirius for his ability to so easily ruin every plan he ever laid.

Chapter End Notes

The filmmakers did not, in fact, use real pigs blood to shoot 'Carrie', pfftt.

This chapter stunnnnggg, but was a necessary evil. Remus is deep in his 'denial' stage, but we'll see how long it lasts. 'Til next time <3

Chapter 57: Cherry, Amended

Chapter Summary

Back to school, with apologies and guilt in tow. But things go smoother than anticipated. Remus is loved.

Chapter Notes

CW: References to sex and smoking.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Oh, thunder only happens when it's raining,
Players only love you when they're playing;
Say, women, they will come and they will go,
When the rain washes you clean, you'll know;
You'll know…

- "Dreams" Fleetwood Mac, 1977

Wednesday 13th April 1977

Despite arriving early, Remus did not spot Marlene on the platform. He tried waiting, bouncing nervously on the balls of his feet until the train's whistle was screaming and James all but dragged him aboard. Feeling antsy as they made their way down the train's aisle, he peeked into the passing compartments in search of a familiar wheat-blonde ponytail, and only stopped after Peter had asked what he was looking for. Deciding that it might just be better to wait to apologise at school where they might have some real privacy, Remus solemnly padded after his friends to their usual seats. He was doing a good job of chalking his sombre mood up to general tiredness, until about an hour into their trip when Mary and Lottie passed by their carriage. Without saying anything, the girls waved through the compartment window to each of the lads, but when it came to Remus, proceeded to flash him several gestures of his own, these of the more crude variety.

As the girls disappeared back the way they'd come, Sirius leaned back against the seat with his hands behind his head, appearing nothing less than amused. "Blimey, Moony. What did you fucking do?"

"Nothing!" Remus snapped. " 'Least nothing that's any of your business.” He tried not to think about how Sirius had his legs extended, stretching across the cabin towards him in a lazy fashion until he was nearly tucking the toe of his Oxford under the hem of Remus' pant leg. The teasing gesture had been giving him goosebumps ever since they'd left the station. Remus also tried not to think about how Sirius’ cheeky smile—the same smile he’d been seeing for the past year and then some—now left him with very guilty knots in the base of his stomach. It made him hate himself—Remus the failure. Being in love with your best friend couldn't be the best way to make-up with your girl-friend.

At least Sirius seemed okay. Though he'd tried not to voice it (Sirius didn't like the fretting), Remus had been worried. Worried for him, about him—it never ended. Especially not after Christmas, when Sirius had returned with a flighty disposition and a bum-wrist. It'd taken weeks and an intervention on Regulus' part just to get through to him, but apparently this time around had been better. Since their arrival Sirius had been laughing and joking with his friends, a wide smile on his face. It made Remus happy, until he turned that smile on him.

"It's McKinnon, isn't it?" Sirius ragged. "She finally kick your lanky arse to the curb?"

"No." At least, he didn't think so.

"You in the dog house, Moony?" Peter snarked.

"Go on, tell us," James went on. "M'sure it couldn't have been that bad. We swear to help ease your heavy heart."

“We just had a bit of a row,” Remus amended gruffly. “It’s normal. Don’t try telling me none of you don’t get into it with your girlfriends?”

”No need to get nasty,” Sirius said.

”Oh? Shall I try asking them then? How ‘bout Lily, Prongs? When was the last time the two of you had it out?”

James grimaced a bit. "Well, I—"

"And Moira, Pete? Or Chas? Boy, I'll bet she'd love to share."

At that, all three boys looked away and Sirius began to whistle innocently. Irritated and not the least bit satisfied with his miniscule win, Remus turned to his window and propped his elbow up on the edge, glaring out at the rolling countryside as it passed them by. Then, for good measure, he kicked Sirius' shoe away by the toe. Sirius recoiled instantly, and Remus felt his eyes on him in question until he finally shrugged and turned away.

Don't think about it, Remus told himself. It'll go away eventually. Let the bastard shrug it off.

"You got our letters, right?" James quietly asked Sirius.

"Yeah," he answered. "I posted you back. Did you not get them?"

"Nah, sorry. Must've been too late for the post."

I got mine, Remus almost said, before he remembered that he was supposed to be brooding.

"S'fine," Sirius said. "You know, even Chas wrote me. Sent an entire package. It was a nightmare sneaking in without mum seeing."

"What'd she send you?"

"A few records. They're in my trunk. But also something else."

"Don't keep us in suspense," Peter prodded. "What was it?"

"You'll never guess."

Sirius' sarky tone got the attention of all of the Marauders, and even Remus was curious enough to turn back from his sulking view. Hopping up from the bench, Sirius reached up to the shelf over their heads and slipped one hand into the outside pocket of his trunk. He came back with a fistful of something pink and frilly that made every eyebrow in the room shoot up. Not even Peter had to do a double-take.

"She sent you her knickers?" James crowed, while Sirius held the pants aloft like a trophy.

"If you think this is shocking, you should read the note that came with them."

Suddenly the compartment felt rather stuffy. Remus shot to his feet, stepping past Peter and sliding the door open.

"Where you going?" James called.

"To apologise to Marlene," he grumbled, before whipping the door shut after himself.

Now, Marlene had always been a very straight-forward person. She preferred to tackle problems head-on rather than ignore them until insanity, which was not Remus' ideal method, but made for better apologies. Doing his best to work Sirius and Chastity Bell's knickers from his system, he prowled the train, stopping only once in the smoking car to puff on a single nervous cigarette. Eventually he found the girls in a cabin near the front, all three of them crowded onto the same bench and giggling over some magazine Mary was holding. Remus almost wished Lily was there to play mediator or at least ensure Marlene didn't push him out of the train at full speed, but they'd yet to make it to Lime Street, which meant he was on his own.

Feeling like an idiot, he gently wrapped on the compartment door with his knuckles and the girls looked up. Marlene appeared tired when she spotted him, which made Remus feel even sorrier. Next to her, Mary and Lottie shared the same narrowed eyes, like angry lionesses out for blood. In response to his arrival, Mary tried to get up and shut the curtains, but Marlene shooed her away with a sigh and opened the door.

"Hi," she said blandly.

"Can we talk?"

"So now he wants to talk!" Mary wailed from inside. Marlene whirled on her.

"Mary."

"Typical men," she carried on. "What's that they say? A women's dime spent on a man's time? Ugh."

Marlene pinched her forehead, while Remus all but cowered in the doorway. "Enough," she said. "Can you lot can just give us a few?"

Clicking her tongue, Mary moved past her best friend with Lottie in tow, stopping only when she was chest-to-chest with Remus in the aisle way. "You're a right twat, you know that?" She snapped. "If it were me I'd kick your arse to the curb."

"I'd kick more than your arse," Lottie added helpfully.

"You get a few," Mary agreed, before jabbing Remus in the chest with her finger. "And remember, I'm watching you."

With a final begrudging look, they shuffled past and Remus stepped inside relatively unscathed. Marlene tugged the door closed after him and pulled the curtains together to keep out any prying eyes.

"Mary looked about ready to skin me alive just then," Remus said, trying for humour and failing. Marlene gave him an icy look, and he sat quickly, as guilty as a hanged dog.

"Mary's loyal," Marlene replied curtly, before taking a seat on the bench across from him. She crossed her legs, then her arms. "Go on, then. I'm listening. Say what you came to say."

"I'm sorry," Remus said automatically, hanging his head.

"For…?"

"For leaving in the middle of dinner."

"And...?"

"And for yelling. I wasn't myself, and I embarrassed you." He looked up. "Can you forgive me?"

"Can I forgive you for dumping me on my own porch?" Marlene drawled.

Remus licked his lips. "I... didn't... dump you..."

"No? You mean to say that wasn't a break up?"

... Don't think about it. We're not supposed to be thinking about it!

"No."

Marlene tensed her jaw, staring at him for a long while before ultimately letting out a long sigh. "Well, considering you actually left between dinner and dessert, I guess it could've been worse." Uncrossing her body, she stood and came to sit next to him. They instantly settled into each other's side, and Remus took her closeness as an okay to put his arm around her. Marlene seemed to appreciate it, as she took his other hand and held it in her lap, fiddling with his fingers. "I'm sorry too," she said quietly. "I didn't realise it'd hurt you to tell people about your family and your friends. I should've asked you first, instead of assuming it would be alright. I know things can be complicated for you, and I don't want you to think you can't trust me."

"I do trust you," Remus conceded, "I just wasn't feeling all that great on Easter, and I think I took it out on you. Does your family hate me now?"

Marlene shook her head. "Told them you had a nasty allergic reaction to the mince pies. As far as they know, your face got all ugly and splotchy and you were so embarrassed you had to call Giles to come and get you."

"You couldn't have said I got a stomach ache instead?"

"I was still quite mad at you, you know."

Remus smiled down at their hands, interlocked at the fingers. This was how it was supposed to be, he told himself. He didn't like any other girl as much as he liked Marlene. There was Lily, but she was just a friend, and Tonya, but she was different and now gone. The Sirius thing was just that—a thing. He owed it to their friendship to keep it that way, and he owed it to Marlene to be a better boyfriend. More patient and affectionate and willing to show her off. Like James.

"What have you been reading lately?" Marlene asked obliviously. Instead of answering, Remus tilted her face up to kiss her. It felt like the right thing to do, and he was rewarded by the eagerness with which she kissed him back. Marlene was so soft. He appreciated this, he was certain. And then when they pulled apart she was smiling warmly at him.

"I'm lucky you're my girlfriend," he told her.

"What'chu mean?"

"I mean, we just get each other. Right?"

For a split-second, Marlene's eyes shifted, as though she were seeing something far away. But her smile didn't falter, and she hummed contently as she set her head on his shoulder. "Right."

They stayed that way until their train pulled into the next station, filling each other in on whatever reading they'd gotten done over the holiday (Marlene was not impressed to hear about The Shining, either) and Remus was grateful. Talking with Marlene was so easy. It made the painful things throb just a little bit less.

"I cannot believe she did that," Marlene gasped over the steady thrum of the stopped train. "Mark my words, you are never getting a pair of my knickers in the p—"

Suddenly their compartment door flew open and Lily Evans stood there, her hands fisted at her sides as though she were already primed for a fight. “Remus Lupin, you thick idiot! You sorry excuse for a toe rag!” She bleated. “How could you do something so nasty and horrible and—and—!”

“It’s okay, Lils, we’ve already made up,” Marlene said simply.

Instantly sagging against the doorway, Lily breathed out in relief. “Oh good. I was afraid I'd have to stay mad at him. In that case, happy to see you, toe rag.”

She came in and sat down, followed almost immediately by James, Mary, Sirius, Peter, and Lottie. All eight of them crammed into the girls’ compartment together, shoulder to shoulder and hip to hip. It was hot and uncomfortable but still, Remus had been missing it. Until something occurred to him.

“Hold on," he gaped, "were you all just waiting to listen to Lily tear a strip off me?”

“ ‘Course,” Sirius said, taking the spot to his immediate right; “Couldn’t very well miss that. I do love watching Evans shout.”

“So long as it’s not at you,” James pointed out, fitting in between Peter and Lily. The moment he sat down, Sirius stuck his leg out and jammed his best friend in the shin.

“Why would she be yelling at me when she has you?”

“You say that as if I wouldn’t be yelling at the both of you at the exact same moment—for the exact same thing,” Lily said smugly. Sirius only grinned back at her.

“Now Evans, I swear,” he started, “you’ll have nothing but allegiance from me, from here on out. In fact, you'll all be glad to hear that I'm turning over a new leaf.”

“Why the sudden urge to repent?” Marlene asked.

“Because as it happens, I came to a few conclusions over the holiday, the first of which being that I will never be having children of my own.”

“No?” Mary said curiously, leaning forward on Marlene’s other side.

Sirius shook his head adamantly. “No, and therefore I must prove my worth to Evans.”

“Why?” Lily laughed.

“So you’ll let Prongs name your first born after me, of course.”

A great guffaw went up from all of them, most of all Lily. “I'd love to say that the world would have to freeze over first, but even then!”

Sirius only shrugged humbly and leaned back into his seat. “Well, I guess I’d settle for godfather,” he hummed, his arm still pressed against Remus’ side. While the others were laughing, Sirius poked him lightly to get his attention. As if he didn’t already have it.

“Moony, when we get back to school, there’s something I wanna show you."

"What is it?"

"It's a surprise," Sirius whispered keenly. "I don’t need long, just a little bit. Just you and me.”

Remus tried not to react. “After dinner then?”

“Yeah, but not in the dorm. I want us to be alone.”

Fuck. His heart jumped. “O-Okay. Astronomy building?”

Sirius winked. “Meet you there.”

* * *

He’d expected Sirius’ ‘meet you there’ to be of the metaphorical sense, but Remus really did have to meet him there. Sirius was still off honouring the detentions he’d gotten from almost poisoning Snape, and when he’d finally arrived, he had Andy’s guitar in hand and a whirlwind smile on his face.

“Sorry if I made you wait,” he said, sprinting across the room to where Remus was just polishing off a joint. He hadn’t meant to start smoking so soon after returning to school, but he'd been nervous ever since Sirius had asked to meet and waiting on his own had kept him bored anyway.

"S'fine," he said, tapping the empty spliff on the ground and smudging out the ashes with his palm. "How was detention?"

"Alright—boring, mostly." Sirius set the guitar case down and lifted its lid.

"At least you don't smell like a barn," Remus observed. Sirius pulled the guitar out and shook his head.

"Wasn't at the barn today. Kettleburn passed us onto Sluggy to clean out like, a hundred beakers. It smelt even worse believe it or not. Next time I'll take the cows."

"Tosser. Who says the cows want you?" Remus said lightly. "Now what's this big thing you wanted to show me?"

Sirius glanced at him before slapping a single piece of notepaper down on the floor between them. "Voilà!"

Picking it up, Remus squinted at the page in the dark. He recognised the stanzas immediately. "You wrote a song."

"Mhm! Spent all week on it too," Sirius said giddily. "Dunno if it's any good, and I didn't have the guitar to write it to, of course, but I wanted you to hear it first."

He scanned the page, reading the lines off one by one and imagining how Sirius might fit them together to music. " 'She loves you smart-mouth, she loves you, she do, she loves your quick wit but she'll kill you too'."

"I like that bit," Sirius said, "when I wrote it I imagined something like this—hold on."

He fiddled with the guitar's tuning for a moment before taking a deep breath. When he played, he kept his eyes closed, as though that was the only way he could remember the moment he'd written it. As he did, Remus took advantage and got his first real eyeful of Sirius since they'd met on the train that morning. He'd been avoiding looking at him directly, half afraid that he'd notice and finally connect the dots. It was dark but like the star he was named after, Sirius glowed brightly on his own anyway. Remus saw him perfectly.

“What do you think?” Sirius asked, and Remus realised he’d missed the song entirely, too lost in watching the way Sirius’ head turned while he played, showing off the sharp outline of his jaw. When had his jawline even start to look like that anyway? It’d always been good, the lucky bastard, but now—blimey.

“Er—sorry, I sort of… missed it?”

Sirius gave him a funny look. “Is that code for ‘it sucked’?”

“No! Sorry, just stuck in my head a bit. Play it again, I promise I’ll listen.”

Sirius sat up a bit and scrunched up his nose. “Alright.” He started again and Remus concentrated on the melody. He was rewarded too, because it sounded so good. Sirius’ playing suited most things but it suited rock and roll most of all. It made Remus giddy just thinking about the day he’ll get to finally see him on a stage.

“That’s fucking brilliant,” he said the moment Sirius had finished. “Is there anymore?”

“Not quite,” Sirius amended. “Need a bit more time, but if you take the lyrics and add some flair to them, I’ll write the music.”

“Some ‘flair’? Who am I—Elton John? Want me to add some of the ol’ razzle-dazzle, too?”

“I just mean you can do what you want with it!” Sirius laughed. “That way it’ll be our song, not just mine. How else am I gonna rope you in?”

“You think I’m not already roped in enough?”

“I just mean I gotta give you a stake in something, right? Keep you tied down."

“As long as I get royalties.”

“Of course. I'm nothing if not honourable. For a Black, anyway.”

Smiling, Remus looked back to the song and bit his lip. “Do you want to work on it now? It’s still early enough, we can go back and I’ll grab the Fender and we can go wherever you want. Or just stay in the dorm —that’s fine too. James can even join in.”

“Sorry, can’t,” Sirius said, tucking Andy’s guitar away. “Told Chas I’d meet her. Man, she's so clingy sometimes. Did you know she wrote me a letter for every day of the holiday?"

"You mean, plus the knickers?"

"Yeah! Poor kid who passes the post along to me looked like he was gonna shit his pants when he had to smuggle all of them inside. Sometimes I'm real jealous of you."

Remus coughed out a laugh. "Why?"

"McKinnon's not so clingy, is she?"

"No… she isn't."

"Not trying to say anything about it," Sirius said quickly, shutting the case. "Just meant that it might feel refreshing to find a girl like that. It's good. I'm happy for you, really."

"You are?"

Sirius shut the guitar case with a smile. "Yeah. You're one of my best mates, Moons. Don't know what I'd do without you."

Remus wanted to rip his hair out. Instead he forced a smile, folding up Sirius' song and tucking it into his coat pocket. "I don't know, probably walk off a cliff or end up prison or something."

"Ha. Probably."

Standing up with the case in one hand, Sirius offered him the other. Remus took it wordlessly and let himself be pulled to his feet. Together they snuck out of the astronomy building, skipping down the fire escape's stairs. He tripped near the bottom and Sirius stuck an arm out to catch him. They might've sprawled down the last flight together had he not been so quick.

"Guess I can't go anywhere without you either," Remus laughed nervously, hating the way his ears and neck burned. " 'Roped in' and all that… ha…"

"So what you're saying is you don't need those royalties?" Sirius said, and Remus glanced at him sideways before pushing him lightly.

"Don't push your luck."

Sirius smirked at the ground and they walked the rest of the way to House Lane in comfortable silence, only stopping outside Chastity's dorm, Bronte House.

"Take Andy's guitar back for me?" Sirius asked, holding out the sticker-covered case. "I don't really feel like playing guitar tonight, if you know what I mean."

He winked, but Remus would've understood without it. "Yeah sure," he said, taking the case from him. Sirius saluted him and turned to cross Bronte's front lawn before disappearing around the dorm's side, no doubt to meet Chastity at the back door. Like an oik, Remus stood there wondering what the chances were that Sirius would reappear in apology. Then he'd say 'Don't know what I was thinking letting some silly girl distract me' and 'Let's go practice, Moons!'

He didn't, obviously, and Remus was snapped out of his daze as a group of kids made their way up the pavement toward him, chittering away. Rather than going back to his own dorm, where he might have to listen to James or Peter drone on about how much they'd missed their girlfriends over the holiday, (Remus loved them both, really, but Jesus Christ) he headed straight for Rowena House and threw rocks at Marlene's window until she opened it.

"You alone?" He called. Marlene nodded. "Can I come up?"

She nodded again and he climbed onto the electrical box, passing the guitar through the window to her first before climbing inside.

"What do you have Sirius' guitar for?" Marlene asked, setting it down beside her bed.

"Safekeeping," was all he said. Then he pulled her close and kissed her, because he wanted to but also because it felt like something he should do—should only want to do. He wanted to draw her up against him and forget everything else existed, but why did that feel easy and hard all at once? Everything seemed so simple for Sirius, like turning a light on and off. He missed him, missed talking with him. Was this how he'd felt when he lied about the double date? When he'd chased him down for practice or pranks and everything in between? Why had he always said no? All he wanted was to be around Sirius—Sirius knew everything. He knew about Tomny and Tonya and his dad and his bloody mum. He wanted to talk to Sirius.

But Sirius was with Chastity.

Remus sunk into Marlene and mercifully—because she was a better person than him—she kissed him back. He wasn't sure what he'd have done if she hadn't, and it was almost enough to chase the relentless thoughts of Sirius from his head. For the rest, he pulled her long runner's legs up around his waist until they were staggering to hit the lights. Quickly they became lost in each other's desperate breaths, as though they couldn't wait to stop thinking. Together they started tracing that gentle path that felt familiar and foreign at the same time —where comfort and guilt went hand-in-hand—and sank back onto her bed, just a tangled knot of limbs and clothing.

It's good, Sirius had said. I'm happy for you.

Remus arched up, knocking his lip sharply against Marlene's upper tooth in a clumsy attempt at a kiss. She didn't even hesitate, merely pulled off his shirt along with his jacket, then his belt, and he did the same for her, dropping her skirt off the side of the bed while she kissed his neck. It caught on something and he tugged, only to hear a clatter as the guitar case rolled onto its side. Freezing up at the hollow sound, Remus bit down hard on the inside of his cheek. It was enough for Marlene to notice and she straightened up above him, eyebrows knitted together in concern, still breathing hard.

"Are you okay?" She asked, smoothing the hair back from his forehead. "You seem a little off."

Eyes shut, Remus leaned into her touch, but even that too made him feel guilty. He took her hand and kissed her palm, mumbling into the soft skin; "I like you so much."

"That's not an answer," Marlene said, drawing her hand back gently. She always knew what to say.

He sighed, gritting his teeth. "I think I might be becoming weird, Cherry. I feel strange and I'm not sure why."

"Can you describe it to me? The strange bit."

"... Not without hurting you."

Marlene smiled, sadly. "It's okay, Remus. I understand."

"What?" He breathed. "How?"

She tucked a bit of hair behind her ear. It was such a Marlene thing to do. "I'm not blind," she said, "and I… well, I just do. Probably."

“I wanted to make this work,” he swore. “We just made up. On the train, I—I told myself I’d be a better boyfriend. That I owed you that much.”

Marlene squeezed his sides with her legs. “Remus, you don’t owe me anything. That’s not how love works. Two people who like each other shouldn’t be obligated to like each other in the first place.”

His gut squirmed painfully. “I think we should break up.”

A moment passed between them in the dark room.

"... Oh."

"I'm sorry."

"No, it's okay,” Marlene said. Then her shoulders sagged too, and he realised it was relief. “Actually, I think we should break up too.”

He tried to sit up but she was still straddling him. “You do?”

She nodded. “Yeah. I’ve been doing a lot of thinking lately and I’m just not sure being in a relationship is what I really want right now.”

“I see.”

“It has nothing to do with you, of course, Remus.”

“Oh, yeah, you neither...”

The corners of Marlene’s lip curled upwards. “You know, after you left on Easter my mum kept talking about marriage and weddings and other crap.”

“No way. Thought she hated me.”

“No. You make her a bit nervous I think, but she's probably just happy I brought a guy around at all,” she smirked down at his bare chest—a sad look—and gently traced the outline of his ribs with her soft skin of her fingertips. “I told her to forget it though. I mean... I don’t have any desire to get married as young as my parents. Do you?”

“Fuck no.”

Marlene laughed genuinely then, and rolled off of him. She shimmied in between his side and the wall in only her underwear and stared up at the bed’s ceiling.

“God, what are we gonna tell the others?”

“Who? Oh. You mean those nosey bastards. We’ll tell ‘em the truth—that we’re friends.”

"Friends. I'd like that."

"Me too."

“Then… I’ll tell the girls if you tell the lads?”

“Deal.”

More laughter, then Marlene leaned her head on his shoulder. “It’s sort of a relief—not dating you anymore.”

Remus covered his eyes dramatically. “And there goes my pride.”

“Fragile jessy,” she said, pinching his arm. “You’re the one who broke up with me.”

“You agreed!”

“As I was saying, it’s a relief to just be your friend again. I like you, Remus, but I’m not sure relationships are for me. Maybe I’m weird too.”

“Nah, you’re great.”

“Aw. You poof.”

“You might actually be the meanest person I’ve ever met,” Remus exclaimed happily. “And I’ve met Snape!”

“Ooh, do I get a prize?”

"Only my love."

“Ha. You are a poof. And I love you too. As a friend, of course.”

"Naturally."

They smiled at one another, before Marlene sighed and grabbed his neck, drawing him toward her. Their foreheads knocked together, and Remus felt calm wash over him.

“You know,” Marlene murmured, “I’m coming to realise something else about myself too."

"What's that?"

She hummed a bit. "I think I'm going to keep it to myself for a little while longer, if that's okay."

"Oh. Yeah, I understand."

Pulling back, she cupped his face, stroking her thumbs across the bit of stubble on his jaw. "Knew you would." She kissed him on the cheek and pat his thigh before swinging her legs over his and standing up. "Guess we should get dressed if we're not going to shag, then. Unless you wanted to try break up sex?"

"I thought it was 'make up sex'?"

She shrugged, then tossed him his shirt, tugging her own over her head as she made her way to the wall next to the door. "Got anything else to say before I turn the lights back on and we're officially broken up?"

"Is that the signifier?" Remus snorted, then; "Nah, I'm good."

Marlene smiled, but her hand stilled as she reached for the light switch. "Remus, do you think I could ask one more thing of you before we break up?"

" 'Course. Anything."

Hesitating a moment longer, she bit her lip. "Will you still call me Cherry even if we're broken up? You'll think it's silly, but it sort of… makes me feel pretty. Like how Mary feels when her boyfriends give her nicknames."

"Of course I'll still call you Cherry," he said, like it was the easiest thing in the world. And really, it was.

Marlene's shy smile returned. "Thanks," she murmured.

"Oh, and Cherry?"

"Yeah?"

"You've always been pretty."

"Oh Remus. In another world…"

Then she turned the lights on, and just like that, they were broken up.

Chapter End Notes

Lime Street [Station] is the main rail station in Liverpool, where Lily is from.

It's my birthday today! Feels crazy to have gotten this far. The fic has passed 300k words and 500 kudos, which is INSANE, so thank you so much for everyone that's been reading and commenting and leaving kudos. You guys are mental to be willingly going on this journey with me, but I love you so much for it! Best birthday gift ever <3

Chapter 58: Love Aeternus

Chapter Summary

> Remus Lupin is a free man. Free to date, or not date and just fret over how good his best friend looks when he's doing... well, anything at all, really. Dammit.

Chapter Notes

> CW: Light sexual harassment at the beginning. (All in jest.)
>
> Also, maybe bring some tissues? Idk.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Goodbye Ruby Tuesday,
Who could hang a name on you?
When you change with every new day,
Still I'm gonna miss you…

- "Ruby Tuesday" The Rolling Stones, 1967

Knowing that they'd be forced to shut up during communion, Remus waited until after breakfast to break the news about the breakup. Marlene had already strategically taken the girls on ahead, leaving the four of them to doddle over to the church on their own time. Remus purposely drifted back, nervous but also disinterested in the current topic of conversation.

"So Potter, what's the verdict then? Look, we already know you were all about the threepenny bits when you were but a wee lad—" Sirius illustrated by clapping his hands over his chest proudly; "but we're old and grown now. And I'll wager that nowadays, it's gotta be the arse for you."

In answer, James rolled his eyes dramatically. "I'm so glad we're talking about this before we get to church."

"C'mooooon, I've seen the way you watch Evans in that little skirt of hers," Sirius pressed, grabbing his best friend by the shoulders and waving him about. "Arse-man! Arse-man! Arse-man!"

"You're that sure, you fuck?" James demanded, shoving him off.

"Oh? You saying you're actually a fan of those little mosquito bites? Lucky Evans."

With a scornful yet delighted cry, James threw himself forward and began chasing Sirius along the outside of the courtyard, whooping and hollering as they disappeared behind the fence.

"This idiots," Peter said, falling into step with Remus as the other two took off. "Shall we go in, Moony? Let them catch up."

"I had something to tell you all," Remus said with a tsk. "Looks like it's gonna have to wait."

Peter squinted up at him. "Well, what was it?"

"Hm... You see, Marlene and I—"

With another holler, Sirius reappeared, his hair mussed from the chase; "Oi, Pete! We're taking a poll—tits or arse?"

Sirius all but shouted the question, drawing the ire of a group of passing girls. Each one of them scowled as they continued on into the church courtyard, making Peter turn a guilty, beet-red colour.

"O-Oh shove off, Black. It's time for bloody church," Peter wobbled.

"Blimey! So modest it hurts!"

At Sirius' teasing, James made his re-entrance and grabbed hold of him in a headlock. "Stop teasing our Wormy, you villain!"

"I'm only collecting statistics! Moira's rack ain't that bad!"

"Nicer than yours anyway, you thick nob!" Peter said, with more vigour this time.

"HA! You got me there, Wormtail," Sirius grunted, still trying to pry James off.

"Come on, let's just go in," Remus huffed, unentertained. "James, let him go."

Obediently, James released Sirius and laughed as he stumbled backwards. "Moony's right. Let's go, Black, before McGonagall drags you in by the ear herself."

"Well, hold on now," Sirius said, straightening his collar and tie, "Moony hasn't bid in. Now c'mon wolf-man, which do you prefer, bosom or bum? I'll bet it's bum."

"Don't be a prick."

"Ooh, a bit touchy today, aren't we? Don't tell me you and McKinnon had another row?"

“Actually Marlene and I broke up yesterday,” Remus answered plainly, drawing an immediate halt to any and all laughter. As his friends gaped in shock, Remus quickly busied himself by plucking a stray leaf off his jumper, trying to appear nonchalant.

“You broke up?!” James cried.

"—Yesterday?!" Peter added.

“Yep.”

“But I thought you just made up with her?!” James continued. “What happened? Are you okay?”

“Yes, I’m fine. I'm not some wilted dandy,” Remus scoffed. “And no, nothing happened. For your information we talked and just agreed we were better off as friends.”

“Friends?” Peter replied. “Like actual friends or ‘we dated and now it’s painfully awkward' friends?”

Remus made to go around them, rolling his eyes lightly; “The first one, Wormtail.”

“He means, are you two actually gonna try and be friends after being boyfriend and girlfriend?” James translated, following Remus from behind. He caught Remus midway across the courtyard and made him turn round again, which he did with another huff.

“Of course we’re gonna be friends. We were friends before we dated.”

“But dating kind of changes things, don’t it?” James pushed.

“How so?”

James took a moment to consider, looking uncomfortable. “Well—er—it just does, doesn’t it?” He threw an arm out toward Sirius next to him, who had been quiet ever since Remus started explaining. “Go on then, Black. You've never been friends with any of your girlfriends after you broke up, right? I mean, apart from Mary of course…"

"Yeah, and he's never been friends with any of them before they dated either," Remus pointed out stubbornly. "Look, is Marlene and I breaking up really going to be such a problem for you guys?"

"No," Peter said, "s'long as you're okay with it."

"I am."

"Well… good then," James finished. "What'd the girls say?"

"Dunno. Marlene was gonna tell them."

"Suppose we'll know soon enough then." James cracked a smile. "Hope this doesn't throw the group off-kilter though, now that we're not all in relationships."

Remus shrugged. "If you're that worried, Prongs, I could always propose to Lily that she dump you for me."

"Don't you dare, she was pissed at me only yesterday for spilling tea on her study notes, and she might just do it."

"Too bloody right, she might," Remus smirked, indicating to the churches doors with a flick of his head. He waited for James and Peter to go first, before falling into step with Sirius. He was still slightly irked, but Sirius' dubious silence was getting the better of his curiosity.

"You've been eerily quiet," he prodded. "What, no witty remarks about the break-up?"

"I'm sure I could come up with something if you're that desperate to hear my voice," Sirius drawled sarcastically, as he fell in line behind the crowd of other kids and began climbing the stairs into the church.

"You seem mad," Remus taunted, doing his best to squeeze in between the bodies to keep up with him.

"What? I'm not mad."

"You're being quiet. You always go quiet when you're mad."

"That's funny coming from you."

"There it is," Remus shot; "So what—you're mad when I start dating her and mad when we break up?"

"I'm not mad, Lupin. You just always ruin the fun."

Remus scowled and looked away, muttering under his breath; 'Dick.'

Some silence passed between them, filled only by the chattering of other students and teachers as they all started down the aisle between the pews.

Stupid Sirius, Remus thought bitterly. This is mostly your fault. Dick. Fuckface. Asshole.

“Are... you okay then?” Sirius asked out of nowhere, making Remus practically spring up on the spot.

“You—You mean about Marlene?”

“Yeah. Duh.”

Remus licked his lips. “Yeah, I’m fine. It was mutual.”

“Heh. That’s what they all say.”

“It was!”

Sirius snorted lightly, head tilted up toward the chapel's expansive ceiling. “Mhm. Okay, Moony.”

You are a fuckface. A handsome fuckface. Dammit.

“Anyone for cards after class?” James asked from up ahead.

“Can’t,” Remus and Sirius answered together, before sharing a quick glance of surprise.

“I-I'm... meeting Chas,” Sirius mumbled, not making eye contact.

“You could always bring her,” James offered; “Lily’s busy, and unless Remus wanted to bring his ex along then I think we’re in the clear.”

“So smug,” Remus sneered, “little do you know that the person keeping Lily busy will be me. She asked me to quiz her, but I’ll say hello for you too.”

James smiled, good-naturedly and slid into their usual pew. “Okay, in that case, hope you two have a good time."

Sirius blanched a bit, stopped at the end of the pew "How can you be so okay with that?" He half-squeaked. "He just practically told you he's taking your girlfriend on a date, and you didn't even know!"

"It's only Moony," James smiled. "If I stopped to worry every time it occurred to me that my girlfriend might be in love with him, I'd never sleep again."

"And if I asked Evans on a date—what then?" Sirius asked, and James pulled them to a stop to look him up and down.

"To be honest, I think you'd have more trouble getting Lily to say yes than me, but more power to you. Though..." James looked Sirius up and down pointedly; "Lily does prefer guys on the more—you know, tall side."

"Oh so we're doing short jokes now, huh?" Sirius lashed, before using both hands to propel himself down the pew toward him. "C'mere, Potter, I'll knock you down a foot or two!"

James squealed and scooted further down, crushing Peter in the process. "Remember the commandments, Black! Thou shall not maim their best friends!"

"Shove your commandments! I am five foot nine and still growing—and for your information that is above average!"

Remus didn't even bother sitting down. He simply took a step back and waited for one of the ministers to come along and berate his friends for fighting in church—which they did, severely. But as he watched Sirius stick out his cheeky tongue and flash the father the bird, it occurred to him that he no longer had to worried about that squirmy feeling in the base of his stomach. Sirius was in a relationship and he—Remus Lupin—was out of one, exactly the way things should be. Clearly dating had made him too aware of his surroundings, but maybe now he'd finally be able to relax and focus on the normal things, like music and school and just being present with his friends. Hoping for normal wasn't an impossible ask after all. Remus just hoped it stayed that way...

Later that day, he met Lily outside the Bellchant building as promised. The sun was shining overhead and the ground was miraculously dry for April, but still she brought a picnic blanket just in case.

"I'm glad you suggested we sit outside," Remus said, as he laid out his books and things.

"Me too," Lily agreed. "It's been so long since it was just the two of us."

The spot they'd chosen was just around the Eastern side of the building, giving them privacy from anyone who might just be walking down the street. It was also near the private music rooms, and Remus could hear the music of a violin drifting out of one of the open windows. He wondered briefly if it was Regulus, but then the violin made a screechy noise like nails on a chalkboard and he was instantly convinced that Regulus “Partita in D minor” Black would have never risked anyone hearing such a mistake.

“I believe you, you know,” Lily said eventually, “that the break-up was mutual. Marlene seemed fine about it and clearly you are too.”

“Finally someone gets it.”

"But if you want to have a little cry, I promise not to tell anyone."

"My hero." Smiling to himself, Remus tucked his hands behind his head and kept his chin tilted up toward the sky. They were supposed to be studying, but in a moment of sure insanity, Lily had tossed her school texts aside and laid down on the blanket to stare up at the bright blue overhead. He’d joined her, and they’d been picking out shapes in the clouds ever since.

“That one looks like a turnip,” he said.

"Where?"

He pointed.

“Oh." She squinted, then; "Nah, that’s a rabbit."

“Why do clouds always have to look like rabbits?”

“Rabbits are just very cloud-like, I guess.”

“Tell me about your holiday?” Remus asked. “How’s your family?”

“Mum and Dad are fine,” Lily said. “They just started compiling research for their newest book actually. 'Ferns of the Northern Isles'."

"Sounds... ferny."

She chuckled. "Kept them busy mostly, but Christmas was still good. I finally met Petunia's boyfriend—Vernon. He makes drills. Or sells them. Can't remember which."

"And I'm guessing he wasn't utterly magnificent?"

"Well Pet likes him, so I guess that must count for something. But good lord, it was like talking to wet cardboard."

It was Remus' turn to chuckle. "I like it when you're mean. Makes me feel so good about myself."

"What are you talking about, I'm not mean. I'm objective."

"Come on now, Evans. Everyone thinks you're this uber-kind prefect, but only I know the real truth—that you're actually Satan incarnate."

Lily gasped playfully and reached up to pinch his ear. "You take that back. Or I'll hang you by your thumbs in Purgatory."

Remus batted her hand away with a smile. "Oh, look there—dinosaur cloud."

She tilted her head. "What kind of dinosaur d'you think?"

"The one with all the spikes on its back."

"Hmm. I think it sorta looks like a rooster."

"Would it kill you to agree with me for once?"

Lily threw herself onto her stomach, hovering over him. "Possibly!" She declared, before blowing on his face sharply. Remus flinched but opened one eye to find her smiling at him, chin resting on one hand. "I'm glad we got to go home for holiday when we did," she said, suddenly quieter. "It helped put some things into perspective."

"You mean Snape," Remus surmised, and her downcast expression told him he was right. "He hasn't said anything else, right? 'Cause if he has, I'll—"

"No, no," Lily waved, "not him. As far as I'm concerned Severus can do whatever the hell he wants—it's the others. Secret's out so I figured everyone would know of course, but we've been back for less than two days and already people are calling me things like 'charity case' and 'hand-out Hannah'."

"Lils!" He gasped.

"That's not even the worst of it," Lily sighed. "Yesterday Severus' roommate—Belby, you remember—well, he sorta suggested that I... That I'm just dating James for his money."

Angry, Remus made to sit up but Lily only pressed him back by the shoulder, shaking her head tiredly. "Who the fuck gives a shit about what Belby has to say?" He demanded.

"Enough people to gossip, I suppose."

"Well, you can't just let them! We have to do something! Let me or James—"

"Oh really! What am I supposed to do—let you punch every idiot who thinks making fun of people for having less money than them is original?"

"Uh, yes!"

Despite herself, Lily smiled and flicked him in the forehead. "Sweet idiot. It's stupid anyway. If actually I wanted to marry rich I'd have chosen Black, I'm not that thick. Did you know he tried asking me out in eighth year?"

"No way," Remus gawped.

"Mhm. I said no, obviously. I'm was pretty sure he just did it to make James jealous. Now that we're older I'm even more sure."

"Sirius really did that just to make his mate jealous? Unbelievable."

"Well you've never heard it from James, have you? So I'd say it worked," she smirked. Their amusement allowed them to relax temporarily, but just when Remus remembered why he was so angry in the first place, Lily reached out and gently stroked the curls resting on his forehead. "I only told you about what the others have been saying because I had another point. I wanted to say that I'm not going to let it bother me. Not their teasing or their pathetic jokes—none of it. We all went home and I got to see with clear eyes exactly where I come from, and you know what? I'm proud. My parents might not be title-owners or business tycoons or whatever else, but they're scholars and they're good. It's enough for me so—so fuck everyone else."

Unable to help himself, Remus smiled. How could he have forgotten.

This was Lily. Lily "take no prisoners" Evans. No one could touch her. No matter the depth of their parents' pockets. “Ferocious Lily Evans," he murmured, reaching up to take her hand; "you amaze me sometimes.”

“Now you see, that’s why everyone likes you,” Lily said, blushing slightly as she turned his hand over in hers and pressed a kiss to his knuckles. “You best be careful or you’ll have a list of proposals a mile long, Remus Lupin. Mary’s already put the word out that you’re back on the market.”

He shot upright slight, nearly knocking their foreheads together. “She what?!”

“Yup," Lily grinned, patting his hand now. "And I may know a few gals who might be interested if you’re looking.”

“I’m not,” he moaned, dropping back down on the blanket; "So please, don’t bother.”

“Did Marlene crush you that badly, dear Remus?”

“Augh—no.”

“Ah, I see, then. You’ve already got your eyes set on someone else.”

Remus felt his stomach clench. “No! I’m just too busy for another relationship right now. I think I’m gonna try the single thing for a while, if you don’t mind.”

Narrowing her eyes, Lily peered down at him suspiciously. “You’re lying.”

“I’m not!”

“You are.”

“And how can you even tell?”

“You’re getting defensive.”

Remus almost snorted at that. “I’m always defensive. It’s literally a fatal flaw.”

"And you're being sarcastically dismissive!"

"Call those fatal flaws two and three!"

“Do you know that when you’re really lying, you get this little nervous twitch at the corner of your mouth.”

“I do not!” He shouted, covering his face with his hands.

Lily beamed; “Ah! I’m right then, aren’t I? You fancy someone!”

“I’m telling you, Evans, you’re wrong! I just don’t want to date anyone right now.”

“Hm, okay, suit yourself.” Lily began to examine her nails, almost imitating Mary. “Just let me know when I should be playing cupid again.”

He peeked out at her between his fingers. “Satan. Incarnate.”

“Oh look, you have a pimple right there. Here, let me get it.”

“No, keep your vicious mitts to yourself!”

Drawing back, Lily gave a playful shrug and then reached up to untangle a red curl that had blown into her face in the breeze. Lowering his hands, Remus watched her. Even if he could find some reason to justify liking Sirius, Sirius had a girlfriend. And the world wasn’t going to stop just because he’d broken up with his. It went on.

Lily looked down at him, and to avoid her piercing green gaze, Remus began counting the freckles on her nose. He’d counted twenty-seven before she spoke again.

“If you did like someone new, would you tell me, Remus?”

The question caught him off guard.

No, one voice swore.

Yes, another promised.

“I would want to."

Lily considered this, before kissing the tips of her fingers and pressing it to his forehead. “I guess I’ll have to live with that for now,” she smiled, turning over and settling onto her back again. “Look there. Leprechaun cloud.”

“There’s no way.”

She pointed.

“Oh. You’re right. It is a bloody leprechaun.”

She laughed, and it was like sunshine after rain. But that was the thing about Scotland; no matter how many sunny days you got, there was always sure to be a coming storm.

* * *

The letter came on an inconspicuous Thursday. There was absolutely nothing about the day that had felt any different from the last. It’d rained in the morning, and by the afternoon the rain had stopped. He had taken four sugars in his tea at breakfast, three at lunch, had homework in two classes, and once that was finished, had made plans to practice with Sirius and James in the music room. Even Peter was going to join them, still sceptical over the drums but finally willing to try as long as Sirius agreed to go at his pace and not push too hard. By all accounts it was a good day. Remus mourned it the moment the letter slipped under their bedroom door.

It had taken its time to arrive, that was for sure. Maybe it was just the slow post, or maybe Tomny had had second thoughts about sending it. He knew the latter could be true, as the top edge of the envelope had already been ripped before being hastily taped back together.

It was strange to see Tonya’s pretty handwriting juxtaposed with Tomny’s poor scrawl. All she’d committed to was his name, ‘Remus John Lupin’ in the centre of the envelope’s back. It’d been Tomny who’d scribbled the school’s address beneath, though he’d misspelled ‘Hawkings’. Remus found himself thanking whatever lucky stars he had that it hadn’t been lost along the way, which he hated himself for a second later. Perhaps it would've been better off lost. After all, this wasn’t just a letter updating him on her journey, or a postcard from some tiny hillside village in the south of France, this was Tonya's goodbye. He wanted to tear it in half—to shred it into little pieces just like she'd done with his heart. But he didn’t because it was also an explanation, and that was more than he’d ever gotten from anyone else.

He waited until he was alone in the dorm to read it, then he peeled back the tape and slowly unfolded the thin paper.

The words hit like a train.

Remus,

I know you won't understand why I'm writing this to you, but words are all I have left and I know you deserve them. I feel sorry I can't give as much to Tomny, but he wouldn't know what to do with a letter and no matter how hard I tried, I could never bring myself say them aloud. I think it's because I knew that if I had, he'd have just smiled at me and I'd have never left. But I have to leave. I never even meant to stay, you see. I haven't spent this much time in one place since I was fourteen and when I asked myself why that is, I couldn't find the answer.

I suppose that's just it though, I want to find the answer. I know that's vague, but I've spent half my life looking for it and I didn't find it in London. I'm sorry if it's selfish, but I want you to know that seeing you at Christmas made me so undeniably happy. I love you so dearly, Remus. In fact, I heard a song on the radio the other day that reminded me of you. I didn't catch its name, but I know you would've liked it. It made me think that there are lots of things out there that we might like that we don't even know about because we've missed them or because someone couldn't remember the name or the words or what it smelt like or how it felt to run their hands across it. But I 'm rambling now, and this was the only piece of blank paper I could find in the entire flat without any coffee stains so I should probably stop wasting it.

I want you to know that I loved Tomny, I did. But I've never really considered love to be the end-all-be-all. Love to me has always felt like an ongoing method of life, not the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. Love should be eclectic—diverse and transformative just like people. When it isn't—when it becomes something that is required of life, that's when I feel myself drifting away. This time I drifted away with drugs, but it wasn't even the first time. I've also drifted away with alcohol, work, religion, (did I ever tell you about the time I joined a cult? Wild times, man) and each time it left me emptier than before. I suppose it's a lot like how you treat music. But I advise you not to make it that terrifying end-all-be-all. Don't let it be the only way you can communicate with others, otherwise it'll lose all its meaning. And when our vices lose their meaning we really don't have much left, do we?

I'll stop trying to give you advice now. I know you probably don't want it. You're probably very angry with me. Tomny too. And I want you to know I understand. You can be angry, but I'll still love you. I'll always love you. Even when you're wasting away as a bank teller or a rice farmer or a rock star, you'll always be loved by me. Oh, look at that—I've used the whole front and back and still this page is too short. I should've written in pencil so I could erase all my bad advice and only list the ways that I love you.

These aren't all of those ways, but here are a few:

I love you like you love Queen, Remus—only much more because you started loving Queen on Christmas last year and I've loved you since the moment we met. I love you the way Tomny loves Lee, Doss, Seesaw, Vint, and all the rest—only I'm a girl and much better looking so naturally my love's much more desirable. I love you like the sky meets the sea, forever and endless no matter how far you go to meet it. I love you enough to write cheesy lines like that. I love you like springtime. Like a second snowfall but not the first because it's always unexpected and I always expected to love you. I love you like a soulmate, which says a lot because I don't believe in soulmates. Instead I like to think that our souls are made for more than just one thing, but I'm so lucky because my soul was made to love yours.

I love you. I love you. I love you. I really, really love you.

Don't let Tomny stay angry. I love him too. I loved him enough to stay but I love him even enough to leave. And I'm sorry I couldn't give him anything. It's just not how we work. He'll understand what I mean.

I have to go now, sweet love. Be safe, be healthy, and please be happy, whatever that means. And don't let anyone—ever—tell you what that means.

Love forever,
Tonya.

* * *

Sirius lowered the letter.

"Damn."

Remus couldn't help it. He laughed. He kept laughing until it'd become sad and weepy and pathetic, and Sirius had moved over against the wall of the astronomy room to press their shoulders together. He'd rushed from the dorm before even finishing the front half of the letter—unwilling to remain where anyone could find him. When he'd failed to show up for band practice, Sirius had been the one to come looking. He was grateful that he'd come alone—any attempt from James and Peter to comfort him would've felt unbearable. But when Sirius put an arm around him and pulled him in close, Remus was so, so pleased. He felt inconsolable, fragile and even a little broken—if this was what brokenness was—but having Sirius close numbed some of it—allowed him some perspective. Tonya was the loss he'd been mourning for weeks now, the letter was just the finality of it. The last string to be cut.

"She really doesn't pull her punches, does she?" Sirius said, and Remus choked on another laugh-turned-sob.

"No… no, she does not."

"Just straight to the throat. No mercy."

"Ha… yeah."

"Is there anything I can do?"

Remus sighed. There were plenty of things Sirius could do, but none he could ask of him.

"Tell me a story?" He asked instead. Begged.

"What kind of story?"

"A happy one."

Sirius clicked his tongue. "Those are hard to come by, but I suppose I'll see what I can do…" Sirius lifted his thumb nail to his mouth, nibbling on it while he thought. "Huh…" he started; "Okay. Once upon a time—"

"Oh bloody hell, here we go."

"Oi, do you want the story or not?"

"… Proceed."

Sirius cleared his throat. "Once upon a time, there was a musician—"

"You?"

"Shh! Shut up—there was once a wonderful musician and... he was known throughout the world for his musical compositions."

As Sirius lapsed into gentle prose, Remus found himself relaxing. He slid back against the cool wall of the astronomy room and let his head rest next to Sirius'. Not touching, just close enough to feel his radiating warmth.

"He could play any instrument—any style," Sirius recited, "and was revered as a master of the art. Some called his abilities, ‘a gift from God’. Others whispered that he’d made a deal with the Devil, as no one could comprehend how any normal person could possess such a talent. So, along with his small band, he travelled the world for many years, playing to not just noblemen and ladies but also those without a penny to their name. He did it all for free too, because he thought that if his talent was God-given, then it should be shared with everyone.

“Well one day, while he was playing a concert for some King’s court, a man stepped forward, interrupting the music. He was wearing simple clothes, nothing fantastical at all, and yet when spoke, everyone listened. He said that he didn’t believe one man could create such sweet music all on his own—that it must’ve been some sort of trick or a lie. Naturally, the humble musician stood up for himself—of course it wasn’t a lie, his music was his to possess and to share.”

“This guy sounds like a right dick.”

“Yes, well, he was—and he wasn’t convinced! He asked for proof of the musician’s talent. He told him to set aside his accompanying bandmates and play in the middle of the hall for all to see. Of course the musician agreed, though he was unaccustomed to others challenging his talent. First he played the piano, but that was deemed too grand—there were plenty of places one could hide a trick or lie within a piano. So instead he played the harp, but by some chance, the strings snapped the moment his fingers touched them. Next he tried the violin, but those strings snapped too. Frustrated with his bad luck, he borrowed the brass horn of his bandmate, but its keys were mysteriously rusted in place. It was unplayable, and he blamed the man for neglecting his instrument. He took the drum of another, but its hide ripped the moment he set palm to it, and he was left embarrassed. Finally he reached for his own brass flute, the very first instrument he’d ever learned how to play. But when he took up the flute and blew into it, no sound came out.

"Disappointed, the musician insisted that he could play, and demanded that another instrument be presented to him. It was then that the same man who'd challenged him presented a reed flute to replace the musician’s very own. Now, this flute was a dinky little thing—and the audience whispered about how it was too simple an instrument to be played in a King's court. But the musician accepted it anyway, and when the flute was played, it produced the most beautiful music. Satisfied, the musician continued to play, pleased that he was finally able to show-up the nasty challenger—and with his own instrument, no less. 'There, now you see what I can do,' he told the man. And the stranger bowed and said, 'Yes, you truly have no rival'. And so the musician finished his concert to many applause, returned the man's flute, and went home.

The next day the musician was due to give a second show. He arrived back at the hall with his band in tow, feeling even more victorious than before. Confident, he took up his instrument and began to play, and only then did he find that he no longer could carry a tune at all. Not on any instrument, big or small. Grand or simple. It was as though his very fingers had forgotten what it was to play music. When he looked to his music sheets it was as though his eyes no longer worked —he couldn't read the very notes he himself had written. Devastated, the musician looked to the crowd, who were all staring on in disappointment. He did not see the man who had challenged him. One by one his bandmates abandoned him, unable to support a master who could not lead them to greatness. Repulsed by the horrible noise, the King ordered him from his hall and as word spread of the musician's failure, not even the common folk wanted to hear his ruins. So, he wandered the world, returning to the same places he'd once played to crowds of hundreds, hoping that one day the mysterious stranger with the reed flute would reappear and challenge him again. But he never did, and no matter what instrument the musician played or however many sheets of music he gathered, he could never play or read a single note ever again. The end."

Sirius let out a long breath, sounding almost tired, and though he'd successfully lost himself in the story—lulled by Sirius' easy voice— Remus tipped his head back against the wall and stared at him in question. "Is that the end?"

"... Yep."

"Actually?"

"Yeah, but don't you get it? It's about vanity. The man wasn't a man at all, he was a reflection of pride. By giving into pride the musician lost everything—his talent, his friends, his admirers."

Remus' mouth dropped open. "Okay but, fucking hell—I thought it was supposed to be a happy story not some bloody cautionary tale about being a pompous nob!"

The corners of Sirius' mouth twisted and he nodded in silent agreement. “Maybe, you're right. I thought it was happy when I first remembered it, but then I guess it does sorta fall off at the end there.”

“You are a sociopath,” Remus laughed incredulously. “Couldn’t you have just—I don’t know, made a fairy appear that forgave him and gave him back the bloody flute?”

“I guess I could’ve, but somehow that doesn't sound as genuine, does it?”

Remus wiped the corners of his mouth, still shaking his head. “You really know how to cheer someone up.”

“Does that mean you’re feeling better?” Sirius asked merrily.

“Better than that musician guy, I’ll bet.”

“Oh good, then you’re welcome.”

Remus looked down at the ground. Sirius’ arm was still around him and his shoulder felt warm where it met his. But then again, everything felt warm around Sirius.

“Who told you that story?” He asked.

“Hm, maybe the second or third governess after Gisela? Now that I think about it, she was probably just trying to scare me out of being a massive cunt. I was thirteen and thought that anyone less than Schubert was a hack.”

“Someone should tell her she failed. You're totally a massive cunt.”

“Ha! C'mon now, I’d say I have at least few more years before that story really becomes applicable. Can't be revered as a ‘master of the art’ until I got people in Japan and South America shouting my name.”

Remus cracked a smile and wiped his face on the back of his sleeve. “Do me a favour and send me a postcard.”

“Don’t need to—you’re gonna be there with me. Royalties, remember?”

“Eh, I dunno, maybe I’ll be a rice farmer instead.”

Sirius chuckled. “Okay, whatever you say. But I’ll tell you what though, Moons, that letter was pure shite. Like ‘run down your leg—ruin your trousers type-a shite.”

”I get the picture.”

”My point is… I’ll never love you enough to leave you.”

Remus’ breath caught. “Yeah…?”

“Yeah,” Sirius said, beaming at him in the dark.

With nothing else to do but cry, Remus closed his eyes. For a moment he could see it—standing next to Sirius on stage, James and Peter right there with them. It would be nice if something as good as music was the only thing that mattered. It would be really nice.

Slowly he folded up Tonya’s letter and held it out to Sirius. “Will you keep this for me? I just… I don’t need something else to keep me up at night.”

Sirius took the letter without a shred of hesitation and tucked it into the inside pocket of his coat. “Of course, Moons,” he said, “anything.”

They locked eyes for a moment and Remus let himself wonder if maybe… but no.

“Alright,” he said, untucking himself from Sirius’ side and getting up, “your story might’ve sucked arse, but I’m not nearly as weepy anymore.”

“Hey, I worked hard on that story! My delivery was very authentic!”

“Work smarter, not harder, Black,” Remus smiled, holding out his hand. Sirius took it eagerly and he pulled him to his feet.

“Is there anything you’d like me to tell the others? You know, about your shitty gangster mates and their bad taste in women,” Sirius asked as they made their way to the exit.

“No,” Remus answered blithely, “I sort of like being a little mysterious.”

“In that case, I'll never have to say anything to anyone. You’ve already got the market cornered in ‘mysterious’.”

Again, Remus thanked his lucky stars for giving him Sirius.

Walking back together, they met James and Peter on Godric's front steps, hailing the pair of them as they were about to make their way inside. It was cooler out now that the sun was going down, and the wind was blowing just enough to excuse how close together they'd been walking, but then their friends called out they naturally sprung apart, though the look Sirius gave him afterwards appeared almost reluctant. Remus told himself to ignore it. No use giving in to nonsense assumptions.

"There you are!" Peter moaned. "Thought you'd gotten lost in the woods or something."

"Nah, not the woods, just the little girls room," Sirius smirked, shouldering Remus as they made their way up the path.

James set the bottom of Andy's guitar case on the ground and leaned his chest against its top. "So much for practice, hey lads?"

"Sorry, my fault," Remus said. "Wasn't feeling all that good."

"You go see the nurse?"

"No, he slunk off on his own like a dying cat," Sirius said mercilessly.

James sighed sadly. "Oh, Moony, Moony, Moony."

"I wasn't feeling that bad!" Remus scoffed, shooting a glare at Sirius.

"Anything to do with Marlene?" Peter asked pityingly.

"Er—yeah, sure, whatever."

James reached over and clapped him on the shoulder. "Don't worry mate, we're here for you. We ain't afraid of a few tears. You can just let it all out if you need to. We'll hold ya."

"Thank you, Prongs. What would I do without you."

It was sarcasm, but James smiled anyway.

"Look at him blush," Sirius said suddenly, reaching to pinch Remus on the cheek. "Do you need a pick-me-up, Moony?"

"Fuck off."

"No—I'm serious! 'Cause I had this great idea for a prank—"

“You’re still paying off your detentions from your last ‘great idea’,” Peter pointed out.

“Wormy—where’s your sense of adventure?”

“It’s up yours.”

James and Remus both snorted. Sirius blazed past it; “I was only wondering, how do you think the professors would fair if we just switched all the coffee in the teacher’s lounge for decaf?”

“If they find out they’d be likely to let Filch lynch you,” James said, but he was holding his chin in that way of his that meant he was already on board. Sirius knew it too.

“Okay, so step one—we leave a few of Bob’s firecrackers outside the building, light them all off with a fuse—that should clear the room long enough for us to make the switch.”

Listening to steps two, three, and so on, Remus leaned back against the dorm’s metal handrail and crossed his legs at the ankles. Sirius always tended to talk with hands, but it was particularly bad when he was excited. He held his fists up, waving them about as Peter and James peppered him with questions about this or that. Content to watch, Remus was smiling until he spotted someone moving up the street in front of their dorm.

“Don’t look now, Black," he mumbled, "but your girlfriend’s coming.”

Sirius straightened up immediately, and they all turned just in time to spot Chastity as she swept up the dorm’s front path.

“Sirius!" She called sweetly; "C’mon, darling, it's almost dinner and you promised we’d eat with the girls today!”

Waving back awkwardly, Sirius replied; “Yeah, just one moment, babe.”

James and Peter began to chortle quietly, and even Remus couldn't resist a tease. “Oh,” he said smugly, “well, don’t be late on our account, darling. The girls are waiting, after all.”

Sirius whipped his head around and glared at him while James picked up the guitar case and turned toward the door. “S’okay, Sirius. Go and join her, we can talk more about your prank idea after dinner.”

Sirius sighed, clearly irritated, and Remus felt a spark of satisfaction. It vanished the moment Sirius stepped down the stairs, casually waving goodbye as he crossed the lawn toward his girlfriend. As he reached her, Chastity immediately grappled onto his arm, and Peter turned to follow James inside, holding the door open.

“You coming, Moony?”

“Yeah...” he murmured, when in reality Remus was caught. I'll never love you enough to leave you, that's what Sirius had said. But he couldn't expect that. Sirius wasn't his. Sirius was a friend and a guy and—and Remus was... Well, quite frankly Remus was sure what he was! But it was something, wasn't it? How could a feeling like this be nothing? How could he be forced to stare at their backs as they got further away? Before when he'd watched Sirius disappear across the grass to the Chastity's dorm he’d begged fate to bring him back, and fate had laughed at him, but now Sirius was only a few feet away. All it would take was a few measly words—if he could only figure out what they were.

"Come back..." Remus whispered, because he had nothing else. "Come back."

The words were but a breath of a wish on the wind. He couldn't even bring himself to say them any louder. You have my letter, he pleaded silently. You have my everything. Please come back.

He didn't think he would. Remus had never believed in magic, but watching Sirius turn—like he could actually hear him—that was nothing short of a miracle.

When their eyes finally met, Remus’ lips parted, and for a moment his heart stopped all together. A second later, Sirius had drawn his long strides to a halt at the edge of the lawn as if he too were frozen. If Remus could've looked anywhere else he might've seen how Chastity's mouth moved in the shape of her boyfriend's name while she tugged on his arm, but he could not see her. He only saw Sirius. He saw him as his expression became torn, as he looked to the girl that claimed to love him, and then back to Remus. It was as if he were searching for a reason to stay. Remus wished he could give it to him, and wished harder still when Sirius licked his lips and he swore he could taste it. All of it was pure torture in the span of a few seconds.

“Moony, lad, you okay?” James called, reappearing in the door next to Peter and snapping Remus out of all of it.

“Yeah—Yeah, m’coming,” he croaked, forcing himself to look away. Moving stiffly, he crossed the front step to the door, but just as James was stepping aside for him, a shriek of girlish contempt echoed from across the lawn;

“What?!”

They all spun round to find Chastity standing before Sirius, hands fisted in front of her and a look of utter disbelief on her face. As Chastity wailed her displeasure, Sirius only shrugged, speaking more quietly than she, with his hands now rid of hers and pressed into his jacket pockets.

"You really—?! Tell me you're not serious!" Chastity howled.

Next to Remus, James leaned in and murmured; "Five quid he says something like 'I'm always Sirius'."

"No bet," Peter snarked, just as Chastity lifted her arm and slapped Sirius clean across the face.

“Ooooh!” The boys winced together, recoiling backward in surprise.

“FUCK YOU, SIRIUS BLACK!” Chastity roared, whirling around and stomping off. They all watched her go, still frozen in place while Sirius started back toward them, rubbing his cheek sorely.

"Man, that girl should try out for the olympic boxing team," he winced, approaching the bottom set of stairs. "She's got an arm to rival Muhammad Ali." Shaking the sting off, Sirius let out a heavy breath and glanced up at them. His cheek was positively glowing red, and yet Remus had never seen him looking so happy.

“What did you bloody say to her?” James ogled.

“… Who?”

“CHASTITY!” They all wailed together.

“Oh!"Sirius grinned broadly; "Y’know, just that we should probably try and see other people and all that.”

“You dumped her?” Peter demanded.

“Sure—if that's what you want to call it.”

“What else would you call it?”

“Amicable separation, maybe?”

“Mate,” James clapped a hand to his forehead in disbelief; “there was absolutely nothing amicable about that.”

Sirius shrugged, appearing completely unbothered. “You win some, you lose some.”

“You’re something else, Black. Really.”

Sirius started up the stairs and squeezed between them, taking the guitar from James and slipping through the front door. They all followed him, one by one, but James caught up first.

"So what, you're just gonna be single now?"

"Why not? More fun that way anyway." Sirius glanced back at Remus, giving him a wink that turned his insides to water. “Now Moony and I can be single blokes together. Wolves need a pack, right?”

He began to howl mockingly, and Remus made a strangled noise in the back of his throat. “You—! You did not just dump your girlfriend to make that terrible joke!”

“HA! No, but it felt pretty good anyway. Now when do you reckon we should forcibly switch our dear teachers to a decaf diet—tomorrow at lunch?”

“Can’t,” Remus huffed, following his friends inside, “got a lunch date."

"With who?" Sirius snorted sardonically.

"Marlene."

Slamming to a halt, Sirius glanced back at him sharply, staring as though his soul were leaving his body. “WHAT?” He exploded. “But I thought the two of you broke up?!”

“We did,” Remus said innocently and suddenly a lot less frazzled. “Don’t tell me you guys don’t go out on dates with your friends?”

Sirius puckered, actually turning red, and in a final hurrah, James hugged him from behind. “Don’t worry, Sirius, I’ll take one for the team and take you out. Now where is it you'd like to go for lunch, darling?”

Chapter End Notes

First of all, I'm SORRY for that Tonya letter. Second of all, like they say, "ain't no rainbow without a little rain" <3
*Putting this chapter out today so I can make you feel better (or worse, you never know, hehe) this weekend with another.

Also "Ruby Tuesday" is just Tonya, I'm sorry it just IS. I don't make the rules.

Notes:
'Threepenny bits' is Cockney slang for 'a pair of tits'. Sirius is obviously using it mockingly.
Franz Schubert was an Austrian composer of the late classical and early romantic periods.

Chapter 59: James Potter's Technicolour Dream World

Chapter Summary

> Remus meets with his forms teacher to discuss his plans for his future. The Marauders discover something surprising about James' connection to music.

Chapter Notes

> No CWs for this chapter. See end notes for an update on my posting schedule!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Oh God, life is strange,
Some are fast and some are slow;
Some believe me, don't even know,
No, no, no, no, no;
Strange, life is strange,
Life is strange,
Oh, my life is strange…

- "Life is Strange" T. Rex, 1973

Sunday 24th April 1977

Once a year, all sixth form students were required to meet with their forms teacher to discuss what it was they wanted to do with the rest of their lives. Being a rather prestigious place, most Hawkings students had their entire life plotted out by year 7, either by their families or someone their family hired. Those students who didn't commit to upper sixth (and there were some, even at Hawkings) would leave school and take over whatever business or lordship from their parents. Naturally, anyone who stayed would aim for the most reputable university that would admit them and from there head into politics or business or whatnot, and if they didn't do that it was probably because they had a diamond mine in Botswana to inherit. Remus' friends were no exception.

For most of his life James had resigned himself to simply following in his father's footsteps. Shortly before his first and only child was born, Fleamont Potter, an already in-demand corporate lawyer, opened his own law firm and was quickly propelled into London's legal stratosphere. A child of immigrants, Fleamont was determined that his own son have every opportunity available to him, though he was distinctly under the impression that taking pre-law classes at school and actual law in university was the best way for James to secure that opportunistic future. James didn't seem to refute this. As long as he had enough free time to play his sports and hang out with his friends then he was content.

Peter was a little more vague about his future. Like James, his father expected him to head into the family business, supporting Simeon as he ran the newspaper until their sons could inherit it from them. For the most part, Peter appeared agreeable to this, despite the fact that working under his brother seemed to be the last thing that he would ever want to do. Remus had never said it, but he'd always sort of pictured Peter doing something with his art. Every time he saw his friend complete another sketch it struck him that it was better than the last. And the last had always been very good so… but Peter was not a risk-taker, and he was always saying how his father didn't believe in the arts—a great source of contention between his and James' families, since Euphemia Potter, a highly educated woman in her own right, was a curator at the National Gallery in London.

"The world will always need news!" Peter would say, puffing up his shoulders to imitate his father.

"And the world will always worship art!" James would say, wagging a finger to imitate his mother.

And then, because he was Sirius, Sirius would chime in with; "Mum's right! Ars longa, vita brevis—'art is long, life is short'!"

'Life is short' became Sirius' mantra in the weeks leading up to the teacher/student meetings. He'd read it off-hand in one of their textbooks and always said it with conviction, but somehow it still felt as though he were trying to reassure himself that art was worthwhile, rather than convince the rest of them. Under normal circumstances Sirius would have had absolutely no cause to worry about his future. The Black family was so old and esteemed that if Sirius were to trace his roots back more than three generations he'd probably have found that he was cousin to not only the British royal family, but at least four other monarchies as well. Sirius could've lived the rest of his life without lifting a pinky and still have been richer than any sorry sod that crossed his path and yet, he wanted none of it. To him it was blood money—paid for but never earned. Yes, Sirius was determined to make his own way—with Uncle Alphard's inheritance as a comfortable subsidy, of course. After his meeting had finished, he left Sheila's office looking cool and collected. Not much worried Sirius Black, and certainly not the future. When he dropped down on the bench where Remus was waiting for his turn, he was still smiling. Even played at lighting one of his cigarettes, but put the pack away when Remus gave him the stink-eye.

"What'd she ask you?" Remus asked, as Sirius untucked his hands from his jacket pockets and lifted them up behind his head casually.

"Oh, you know, the usual—what university I want to go to, what I'm gonna study, what goals I have in life. All boring stuff."

"And what'd you say?"

Sirius tilted his head toward him and raised an eyebrow. "What do you think I said?"

Remus looked away, fingers knotted in his lap. It'd been hard to look at Sirius these last few weeks, but beyond breaking up with Chastity, Sirius had done little to provoke such a reaction, which meant it was all on him. Embarrassing, really.

"I at least hope you weren't a dick about it," Remus said snidely.

"Me? Never."

A smile tugged at the corner of Remus' lips, but a moment later the office door opened and Sheila stuck her head out. She was wearing a long hair scarf covered in daisies, and when she leaned over to peek out the doorway the tips of the scarf hung almost to the ground.

"Remus, you can come in now," she said fondly.

"Good luck, lover boy," Sirius teased, jamming him in the ribs with his elbow before hopping off the bench and starting down the hall. Remus glared after him, wondering if this was what it meant to really like someone.

"Can I get you a cup of tea?" Sheila asked after he'd followed her into the office. "I was just about to have one myself."

"Sure—I mean yes, please."

She smiled and gestured for him to sit while crossing to a small coffee counter. Being in less demand than those found throughout the school's other buildings, Sheila's office in the music hall was of a decent size, but was made tighter by the mountains of papers and books she had piled on every shelf and in every corner. There were binders upon binders and instruments upon instruments scattered about the room and enough boxes of old records to get Remus' heart racing, but still it managed to feel like a sort of organised chaos. This was proven when she pulled a small sugar tin out of a cupboard filled to the brim with miniature, multicoloured maracas.

"I'm afraid I don't keep any milk in the office," she apologised, while carrying two mugs of steaming tea back to her desk, "but there's plenty of sugar."

She handed him a small spoon and set the tin in between them, which Remus appreciated, before scooping three generous spoonfuls into her own cup, which Remus appreciated more.

"I've a bit of a sweet tooth," she amended shyly. "Colin always says it'll be the death of me."

"Who's Colin?" Remus asked, stirring plenty of sugar into his own tea.

"My husband."

Remus stirred a little slower. Of course Mrs. Buchanan had to have a husband, but the way she'd said it so casually had surprised him. "Is he who you're always going to visit when you leave school?"

Sheila tipped her head forward. "Yes, in fact. Colin lives in Glasgow. It's where our home is, actually."

"Why teach all the way up here then? Surely there are jobs in Glasgow."

"You'd think, but I'm afraid our government hasn't been so helpful on the job front as of late. Anyway, I like Hawkings. It's like my second home. And I really don't mind the travelling, I get to do most of my marking on the train. It's great to pass the time."

"Why aren't you there now?" Remus asked.

"Because we're having your meeting, silly. A teacher's work is never done, after all. But don't worry, I actually do like hearing about my students' plans for the future. Makes me excited to think about what they might accomplish. And besides, Colin's at the hospital this week, so no one'll be home anyway."

"Oh..." Remus tapped his spoon on the rim of his cup. He'd never really given much thought to accomplishing anything. "He a doctor then?"

"Hm, something like that."

Her answer felt a bit dismissive, as though he were nothing more than a child, but then again he had been asking a lot of questions. Remus would've never admitted it, but just hearing Sheila talk made him feel... well, better, probably.

"Now, I do believe I'm the one who's supposed to be interviewing you, so shall we get started?" Sipping her tea with one hand, Sheila used the other to flip open a folder with his file in it. She looked it over for a moment, drawing her finger up and down each page as she read. "Mhm. Yes, good marks—"

"Decent marks," Remus mumbled. Sheila gave him a sly smile and glanced back to the file.

"Good marks, good health, suspected interests in literature, history, and—" she looked up again coyly, "music."

Suddenly shy, Remus lifted his tea cup to his lips.

"Your father still works in government, yes?"

"Yeah."

"And do you have any desire to enter a position such as his?"

"No."

"So that's a no to politics or law?"

He shook his head firmly.

"And is it your intention to return school next year for upper sixth or do you have plans to pursue your education elsewhere?"

"I want to come back," Remus said without a moment's hesitation.

"You do?"

“Yeah.” What was there at home anyway—Giles and the dogs. His friends were at school.

“That’s wonderful then,” Sheila grinned, “we have a goal. Have you given any thought to the classes you might take next year? Most students coming back chose a single subject to work toward before going on to university. There’s law, philosophy, ethics, history, fine arts, human biology, music—”

“I haven’t given it much thought.”

“Well, you still have time to decide. The school doesn’t ask you to confirm re-enrollment until the end of summer.”

Remus nodded, picking at the rim of his cup. It was handmade with a sunflower painted on the side. A closer look revealed a small engraving near the bottom; ‘To Mrs. Buchanan, made with love—Elsie, 1973’.

Watching him, Sheila flipped his file shut. “How is it you’re feeling today, Remus?”

“Fine,” he murmured.

“I want something a little more than ‘fine’,” she said, clicking her tongue; “Remember it’s not just a solo, it’s a cadenza, and music isn’t played as ‘cheerful’ it’s played as ‘allegro’.”

“I’m very fine, then. I'm andante.”

Sheila smirked. “Alright, you cheeky thing, might as well spit it out then. What is it you want to do with your life, Remus?”

He squirmed a bit. Of course he’d been expecting the question—dreading it really—but he had no answer for her.

“What did Sirius say?” He asked.

Sheila shook her head lightly. “I’m sorry dear, that’s confidential. I couldn’t tell you what Sirius said in his meeting any more than I could tell him what you say in yours. It might influence your decisions.”

“Not all kids are so easily influenced, you know.”

“I know,” she smiled, “but I just want to make sure that they’re all doing what it is they want to do. Are there any universities you have your eye on?”

“Not really.”

“How about a goal for after you leave school, or even this summer?”

He shrugged. “Gonna learn how to drive.”

“Brilliant. And where is it you want to drive?”

“Anywhere, really. Away.”

“Away, where?”

“Dunno…”

Sheila sipped her tea again. “Well, it’s okay to not know right now. Sometimes the best trips we take have no real destination. Will you tell me where it is when you figure it out?”

“Do I have to?” Asking that felt better than just saying no.

“Of course not,” Sheila said, before placing a hand to the side of her mouth to whisper; “but I would like to know where your band is playing so I could come watch one day. I’ll bet you and Mr. Black could put on quite the show.”

Remus perked up. “I thought you said you couldn’t—”

“Now, shall we talk about your maths for a bit?”

* * *

Remus slid in next to Sirius at the dinner table. “You told Sheila about the band.”

Sirius smiled deviously over a bite of stew. “Gossips.”

“You told her we were planning an actual band.”

“Aren't we? Really, this dancing around our future is getting a bit old, Moons. Don’t tell me you actually told her that you’re going to be a flippin’ rice farmer.”

Remus shook his head, then, too curious; “What’d she say?”

“She congratulated me actually,” Sirius said smugly, “said if anyone could do it, we could."

"Really?"

"Well, good as."

"You're so full of shit."

"Vita brevis, Lupin."

"Yeah and 'carpe diem' and the other bit," James finished, joining them at the table along with Lily. "How were your guys' meetings?"

"Peachy. Yours?"

"Long," James yawned. "I swear, Bilshin lives to exhaust us."

"Yours go long too, then?" Remus asked Lily, who had begun to pick at her dinner like she was lost in a daze.

"Oh? Yeah, good."

Remus exchanged glances with James who immediately tightened hold of his fork. "Everything okay, Lils?"

Lily said nothing at first, until James nudged her pointedly. "It's nothing to worry about," she persisted. "Barty's young and stupid, that's all."

"But he said something again, didn't he?" Sirius glowered.

"Yes! And he's not the only one," James lashed. "Snape—"

"Tried to apologise," Lily interrupted.

Remus' jaw practically hit the floor. "You didn't accept, did you?"

"No, of course not! Severus can apologise until he's blue in the face. He did as much while we were home for Easter—it doesn't mean I'm just going to forgive him, but I don't have to hate him either."

"Well can I finally hate him freely then?" Sirius scoffed.

Lily rolled her eyes, but James was not finished. He leaned toward her; "If you would just let me say something to them then they wouldn't bother you—"

She slapped her fork down. “You’re obviously all cut from the same bloody cloth so I’ll say to you what I’ve already said to Remus: I refuse to let it bother me. Start reacting and they’ll just keep at it even more.”

“So we pretend like you’re not being bullied?” Sirius demanded.

“If that’s how you want to put it, then yes.”

“No!” All three boys said together.

“Do you want me to find somewhere else to eat? Because I will,” she threatened. “Now I’ve said my piece, and that’s that. If I hear that any of you are going around threatening people or getting yourselves in more trouble I’ll put you in detention for the rest of the year myself!”

Sirius leaned in. “How about we just prank them with—”

“No pranks!”

“Kay, fine,” James grumbled, “but I don’t understand why you can’t turn that wrath of yours on little shits like Barty.”

“It’s not effective on Barty,” Lily said through her teeth. “Now eat your damn dinner.”

None of them were satisfied, but Lily refused to say any more on the matter and they knew better than to argue. Remus did have to hand it to her though, she was holding out for much longer than anyone else he knew would’ve been able to. It wasn’t as if she took everything lying down—anyone who might be ballsy enough to say something snide in her presence were promptly handed a detention slip, but that only seemed to make things worse. Eventually kids started to turn and flee from her in the halls, shrieking things like ‘here comes the penniless prefect’ while waving pink-slips she’d already given them in her face. James just about throttled Barty every time they were in the same room together, but the real surprise was Sirius’ reaction. The following Monday, after Lily had lambasted them over dinner, Sirius got into a fist fight in the middle of history class with some pig-faced kid named Jason Mueller.

It was the middle of silent study, and Professor Binns was lightly dozing at his desk like normal. A faint noise drew his attention and Remus looked up from his textbook to find that Jason had dropped his pencil, but when Lily went to pass it back to him, he only sneered;

“Oh, keep it. I’m sure you need it more than me.”

Temporarily stupefied, Lily just sort of blinked at him for a while, but before she could turn away and hide the red blooming in her cheeks, Sirius, her seat partner, stood up and plucked the pencil from her hand, pointing it sharp-end first at Jason’s nose.

“Here,” he snarled lightly, “you dropped this."

"No, I didn't," the pig-faced boy contested.

"Yes, you did. And Evans was nice enough to pick it up for you. Now take. It. Back.”

At that, Jason looked from Sirius’ face to the pencil, to Lily. “No thanks," he laughed finally, "wouldn’t want to catch anything. I hear poor-people rats have all sorts of nasty diseases. You understand, right Black?”

Sirius raised both eyebrows, then pressed the pencil’s eraser to his lip in feigned consideration. “Sure, Jake, I understand. But would you do me a favour? Catch this.”

Before Jason could react, Sirius had tossed the pencil straight toward him, but while Jason fumbled to catch it Sirius’ fist came down, socking him in the cheek hard enough to leave the other boy sprawling from his seat. Several other students shrieked in shock and Lily leapt up, completely horror-stricken, but before anyone could do anything, Jason sat up and threw himself at Sirius' middle with a great cry.

While their classmates hooted and hollered, the two scrapped on the ground until Remus managed to pull both of them apart. It was enough to get Professor Binns’ attention and Sirius was quickly shuffled out of the classroom, holding his punching-hand to his chest. Remus knew he’d be hurting—it was a rookie shot, he’d squeezed his thumb on the inside of his fist—but something about watching Sirius come to Lily’s aid like that had made him incredibly proud... among other things.

Unfortunately for Sirius, Lily did not share the same sentiment.

After using her prefect status to escort both boys to the nurse and then detention, she spent an entire evening lecturing not only Sirius, but all four Marauders on the importance of rising above their tormentors. To his credit, James tried his damndest to make her see reason, but Lily was adamant. Any issues stemming from Snape or her scholarship were hers to deal with, and everyone else should respect that. Remus didn't agree, but she wouldn't allow him a word in edgewise anyway.

Still riding the high of socking Jason, Sirius once again milked his injury for all that it was worth, taking the opportunity to sit back in art class and play model, as they continued their unit on oil portraits. Remus loathed the class but the girls had convinced him that taking it would mean an easy A, except according to their teacher, Madame Aubert, he painted like he'd already 'jeter l'éponge'. Thanks to Sirius he was half sure he knew what it meant, but if 'jetering' the 'ponge' meant he'd never have to pick up another bloody crayon again, he'd do it.

"You're such a nob," Remus complained, doing his best to mix a colour that looked even slightly akin to Lily's copper waves. Peter was the one painting Sirius, and was doing a significantly better job of capturing the blue tones in his dark hair.

"It's my right wrist, Lupin," Sirius complained, waving his wrapped hand at him. "My strumming hand!"

"He's just worried he won't be able to wank anymore," Peter teased.

"Correct," Sirius said crudely, "but I'm a musician first, a masterbater second."

They all laughed, except for Lily, who was trying her best to hold still for Remus while Sirius tossed this way and that on his stool.

"Does that mean your dreams of being a musician are shattered, Sirius?" She asked.

"Of course not. Lead singers hardly even have to play instruments these days anyway."

"You're a lazy nob then," Remus corrected, looking up from his portrait. It made Lily look more like some hair-raising evil witch than a girl, but he wasn't about to tell her that.

"Ah, what do I care," Sirius waved, "I got Potter."

"To wank for you?" Remus suggested, making Lily groan.

"Yes, as a matter of fact. Didn't you know—I get off vicariously though others. You couldn't imagine the time it saves me. Speaking of which,

I got us some more sheet music for tonight. Pete, think you can pass it onto Prongs next period so he can look it over for our practice tonight? Don't want him lagging behind."

"Dunno what help that's gonna be," Peter mumbled, staring down at his painting with a concentrated expression.

Sirius rocked forward on his stool. "What do you mean?"

"Stop moving," Peter huffed, wetting his brush, "I mean James can't read the music so what's the point?"

"Sure he can. I taught him myself."

Peter snorted. "That's what you think."

Remus shared a glance with both Lily and Sirius. "Mind extrapolating a bit, Wormtail?"

"It's not that big 'a deal," Peter sighed, glancing from Sirius to the canvas. "I mean, he still sounds great right? He just can't read it. I'm surprised neither of you have noticed. Now stop bloody moving."

"But he never has any issues during practice," Sirius said.

"Well yeah, it's because he always gets you to play it first."

"... What?"

Peter let out an irritated sigh and lowered his paint palette. "Okay, read my lips—James. Can't. Read. Music. I quizzed him myself last practice. He knows all the notes, and if you ask for a G or B-sharp or whatever he'll play it, but the moment you point to it on the page he's lost. You've never noticed because you're only ever listening to him, but that's it exactly—he's listening too. James plays by ear."

Sirius' mouth dropped open. "No fucking way. By ear? He's moved on to bloody Hendrix now and you're telling me he's playing that all by ear?!"

"I don't understand, is that uncommon?" Lily asked.

"Plenty of musicians can't read music," Remus shrugged, also shocked, "but memorising every note just by what it sounds like isn't exactly the most efficient way to learn an instrument. They have to have perfect pitch, and yeah, that's pretty rare. Most people just start with memorising a few chords and work their way out from there, but I guess if James has been doing it from the beginning then…"

"Then he's also a genius!" Sirius finished.

Remus nodded. "Even with your memory, hearing an entire song and copying every note by ear should be impossible."

"It basically is," Sirius said smugly. "And he was holding out on us this entire time. Wow. I'm gonna kick his arse."

"Try sitting still for a second first," Peter grumbled, setting his paintbrush down just as their teacher strolled by, clutching a fistful of fresh parchment. She stopped at his shoulder and beamed as she took in his portrait.

"Ah, Pierre," she sighed in that thick, French accent of hers, "c'est magnifique. You've captured Monsieur Black's likeness exquisitely."

"You hear that," Sirius said to Lily, "she called me 'exquisite'."

"What is it you are calling this piece, have you decided?" Madame Aubert asked.

Casting a look at Sirius, Peter smirked shyly. "I have. I think I'll call it, 'A Narcissist's Mirror'."

Both Remus and Lily began to snicker and Sirius crossed his arms with an unimpressed expression, but Madame Aubert just clapped her hands together in enthusiasm. "Très bon! Monsieur Lupin, et toi? What about your portrait of Mademoiselle Evans?"

Holding up his wicked painting (wickedly bad, that was), Remus considered. "Er... 'Smudged Ginger'?"

Sirius snorted and Lily gave a little gasp before playfully whipping his own paint rag at him. Madame Aubert just clicked her tongue.

"Je vois… Maybe keep thinking, yes?"

"Yes, ma'am."

Their teacher strolled away, shouting to the class that it was time to start cleaning up, and Peter began looking between his and Remus' paintings pointedly.

"Oi!" Remus snapped, pulling his portrait back when he noticed.

“What? It’s nothing to be ashamed of, Moony. You said it yourself, it's abstract.”

“Yes, and it’s still a work in progress!”

“Whatever you say,” Peter said, smiling smugly.

Remus scoffed and dipped his fingers in his water jar before flicking them at Peter, who flinched away.

“Watch the masterpiece, Lupin!”

“C’mon, it’s already time to clean up,” Lily said, hopping off her stool as Remus set her portrait aside and collected his brushes.

“Sirius hang on, I just want to finish this bit,” Peter insisted, keeping him sitting while the rest of the class fluttered around, trying to finish up before the final bell rang. When it did, Sirius launched himself up from his stool.

“Are you done yet, Pete? ‘Cause I’m starving,” he declared.

Peter nibbled on the end of his paintbrush in consideration, still teetering his stout legs on the bottom rung of his stool. “You guys go on ahead, I wanna finish this bit here before the paint starts to thicken. I’ll just catch a late dinner.”

“Alright, but remember we’re practising in the music room tonight. Room two. I wanna see for myself if your ear-tingling assessment of James’ abilities are for real or just rubbish.”

“Fine, fine,” Peter waved, turning back to his painting.

Saluted his friend goodbye, Sirius met Remus and Lily by the door and joined them as they left the classroom.

“What’re they serving for dinner, again?” Lily asked, dodging other students as they shuffled up and down the hall.

Letting the sea of bodies part naturally around him, Sirius opened his mouth and spoke through a yawn; “Pot pie again. With corn and the little cups of jelly that are great for throwing—”

“Lily?”

Snape appeared behind them unannounced, so close that he might as well have been breathing down the back of their necks. At the interruption, Sirius jumped nearly a foot into the air and spun around with the rest of them. “Fuck—! You should come with a warning bell!” He hissed.

“And you should come with a muzzle,” Snape shot back. "I'm here to talk to Lily, so why don't you just get back to whatever ridiculous scheme you're sure to be planning and leave us alone."

"Ha, joke's on you, Snivelly," Sirius shot, "it's a Thursday and Thursdays are for initiating ridiculous schemes, not planning them."

"I'm surprised you can plan anything at all, what with hot air where a brain should be," Snape seethed. Remus might’ve congratulated him on the good quip if Lily hadn’t immediately sighed and stepped between them.

“Severus, that’s enough," she sighed. "Now what do you want?”

Snape eyed Remus and Sirius, who had both drawn themselves up to their full height, fully prepared to defend Lily’s already degraded honour. “I want to talk to you,” he grumbled.

“We already talked,” Lily said tiredly, “there’s nothing else to say.”

“Yes, there is. There's plenty more to say if you'd just listen, and if we could have five minutes to ourselves—"

"You're lucky you're still standing here," Remus scoffed. "If it weren't for Lily, I'd have already—"

"Flunked out? Been arrested for assault? Trust me, I know your type, Lupin."

"You don't know anything about me, Snivellus."

"I know enough. Like how your—"

"Enough!" Lily shouted. "I'm so done with this! Severus, if all you're interested in is fighting then I don't want to hear—!"

"—I want to apologise!" Snape cried hurriedly. "I'm sorry! I don't want us to fight anymore."

While Remus and Sirius suppressed a string of irritated moans, Lily's shoulders slumped in worry. “Sev, you’ve apologised plenty, and I already told you that I'm not angry anymore... but that doesn’t mean everything’s just fixed. I think that... Well, that maybe we've just outgrown each other."

Snape's screwed up his face so tightly it began to turn red. "That's a stupid answer."

Before any of her friends could jump to her defence, Lily threw a hand out to stop them. "I understand if that's how you feel, but I've made up my mind. I'm sorry."

"Is this about the charity case thing?"

"No, it's about trust. Trust you broke."

"Everything can be fixed."

"Not everything," Remus ground out.

Snape snapped his eyes toward him, but Lily just shook her head. "I'm sorry, Severus, but we're not friends anymore. I've made my decision."

"You can't just do that!" Snape snapped. "We've known each other longer than anyone here. Now I've apologised, and I already told everyone to stop calling you a charity case!"

"Don't think they heard you," Sirius scoffed. "Now you've got her answer so buzz off."

"Go paint your bloody nails, why don't you, Black! You're the one poisoning Lily. You and the rest of your scummy, low-life group. Band —what band? You're going to fail before you even get your feet off the ground! Lily's mental for thinking that hanging around you will bring anything but failure!"

Pushing up his sleeves to ready himself for another fight, Sirius took a step forward. "Come here and say that, you fucking worm!"

Lily spun around, grabbing onto him; "No! Sirius, it's alright."

"No, it ain't! Real friends don't talk to one another like that."

"Fuck you, Black! This's got nothing to do with you anyway!"

At Snape's reply, Sirius let out an incredulous laugh and crossed his arms over his chest;

"Actually it does! You see, we were there when you revealed your true colours and permanently revoked your own 'Lily Evans' friendship card'. Rather spectacularly, I might add—no offence, Evans—and you've already given your shitty excuse for an apology, that Evans has been so gracious to accept—good on you, Evans—which leads me to believe only one thing..." Next thing they knew, Sirius had gotten between Snape and Lily, tipping his head in Snape's direction; "You didn't come here today to apologise, you came here to guilt Lily into being your friend again. Well, let me be the one to tell you that that's not how the world works—that's not how people work! You don't get to just decide that you're important to someone, especially after you've fucked up so royally—people aren't things. So if you're so hurting for friends, why don't you go find your little chemistry set and build a new one?!"

Snape drew back, a look of utter loathing on his face. "You're making a mistake," he warned Lily. "One day these freaks are gonna end up in jail—or worse! Then you'll know I'm right. Mark my words, Lily, they'll just disappoint you."

"I'm used to disappointing people," Sirius said, almost smiling; "the shock wears off after a while. Now too-da-fucking-loo, Snivelly."

Scorned and embarrassed, Snape finally turned and left them in the middle of the hall, stalking away for what Remus hoped, but knew, wouldn't be the last time. Still, as he watched him go, he couldn't deny the giddy feeling he'd gotten watching Sirius verbally thrash one of his greatest enemies.

"You were too mean," Lily sighed sadly, "and yet somehow I'm still grateful."

Sirius turned around and took Lily's hand in his, actually dropping down into a bow and kissing her freckled knuckles. Remus felt his mouth go dry just watching and had to clear his throat as Lily's eyes turned to saucers.

"I am sorry for every nasty thing I have ever said, thought, or even briefly wondered about you. And—" Sirius beamed at her; "I am grateful to be your friend."

"Oh, well, I—" Lily also cleared her throat; "Thank you, Sirius. Really."

Sirius winked up at her. "Anytime, Evans."

"You've never said that you're grateful to be my friend." The comment slipped out before Remus could stop it.

With any and all bad mojo dispersed, Sirius dropped Lily's hand and straightened up. "Ah, well you're not just my friend Moony, you're the apple of my eye—my fair-haired boy!"

Unable to help it, Remus opened his mouth to tease him some more; "Actually that sounds more like Peter to me."

"The yin to my yang then!"

"James."

"Alright—you're the light of my bloody life then!"

"Nuh-uh!" Lily jumped in spectacularly. "I'm the light of Remus' life! And he's my object of dearest affections!"

Sirius sighed dramatically, sagging against the row of school lockers behind him. "I am running out of metaphors here people! Keep it up and I'll make you, Evans, my gentlemanly caller, and Moony here—honey bunch!"

"Why wouldn't Remus be the gentlemanly caller?" Lily snorted.

Sirius covered his mouth with his hand as though he were scandalised. "Oh, because we're much more intimate than that. What you and I have is still just puppy love, but Moony—us together is like a burning flame of wanton eroticism."

"Keep it up and I'm going to smack you with your own thesaurus!" Remus swore. He could hardly function anymore as friends. One spark of eroticism and he might actually keel over. Though, Sirius would probably pay to see that, he expected.

"Careful, he might like it," Lily smirked, confirming Remus' suspicions.

"Maybe I will. We'll never know unless we try—" Already puckering up for a kiss, Sirius made to straighten up, only to gag a little when his school shirt got caught on the edge of the locker, pinning him in place. "Oh hell—Moony, be a dear and come free me."

Remus turned to Lily. "Lily, are you hungry?"

Lily turned to him. "Why yes, Remus, I believe I am."

Remus offered his arm. "May I escort you to dinner, oh light of my life?"

She took it. “Yes, oh object of my dearest affections, I would simply love that.”

“Wait!” Sirius wailed as they turned and started down the hall. “Evans! Moony! You can’t just leave me, I’m gonna tear my shirt here! C’mon guys, I’ll keep trying! How ‘bout 'my angel'? Dear paramour? Sweetheart?! Honey bunch!? C'mon guys, don’t leave me behind!”

* * *

Peter wasn’t much of a liar. In fact, Remus could’ve sworn that keeping a secret caused him physical pain, so it made sense that he hadn’t been lying about James. Completely amazed by his best friend's unsung talent, Sirius leapt up from his spot on the music room’s risers, swinging the acoustic around his back and grinning like a madman. “You jammy bastard! If I’d have known that this was what you were capable of when McGonagall kicked you off the football team, then I would’ve poisoned Snape ages ago!”

“Poisoned him? I'd have put him in the ground already,” Remus said from his seat on the risers.

James waved them off before slinging the Rickenbacker off his shoulders and setting it down on the guitar stand. “Man, my arms feel like rubber,” he huffed.

“You might feel better if you don’t hold your breath for the entire solo,” Peter supplied from his spot behind the drum kit.

“Yeah, I think you’re right, Pete,” James smiled. "Honestly I’m glad you noticed. Pretending I understood what you were on about with those silly little lines and dots was really starting to suck. Just gotta work on my endurance, I guess."

“Endurance—smurance! I still cannot BELIEVE you just casually picked up ‘All Along the Watchtower’ by EAR!” Sirius gushed, still shaking his head in disbelief.

James rubbed his neck. “I'm sure it’s not that big a’deal."

"No, it is,” Remus said. “You’ve got perfect pitch, Potter. Not even Black has that.”

“Oi. I don't need perfect pitch. I have range." Sirius illustrated his claim by launching into a bit of Led Zeppelin. " 'And I'm buying a stairway to heaveeeeen'!"

"You always have to steal the show," Remus sniggered, balling up some scrap sheet music and pelting Sirius upside the head with it.

Again, James tried to wave them off. "Okay, fine, so I have perfect pitch. What, like three out of four Beatles must've had it too?"

"Try none of them," Peter said, and when they all glanced at him in surprise, he balked a bit. "What? So I did some research over Easter. Sue me..."

"C'mon Potter, how do you do it? Now, don't be shy, spit it out!" Sirius demanded, grabbing his friend by the shoulders and shaking him across the music room floor.

"I don't know!" James pleaded. "I just hear the notes and match the right colours together, alright?!"

Sirius stopped his incessant shaking immediately. "Colours?"

"Yeah! I just figured out which colours go with what sound. Makes things easy, that way."

Remus squinted at Sirius, then Peter. "Prongs, what do you mean by 'colours'?"

"You know, like the colours you see when you hear certain stuff? Like... a dog barking is this weird orangey-brown colour, but a trolley honk is like more rusty? You can just see it, yeah?"

They all blinked at him, and finally Sirius leaned forward, slowly shaking his head. "We... don't see colour when we hear a dog bark, mate. We hear a dog. Barking. That's it."

James frowned. "Are you pulling my leg?"

"Honestly, think we should be asking you that," Remus said. "You really just like... see colour when you hear shit?"

"Not everything has a colour," James babbled. "Just like—specific sounds. And names. And... notes. It's how I remember 'em! Been doing it since I was a kid... You sure you guys don't see anything? Like at all?"

They all shook their heads.

James' entire body relaxed, as though a thought were just occurring to him for the very first time. "Wow. Shit."

"Wait, I think I've heard of this," Peter said excitedly. "Mozart had it. They said he could see specific words and colours in his mind while he was playing. It helped him write. That happens for you, yeah James?" At his question, James nodded dumbly, and Peter used one of his drumsticks to point at Remus. "Moony, go on and pluck a string for him. See if we're right."

Perking up, Remus readjusted his seat on the risers and plucked a single chord off his bass. They all turned straight for James, who licked his lips and nodded again, this time a little more sure of himself.

"That's an E. It's purple. Not like bright purple, but more soft. Like a lavender."

"And this one?" Remus plucked a D-sharp.

"Definitely green."

"But what note is it?"

"D-sharp."

Remus looked to Sirius, who's mouth was hanging open. "Wow, alright. And this note?"

At the sound, James nearly smiled. "That's an A. A's are always yellow."

"Holy shit!" Sirius gasped. "You mean you really just see that? He plays an A and you see yellow?"

"I thought it happened for everyone," James said, looking just as shocked. "My mum used to joke that my gran would make this egg casserole that tasted like the colour of day-old rubbish so she hated eating it. Made perfect sense at the time."

"Maybe he doesn't have perfect pitch," Peter said. "Maybe he's just a mutant."

"More like superhero! That shit's like magic!" Sirius grinned, picking up the Rickenbacker himself and sliding the strap over his shoulders. "I'm gonna play something—you say what it looks like."

“Sure,” James chuckled, appearing more than happy to play along.

Excitedly, Sirius ripped into one of his favourite Zeppelin licks, which had them all leaning forward to get a better listen. When he was done, James arched a single eyebrow and crossed his arms over his chest. "You're gonna play Jimmy Page and tell me that it don't sound exactly like bright red? It was just one big swirl of it. Like a tornado."

"Amazing!" Sirius cried. "This is so cool, imagine what we could do with your superpower. We're gonna writing songs that sound and look like masterpieces! C'mon, we could start right now. I have that that little diddle I did up in our room yesterday—you know the one, goes like—” Sirius began plucking away at a fun selection of notes. “Hey? Hey?!”

"Alright," Remus said, unslinging his bass and standing up for a stretch. "You guys can start without me, but I'm gonna go get a drink from the fountain. Be right back."

"Actually me too," James said, slipping over to Remus' side.

"Look at him," Sirius pouted, "he's already running."

"I'll be right back," James assured him. "While we're gone, why don’t you do the band a favour and break in our dear drummer boy a little bit more? Oh and—that 'little diddle' of yours was hot fucking pink.”

Grinning happily, Sirius arched a cheeky brow and turned to Peter, who was busy yawning and rubbing the sleep from his eyes with a drumstick in each hand. “Aw dammit,” he mumbled after, which only made Sirius cackle as he crossed the risers to him.

“C’mon, Wormy, Pot’s right. You’ve been doing an awful lot of ' just watching' at these practices of ours—now it's time we see what you’re really made of. Got any wicked drum fills to show off? No weird brain-colours necessary, honest."

"Don't bother me," Peter whined. "I'm happy going at my own pace."

"Aw, but I already know you’ve been practising in secret—perfect time to fess up! Now let's hear that talent!”

As Sirius tugged another stool up alongside the drum kit and Peter sheepishly sorted through his sheet music, Remus let James follow him out of the room. A clamouring sounded just as they swung out into the hall—the sound of a snare being knocked over and Peter moaning in response.

“We’re lucky that teacher of yours lets us practice here after class and weekends,” James said, “don’t think we could get away with having a drum kit in the dorms.”

“It’s gonna be hell trying to find someplace to rent in London,” Remus said snidely. “Can you imagine drums in a flat? Ha.”

“So you’re serious then—about moving back home and being in a band together?”

Remus felt suddenly self-conscious. “Well, it’s a funny thought, sure, but there’s not much else I wanna do right now. And with you and Sirius, how can we go wrong?”

James looked down shyly, before reaching out to let his hand trail along the cinder block wall of the hallway. “So you don’t want to go into politics like your dad then?”

“Fuck no.”

“Ha. Fair.”

“Do you want to be a lawyer like your dad?”

Stopping next to the water fountain, James leaned up against the wall and rubbed his arm. “Not really,” he confessed, “but if I go to university I’ll get to play football on an official team. In our meeting the other day, Bilshin told me he figures I have a chance at a scholarship actually—s’long as I don’t bollix it up and get myself tossed off the team next year.”

Remus cracked a smile. “Better put out a restraining order on Black then, just to be safe.”

“I better,” James said, matching it.

“So you want to play sports professionally?”

“Maybe,” James shrugged. “I did when I was a kid, but it never really felt like the best thing. Dad loves football but didn’t like the idea of me pining over it. Says you break your body before you’re thirty—and then what, live as a cripple?”

“A filthy rich cripple.”

“Only if you’re good.”

“Trust me, Prongs, you’re good. Even I know that.”

“Even you?”

Remus sighed. “You finally gonna make me say it? I fucking hate football, mate.”

“I know,” James laughed. “It’s such a shame really. I’d kill for your legs.”

“Thanks, ‘Legs’, I’ll take that as a compliment.” Smirking, Remus bent forward and took a drink from the fountain.

“So what was it Sirius said to Snape again?” James asked, and Remus drew back up, wiping his mouth.

“He not tell you?”

“Nope, heard it from Lily actually. Surprising right? Sounds like just the thing he’d brag about.”

“Maybe he’s maturing.”

“Don’t bet on it.” James replaced him at the water fountain, speaking between gulps; “So what’d he say?”

“Told him off for Lily’s sake mostly. There was something about Snape literally making new friends like Frankenstein, but then Sirius apologised.”

James straightened up, water dripping down his chin. “To Snape?”

“No,” Remus answered in amusement, “to Lily. For ‘every bad thing he’s ever said, thought, or briefly wondered’.”

James wiped his mouth on his sleeve to reveal a curious smile. “Wonder what’s brought that on. Maybe she’s got something on him.”

“I told you, it’s maturation.”

“You really believe that?”

“No, but they say if you say things out loud enough times eventually they’ll come true.”

“And who’s ‘they’?”

“You know—them—people.”

“I see. Could you also ask them who’s gonna win the Cup this year? Pretty sure Dad’s bet most of my inheritance on Manchester.”

Remus’ smile broadened. “Ah, but what do you need that for when you’re gonna be a famous rock star?”

James surged forward and slung an arm around his shoulders. “Oh, Moony, I like the you that comes out when Sirius isn’t in the room. He’s so playful, that one.”

“Oh stuff it.”

They walked back together, following the paintings of various instruments that led back to the music rooms. “What even is that?” James asked, pointing at the image of a boxy string instrument.

“A crwth,” Remus answered smugly. "What—your superpower not tell you that?"

"It has its limits," James said. Then he sighed, but like with most things concerning him, it was a happy sigh. “You know, I do sorta wish we could just say we were gonna be in a band. Might make things feel less—I dunno—uncertain.”

“Which things?”

“You know—things—” He echoed Remus teasingly; *"*the future. Boring stuff.”

“Maybe we’re just going about it wrong,” Remus offered lightly. “Maybe we gotta stop saying we’re ‘gonna’ be in a band, and just say that we ‘are’ a band. Sirius’ll at least be happy about that.”

“Hm. You know you’re so smart, Moony. You better kick his ass come exams.”

Remus bit his lip to hide a smile, and offered his fist. “Count on it.”

James returned the fist bump and they rounded the corner toward the music room. As they approached, the sound of drums drifted toward them, uneasy and staggered at first, but eventually dropping into a cool and gentle beat.

“ ‘Little Wing’,” James said, recognising the song, “he’s playing Hendrix, too.”

Remus pushed the doors open to find Peter across the room, playing with his eyes closed while Sirius stood behind them. When he noticed them, Sirius waved his hands in the air and pointed vigorously to Peter, mouthing; ‘This guy, man!’

Finishing the drum fill, Peter let the notes filtered off at the end before opening his eyes and slowly looking back at Sirius. “So?”

“It was GREAT!” Sirius shouted.

“Pete!” James called immediately after; “Were you actually playing with your bloody eyes closed?”

Peter clutched the drumsticks nervously. “Well I—”

“It was great,” Remus said quickly, as James practically vibrated at his side.

“It was,” he agreed, before throwing his hands up in the air. “And guess what, Moony says we’re in a band!”

“WE ARE?!” Peter said, at the same moment Sirius shouted; “HE DID?!”

James nudged Remus in the side. “Tell ‘em, Moony!”

Remus looked to James, rolling his eyes over a smile, before throwing his arms up too, albeit a little less enthusiastically. He had to save face somehow.

“Guess we’re in a band, lads.”

Sirius’ arms immediately shot skyward to mirror his. “FUCK YEAH WE’RE IN A BAND!” He wailed, streaking down the bleachers until he met them at the doors. “This is fucking brilliant! It's vita brevis! Oi Pete—get your mousy butt down here and join our band already!”

As Peter scrambled down from his kit, Sirius looped an arm around both James and Remus' necks. “This is gonna be great,” he swore, “we’re gonna be great.”

Peter reached them and James loped an arm around him to gather him into the circle, but Remus couldn’t look anywhere but at Sirius. He could feel the ghost of Sirius’ thumb as it stroked the side of his jaw and sent shivers down his entire back.

I like you so much, he wanted to tell him—wanted to scream it. He'd been so distracted since they'd gotten back, but how could he have been when Sirius was always the most distracting thing in the room? He wanted to drown in it—to satiate the need or stop it, he wasn't sure. And now Sirius' eyes, which were never not alight with cheeky mischief or mad passion, were filled with promise. In them, Remus saw what might've been a glint of their future and when Sirius finally looked back to him, smiling like he'd just been handed the key to Heaven, he knew he'd found his answer. And just like Tonya, it wasn't in London.

It was right there.

Chapter End Notes

'Upper sixth' refers to year 13, which would equate to the 12th grade in North America. Lower sixth is therefore year 12/11th grade.
'Jeter l'éponge' literally means 'throw the sponge' but it's a French idiom meaning 'to give up'.

What James has is a form of synesthesia (specifically 'chromesthesia' or sound-to-colour synesthesia) which means that sound invokes an involuntary visual representation in the user's mind when they experience a certain thing or feeling. Synesthesia is different for everyone who has it, and not much is known even today about how it is caused. It makes sense that James would've gone his whole life without realising he was different, as testing for this sort of thing did not exist and information on it was slim to none.

Because I'm finally getting ready to finish up my semester for the holidays, I've put together a release schedule all the way up until Christmas. No news yet on if I will have as consistent updates following these dates, but I wanted you to have something to look forward to leading up to then <3

As always, I love-love-LOVE your comments, and I read and re-read every single one. Thank you so much for reading the silly words I come up with in my head. You're all rock stars as far as I'm concerned ★ ☆ ★ ☆

Next chapter: Dec 11/12 (all dates vary depending on your time zone)

Follow-up chapters: Dec 15, Dec 18, Dec 22, Dec 25 <3

Chapter 60: Paws Off, Padfoot

Chapter Summary

Remus Lupin, you're so embarrassing. Almost embarrassing as Sirius and his new nickname.

Chapter Notes

CW: 'F' slur used in exposition to refer to smoking. Drinking. Crude language.

Meant to have this up way earlier, but my term isn't technically over until April, so even though we've broken for holiday I've still got loads of work. So, you can have this now! Sorry for any spelling or grammar mishaps, lol <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Trying to make some sense of it all,
But I see it makes no sense at all;
Is it cool to go to sleep on the floor?
I don't think that I can take anymore;
Clowns to the left of me!
Jokers to the right!
Here I am, stuck in the middle with you…

"Stuck in the Middle with You" Stealers Wheel, 1972

In a lot of ways, dating Marlene had been easier than not dating her at all. Back then Remus could be trusted to better hold himself in check, but without a girlfriend to procure notions of guilt over, his feelings for Sirius had begun to run rampant. He'd remembered what it was like to be jealous of James whenever he and Sirius went off together, or began talking about anything moderately close to music—which was more often than not, now that they'd actually agreed to make their 'band' official. He caught himself glaring at the girls that stared at him when he walked past, and laughing a little louder at his jokes just to be sure that Sirius heard him over the others. Remus didn't want to laugh. He felt more like crying, and the jokes were usually shite anyway.

He tried to keep everything at bay by edging himself into denial—meditating on pensive thoughts such as how his feelings could just be that of those forged in friendship, now blown out of proportion due to his failed relationship, boredom at school, or general disinterest in his current reality. Surely he was just mistaking 'like' for something more substantial, and the turn-around period for such ridiculous things was simply much longer than anticipated. It even occurred to him that he could be mistaking his ideas of Sirius as leftover affection for Tonya. After all, the likeness was uncanny. From the inexplicable desire to have drama follow them from room to room, down to their inky-black tresses, the similarities were almost endless. Perhaps he was simply feeling this way because Sirius was there and Tonya was not. Every time he thought he'd begun to miss her again, Sirius was by his side, offering him smiles and distractions by the armful. But it would never work, Remus would tell himself. No matter how guilty he'd felt while dating Marlene, it was nothing compared to the guilt he now faced alone. The Twelfth of Never would fall upon Tibb's Eve before the two of them could ever be anything more than friends.

And why's that? That devil on his shoulder would say, whenever he thought he'd made peace with it. Sirius said it himself, he likes blokes. And he ain't dating that love-sick, primrose Chastity Bell anymore. What's a'matter, chap—afraid you might like it?

Yes, Remus thought back a million times. Some might deny it, but 'like' and envy went hand in hand. There were plenty of people who didn't like Sirius Black, but they certainly envied him. Whether for his looks or his smarts or his money, or that bewitching devil-may-care attitude of his. Sirius was bold and daring and Remus, he... wasn't. He was just Remus. He was happy being the tag-along, the sarcastic friend with a fag and a half-decent music recommendation in his back pocket, the kid with a crappy dad because nine out of ten dads were crappy anyway. He could be 'Remus and his books'—'Remus and his fags'—'Remus and GODDAMMIT WOULD YOU ALL JUST LEAVE ME ALONE?!'

Maybe it was a hard realisation, but it would've been worse to lie to himself. He just wasn't willing to risk it all like Sirius was, and if he were being truly honest with himself, he was afraid. Afraid that Sirius would ask him to.

Though... that didn't mean he couldn't look, right? Sirius made that part easy, what with his, well—everything. Between Remus' own romancing and the way things had gone down with Tomny, he'd somehow missed it, but where Sirius had been handsome before, the shape he was growing into now was downright stunning. He had a side-profile that made Remus want to punch him if just to add a dent to the perfect ridge of his nose. Unlike so many other musicians, his fingers were long and delicate—a realisation that had come after they'd received a lecture in art class about the Sistine Chapel. Remus had thought crudely that compared to Sirius, Michelangelo's depiction of Adam's hands were rather ugly. And then because it was so embarrassing, Remus rushed back to the dorm for an ice-cold shower.

I must be going insane, he thought, while drowning himself under the showerhead. No sane person thinks about someone else this much. Maybe I should just tape a bag over his head—see him try and look so bloody fit then. Bastard.

Oh, he blamed Sirius, alright. Not just for his looks or his inability to be missed in any crowd he was ever in, but for his kindness. And for keeping his secrets.

A full month had passed since that phone call with Tomny. More often than not it hung over Remus' head like a dark cloud, but thanks to his friends' goodwill, he was finally starting to feel okay again. He dreaded summer, but at least he would have James and Peter. Mary and Marlene too, if he could put up with their primping and preening. He was more worried for Sirius, who'd had such a horrible time over Christmas, but they would both find ways to distract themselves. Sirius was wreak his havoc, and Remus would read his books, maybe even venture out on occasion. Not to the End, no—he refused to obsess over people who had no interest in him, no matter how many pretty words they used to justify it. Even now, Remus wasn't sure what Sirius had done with Tonya's letter, and he didn't ask. He'd been right to hand it over. Secrets like that only made him and Sirius closer, and when he was ignoring his more ludicrous emotions, he supposed it only made them better friends too.

You have my everything, he thought, each and every time he found himself staring at Sirius from across their bedroom, classroom, or dinner table. It didn't matter how much distance was between them, or how stupid he knew he was for doing it, Remus was always staring at Sirius. It as though he put him in a trance. It happened so often that some of the others had even taken notice, and Remus had had to make up a few imaginary bees just to get himself out of it. But it was okay now—he was okay—except he still wasn't sure how he was going to keep himself from ruining a friendship that meant everything when a single glance from Sirius left him thrumming from top to bottom. It made him apprehensive to let Sirius come close, but he also couldn't bear to let him drift away. It was like some horrible game of cat and mouse, without knowing who was playing what. Remus had never fancied himself a wolf, but playing cat and reaching for the stars didn't sound all that more pleasant.

* * *

Thursday 19th May 1977

After several weeks of practice, Hawkings' first (and likely only) rock band, 'The Marauders', were finally starting to sound half-decent. James and Sirius found it rather difficult not playing over one another every other song and Peter still dragged behind in tempo sometimes, forcing Remus to make up for the lost rhythm with his bass lines, but for a couple of wannabe rock stars with only Sirius' formal training to split amongst them, they'd certainly done alright.

Tuesdays and Thursdays had become unofficial practice nights, along with the occasional Sunday if they were feeling up to it. With the incident involving Snape long behind them, James eight-week ban from the football team was about to be lifted, which would probably change how often they could get together, but Remus had Sirius had already been assured: this was for real. All for one and one for all, those Marauders. Remus couldn't wait until they were making music of their own.

For now though, it was just any other Thursday. Remus was supposed to be meeting the guys for another practice, except he was running late after getting sucked into a conversation with his new biology partner, Jillian, who seemed a bit too eager to get a jump start on their project. He'd made the mistake of using the band as an excuse to try and leave, which had only opened up an opportunity for Jillian to pepper him with more questions. It'd taken a while to shake her, and he doubted his friends would've found it as interesting a conversation as Jillian seemed to. They'd probably have just made fun of him for not being able to say no to the girl—but it didn't matter much anyway, as the moment Remus rounded the corner leading up to the music building's front doors, he was drawn to an immediate halt.

All thoughts of biology and Jillian evaporating instantly, Remus watched as Sirius leaned out of door, one foot crossed in front of the other at the ankle. He was talking to a girl—just chatting really, but he was leaning back against the open door so casually that not even a blind man would have mistaken it for anything other than flirting. A moment of pathetic doubt flitted across his mind—Maybe they're also talking about a... biology... project—but then Sirius smiled and touched his thumb to the side of his mouth and Remus knew he was right.

Uncomfortable with the idea of walking right between the two of them, he skirted to the side of the pavement and bent down, pretending as though he was riffling through his guitar case and having to retie his shoelaces. Half of him wanted to crane his ear just to catch a snippet of their conversation, but that jealous Moony that had been living under his skin for who knows how long wanted nothing to do with it.

It took far too long for the conversation to end for it be anything innocent, and by then Remus' ankles were beginning to ache from the three-dozen times he'd tied and untied his shoes. When the pair finally said goodbye and Sirius slipped back inside the music hall, he stood and stiffly made his way to the front doors, bass guitar in hand. He passed the girl, whose uniform was made up of Rowena House colours just like Lily and the other girls'. For a split-second Remus was so caught up by the navy blue of her skirt that he'd nearly missed the little wave she gave him. Not that it wouldn't have mattered—he did not return the gesture.

Throwing open the doors to the music hall, he muscled his bass inside and took a deep breath. Sirius was just ahead of him down the hall, walking with his hands in his pockets and—was he whistling?

"Oi! Black!"

The cherry tune cut out immediately as Sirius turned around, a wide grin on his face. "Oi, yourself, Moony. Thought we were gonna be waiting on your sorry arse all night."

Feeling strangely apprehensive after the quip, Remus approached Sirius, who'd stopped to wait for him, and swallowed the lump in his throat.

"Who was that?" He asked, indicating to the doors with a jerk of his head.

Sirius looked around him before scratching his nose. "Oh, you mean Tess? She's in English with James and I. Was just asking me about the homework."

"Just homework? Nothing else?"

Sirius gave him a funny look, which was ironic because Remus felt anything but funny.

“We talked about the band too," he said. "Can you believe it? Guess word’s getting around. We’re already famous.” Sirius stepped forward and clapped him on the shoulder in a friendly manner, but Remus hardly noticed.

“You were flirting,” he said sharply.

Sirius' funny look returned, this time accompanied by a self-satisfied smirk that made Remus want to punch his lights in.

“Was I?”

“Yeah, you were. So what, you gonna date her?”

“Would it be a problem if I did?”

Remus’ mouth opened, temporarily dazed by Sirius’ brazen response. “N-No. You just—might as well fess up to it if you’re interested.”

“Why, you got a thing for Tess?”

Say no, a voice screamed.

“Would it be a problem if I did?”

Idiot.

Sirius glanced down and then shoved his hands back into his pockets. “No… no problem. Didn’t realise you and Tess knew each other all that well, that’s all. But yeah, I’ll back off. Not worth risking your best mate for some girl, right?”

Remus felt his stomach sink.

You fucking idiot.

“I don’t have a thing for Tess,” he confessed. Sirius squinted at him.

“You don’t? Then why the grumpiness?”

“Jus'... in a bad mood. Sorry. Date her if you want.”

“You're so weird. I never actually said I was gonna date her,” Sirius said, trading his confused look for a smile.

Great, now he thinks you're weird, Remus thought.

You ARE weird, jealous Moony said.

The thought was enough to leave Remus panicking.

"You think I'm weird?" He demanded.

"Uh—yes?" Sirius looked him up and down. "Or no. Actually, I'm not really sure what the right answer is here. Can you give me a hint?"

Mortified at his own lunacy, Remus forced a smile. "…Was only joking. We both know Potter's the biggest weirdo anyway, right? I mean, I don't know any other seventeen year-olds ready for marriage, do you?"

Satisfied by the response, Sirius laughed in agreement. "Nope. Now who'd have thought it—the only tosser among us with a well-adjusted family and he's the weirdo."

They laughed together, albeit awkwardly, and Remus rocked back on his heels until his fried nerves gave way.

“Wanna get to practice then?” He suggested.

“Sure, Moony. We were waiting for you.”

Sirius turned and motion for him to follow, and Remus did, feeling horribly stupid. Who was he to police those Sirius did and didn’t date? Best friends didn’t do that. He had to get control of these embarrassing outbursts.

Back in music room #2, their friends were waiting for them. Peter was already tucked up behind the drum kit, licking his thumb as he flipped through a book on music theory. James sat next to him on a stool, spinning haphazardly in circles while holding the 1964 Strat Sheila had so graciously lent out to him for practice. As the door clattered shut behind them, James looked up.

“About time Cinderella arrived for the ball,” he called; “Clock’s just about to strike midnight, you know.”

“Yes, and he’s broken a glass slipper so don’t test him,” Sirius cheeked.

“I’m fine, let’s just play,” Remus grumbled loosely.

James exchanged a wary look with Peter, who just shrugged and added his own sound effect with the drums; ba-dum-tsss!

Remus ignored it, setting the Fender's case down and popping the lid. "Black, you got those music sheets?"

"Right here," Sirius said, dropping a paper folder down on a music stand.

“Hell yes, what we playing tonight, Maestro?” James asked.

“Maestro is not an acceptable nickname,” Sirius scoffed, shoving the sheet music into his chest. James took the paper—which they all knew now he couldn't read anyway—and began toddling after Sirius with a coddling smile.

“Ah, c’mon—you were just complaining yesterday that you don't have one. I’m really trying here.”

Sirius handed Peter his music sheets. “Try harder.”

“I think it’s fine,” Remus said, from across the room.

“That’s ‘cause you’re a shit.”

"Since when are you supposed to like a nickname? You were the one who forced those stupid names onto us in the first place."

"My nicknames are art!" Sirius cried, balling up Remus' sheet music and throwing it at him. "You're an arse."

“So you don’t want one?” Peter asked, while Remus chased his paper ball down the music stand.

“Never said that,” Sirius said haughtily. "But honestly—who are we right now? We got Moony, Wormtail, Prongs, and Black. What the fuck—that’s so lame!”

“I'll remind you again that you're the one who came up with all of that crap in the first place,” James added snidely. "If you don't like any of our suggestions, just give yourself one."

Lifting his guitar strap over his head, Sirius paused long enough to flip James the bird. “I can’t just give myself a nickname. That’s worse than lame, that’s bottom of the fucking barrel-level embarrassing.”

“Okay I got it, how about Moony, Prongs, Wormtail and ‘that other asshole'?"

"I appreciate the menial effort but that's not exactly snappy enough."

"How about 'The Hair'?" Peter suggested.

"Oooh—! I like that one!" James grinned, while Sirius scoffed.

"Fuck you guys, you're not taking this seriously at all."

"We could always call you 'Trouble'! Or how 'bout 'Starboy'?"

"That sounds like the name of a cheesy superhero," Remus called.

"Exactly!" James shouted gleefully; "He could be the sidekick to Bowie's 'Starman', eh?"

"Fuck you, not a chance," Sirius hissed. "I ain't anybody's sidekick, so let's just get going on 'Honky Tonk Woman' before you're kicked out of the band for being absolutely useless."

Sighing wistfully, James returned to his stool, rumpled music sheet in hand.

"It's okay, Prongs, I liked that one," Peter said out of the corner of his mouth.

"Thank you, Wormtail. Wanna walk me through the rhythm?"

Peter rolled his eyes. "Honestly, when you gonna actually learn to read music? What good's a super power if you can't read?"

"Meh, reading's for you normal blokes. Call me when your dad's voice starts sounding like the colour of chocolate chip cookies."

As James scooted in closer to the drum kit, Remus walked himself and his bass back across the orchestra risers, setting his paper down on the stand next to Sirius' and picking up the Fender. Sirius watched him out of the corner of eye, while tuning the Rickenbacker.

"You've been awfully quiet," he said to Remus. "What, no stupid nickname jokes?"

"Nope," Remus shrugged, picking out the notes of the song's chorus.

"Nothing? What happened to that creative mind of yours?"

“I don't work for free.”

“Stingy arsehole. Your D's out of tune by the way.”

One corner of Remus’ mouth curled upwards and he tucked his pick between his lips. "Maybe you have perfect pitch," he muttered, but before he could even look up to gauge Sirius' reaction, the other boy appeared in front of him, nose only a few millimetres from his. Almost spitting out his pick, Remus jumped backward on the stands. “What the—back off, you idiot!”

“Not until you suggest something,” Sirius pushed, pushing way beyond the limits of personal space.

“I don't care, tell James you're flippin' Maestro and let's call it a day!”

“Ha—Try again.”

“Fucking—I don’t know!”

Sirius reached out and grabbed Remus’ face on either side, practically shaking his head back and forth. “I’m gonna rattle your snarky gob until something decent falls out!”

“Get off me!” Remus hissed, pushing him off. “God, you’re incessant—like a bloody dog!”

“Good, keep it going!” Sirius encouraged.

“You want me to call you a dog?!”

“I want you to suggest something! Join the club already, Moony! It's only been two years!”

"Oh, fuck off," Remus bristled.

Sirius didn't seem to care. "C'mon, we know you've got dogs. You name them—now name me!"

“Fine!" He threw his arms up. "Zenyatta, Seabiscuit, Padfoot—"

"Padfoot and Zenyatta?" Sirius grimaced. "Those are terrible names."

"UGH! Take your pick, I don’t care, just don't—”

Remus drew up short, his breath leaving him all at once.

Just don't touch me.

A beat passed and then Sirius huffed, clearly unsatisfied. “Guess it’s true, you can’t force perfection—or a half-way decent nickname.”

“Dogs this, dogs that—there was so clearly a bitch joke in there,” James said to Peter, almost as though he were trying to diffuse the sudden tension.

"I thought 'Padfoot' was kinda cute," Peter returned.

Ignoring them, Remus bent over to pick up his dropped pick and wipe it off on his shirt before returning it to the corner of his mouth.

“Bloody lunatic, it's just a nickname. Have mine if you’re so pressed,” he grumbled to Sirius, who’d turned away to plug his guitar into an amp.

“You can’t just recycle a nickname," Sirius lashed, "that’s horse-shit.”

“Given this enough thought, have you?”

“Blame Lottie. She was the one who brought the utter lack of equality among this group of lads to my attention in the first place.”

“You’ve gotta be kidding me,” Peter scoffed.

“I’m sure he isn’t,” James sang, “but if you two are done with your little spat, I actually want to make it in time for dinner, so let’s just shut up and start playing, yeah?”

Remus stood up and pulled the pick from his lips. “Yes, let's."

They all dispersed a bit to ready themselves, and Remus did his best to ignore Sirius' presence. Despite this, he could tell Sirius was watching him again; his gaze felt like a million tiny little pin pricks staring him in the back. Too stubborn to give him a reaction and too rattled to call him on it, Remus walked over to his own amp and tested the volume. He made sure to bring his music sheet with him, so he didn't have to be next to Sirius while they practiced.

You never make things any easier, he told him telepathically. Just for Christ sakes, stay away.

"You got the basics already, Potter?" Sirius called, still eyeing Remus as though he was the toy he’d wanted and hadn't got.

"Basically," James shrugged. "You guys just give it go. I'll follow you."

"Alright. Moony, you good?"

"Let's just play," Remus muttered.

"Fine. Pete, count us in."

Peter squinted at the sheet music. "Okay, but I don't have a cowbell..."

* * *

Friday 20th May 1977 — The Next Day

They didn't always fight. Some days were good—like the Monday before when they'd taken all the freshly-dissected frogs from the biology lab and hid them in Professor Flitwick's desk just before class. The shriek he'd given when he opened his drawer while looking for a pencil had been enough to leave Remus and Sirius in stitches for hours. It'd been ages since they'd pulled a proper prank, and Sirius seemed eager to bring one to fruition, even if it wasn't on such a grand scale as those they'd managed to pull off before. If Sirius had known what was coming, he probably wouldn't have been so eager. But that was the fun of practical jokes, Remus supposed; full of surprises. Though, he wasn't sure what cow-tipping had to do with pranking.

"Well, it's not really a prank, we've just never done it," James amended, as they made their way down the lane in the dark, one half-drunk bottle of whisky in hand. Skipping out on curfew had been his and Sirius' idea, but with a little liquid-courage, Remus and Peter had been just as eager to join in.

"You sound pretty lax for someone who is not only counting on getting back onto the football team, but also wants to be dorm monitor next year," Remus said, never one to let his friends off easy. Smirking around the rim of his gin bottle, he threw back a final gulp before passing it to Peter, who finished it off and tossed it into a bin along the side of the road.

"I'm not counting on anything—I'm on the team! And I told you, I'm only considering it," James insisted.

"Nah, he'll do it," Sirius started, punching James lightly in the shoulder. "Imagine the parties—and he can declare his undying love for Evans at every one. Don't that sound great, Prongsy?"

"That sounds like a surefire way to get fired," Peter added.

"Really, Wormtail, do you think he'll be the first dorm head in history to throw a party? It's time you started thinking bigger and better, my friend."

"Hmph."

"How did you even come up with this 'cow-tipping' thing anyway?" Remus asked. "Thought they only do shit like this in dumb American television."

"As a matter of fact, that's exactly how we found out," Sirius said, before going on to explain how he and James had been forced to watch some horrible 'coming of age' movie in their Classics class. "There's always cows in that field just around the eastern lip of campus, right? James and I saw them this morning from the top floor of the science block."

"We did," James confirmed. "They're there."

"Don't cows bite?" Peter asked.

"Sure, they got teeth," Sirius shrugged, "but I'd be more worried about getting trampled. Cows and buffalo aren't that distantly related, you know."

"I'm gonna tip the most," James said, before hiccupping. "I shall be the —" HIC! "—King of cows!"

"Now that's a nickname," Sirius said.

Remus was sceptical, and didn't fancy dragging any of his friends back to the medical room when they got trampled, but after emerging through 'Moony's glory hole' ("Sirius I will murder you.") there was no going back anyway. Their only real regret was that James' torch had turned up dead and they were left with only a single torchlight to guide them.

"What, why aren't we tipping the school's cows?" Remus asked, squinting ahead of them down the dark dirt road that followed along the outside of the school wall.

"Kettleburn never leaves them in the field overnight," James explained. “Probably for this exact—" HIC! "—reason.”

"Prongs, try holding your breath."

"Okay—" HIC! "—Moony."

“I wouldn’t try messing with the school’s herd anyway,” Peter supplied, flashing the torch around. “They’re all hairy and have horns that look like they could disembowel a grown man. Talk about buffalo.”

“Yeah, but not these guys,” Sirius said, “they’re dairy cattle. Now c’mon, it’s this way.”

Nudging James, who had just managed to stop hiccupping, Sirius took off across the road toward a barbed wire fence and carefully placed his hands and feet along the wire. Making sure to go slow, he stretched it out for each of them to slip through and let James trade with him so he could do the same. Afterwards they were all left standing on the soft ground of the Highland field, staring out with nay a cow in sight.

“Why are we here again?” Remus asked, only because he felt like complaining. It was pitch black and all he could smell was cow dung. At least they'd all worn boots.

“ ‘Cause Moony,” Sirius sighed, “when you think back to your school days ten years from now, you’re not going to remember sitting in class getting lectured by Binns, or the papers you wrote, or even the people you liked and the people you loathed—but cow-tipping with your favourite lads? That you’re gonna remember.”

It was a good argument, so Remus resolved himself to stop complaining and just gestured for Sirius to go on. He did so, winking at him and grinning in that shameless way of his that left Remus feeling exhilarated and tired all at once.

No, you’re already over this, you toff. He’s your friend.

Then why does he have to look like that? And look at me like that? It’s not fair.

Life’s not fair, idiot.

Remus pinched his forehead. He needed to stop having imaginary arguments over Sirius in his head or he really was going to lose it.

“I don’t mean to be the voice of reason or anything,” Peter said as they walked, “but I don’t actually see any cows.”

“They’re here!” Sirius insisted. “We just saw them today, you were Prongs.”

“Is this the right field?” James asked, sounding sceptical himself now.

Sirius began turning around, searching desperately. “Yeah—I mean, I think so..."

“You think so?” Remus echoed.

“Well all fields look the same, don’t they? And it’s bloody Scotland—there’s fields everywhere! All I know is the cows were out behind the science buildings on the opposite side of the fence and now so are we.”

“Cows do have feet, you know—they can move.”

“Thank you for that startling revelation, Lupin.”

“We know they were here because we can still smell them,” James said, pinching his nose for dramatic effect. “How ‘bout we just walk a bit more? Who knows, maybe we’ll find some sleepy sheep instead and we can tip them.”

“I think sneaking up on a sheep might be a little harder,” Peter said, but because they were lightly buzzed and without anything else to do other than return home and head to bed (which was totally unacceptable and totally not cool) they kept walking. Eventually James and Sirius fell into step with one another, sharing the last bottle of whisky and surging on ahead while Remus hung back with Peter and his torch, not interested in breaking an ankle in some stray foxhole. As a result, Peter had taken the chance to share with him his most pressing dilemma: what he was going to get Moira for her upcoming birthday.

“I could always call mum and she could send something, but that almost sounds a bit lazy, don't you think? I was supposed to look over Easter, but she came to visit so I didn't have to time to sneak off, and Moira wouldn't be impressed if it weren't a surprise. You didn't have to buy Marlene a birthday gift while you were dating, did you?”

“Uh-huh... sure...”

Sirius' hair looks a bit blue in the dark. It's the moon. The moon must make it blue.

“Are you even listening, Moony?”

Remus blinked several times. “Oh yeah, sorry Pete. Why don’t you just make her something then?”

“Like what?”

“I don’t know—you’re a great artist, and Moira loves your art, right? So…”

“You’re right,” Peter said fondly, “I guess it could be that easy then, but what could I make her? Maybe a collage?”

“Mhm.” Remus drifted off again, unable to help himself only because it was nighttime and Sirius was still ahead of him and Sirius always looked best under the moonlight. It made every inch of him light up like real star-shine. He had his back to him, but Remus knew without looking that his stormy eyes would have turned clear, and his smile—just absolutely blinding.

“He’s your friend…” Remus told himself under his breath. “He’s your friend.”

“James!” Peter shouted, making Remus jump and snap out of yet another daze. “I meant to ask earlier, what’d you get Lily for her birthday this year?”

“A bracelet,” James called back, “the one with the little charms on it. You were with me, remember? At Harrods.”

“Oh yeah,” Peter said sorely, before biting his lip.

“Gifts don’t have to be expensive to be meaningful,” Remus told him, quietly. “Just get her something you know she’ll like.”

“Maybe you’re right,” Peter said, looking down. “Oh, watch out, Moony, or you’ll step in a—”

“EUGH—! OH MY GOD!”

The cry came from ahead of them, where Sirius was now standing with his legs splayed apart, waving his arms like they were on fire, his left boot now ankle-deep in what could’ve only been a very large puddle of cow shit.

“Gross!” He wailed, before letting loose a string of horrible retching noises.

James and Peter instantly dissolved into breathy laughter, holding their stomachs while Sirius bent over and heaved.

“Aw, Sirius, did the poor cow pat attack you?” James asked, before having to shoot backwards as Sirius took a swing at him.

“Just help me!”

“Why don’t you try pulling your damn foot out,” Remus snapped, approaching Sirius with a huff.

“It’s stuck—!" Sirius moaned, before retching again. “EUGH—It’s like the shit’s suctioned-cupped to my foot!”

“Where there are cows there are shit,” Peter offered enthusiastically. Even in the dark Remus could tell the glare Sirius gave him was particularly nasty. Rolling his eyes, Sirius grabbed hold of his pant leg and sucked in a breath before giving one good tug. Unfortunately, the tug was a little too good, and his foot shot up right out of his boot, leaving him to sprawl backward in the muck before finally catching himself with one more horrible squelch.

All colour drained from Sirius’ face, and he looked down to find that he’d stepped in a second cow pat, only this time, with his bare foot.

“Oh fuck,” James gasped, “you didn’t actually step in another one, did you? That's prime comedy, mate!”

Sirius gave a wail so loud he could’ve been heard from Castle Hall. Holding a hand to his forehead, Remus fought back a smile. Seeing the normally composed Sirius dance around like a chicken with its head cut off was almost too much.

“It’s just a little cow pat,” he started, barely holding back laughter now. “Could you be any more of a prissy prat?”

Sirius gaped at him, horrible offended; “Would you like to try it?! Because there is cow shit between my toes!”

That was it for Remus, who broke down with laughter so hearty it brought real tears to his eyes while Sirius waddled around, desperately wiping his bare foot on any bit of clean grass he could find. James and Peter joined him, laughing at the whole thing but mostly Sirius, before James shot upright in realisation.

“Cow pat—oh my god, Moony, what was it you called Sirius in the music room yesterday? Pat-foot?”

Sirius’ head turned to them so quickly it almost looked like he gave himself whiplash. “No way,” he hissed.

“Oh hell yeah!” Peter gasped. “That’s it—that’s your nickname! Patty-foot!”

“No fucking way!”

Remus crossed his arms with a shit-eating grin on his face (pun intended); “Oh c’mon, I know you don’t take being the butt of the joke so well, but you didn’t actually think we’d let you pick your own nickname, hm… Pat-foot?”

“That is your DOG'S NAME!" Sirius roared.

“No—he's 'Padfoot'. Though I suppose we could call you that instead on the days where we're feeling generous,” Remus said smugly.

"You dicks! You vicious, betraying les roi des fille de putes! Je t'emmerde!"

"You're right, Pat-foot, the name does have its own sort of 'je ne sais quoi'."

“HA!" James howled. "So good!”

Fuming, Sirius stopped forward and grabbed hold of his boot, yanking it free with one hand and pushing his hair up over his eyes with the other. As he did so, he raised the boot high, primed for throwing.

“Oh fuck,” Peter yelped, already turning to run.

James did the same, shouting; “Run, Moony! He’s gone mad!” And Remus turned, cackling as raced away, a single shit-covered boot arcing over his head while Sirius screamed after him.

“Your accent is ABYSMAL AND YOU’RE ALL DICKHEADS!”

“Watch your step on the way home, Padfoot!” James answered. “Wouldn’t want to become ‘Padfeet’ now would we?”

“AUGHHHH!!!”

* * *

Saturday 21st May 1977

Sirius might've not been as impressed by his new nickname, but the girls certainly were. They spent the several hours of the following afternoon laughing over it, plus the fact that Sirius had to walk the entire way home with cow shit between his toes before washing off under the hose outside their dorm. The boot, sadly, could not be saved, as they never recovered it from wherever Sirius had thrown it in the field.

"So you're not gonna go back to look for it?" Lottie asked, popping a grape into her mouth.

"Nah, let the cows keep it," Sirius grumbled. He had an arm draped over his eyes as he laid back on the picnic blanket, and his head was propped up on Mary's shin. It was just after dinner and all eight of them were currently crammed on the single blanket, making up a single messy knot of limbs. Occasionally one of them complained of a knee to the back or shifted and crushed someone's hand, but it was the first nice day in weeks since the April rain had fled, and there was a real sweetness on the breeze that made everyone want to be outside.

"I wish you'd taken a picture," Marlene laughed.

"It happened too fast, was much too dark," James sighed. "It exists now only in our memories."

"It wasn't that funny," Sirius said. "Lupin just took the lazy-way out and picked a dog's name and these numpties pretended it fit. It's practically slander."

"You're just lashed because it is funny," Peter snorted.

"It's not funny!"

"Oh yes, it is."

"Okay, if we don't talk about something else right now I'm gonna go mental," Sirius warned.

“Did you ever settle on the name for your band then?” Lily asked, flipping through Peter’s sketchbook. She’d had to practically wrestle it out of his hands, but after promising to correct his maths homework, he finally handed it over.

“Oh, that’s still a thing?” Marlene asked after her.

“Yup. Naw'stop movin', Cherry, m'almost done.” Remus said around the hair bobble in his mouth. He hadn't meant to be roped into doing her hair, but really, he didn't mind.

As Marlene straightened her back for him, Mary lifted her sunglasses up. “So you can all suddenly play instruments now?”

“What do you mean ‘suddenly’?” Sirius asked. “The four of us have been practising together for weeks now—me and Moony, for years.”

She shrugged. “Calvin keeps me busy.”

Sirius grimaced and word of Mary's latest beau. “You’re still dating that guy? He looks about thirty-five.”

“He’s only a year older than us.”

“He’s got chewing gum for brains,” Marlene added, grimly.

“Yeah, but he’s got just the right amount of opinions to make him tolerable and his dad runs a hedge fund, so who cares. Plus, he's not all that bad in the sack,” Mary smirked.

Remus couldn't see it, but he got the sense that Marlene was rolling her eyes.

“Are you guys actually any good with those instruments of yours?” Mary asked.

“It’s a work in progress,” Sirius said staunchly. “Elvis wasn’t born a musical genius, you know.”

“Even if Sirius was,” James snickered. Sirius saluted him.

“Well, have you written any songs yet?” Lottie asked.

“Not entirely,” Peter answered.

“Do you even have a name?” Marlene drawled.

“YES!” All three boys answered together, before Sirius cleared his throat and answered; “The Marauders!”

Remus looked up. “You mean that was official?”

“Unless you’ve got any better ideas, name-giver-extraordinaire,” Sirius ragged. He took a moment to look him up and down, but Remus just returned to his task at hand—braiding Marlene’s hair. Too bad all it took was one glance away for him to lose his place and get all muddled up.

“I messed it up again,” he sighed, releasing Marlene’s blonde plaits and letting them unravel down her back.

“S’okay, you gave it your best shot,” Marlene giggled, before crawling across the checkerboard blanket to Mary and plopping down in front of her expert fingers.

“Where’d you get the idea for ‘Marauders’?” Lily asked. Remus looked down at the sketchbook in her lap to find she was looking through several beautiful sketches of Moira. She wasn’t facing the viewer in any of them, which meant Peter must’ve done them without her knowing.

“From Mrs. Buchanan, actually,” James said, leaning back on his hands next to Lily. “She sprung us from Filch after a failed prank. It was one of the words she used to threaten us out of doing it again.”

Lily smirked down at the sketchbook lightly. “Fitting.”

“I think it sounds a bit naff actually,” Mary said, the picture of honesty.

“Gee, thanks. Does that mean you've got any bright ideas under that big hair of yours then?” Sirius asked, reaching over to poke at Mary’s hair, which was so big it nearly blocked out the sun. Her choice to ditch the braided hairstyle she’d been sporting since Christmas had left her with an afro to rival Diana Ross, but Mary had the confidence to pull anything off, so of course it looked good.

“Paws off, Padfoot,” Mary hissed, batting Sirius away while she continued to braid Marlene’s hair. “I just mean that no one’s gonna get it. It’s funny to you, sure, but to everyone else? Nu-uh, it’ll be a missed opportunity.”

“A missed opportunity for what?” Peter asked, pulling his t-shirt away from his neck to fan himself.

“To make a statement, of course! ‘The Marauders’—no, way too many syllables. Don’t you want people to remember you? Well, people are stupid, and they ain’t gonna if your name don’t roll off the tongue."

"I didn't think choosing a band name would come with so many conditions," Remus said sarcastically, while stretching out his back.

"Of course it does. It's like the cover of a book—it tells people what you're about. Take Sirius’ favourite pop band for example, Small Faces —”

Sirius scoffed; “They’re a rock band.”

“Shush. What I’m saying is, is that they may have had a few hits as ‘Small Faces’ but they didn’t really get good until they were just calling themselves ‘Faces’. And how about ‘T. Rex’? Could you imagine shouting ‘we want Tyrannosaurus Rex at a concert? No, you shout for T. Rex.”

“So you don’t like it at all?” James asked. “Because our backup was 'The Vaudeville Pantsers'.”

“No, I—” Mary grimaced; “Actually I don’t even want to know where you were going with that one.”

“Read it off a gum wrapper,” Sirius snorted, nudging Lottie with his elbow.

“The name is fine,” Mary clarified, “almost great even. You just need to lose one little detail.”

“And that is?”

“Duh—lose the ‘the’! No one’s about to go and pay to see a group declaring themselves as ‘The Marauders’ like some cheesy daytime comedy sketch. But ‘Marauders’, maybe—so just refer to yourselves directly and move on with it.”

“But that’s just bad grammar,” Sirius insisted.

“And since when do you care so much about grammar?” Marlene asked, smugly.

“I think Mary’s right,” Lottie declared. “Shorter might not always be ideal, but I think it’s acceptable in this instant.”

“Lottie’s filthy mind aside, I actually think Mary’s right too,” Lily added, before glancing up from the sketchbook. “You do have a lot of sketches of Moira in here, don’t you, Peter?”

Peter shot forward and snatched up the sketchbook. “I told you not to go that far!”

“They’re beautiful though,” Lily said kindly, turning back to the rest of them; “I guess the question the problem begs is this—are you describing yourselves as a collective or a concept?”

James squinted at her; “Huh?”

“Well ‘The Marauders’ implies that you’re all a singular marauder forming one unit, but ‘Marauders’ is more like a statement. Like ‘The Beatles’ are each a singular ‘Beatle’ on their own, I suppose, but the members of ‘Led Zeppelin’ aren’t all claiming to be flying lead balloons.”

“Exactly!” Mary agreed, getting so excited she almost dropped the tail of Marlene’s braid before she could tie it off. “Plus ‘the’ isn’t sexy.”

“You’re all nutters,” Sirius said. “There’s nothing wrong with ‘the’.”

“Should we put it to a vote then? All those in favour of ‘Marauders’—the concept—raise your hand.”

All four girls raised their hands, and eventually so did James and Peter. Sirius gaped at them. “You didn’t have any complaints yesterday when we let Pete paint ‘The Marauders’ across the side of Andy’s guitar case!”

James grinned at him and shrugged. “ ‘The’ ain’t sexy, mate.”

Done deliberating, Remus also raised his hand. “I’m with the girls.”

“There’s a shocker,” Sirius huffed.

Remus just smiled at him. “C’mon Black, you don’t want to be a Marauder, or even ‘the’ Marauder. That name feels too tangible for you—too touchable. Wouldn’t you rather be un-touchable? Be a concept people have to work to understand? What even is ‘Led Zeppelin’? It’s a million different things because no one pictures a concept the same way.”

Sirius drew back a bit, and Mary rocked her head in his direction, pointing back at Remus. “I’d listen to him if I were you.”

Sirius peered at him for a long time, but then finally relaxed, as if all the fight was draining out of him, one cheeky quip at a time. “ ‘Marauders’,” he echoed, before sighing, “alright, you’ve convinced me, but it better be a bloody good concept.”

“ ‘Cause how could it be any worse than ‘Moony, Wormtail, Padfoot, and Prongs’,” Lily smiled.

“Har, har, you’re so funny, Evans,” Sirius said, but he too was smiling.

“I don’t know why you’re so upset about the nickname in the first place, Sirius,” Mary said, fiddling with the end of Marlene’s braid. “Us girls don’t even have them and you don’t hear us whinging.”

“Actually we do,” Marlene said.

“We do?”

“Well, Lily and I do.”

“What’s yours then—you mean ‘Marls’?”

“No, it's ‘Cherry’,” Remus said automatically, before catching Marlene’s eye. Blushing a bit, she gave him a cheeky wink before sipping out of her water bottle.

“And here’s ‘Daisy’,” James grinned, jutting a thumb toward Lily, who cupped his chin and pulled him in close to plant a kiss on his cheek.

Mary turned on Lottie. "And you?"

Lottie considered. “Well, strickly speaking, I’m fine with ‘Lot’. After all, ‘Lottie’ is already a nickname. Though Mickey did used to call me ‘Barbie’ sometimes.”

Peter grimaced. “Oh bloody hell.”

“What the fuck?” Mary demanded. “You mean to say that I’m the only one here without a nickname?”

“Well, ‘Mary’ is already pretty short, ain’t it?” Marlene offered.

She scowled at her. “Sirius is right, you guys are lazy twats.”

“You mean you don't like 'Macdonald', Macdonald?” Sirius teased.

“Up yours, Black. A surname’s not a nickname.”

“Okay, then how do you fancy ‘Nymph’?”

Mary paused; “Like a fairy?”

“No, I was thinking more like ‘nymphomaniac’.”

Snatching Marlene’s water bottle from her, she tossed it at Sirius, who flinched and caught it in the stomach with a groan.

“ ‘Fairy Mary’ does sound kind of cute though,” Lottie suggested.

“Do not encourage him.”

Beaming very suddenly, Sirius clutched the bottle to his chest. “Oh, I know,” he started, “how about ‘Mingy Mary’? Or ‘Suzy Snatch’ if you want a bit of ambiguity. Or even better yet, just Snatchy? Gotta make it short and snappy so all the stupid people can remember it, right?”

After taking a second to glance around and see if there was anything else she could throw at him, but turning up empty, Mary settled for a venomous glare. “I hate you.”

James chuckled. “Well, if Padfoot here can be named after an unsavoury memory as well as one of Lupin’s dogs, then why not try that? Moony—what was your favourite dog’s name back home?”

Remus felt like he was walking into a trap. “Er… Dusty.”

“That’s PERFECT!” Sirius exclaimed. “Dusty Snatch!”

Chapter End Notes

'Twelfth of Never' and 'Tibb's Eve' are idioms to express something that'll never happen.
'Harrods' is a London department store.
'Naff' means lame or unfashionable. Can also be used to tell someone to "f off".

I really like this chapter, especially the beginning. Felt a lot like a character study into who Remus is right in this moment. To me, Remus and Sirius' behaviour is also very telling of what they're feeling on the inside, and just react in different ways. Sirius is very external, while Remus internalises everything. Does this make sense??? I hope so, lol.

Cheers and love. Next chapter out soon!

Next update: Dec 15/16 (Depending on your timezone).

Chapter 61: Liar's Dessert

Chapter Summary

> Remus Lupin wants two things: a distraction from how aware he is of his best friend, and to pass his exams. Lucky for him Barty Crouch can help with at least one of those things.

Chapter Notes

> CW: Mentions of suicide and homophobic language. Brief violence, and a generally not-so-happy Remus.
>
> I'm so tired, but happy I got this out! If you can't tell by the end, I'm really ramping up for some new developments, so I hope you enjoy <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

You know I've seen a lot of what the world can do,
And it's breakin' my heart in two;
Because I never wanna see you sad, girl,
Don't be a bad girl;
But if you wanna leave, take good care,
Hope you make a lot of nice friends out there;
But just remember there's a lot of bad and beware, beware…

- "Wild World" Cat Stevens, 1970

Wednesday 25th May 1977

Sirius was terrible with anything spicy.

Remus knew this because more than once he'd watched him dip his sticky fingers into one of James' regular care packages, only to complain for the next several hours that he'd never be able to taste anything ever again. Now, with only a month shy from the end of term, Euphemia Potter had sent her famous homemade chocolates as an early exam reward. Only thanks to having more kick than your average sweet, the chocolates felt more like a punishment rather than a reward.

"Maybe it is a punishment," Peter said, staring down at the tin and its unassuming tissue paper. “Like a warning—fail your exams and she’ll force-feed you the fire-chocolate.”

“She makes ‘em with bhut jolokia seeds,” James explained. “Ghost peppers. Evil stuff. But the salsa and vindaloo are great. If you've have the stomach for it, that is.”

“Which ninety-nine percent of the population does not. One bite is like licking the bottom of Satan’s flamin’ ball sack,” Sirius said, already pale.

Despite being under the impression that putting anything in chocolate that might bite back was a terrible shame, Remus couldn’t resist clapping Sirius on the shoulder. “Well, Padfoot, your name was on the card too, and I’m sure you don’t want to disappoint ‘mum’, so go ahead—give it a go.”

“You’re mental if you think I’m going anywhere near that stuff. My eyes are watering just with the bloody lid open.” Taking the chocolates from Peter, Sirius snapped the lid shut and slid the tin beneath James’ bed.

“They only get spicier with time, you know,” James said, grabbing his school bag. “Dad calls ‘em the ‘fine wine of chocolate’.”

Sirius held up a hand. “Out of sight, out of mouth, Potter.”

It was just as hard in forms not to tease him, so Remus didn’t bother practising much self-control. They sat around the room in a staggered formation in desks that Sheila had brought in for studying in preparation for their exams, which would commence the following week. She had the radio going as well, letting the quiet classical music drift across the classroom to 'stimulate their minds' and 'help wake them all up'. Rather than getting much studying done himself, Remus spent most of the short period watching Sirius, who was concentrating on the sheet music he’d propped up on a music stand next to his desk, scribbling and erasing notes while he hummed a tune to himself.

“Who would’a thought that the great Sirius Black would be frightened by a little chocolate,” Remus said quietly, eyeing Sheila, who was lounging across the room and doing class marking while wearing a dress so vibrantly purple she probably could’ve been seen from Mars.

“I didn’t see you jumping at the bit to take a bite either,” Sirius shot back, pulling one foot up onto his chair and nibbling on the end of his pencil as he glared at his work.

“What’s that?” Remus asked, pointing at the song.

“I’m calling it ‘Wag the Dog’. Just wish I could remember how this bit went when I wrote it.” He turned his glare toward their teacher. "Bloody Sheila. It's a music classroom—we should be playing music, not studying for maths."

“Does it have any lyrics?” Remus asked quietly, more intrigued than before.

“Mhm. Back at the dorm. You can have a look later if you want.”

“Okay, cheers.”

Sirius gave him a sideways glance. “Have you managed to write anything?”

Remus stared down at his English book a little harder. “A little. Not much though. It’s felt a little harder since… well, you know.”

Sirius nodded in understanding. “Okay. You just let me know if you want to collaborate again or something.”

Encouraged by Sirius’ calm response, Remus looked up again. “I might have this one song.”

“Oh yeah?”

“It’s... er—kinda sappy though.” And not at all about you, so don't look too far into it.

“That’s alright,” Sirius smiled, “every rock band needs a few ballads.”

“And a few poofs too, I suppose,” called a nasally voice from behind.

Remus turned around in his seat, instantly soured. “You know, eavesdropping’s actually considered a sin, Crouch.”

Barty sneered at him; “You’d know all about that then, wouldn’t you, fudge packer?” Beside him, Yaxley gave an ugly chortle and held out his palm for his friend to smack.

“You want me to lock you in the broom cupboard again, you little shit?” Snarled Sirius.

Ignoring him, Barty turned to Remus, looking him up and down with an evil look. “I heard something interesting from my dad the other day, Loony. You see, he's a politician too, only he works for the Crown, making sure all those sleazy, two-bit politicians are doing their job. And get this, he went 'round a new office the other day and happened to pick up on a familiar name. Now I'm no expert on genealogy, but unless there's more Lupins running 'round London than I thought, then I'd say he found your dad."

"Wow! You're so obsessed with Lupin that you're already telling your parents about him?" Sirius said. "Careful Bartemius, your own closet's turning a bit see-through."

Barty did not laugh this time. He ignored Sirius' quip and kept his eyes trained on Remus like a predator waiting to strike. "You wanna know what my dad heard at that office?"

"No really," Remus drawled, "but I'm sure you're going to tell us anyway so why don't you just get on with it?"

"—He heard that Lupin senior's got himself a bit of a wild child at home!" Barty hissed. "That he's so embarrassed of you he won't even let himself be seen with you in public! That you've been tossed out of so many schools, Hawkings was the only place left to send you."

Remus shared a look with Sirius. "Yeah, and...?"

Barty laughed like he'd gotten them. "Ha! So you admit it then? You admit you're a complete loser—a waster and a disgrace of a son?!"

Sirius clicked his tongue bitterly; "Shit! I thought I was the disgrace, Moony? You're supposed to be the phoenix rising from the ashes—the one turning his life around."

"He's certainly not!" Barty said smugly. "My dad said he's a no-good waste of space that wouldn't amount to anything, and that Lyall Lupin's just waiting for the day he can dump your arse."

Remus turned to Sirius, feigning relief and delight. "Black, did you hear that, Barty says my dad's finally gonna kick me to the curb—can you believe it?"

"If only I were given such a gift!" Sirius declared. "Ah, woe is me. Whoever spanked you with that lucky stick, spanked you hard, Lupin!"

Remus snorted, but Barty had already realised they were just making fun of him. He leaned forward in his chair, practically foaming at the mouth.

“I heard other stuff too,” he seethed, “like how you bashed up your face running with thugs and then they got tired of you and jumped you, leaving you for dead. That’s why you look like a cat used your face as a scratching post!”

“The drama!” Sirius gasped. “Moony, you told us it was a football accident.”

“I guess the pain made me block it out,” Remus shrugged. “Why Barty, were you looking for a way in? I’m not sure if anyone back home’s recruiting but with your face I’m sure they’ll think you look the part already.”

“You’re still laughing but that’s not all I heard, Loony,” Barty said very slowly. “A little birdy told me a rumour's been going around about you. Guess the nickname make more sense now that I know your—”

Interrupting him, Sirius waved a friendly hand; “Okay, Crouchie, go ahead. Just admit you’re in love with dear Lupin, here, so we can all move on and get our work done.”

Barty’s eyes shot wide. “What the fuck? I’m not—”

“Don’t feel bad for falling head over heels for the handsome chap, it’s okay. Most people can't help it. Moony’s a hot-ticket item, didn’t you know?”

“That's disgusting! You’re mental!”

“And you’ve absolutely pictured him naked. C’mon Crouch, just admit you’re in love with him.”

Sputtering, Barty launched himself to his feet, his chair toppling behind him. “I’m not in love with him!” He shouted. Everyone turned to look and a few kids began to snigger while Barty fumed, but before either Remus or Sirius could respond, Sheila cut the music.

“Mr. Crouch,” she called, standing up from her chair and straightening her dress. “I was just about to take a walk to deliver today’s attendance sheet, care to gather your things and join me?”

Barty turned his vicious glare on their teacher, and though it was obvious there was more he wanted to say, the giggling had spread. As though that weren't enough, Sirius held up his hands and drew a heart in the air, before blowing Barty a kiss to finish it all off. The younger boy looked about ready to snap as the class's sniggering rose to even further heights, but either out of embarrassment or sheer lack of a clever response, he snatched up his school bag and obediently followed Sheila to the door.

"You didn't have to say that," Remus said after they'd gone and the class's chittering had died down. He knew his cheeks red with embarrassment, but Sirius only turned back to his song with a haughty expression.

"I say call a spade a spade. If he's gonna play dirty, then so will we."

Remus sat back with a huff. Making fun of Barty's arrogant spiel had been fun, but as he reopened his book to the correct page, he was left with the gut feeling that it wasn't the last they'd be hearing from Barty or his father.

* * *

Friday 27th May 1977

Remus wasn't exactly sure what for, but between their spat in forms and the following morning, Barty had somehow procured himself a set of detentions that left him unable to attend forms for most of the week. This meant he did not arrive in class the next day or the day after, and Remus allowed himself a sigh of relief. At least this way he could study in peace. AS-Levels were not taken as seriously as O or A-Levels, nor did their exam period last as long, but that didn't mean Lily wasn't completely losing her head over them. She flitted about campus, handing out detention slips to any rowdy students who much as dared to get within twenty feet of her while she had a textbook open, and once actually considered giving Peter a pink slip for merely mentioning the word 'fail' in her presence.

Remus didn't really mind. Lily had always been the best out of his friends to study with, and he preferred quizzing her than himself anyway. Though sometimes her particular brand of 'dramatic crazy' did bridge on Sirius-territory.

"How do they all keep disappearing?" She demanded, scrambling desperately through her book bag.

"It's nice to see you've finally figured out how to relax during exams," Remus drawled, busy flipping through his notes.

Lily looked up, hair frazzled and a pencil stuck behind each ear. “Wha—?”

“Not even sarcasm can reach you,” he sighed, before reaching over and plucking both pencils from behind her ears. “Here.”

Looking distinctly embarrassed, Lily took them and pressed her knuckles to her warm cheeks. “You’re right, I need to calm down or else I’ll just start bursting into tears on the spot.”

“Eugh. Do me a favour and hold out until Potter crosses the berm,” Remus said, pointing to where James and Sirius were making their way toward their picnic table, food trays in hand.

“Bit early for dinner, isn’t it?” Lily said, collecting a few of her library books to make room for them as they flopped down on the bench.

“We missed lunch,” Sirius answered, shovelling half a sandwich into his mouth. “Final detention for poisoning Snape.”

“Ah.” Lily smiled to herself as she set to tapping a stack of papers into order. “I at least hope some of the punishment sunk in?”

Sirius started to refuse around the mouthful of sandwich, but James just smacked him in the gut, making him cough. “Yes, definitely. I’m ready to get back on the pitch.”

“And pass your exams?”

“Yes, well, those too.”

Lily smiled and passed him a few papers. “There’s the history notes you wanted.”

Talking them, James gave them a quick once-over. “Ah, perfect! Thanks, Daisy.”

“Don’t thank me, thank Remus. I borrowed them from him.”

Both James and Sirius raised an impressed brow, and Sirius swallowed his sandwich. “And how is your studying going, Moony?”

“Fine,” Remus answered lightly.

“Just fine?”

“Swell.”

Sirius smirked. “Hm. Guess we’ll see how swell once exams are finished.”

Remus returned the expression. “Guess we will, Pattycake. When I beat you, that is.”

Flashing him the bird, Sirius took another bite of his sandwich. He liked to play the nonchalant genius, but Remus knew that he'd done more than just crack a textbook in the last several weeks. Sirius wasn't much of a studier, but he could be trusted to pull his own weight when his pride was on the line. It almost humbled Remus to think that the entire reason Sirius was taking exams seriously was just to ensure he didn't whip his arse too badly, but Remus was also determined. He expected he had a real chance of being first in year for History, maybe close to that in Modern Lit, but even breaking the top ten for MFL and geography would be enough to hold over Sirius' head. That's right, Remus Lupin was going to come out on top this year. This time, he wasn’t going to let anything or anyone throw him off his game.

Or, that had been the plan anyway.

“Oi, Loony!” Barty called, making his way across the lawn toward them with his hands in his pockets, moving at a pace that he must’ve thought was quite swaggy, except only made him look like a club-footed duck instead. He had a line-up behind him; Yaxley, Travers, who were both wearing expressions that made them appear as though they went around frying bugs with magnifying glasses for fun. Bringing up the rear was none other than Regulus, who held his nose high but at least looked the most adverse to be there.

“Oh joy, the gang’s all here,” Sirius said, holding his fork between his teeth and pretending to look bored. “Seriously, Crouch, we don't see you for three days and you miss us so badly you have to hunt us down on our lunch break? Pfft, get a hobby.”

"He has a hobby," James said wryly. "Pretty sure I caught him burning ants with a magnifying glass last week."

"Oh yes, I even like to name them first," Barty added. "Potter Jr. made such a lovely sizzle."

“What do you want, Barty? I really don't think you need another detention, but I'll oblige you if you insist on carrying on,” Lily shot, leaning protectively over her books as though she feared they’d get splattered with peanut butter.

“Lupin and I have unfinished business,” Barty answered, stopping a few feet away and spitting into the grass. “You too, Black.”

Sirius waved cheerily.

“Having unfinished business with Remus sounds a lot like a death sentence,” James called in a lofty voice, but instead of looking unnerved, Barty’s face only split into a grin.

“Have some experience there, Potter? Though I suppose you would, being friends with such a nasty bloke.”

“Actually, I don’t have any business with you,” Remus said firmly. “In fact, if I could, I’d get a refund for every minute I’ve had to spend looking at your miserable face, so if you wouldn’t mind—piss off already.”

The enemy boys all exchanged looks, ranging from scornful to impressed, while Regulus just looked away as though the whole thing were beneath him. Remus supposed that that was exactly what he thought, being who he was. Regulus had never been nice, but he wasn't known for being a bully. His relationship with his roommates had always felt like a friendship of convenience at best.

“You always did have a bad mouth on ya, Loony," Yaxley grunted.

“Better than bad teeth. When was the last time the lot of you visited the dentist?”

That got the boys to scowl at least.

“You should hear the things they say about you Lupins," Barty tried.

“Can’t be all that bad compared to what all the year eleven girls say about you,” Sirius interjected. He was talking to Barty, but he couldn’t take his gaze off his brother. “And what about you?” Sirius asked loudly, forcing Regulus to look at him.

“Got nothing to do with me,” Regulus said arrogantly.

“You’re here.”

“So are you.”

“You think this makes you cool?” Sirius snapped.

“You think I care what you think is cool?”

“I think you care an awful lot, actually.”

Regulus’ glare could’ve cut glass. “I don't care what you think at all. If I could, I'd put you out on the curb myself. You’re the same as him anyway." His eyes slid to Remus.

Launching himself to his feet, Sirius slammed his hands down on the table, rattling his dishes. “You foul little git! What’s that supposed to mean?”

“It makes sense," Barty said. “Two fucked-up tossers, teaming up. You make the perfect pair—both loathed by your own parents? With naught but a five pence piece to rub between you on your own."

Sirius scoffed mockingly. "If you think you're going to get a rise out of me with crap like that, you've another thing coming, you shitty twat. Now why don't you turn around and run back to Mummy before I have to spank you myself."

"Ooh, that's cheeky. You offer that to all your enemies?"

"Only the ones that I feel are particularly desperate for it."

Barty's smile was feral. It might've been enough for him had he come for Sirius, but he was the wrong target.

"Speaking of Mummy..." Like some evil little doll, Barty's bulging frogs-eyes shifted to Remus. "Lupin, is it true you have trouble sleeping?”

Remus set his jaw. “What’s it to you, Barty?”

“Oh nothing, really, it's just—" Barty gave an exaggerated sigh; "I get it, you know. I’m sure it’s mighty hard to fall asleep without Mummy around to tuck you in at night. At least you've got the summer and Christmas. But oh, wait... you don't have a mummy, do you, Loony? Hm. Sad.”

While Remus bristled, James shot to his feet next to Sirius. “You shut your dirty trap! That’s got nothing to do with you!”

“Yeah, why don’t you move on to someone who wants to hear you blow rubbish everywhere!” Lily fumed, pointing her pencil at the other boys in a very threatening manner.

“My Loony, the peanut gallery’s awfully loud today, ain’t it? Reckon you could shut them up for a little bit so we could chat?” Barty crooned.

Remus gripped the edge of the table until his knuckled turned while. “I told you Crouch, we’ve got nothing to talk about. It's time you pissed off.”

“Aw, don’t be like that.”

“Barty, I’m gonna give you and your shitty band of cronies one last chance to move on,” Sirius hissed, “after that I’ll—”

“You’ll what—sing us a song?"

"Can we at least pick the tune?” Travers added enthusiastically.

Having had enough, Remus stood from the table and strode straight up to Barty, who balked slightly when he realised just how much height Remus had on him at such a short distance.

“Barty, I know your English marks are shit, but do me a favour, and read my lips. I'm done with you. You hear me? You’re pathetic, and you’re done. Now fuck off.”

Barty let out a high trill from the back of his throat and smiled again, eyes wide as saucers. “Oh I’m pathetic, am I? Well, at least I’m not so terrible that my mum had to go and kill herself.”

There was a small gasp from behind him—Lily—but Remus was frozen. The words had hit him like a bucket of ice water, and Barty quickly grew giddy off his shock.

“Yeah—Yeah!” He cackled, dancing backward a few feet to hide amongst his friends. “Dad confirmed it for us, ha! Apparently your old man's got as big a reputation as you—did you know that, Loony? A right bastard, they say he is! There's rumour he offed his wife himself! But really, who could blame him? Not when he's got a missus with one foot in the grave, the other in the loony bin, and a kid who's hell-bent on serving at her majesty's pleasure! Ohhhh, the stories they tell about you... Tell me, Loony, how'd he get you a place here, huh? How many strings did Dad have to pull? Did he finally offer that old bat McGonagall the shag she'd been missing all her life?"

“You sick fuck!” Sirius shouted, culminating all of his friend's horror with a few words. Unfortunately his anger only served to egg Barty further on.

"No? A sob story then, maybe? Don't tell me you cried to her. How'd it go? Maybe like—'Please Professor, please let me in to school, I'm sure my dad'll beat me if he catches me on the pipe again! He's afraid I'll end up like me ma, hanging myself in the closet'!" Barty stopped to cackle some more, and nudged Yaxley to the left of him. "Oi, none of you would happen to have a picture of the old bird, would ya? Loony's good for a laugh, but I've always wanted to see real crazy in the flesh."

With a scream, Lily ripped herself up from the picnic table and threw herself toward Barty. Only James stopped her—catching her round the middle as she kicked out at them. "Just get away!" She screeched. "How dare you say such vile things!"

"Get the fuck out of here, Crouch!" James hollered over her shoulder.

"Oh c'mon, don't tell me you guys didn't know?" Barty crowed. "I mean surely you all knew! You're 'friends', right? Any real friend would want to know that they're living in the same room as mental-made-flesh! Any of you got any juicy details so we can fill out the story a bit more? I heard it was actually the pills that done 'er in, but was it more Hollywood than that? Drowning? Oh! Did she throw herself off the parapets? Now c'mon, don't be shy, we'll be sure to get everything right when we pass the story along!"

"REG, PUT MUZZLE ON YOUR FUCKING FRIEND!" Sirius cried, making Regulus actually jump backward.

"Muzzle yourself!" Regulus hissed, before grabbing Barty by the arm. "Barty, let's just go."

"But I ain't done!" Barty announced. "Lupin's been awful quiet, and I wanna hear him make some noise. Am I not speaking the right language, Loony? Shall I try a bark? Woof! Woof! Arf!"

Emboldened by their friend's nerve, Yaxley and Travers began to bark too, crowding in until they were but an arm's length away. Remus couldn't react to the mocking, he could barely even speak—all he felt was the white-hot coils of rage. He sensed his friends at his back, each of them pulled taut as a string as they hurled obscenities back at the nasty boys. Barty only laughed. So did his friends. Regulus wrapped his arms across himself and rolled his eyes. In the beginning, the shock had been enough to make Remus feel and see white, but now as he watched Barty's face contort into bouts of hideous laughter that only left his ears ringing, he saw red.

“Say, Lupin, who is it you take after, mum or dad?”

Stop.

"I’ll bet it’s mum."

Stop it.

"Did you get to see the body after they dragged her out? Did you get to keep the rope?"

STOP IT!

"Did she even love you?" Barty frowned. "Seemed in a real rush to get out. Bet you don't even care."

Remus’ fist came up in a single fluid motion. All it took was a single punch for Crouch to hit the ground.

* * *

By the time Remus came back to himself, he was sitting outside the Headmistress’s office with a bag of ice taped over his hand. His knuckles stung, but it was nothing compared to how he felt inside. Barty’s words had hit like Tonya’s, only where he’d had time to prepare himself for hers, Barty’s were all too unexpected. They’d made him feel as fragile as glass but as cold and numb as stone.

It’d been a while since he’d lost himself like that. Punching Mickey back in January had been an instinct, but this was pure rage. He’d wanted to hurt Barty. It was smart of James and Sirius to hold him back. If they hadn't, Barty wouldn't have been able to walk the next day. Remus would've done ten times worse than what had happened to him in that alley last summer. And he would've enjoyed it. Perhaps that was the worst part.

There'd been a lot of shouting, and eventually Lily had gone for a teacher, but the only thing Remus clearly remembered from the heated moment was a pair of grey eyes. Not Sirius', but Regulus'. Remus hadn’t had the time or sense to discern what sort of expression he was making with the rest of his face, but it was certainly shock mixed with something else. Regret or fear, maybe both.

The office door clicked open, and Barty emerged, looking spiteful as he held a sack of ice to his own jaw. He'd been lucky not to bite his tongue, but Remus could still hear the sound of his teeth snapping together like an echo in his head.

Barty paused outside the door and they glared at one another until Sheila finally appeared behind him, looking tired and unimpressed. "You may go back to your dorm, Mr. Crouch," she said, and Barty turned to stalk down the hall, stubbornly dragging his feet the entire way.

After watching him go, Sheila finally turned on Remus. "Alright, mister, your turn."

Pushing up from the chair, he followed her inside and flopped down in a seat opposite to the Headmistress, who had her hands folded neatly in her lap. Sheila stood behind her, wisps of chestnut hair slipping out of her bun. Just seeing her made everything worse—the ringing in his ears, the trembling in his hands. It was as though an elephant was sitting on his chest.

"I'm not talking," Remus said staunchly.

"Well, that's surely a shame," McGonagall answered, "as we have much to talk about."

"Expel me then, I don't care."

"Remus, don't say that," Sheila sighed, but he just tore his gaze away, refusing to look at her.

Professor McGonagall cleared her throat. "I told you at the beginning of last year, Mr. Lupin, that we take violence very seriously here at Hawkings. You've been doing very well here, all things considered, but I must enforce upon you the seriousness of what you have done. Student on student barbarity is not tolerated in any form, under any circumstances."

"Then expel me."

They were all quiet for a little bit, and the headmistress sighed, but before she could speak again, a loud clattering sounded in the hall. With a spectacular cry, Sirius, James, and Lily burst forth across the officer threshold, each of them out of breath before they'd even begun shouting.

"Professor McGonagall, you can't expel Remus!" Lily yelled.

“It was Barty’s fault!” James said. “He started the fight when he showed up spewing all kinds of bullsh—all kinds of nonsense!”

“Minnie, you can’t!” Sirius shouted. “Lupin’s the best we’ve got and if you can’t see that then you’re blind!”

Very calmly, McGonagall held up a hand to silence them; “I understand your compassion and distress, but right now I need to speak with Mr. Lupin.”

Lily threw out her arms. “But professor—!”

“Remus doesn’t deserve this!”

“What Crouch said was—”

“Ah, ah.” McGonagall shook her head. “That’s quite enough, thank you. I will hear all I need to from Remus.”

“Okay,” Sirius heaved, “but what’s gonna happen to him?”

The Headmistress’s smile was kind at least. “Go and be well, Mr. Black. Remus will rejoin you when he is ready.”

All of them deflating in various levels of relief, his friends turned and slowly shuffled reluctantly from the office, trying their best to offer him comforting waves as they went. The last to leave, Sirius grasped the door handle and pulled it closed behind them, but before he slipped out of sight he flashed Remus a wincing smile and a quick thumbs up.

Almost more tired now, Remus sunk further down into his seat and squeezed his face in his hands.

“It’s good to see that someone cares about whether you’re expelled or not. Enough to storm all of Castle Hall it seems,” McGonagall said. She had an amused expression, but even as he peeled his fingers away, Remus only stared at the floor.

“Professor,” Sheila started, biting her lip. “I wonder if you might let Remus and I take a walk together. I think it's best he be allowed to rest a bit more before the three of us chat and you decide on a course of action.”

Eyes squinted in consideration, the Headmistress glanced at him, mouth razor thin. “Yes, I believe that might be a good idea, Mrs.

Buchanan. A bit of fresh air might do us all some good."

Sheila smiled and gathered up her white frock coat, coming around the table and gently prodding Remus in the arm. "C'mon Remus," she said quietly, jutting her head toward the door. "Let's take a tour of the grounds, shall we?"

"I don't want to," he grumbled.

"I don't care."

Remus looked up sharply, but Sheila was still smiling. "Walk with me," she said kindly.

Every cell in his body wanted to scream in protest—be stubborn, tell the crazy lady to fuck off!—but that would just mean staying in the office, where they could poke and prod at him until he really lost it. So, Remus grudgingly pushed himself to his feet and followed her out. A part of him wondered if his friends would be waiting, but he saw no sight of them even as he was led out the back doors of Castle Hall and down the pavement toward the school's rose gardens. The flowers were already in full-bloom, casting a beautiful colour across the lush gardens and filling the air with a scent that made Remus' nose itch.

Sheila sighed happily, breathing it all in. "Ah. Much better being outside, don't you think, Remus?"

"I'm still not gonna talk," he answered stubbornly.

"Okay, we'll just walk then."

It irritated him that she was using the same method of de-escalation she'd used on Barty just a few days before—that she'd even consider putting them on the same scale—but as he stomped along, Mrs. Buchanan just walked quietly next to him, hands tucked behind her back. She wasn't a short woman, but he was still taller, and he wondered briefly if that imitated her at all—if she was worried to be alone with him like he knew other teachers at other schools had been.

But then as if to answer his unasked question, she started to whistle a cheery tune and Remus knew for sure that Sheila Buchanan had nerves of steel.

"You know sometimes, Remus, bad things happen to good people," she told him, after a good long while. "Don't misunderstand, good things can also happen to bad people, and okay things to just okay people.

They say life's a circle, but that's not what I've found. Instead I think it's rather more like a spider's web, connected with all these different paths, and we're constantly arriving at new crossroads, wondering which is the best path to take—which will get us out of the web fastest or safest or with the best possible outcome. We're built to believe the concept that one path is always better than another—that if we fail at something, we've failed for good, because there was only one right path and we missed it. We missed our way out. But I know now that that's all utter shit." She smiled up at him. "Sometimes things are just hard, and we must face them however well we can."

Remus looked anywhere but at his teacher. They'd reached the centre of the gardens and were just passing a trio of girls sat on a bench and comparing photographs in an album. Sheila paused her story long enough to say hello and greet each girl by name—she always knew everyone's name—before swinging her hands out from behind her back and returning her gaze to him once more.

"I know some things are hard, Remus, and I'm not going to tell you more crap like 'life isn't fair' or 'some people have been to war', though it might make a funny joke. Instead, would you like to tell me what was hard about today?"

No.

"Not really."

"How about yesterday then?"

He almost refused her again, but then remembered he'd managed to rip a hole in his trousers during second period. The story came tumbling out before he could stop it, and Sheila began laughing before he was even finished, holding her stomach and pushing the hair from her eyes. "That is unfortunate. I do hope that your trousers can be mended."

"I don't think so, Mary already declared them a lost cause. Which is sorta funny, considering I don't think Mary knows how to sew."

Sheila lit up again. "Mary Macdonald, right? Ah, you're right, she's a funny girl. Are you two close?"

"Sort of… We're friends."

"Well, it makes me happy to hear that."

Remus dug his nails into his palms. They were alone in this half of the garden at least. “My mum was sick but she didn’t kill herself,” he confessed all at once, feeling the words leave his body like a single breath.

Sheila gave a breadth's pause. “I know. I know what happened to Hope."

As if urged on further by her words, Remus stopped dead in the middle of the path and put his head in hands. “She didn’t kill herself,” he ground out again.

“I know.”

“She didn’t!”

“I understand.”

He moaned through his teeth, before sucking in a shaky lungful of air. Sheila approached him from the side, like one might an injured animal, and placed a hand gently on his arm.

“Remus, I have something for you. I’m a bit worried it might make things harder, but if it at all helps, then I think you should have it.”

It took a moment, but finally he pulled his hands away and sniffed. “What is it?”

“It’s... Well, it's your mother.” Slowly, Sheila reached into her jacket pocket and withdrew a small book—a pocket bible. From within its pages, she pulled out a single photograph, black and white and faded in some places, but still clear enough.

“It took me a while to find this. It is over twenty years old now, which makes me feel terribly old,” Sheila said, chuckling faintly as she carefully handed it over, “but I managed to uncover it during my last trip home to visit Colin, and I thought you might like to see it.”

Remus turned the photograph around and stared down at three people no older than he was now. It was Sheila, young and wearing her school uniform, along with Hope in hers, and another boy. They were all smiling, arms tucked around each other as they crowded into the lens. Along the bottom of the photo was a date, April 23rd 1954.

“Mum’s birthday,” he murmured.

“That’s right," she said. "We were around seventeen here, I believe. That’s your mum, and me, and our friend Thaddeus. Thaddeus Dean. We all grew up together—here at Hawkings. Thaddeus loathed his full name though, so everyone called him Tad. We really had so much fun at school.”

Remus’ hold tightened on the photograph. Tad.

“I’ll understand if this is too much,” she said, watching him cautiously, “but there’s one more.”

Prying his eyes away, he looked down to find her holding a second photograph, this one of a baby in colour. Taking it, he stared at the infant’s big blue eyes, before slowly turning it over. On the back was printed, Remus John Lupin, born March 10, 1960. 2.9 kgs.

“I…” Remus immediately looked up, fixing his gaze on a rose bush across from him. “You… have my baby photo…”

“I do,” she said softly. “Your mum and I were still very close when you were born. I'd just moved to London with Colin, and when she brought you to see me, it was wonderful. You were so were frightfully small then—a far cry from now—but I was so pleased to see that you’d been born healthy.”

Unsure of what to do, Remus passed the photo back, and Sheila took it, looking at him before tucking it back into her bible. “I’m sorry if this was strange or… or odd, Remus. I just wanted you to know that I understand, as much as I can. I miss your mother very much. She was very dear to me, and it’s alright to be upset sometimes, but you have a responsibility as a student here, and I know you know what that means. Your friends treasure you, and there’s nothing more valuable than that.”

He grunted—there weren't the words—but Sheila didn't seem to mind. She just clutched his baby photo in a tight grip, before wiping her eyes and smiling at him once more.

What mistakes have you made then? Remus thought. Eyes still downcast, he made to pass the first photo back, but Sheila pressed it back toward him.

“You can keep that one, if you’d like.”

It was her kind way of telling him to take it, and because he didn’t have it in him to argue anymore, he tucked the photo into his breast pocket, feeling it's featherweight like a bolder against his chest. It struck him then how much easier things might've been if he'd been born Sheila's son rather than Hope's. But then a feeling of instant self-loathing overcame him.

What a horrible son, the nasty voice sneered. How could you even think that about your own mother?

Remus suddenly felt sick, but Sheila was still watching him, her expression strangely concentrated—he had to say something.

Clearing his throat awkwardly, Remus smoothed his hand over the pocket with the photo. "Thank you, Mrs. Buchanan," he mumbled, "for… being my teacher."

Sheila's smile softened. For a moment another emotion flitted across her face. It felt like longing.

"You're welcome, Remus."

* * *

When he finally returned to the dorm, his friends were waiting for him. James and Lily were both busy pacing ahead the length of the room while Sirius laid upside down on James' bed, tossing a hand ball up and down thoughtlessly. In reality Remus really only got a split-second image of the scene before he'd stepped inside and all three of them had rushed him.

"What they gonna do to you?" Sirius demanded.

"They're not gonna expel you, right?" James pleaded.

"It wouldn't be fair!" Lily added, though Remus was pretty sure she'd never once been under the impression that life was fair in the first place.

He shut the door and shook his head. "McGonagall says she's withholding judgement. And punishment."

"What the bloody hell does that mean?" Sirius demanded. "You shouldn't even be getting a bleedin' punishment in the first place—didn't you tell them what Barty said?!"

He shrugged. “I dunno what she's gonna decide, but they sent me back so…”

“So you’re not expelled!” Lily cried, before letting out a heavy sigh of relief and throwing her arms around his neck. “Oh, Remus, I’m so sorry! Barty had no right to say what he did!”

“I know. It's fine.” He pat her gently on the back—a sign that he wasn't interested in being fret over anymore—before pulling away. Lily withdrew shyly, and James stepped up to cup her shoulders as Remus stepped past all of them and strode to his bed.

“How are you feeling then?” James asked.

“I told you, I'm fine.”

James glanced sceptically at Sirius, who instantly began to seethe; “That git, Crouch. He knew exactly what he was doing coming at you! We can’t let him get away with it. We have to get the bastard back.”

“Sirius, Remus just got let off the hook—he could’ve been expelled!" Lily said. "Let's not push it, okay?”

“We didn’t do anything when the git and everyone else was coming after you for your scholarship,” Sirius pointed out, “so where’s the line then? When is enough, enough?”

Remus sat down on his bed and rubbed his eyes. Hearing Sirius come to his defence might've felt nice any other time, but right then he was too tired to think of revenge. The photo Sheila had given him was boring a hole in his pocket and all he wanted to do was sleep.

“Barty just wanted to start something, you said it yourself earlier,” James reasoned. “He knew he could hurt Remus by saying it like that so he did, but he’s just a stupid kid.”

“And we’re not about to listen to someone as pathetic as Barty anyway. Besides, Remus’ mum passed when he was little, you'd have to be ten-feet thick in the head to even consider that he could’ve had anything to do with it,” Lily finished.

Sirius gave a low moan; “Why aren’t we asking Moony what he wants to do? He should be the one who decides! Barty used his mum’s suicide as canon fodder! He can’t just get away with—”

Suddenly on high-alert, Remus tore his hands away from his face. “My mum didn't commit suicide!"

All three of them froze, opening up the circle they'd gathered in to gape at him. Sirius, who'd been cut-off in his rant, looked the most horrified. He stared at Remus as though he'd just told them that he was a bloody wizard and could cast magic spells.

"Oh, Remus…" Lily tried; "We didn't…"

He shot to his feet; "She died of pneumonia for Christ's sake—of fucking cancer! What, don't tell me you all actually believed some stupid rumour that's been going around?"

The stunned looks on his friends' faces were enough to tell Remus that yes—yes they did believe it.

"How long have you guys thought this?" He demanded.

None of them answered.

"How long?"

"You never talk about it," Sirius said. "We… We just assumed that..."

"That she fucking killed herself?!"

The dots were starting to connect; the way they gingerly stepped around all mention of his mother, how they never asked about the records or about the estate—even Marlene's mum on Easter.

It's so hard when a family member just refuses to get better.

They'd all thought it then—believed some rumour and talked about it amongst themselves too. Remus suddenly found it hard to breathe, and when Lily stepped toward him with those big green eyes of hers, he staggered back so quickly that he knocked almost everything off his bedside table. The lamp clattered to the floor by his feet and he stared at it. The bulb had cracked.

"Remus."

When he looked back, he found Sirius just in front of him.

"We're sorry."

"You're sorry?" He echoed. "You're fucking sorry?"

“Yes, we’re sorry. I’m sorry.”

"FUCK YOUR SORRY!" He howled. "You never even bothered to ask me what had happened! And don’t you dare say ‘would you have wanted to’—anything is better than this!”

Sirius licked his lips. “I understand how you feel. Can you really blame us for not asking, though? You just... You never talk about this stuff, Moons.”

He wasn’t sure if this was Sirius’ way of inviting him to fight—to get it over with—but he took the chance anyway. “Well, what about you?” He snarled. “You never talk about anything unless you can make a joke out of it. So what’s your trauma then, your mum? Those burns on your chest? You said it was boiling water—what, misjudge your bath temperature, genius boy?!”

He didn’t mean to be so vicious. His words made even Lily flinch, but Sirius took the anger in stride.

“I guess you could say it was both, actually. It started with a kettle. Mum and I got into it in the kitchen one day—something about Reg. All I remember is she hit him and he was crying, so I got between ‘em. She didn't like that, you see, so she went and grabbed the kettle right off the hob. I guess it burnt her so she went to throw it, but Reg was... He was right there. It was a mistake, but the consequences stuck around, obviously.”

Sirius spoke so pragmatically, so unembellished and detached, that Remus could’ve believed it was a story he’d read off-hand in a paper.

“I was eleven,” he finished finally. “Same age as you when your mum died. But I mean hey, could’ve been worse, right? At least my scars missed my face.”

“F-Fuck you,” Remus hissed. It didn’t make him feel any better. Smiling sadly, Sirius held his gaze, brave and stoic and beautiful.

“I’m sorry, Moony."

No, they're not.

Lily stepped forward. There were tears in her eyes. "We're sorry, Remus."

They just pity you. Those are tears of pity.

"We really are sorry, Moony," James finished. "We didn't mean it. Please believe us."

Gritting his teeth, Remus squeezed until he could feel the pain in every inch of his jaw. Then finally, he slumped forward, hanging his head in acceptance.

None of them spoke for a long time, but when Remus covered his face again to hide any tears that might have squeezed their way out, Sirius stepped forward and enveloped him in a strong hug.

“We’re sorry, Moony,” he said.

“We love you, Remus,” Lily sniffled, grappling for the both of them with fingers that were tender and solid. James was next, and though his hands were rougher, they weren’t any less gentle.

"We wouldn't trade you for the world, Moons. You're our best mate. We love ya, man."

And because he loved them too, Remus hugged his friends.

Chapter End Notes

Being 'jumped in' refers to the beatings that youth gangs sometimes give to make sure an initiate is tough enough to join a gang.
'Serving at her majesty's pleasure' is an idiom for serving a prison sentence.

Also, yes, I firmly believe that Hope Lupin was a Taurus.

Next update: December 18/19 (depending on timezone and how tired I am, lol.)

Chapter 62: Loyalty

Chapter Summary

> The Marauders plan pranks. Barty loses his teddy bear. Remus worries for Sirius.

Chapter Notes

> I think I might've fucked up and posted this too early, but I'm not sure because I panicked and immediately deleted it, lol. This version is a RE-POST. Sorry if you got two notifs.
>
> CW: Smoking, references to abuse. Take care of yourselves first <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

And these children that you spit on,
As they try to change their worlds;
Their immune to your consultations,
They're quite aware of what they're going through;
Ch-ch-ch-ch-changes!

- "Changes" David Bowie, 1971

Sunday 29th May 1977

Remus could tell his friends felt guilty after the incident with Barty. Even after he'd forgiven them, they still insisted on catering to him as though he were some wilted daisy. It was frustrating, but Remus didn't dare snap at them again. Not after what Sirius had said about his scars... And in the days that followed, Barty and the other boys stayed clear, which quickly became the sliver-lining of the whole thing. That, and the undeniable wake-up call that it'd given him. With everything finally out in the open, Remus was forced to reevaluate the way he'd been treating his mother when it came to his other relationships. He realised that not only had she become a skeleton in his closet, but a roadblock when it came to trusting his friends. They believed the rumour because he'd given them absolutely no reason not to, and it left him feeling ill. These were the people he trusted the most, and if he couldn't be honest with them, then who could he be honest with?

Marlene threw a legendary fit when she found out the truth, spending several hours begging Remus to forgive her for all the things she'd thought and—even worse—told her family. He forgave her on the first apology, but she cried until her voice turned hoarse anyway. In the end he was able to distract her with talk of her most recent read, some science fiction novel she'd devoured in less than a day. He was getting good at distractions these days, it seemed.

The boys, on the other hand, opted for a more stoic approach. Remus knew without asking that they wouldn't just accept his forgiveness and move on. Something needed to be proven—their loyalty, their support, their hatred for any and all things Barty. He let them only because it meant pranks—less time spent 'coddling Moony' and more time hiding out in their dorm room, pitching ideas back and forth while music played in the background. Remus had to admit, the plans they laid were some of their best yet; a whole week of exams interlaced with merciless pranks on not just Barty, but his roommates as well, who Sirius had generously declared guilty by association. It might've just been his way of punishing Regulus, who it turned out he'd had a nasty row with over Easter, but the pranks were harmless enough, so no one said anything.

No one except Lily of course.

"You guys are insane," she huffed, after arriving at their dorm to collect the maths notes she'd leant Peter.

"Not insane—sensible," Sirius told her, while draped out over James' bed like a cat. "These things have to be nipped in the arse quickly. Can't let Barty think he got away with messing with Moony with only a small bruise to show for it, can we?"

"There is no way you have this much time to mess around while studying. You're going to fail everything at this rate."

"Au contraire, Evans, it's only lower sixth. Which means just a few AS-levels lay between us and sweet, sweet payback."

Lily pointed at him viciously. "AS-levels are important! Some of these tests help decide what uni's you can apply for next year! They're meant to set up your entire future!"

"Only if you dream of intellectual labour—which I do not."

"Well, what about you?" She demanded of James. "You've only just gotten back on the football team, I thought you were spending every waking moment whipping those guys into shape?"

"I am," James said, from his place next to Sirius, the same cheeky look on his face, "we planned this stuff instead of sleeping."

"And you?! I thought you didn't want to retaliate." Lily whirled on Remus, who had his back leaned up against the side of Sirius' bed.

"I never said that..." he said, suddenly finding the stack of albums sitting to his left very interesting; "And besides... they're good pranks."

"... Ugh. Peter, at least tell me that you're taking this seriously?"

Peter held up his hands in surrender; "I'm just worried about my maths."

Shaking her head with a final moan of exasperation, Lily opened her bag and shoved her notebook inside. "Fine, do what you want, but I don't want to hear about any of it—from any of you!"

"Rest assured," Sirius promised; "it won't be us you'll be hearing it from."

She scowled lightly; "Alright, to hell with all of you then. I'm late for a prefect meeting anyway."

"See you at dinner?" James called, and Lily tossed him an irritated wave and shut the door behind herself.

"Ah, I don't blame her for being mad, I'd lash someone too if I was taking like, six A-levels in my twelfth year," Sirius said, snatching a piece of notepaper from the stack of school books at the foot of James' bed, and rolling onto his back. Crumpling the paper up, he began tossing the ball up and down methodically.

"She's only taking three," James amended proudly. "And she's working hard! She wants to get into Oxford."

Sirius whistled. "Shooting high, our little swot is. Couldn't be me. How 'bout you, Moons?"

Remus shook his head. Lyall probably would've bent himself in half just to get Remus' name on the applicants list, but fuck him if he thought he was ever going to be some 'scholar'.

"Wait..." Peter said, sitting up on his bed; "Does that mean you guys aren't thinking of university at all?"

"No," Remus said, at the same moment that Sirius snorted; "Of course not."

They shared a glance, and Sirius gave a wink that left Remus slightly weak in the knees. To distract himself, he cleared his throat and turned to Peter. "What about you, Pete? Does this mean you have plans?"

Peter shrugged and looked down at his hands. “Not really. Probably just end up doing business stuff like Dad.”

Catching his paper ball out of the air, Sirius gave a dramatic groan; “Dear fucking lord, I don’t know who’s worse—you or Potter. It’s always, dad’s this, dad’s that. Law or business, business or law—it’s all the same boring crap, and somehow we're still not getting the big picture here!"

"Which is what?" Asked Remus.

"Duh—our band!"

"We can be in a band and be educated, can't we?" James chuckled.

"Sure, but all of the best artists were drop-outs. Like Hendrix and Springsteen."

"So you're not even going to consider it?"

"Nope."

"But what about..." Remus licked his lips. "Going for something like... music?"

"There's an idea," James agreed; "You could find some conservatory—probably go for classical guitar if you really wanted. Or music theory—then you'd be just like all those composers you're always name-droppin'."

"No thanks. Don't care much for being the next Schumann." Sirius kept tossing the paper ball; up and down, up and down. "Besides, already been there, done that."

“What are you on about now?” Peter asked.

“Royal Academy of Music,” Sirius answered, sounding almost bored. “I auditioned for a spot in their piano department at the end of our tenth year. Turned it down.”

Reaching over, James snatched Sirius' paper ball straight out of the air. “You never told us that!”

“Yeah, well, I said no so what's it matter?”

“You mean, your mum didn’t try and make you go?” Peter demanded, finally scuttling off of his bed and coming to sit next to Remus.

“She tried a'course, but she couldn’t make me. I threw the audition. Ruined it before she had the chance.”

“Wow." Remus squinted up at him. "You mean you didn’t want to go at all?”

“Nope. In fact, not going was one of the few sweet victories of my life. Those poor sods are like robots. They live and breathe for music until they don't even like it anymore. Couldn't imagine a worse way to be.” Already withdrawing, Sirius turned over onto his stomach on the bed and began picking at the dark blue polish on his fingernails.

Not just any school, Remus thought while watching him; but the Royal Academy of Music... They wanted Sirius, and he turned them down. Wow.

Sometimes it was easy to forget that Sirius was a piano prodigy. Occasionally Remus would try to envision what it might look like to watch Sirius' elegant fingers drift up and down the keys. To listen to their sound and know that it wasn't pouring out of just any soul, but Sirius'—that it once had! Blimey, it must've been amazing, but all he could do was wonder, since Sirius refused to play.

Not that he blamed him.

Near the end of their first year together, Sirius had confessed that his mother had been his piano teacher. While people called him a prodigy outwardly, Sirius had dealt with hours of excruciating practice, playing until his joints locked together and his fingertips bled from the quick. He'd had nails split down the middle on him or else fall off completely, and still Walburga forced him to play. Sirius only confessed these things when he knew he could get away with framing them as a joke. Sometimes it would take Remus days to come to the realisation of what had actually been said, and then he was left with the guilt of it because he hadn't known how to probably comfort him. Maybe it would be different if Sirius had just said things like "she used to make me slam my own fingers in the fallboard when I played out of time", but instead it was always, Mum used to think it was hilarious to shut my fingers in the key cover whenever I cocked things up. It's how I learned to keep time. Who needs a metronome when ya got punishment and reform?

Remus had never met Walburga Black, but he hated her. Viscerally. She'd left Sirius with scars inside and out, and still expected a thank you for granting him such talent. It was vile, and Remus doubted that anybody—not even James—would ever truly know the full extent of what went on inside the walls of the Black home. He couldn't even imagine being there—feeling so terrible all of the time, while simultaneously being forced to play such beautiful music. It was the sort of thing that rewired your brain; what should be beautiful, became a nightmare. If it were Remus, he probably would've never touched an instrument again; but Sirius was stronger. He never let his mother ruin the one thing he truly loved in this world.

"What's everyone gone so quiet for?" Sirius said eventually, eyeing the rest of them. "Thought you'd be happier. If I'd have gone to that poncy place, you would've had to deal with two new roommates. And you don't just get lucky with a Moony twice."

Yes, Remus thought, I'm happy you turned it down.

What was life without a Sirius Black? He wasn't even sure anymore.

"You're right," James said, "I, for one, am happy you chose to stay, Padfoot. If you'd have gone, I'd have a long life as lawyer to look forward to, just like me dad. All of it—the big house, the happy family, the nice cars. And now look at me—with only a life as a musical degenerate in the cards. Not everyone can say that."

"No they cannot," Sirius grinned.

"What a thing to look forward to," Peter ragged shaking his head. It made Sirius laugh, until he glanced back and began eyeing Remus up again. "What about you, Moons? You've been awful quiet about your own plans—thinking about getting yerself a degree in music then?"

"Nah," Remus said with a small smile, "what do I need that for? I'm already in a band."

"Oh really?"

"Mhm, yeah. S'just a little thing right now, so you might not have heard of us, but I expect that eventually I'll be too busy playing to thousands for normal, boring things like going to college."

Sirius' smile doubled, and he extended a fist for Remus to bump. "Let's make it hundreds of thousands."

"Alright."

Peter surged forward, clapping his hands over their fists. "Hey, I'm in this band too, aren't I? I don't actually want to do business, you know."

"Right you are, Wormtail." Sirius raised an eyebrow at James. "And you?"

James chuckled. "Fine, but if our first record's only got your face on the cover, I'll riot."

"Perish the thought of hiding your handsome gob from the rest of the world," Sirius said, pinching James on the cheek. James accepted, only because it meant Sirius was close enough for him to grab his cheeks in retaliation and stretch them out like playdough.

"AUGH—" Sirius clapped his hands to his cheeks before batting him off; "Okay," he laughed, "tomorrow might kick off exams for everyone else, but I solemnly swear that by the end of this week, everyone's going to think twice before messing with a Marauder."

* * *

Careful to save some time for studying so as not to incur the wrath of a certain Oxford-bound ginger-girl, they spread the pranks out on several days. On Monday, while Remus and Peter were sitting in on their first exam, James and Sirius managed to convince some seventh year Salazar kid to get a hold of Barty's shower bag for them. With it hand, they committed what might've been Sirius' worst nightmare—putting hair removal cream into Barty's shampoo. Remus wasn't even sure where they'd gotten the stuff on such short notice, but unfortunately it didn't matter much. The next morning when Barty appeared in the dining room for breakfast he was still sporting a full head of hair, and they had no choice but to declare the prank a failure.

"Maybe the git just never showers," Peter offered; "you know, like Snape."

James and Sirius began to grumble, already plotting their rebound revenge when Barty pulled his jumper over his head and tufts hair shot off him like a dandelion. It took several seconds for anyone to notice, but eventually a clump of chemically-fried hair ended up in Yaxley's cereal, and the boys finally picked up on something being very not-right. A few confused and panicked moments later, Barty had nearly fainted in the middle of the hall and the Marauders got their first taste of sweet revenge as his friends helped him hobble to the nurse, hair breaking off in big clumps as he frantically ran his fingers through it.

On Wednesday, while the year eleven boys were in gym, Remus, James, and Peter snuck into the change rooms and picked the locks on Yaxley and Traver's lockers. Inspired by the girls' prank on Sirius' birthday, they took everything but their shoes and left behind bed sheets they'd painted to read "Godric Pride". Watching the two boys scuttle back to their dorms in red togas was certainly the highlight of their day.

Thursday they all found themselves busy with exams, but unlike the term before when all he'd had was Sirius-on-the-brain, Remus finished his day feeling rather victorious. So far he felt good about all of his exams, but whenever he asked Sirius how he thought he did, Sirius would give only sly or vague answers. It was enough for now, but Remus was just itching to get his fingers on their final marks.

"So what we doing tomorrow?" James asked, shouldering his bag as they all made their way back to their dorm from the Great Hall. "We could plant some weed in their room and tip off their dorm monitor?"

"I was thinking something else actually," Sirius said. "Something more... sweet. After all, tomorrow's Reg's birthday."

"Really?" Remus asked.

"Yeah. So maybe the little sod deserves a treat. Prongs, that tin of sweets from your mum still under your bed?"

"Should be. I haven't touched it."

They all looked to Peter, who pulled a face.

"Oh, fuck you guys. I didn't touch it either, James can keep his lava chocolate."

"Good," Sirius smirked. "Hope the boys are feeling hungry."

Waking up early the next morning, they got themselves sorted and left the tin on Regulus' regular table, lying in wait across the room as the four Salazar boys filed into the hall. While his roommates opened the tin, Regulus paused to pick up the card they'd planted, reading it over before scanning the room with a suspicious look. Immediately they all turned away, innocently picking at their breakfast.

"What'd you end up writing on the card?" James asked quietly, nudging Sirius with his elbow.

" 'To Regulus, my jewel-eyed prince. Happy Birthday, love from your secret admirer. Kisses. Hugs. Have my babies'—you name it."

"Cruel bastard."

"Look, they're eating them!" Peter said, and Remus turned around on his bench to watch as Barty—now sporting a severely short number 2 buzz-cut—Yaxley, and Travers began stuffing their faces. Regulus remained more sceptical, and got up from the table without so much as a taste, leaving them be.

"That little git, is he really not gonna eat it?" Sirius hissed.

"Maybe he hates chocolate?" Peter suggested.

"Nobody hates chocolate," Remus scoffed.

"Looks like he's getting himself a cuppa," James said. He was right too, and by the time Regulus returned to his table with his tea the other three boys were red in the face and rasping for breath. Half-screaming, Barty flew from his chair and downed a neighbouring girl's glass of milk, but it wasn't enough apparently, and he scrambled to find another while Yaxley and Travers made a beeline for the drink table, disrupting the line up of students and throwing themselves under the beverage dispensers to guzzle directly from the spigots. A horrified lunch lady came out from behind her counter to scream at them, but Regulus remained unperturbed, sitting quietly at his table and flipping through a textbook.

"That's it!" Sirius snarled, standing up and marching across the room. Exchanging worried looks, James, Peter, and Remus quickly followed, stopping next to Sirius while Regulus casually sipped his tea.

"Come to wish me a happy birthday, 'secret admirer'?" Regulus asked calmly.

“You knew it was us,” Sirius said.

“Of course I knew it was you. You’ve been pranking them all week.”

“And today was supposed to be your turn."

Regulus' mouth curved upwards haughtily. “Too bad your thinly-veiled gag was about as clever as a monkey holding a dull hammer.”

Sirius fumed; “You cheeky little git! You didn’t even tell your mates it was us, you just let them stuff their faces without saying a thing!”

“They’re the ones who fell for it,” Regulus shrugged; “Let them figure it out.”

“I think they did,” Peter mumbled, watching as Yaxley and Travers scraped their tongues with napkins on the other side of the hall, moaning and crying while other kids laughed.

Furiously, Sirius slammed his hands down on the table; “Don’t you have any sense of loyalty—any at all?”

"As if you know anything about loyalty."

"More than you. What kind of bastard lets his friends take a fall for him and isn't even sorry for it?"

Unmoved, Regulus just flipped a page in his text. “If you’re done, I have an exam to study for. Not that you would know what that's like either.”

Like a steaming bull, Sirius scoffed, but did not lash out. Instead he turned away and stormed back to their table, cursing his brother under his breath. Peter followed, but James stayed a moment longer, smiling genuinely.

“If it’s any consolation, happy birthday, Reg.”

Glaring, but admittedly more pink-cheeked than before, Regulus said to them, “It’s not.”

James waved awkwardly. “Er—cool… See you... around then…”

“That was really lame,” Remus whispered as they crossed back the way they'd come.

“Shut up.”

“Change of plans,” Sirius announced as they sat, “plant the weed. Throw a stink bomb into his gym bag. Leave a jar of bees in their bathroom. We can switch their water bottles out for pickle juice, and cut the hot water line and steal their towels and—" Sirius suddenly lit up. "Yeah that's it, let’s just steal everything!”

“And do what with it?” Peter demanded, looking quite uneasy at the daunting list.

Sirius smirked. “I hear the Dubh’s pretty nice this time of year. Reg’s always hated anything to do with water. He’d probably avoid bathing if he weren't such a priss. Maybe we should help him out—give him a reason to go for a little dip.”

Remus wasn’t really a fan of Lake Dubh either, but stealing stuff from their room seemed a lot more preferable than the charge of manslaughter that Sirius was bridging on. The prank also proved to involve very little water acrobatics on his part, with the hardest bit being breaking into their dorm and sneaking everything out without getting caught. They waited until later that evening while everyone was off eating dinner, and then strode right in the front doors.

"Shouldn't we trying to be more inconspicuous?" Peter winced, after they'd passed several boys on the stairway.

"Nah," Sirius said, "I want them to know it was us."

No one seemed too inclined to argue.

They followed each other up to the third floor, where Remus got to work on the lock with the others practically breathing down his neck. When the door finally gave way, they all slipped inside and found themselves in an incredibly average dorm room. A stray sock here, an empty tea mug there, three messy beds and one neat.

“I’ll give you one guess which bed belongs to my control-freak brother,” Sirius blagged, purposely snatching up Regulus' pillow and throwing it across the room.

"Okay, but I gotta be honest, I was sorta expecting something more... horrible?" James said. "Like, I dunno, maybe a few dead cats or a dartboard with our faces pinned to it."

"No, that'd be far too clever," Remus answered.

They got to work next, moving about the room and gathering up whatever they could find that would inconvenience the boys the most; a left shoe, the bathroom light bulb, the window curtains, every third issue in Yaxley's comic book collection. Eventually Remus uncovered a nasty-looking switchblade from Traver's side table, and James also lifted the small jar of poorly-rolled spliffs he'd discovered in the back of the bathroom cupboard, but the real treasure was actually the worn teddy bear Peter had found hidden in between the wall and headboard of Barty Crouch's bed.

"What do you reckon his name is?" Peter asked, dangling the bear by one arm. "Mr. Cuddles? Sgt. Squishy?"

"No way, it's definitely something distinguished like 'Mr. Weatherby' or 'Sir Rutherford'," James snickered.

"Eh, my money's on 'Teddy'," Remus finished, taking the bear and shoving it into one of the pillow cases they were using as bags.

"What's your bet, Padfoot? You're the best with names, after all," James called, turning around just in time to see Sirius ducking his head under Regulus' bed. "Ooh, I wouldn't try that if I were you, mate. I only found dirty magazines under Yaxley's and half the pages were stuck together."

"Maybe he was just playing target practice," Remus offered snidely.

"Nasty," Peter laughed, but Sirius remained quiet, until finally he withdrew, bringing with him a small black case, which he flipped open to reveal Regulus' prized violin.

"Yes! Found it!"

"I'm not sure leaving an instrument like that to float in the middle of the lake is such a good idea," James winced, but Sirius just got to his feet, grinning victoriously.

"That little git values nothing more than this bloody squeak-box. If you want to get a reaction out of him, this is the way to do it. The dickheads should be grateful we're not flooding their room like they did ours."

James reached up to rub the back of his neck. "Whatever you say."

"Hurry up then, we've stayed long enough as it is," Remus said, grabbing a full pillow case and heading toward the door.

It took some time and even more whining and whinging, but together they managed to lug everything down to the lake side, where they tossed it into the nearest canoe and pushed the entire thing out into the middle of the Dubh. It floated nicely, barely even weighed down by the stolen goods, but despite being successful, none of them were jumping for joy.

“Feels a bit anticlimactic,” James observed.

“Well 'course, they're not here yet,” Sirius said proudly, crossing his arms over his chest. "But don't worry, I left a map."

“A map?”

“Yeah, got the idea from Moony, actually.” Sirius glanced in Remus’ direction. “After his map of hiding spots.”

“Copycat,” Remus said, digging the toes of his boots into the rocky shore.

"Anyone for a celebratory spliff? It's on Barty," James said, holding up the jar of joints from the bathroom.

They all appeared eager to partake, but when it began clear that James wasn't going to be able to get the lid off of the jar, Remus took it and threw it against the rocks, instantly satisfied when it shattered to pieces.

"That's our delinquent," James cheesed, as he and Peter went to work picking the crappy rolls out of the glass and rocks. Picking out one of his own, Remus checked it over for any shards before setting it to his lips and lighting it. He'd just gotten his first decent drag when he turned around to find Sirius a few feet away, staring out over the lake at the canoe, which was drifting quietly along on its own.

Careful not to slip on the shifting stones, Remus strode up to his side and took another short puff before offering it. "Wanna try?"

"Cheers," Sirius said, taking the spliff with two fingers and examining it. "Wow, this is shit. Doesn't even have a filter. Maybe you offer to teach Barty how to roll a decent joint, Moons."

"Maybe he'd hate me less then," Remus chuckled, before glancing at the canoe, now at least a hundred yards away. "You satisfied now?"

With the joint between his lips, Sirius breathed in deeply and exhaled smoke through his nose. "I will be. Once I know we've really gotten them. What about you? You're the one they came after."

"It's whatever," Remus dismissed, squinting over his shoulder at James and Peter to avoid meeting Sirius' eyes. "I was angry, but Barty's just an idiot. What's he really gonna do to me in the grand scheme of things."

"You let them off too easy," Sirius sighed. "Sometimes a little revenge is needed."

"Maybe... but don't that mean that Barty wins again? If all I do is worry about getting him back, when will have time to make myself feel better?"

"Getting him back is how you make yourself feel better," Sirius said, gesturing at the canoe with the joint.

"You don't really believe that," Remus said.

Sirius shrugged. "Sure I do." He took another drag and went to pass the joint back, but Remus got caught staring at his fingers. How was it that everything somebody did became beautiful when you realised what they meant to you?

"Moony?" Sirius waved the joint. "Want some more?"

"No," Remus said. "Don't want to green out before we see the end of this prank of yours." And I'd rather not touch you right now.

"Suit yourself." Sirius raised the weed to his mouth again.

"GUYS!" James called suddenly. Both Sirius and Remus turned just in time to spot Regulus, Barty, Yaxley, and Travers crest the top of the shore. All of them were breathing heavily, no doubt from running all the way from their dorm, but they all managed to appear livid as well. Regulus was at the helm, looking more alarmed than Remus had ever seen him.

Instantly giddy, Sirius flicked the joint away and clapped his hands together. “Hey lads! You found our note then?”

“You!” Yaxley shouted. “Our—our stuff!”

“I knew something was up when you were all mysteriously missing from dinner!” Barty snarled.

Peter began a clap, smug and slow, and James gave a snide whistle while Sirius only laughed; “I’m impressed boys, you’re a lot quicker on the uptake than we would'a thought.”

“What did you do with it?” Regulus barked, a vision of rage.

“Oh, you mean—” Mockingly, Sirius played a quick air-violin 'wah-wah' before clicking his tongue and pointing behind him at the lake. "Happy birthday, bro."

Realisation dawned on Regulus’ face, and he turned sheet-white and began skidding down the rocks to the very edge of the shore. With his shoes just barely grazing the water, he stared out over the Dubh as though his entire life was crumbling before him.

“You actually put our stuff in the lake?!” Travers bellowed.

“It’s safe in a canoe,” Peter promised; “You just gotta go get it.”

“Yeah, go on, Reg, it’s just a little swim,” Sirius said smugly.

"YOU BASTARDS!" Barty howled. "We'll get you for this! You better start sleeping with one eye open, all of you!"

"Big words from someone who looks like a chewed toothbrush," Sirius keened. "If you're so desperate for a proper row though, you could always try going a round or two with Lupin! Though, I'm not sure how eager I'd be if I had a bruise like that."

Barty hesitated, before wiping his hand across the dark bruise that had flowered along the top of his cheek. Perhaps the smartest decision he'd ever made, he did not take a running charge at Remus. Instead he surprised them all by showing actual control as he called out to his friend; "C'mon, Reg. We'll get it later."

Still utterly quiet, Barty's call was enough to prompt Regulus to turn back around and face his brother. His hands squeezed were at his sides, fingers tapping together as though he were timing something or counting down.

"What?" Sirius drawled at him. "You wanna fight then? Alright, I'll entertain it. Go ahead, have a go. Come at me!"

But Regulus did not fight. Instead he remained stoic, glaring with such venom that Remus could've believed that he might've had a real chance of winning said fight, should he actually attempt to rush one of them. Remus could tell it was making Sirius antsy; he wanted a reaction, something that told him without a doubt that he'd won.

"Got nothing to say then?" He demanded. "Mummy's favourite boy lost his favourite toy and he just stands there—really?"

The goading did nothing. Regulus gave him nothing.

"Man, what a disappointment this is," Sirius scoffed. "You must have no feelings at all. Like an empty doll."

"Shut up!" Barty hissed.

"Oh! Look at that, your mate's defending you, Reg! Too bad you wouldn't do the same for him!"

Regulus gave the barest breath of a scoff, before finally turning away and marching off, back up the embankment. He did not stop and wait for his friends, but kept going back the way he'd come, leaving his roommates to stare after him.

"Where you going?" Sirius cried. "Violin's this way!"

"Sirius," James said, coming in close. "C'mon, man, it's done."

"Bloody coward," Sirius swore, ignoring him as he threw a dismissive hand at Barty and the rest. "Well? You gonna just stand there or you gonna follow him? Bloody sheep!"

“Fuck you!” Barty snarled, flashing them a double-bird as the other three boys turned and following Regulus off.

"Mission accomplished?" Peter said slowly, obviously relieved when James turned and high-fived him.

"Yeah, we did it," he said, smiling and nudging Sirius pointedly. "Don't gimmie that face Black, the prank was successful."

Sirius did not reciprocate the gesture. “The little buggar didn’t even try,” he said. “He just stood there—didn’t even get his socks wet.”

Peter reached over and gave Sirius’ shoulder a pat. “But their stuff’s still in the middle of the lake. We did it!”

“Yeah, sure… we did it,” Sirius said, obviously unsatisfied.

“So… how should we celebrate?” Remus asked, watching Sirius closely. “Maybe we hold a band practice?”

“That’s a great idea, Moony!” James agreed. “Between exams and pranking we haven't had any time, and I’ve got the tournament next week. So what do you think, Padfoot? A nice evening of noise to lighten your unappreciative mood?”

Sirius blinked himself out of his daze. “Sounds great,” he answered, and James gave a firm nod, gathering Sirius in by the shoulder and starting up the shore with him.

“C’mon, Moony, Wormtail—we’re gonna finish this night off right!”

“Hell yeah!” Peter called, chasing after them. Remus followed, because what else was there to do, yet he couldn’t shake the knowledge that Sirius obviously hadn’t gotten what he wanted.

Ignoring the stilted atmosphere, James managed to wait until they’d made it back to House Lane before clapping Sirius on the shoulder. “Oh, that’s right! Forgot to mention it before, but you’re not gonna believe it. Yesterday, while you and Moony were taking your English exam? Yeah well, Pete and I were just waiting around for you and we sorta got to messing and guess what—we wrote something!”

“Like a song?” Remus asked, surprised.

“Yeah!”

“He means he composed it. I wrote it down,” Peter said to Remus as they walked. “You should’ve heard him—‘and then it could go, da-nah-nah-nah, da-dum-duh-nah-nah!’ It was almost painful."

James scoffed; "I still don’t understand why I would need to know the difference between a 'breve' and a 'quiver' when I have you three.”

“It’s a quaver. Not quiver."

“Yeah, well, tomayto-tomahto, pina colada, and the other bit.”

Remus couldn’t help his smile. "What colour is this new song of yours?"

"It's a giant mash, but it's got this real soft melody that's mostly blue. Padfoot's favourite colour, even!"

"Yeah sure," Sirius said, obviously not paying attention.

"You told me your favourite colour was brown," Remus said. Sirius looked at him very sharply, and he nearly baulked.

"Brown?" James grimaced next to them. "Like what kind of brown?"

Sirius' eyes dipped, as though he were trying to scan Remus from head to toe. Finally they came to rest on his face again, looking him right in the eye.

"A very specific kind..."

* * *

Sunday 5th June 1977

Remus could hardly believe it. It was end of term, marks were finally out and after he'd managed to get his hands on his end of term report, he practically raced back to his dorm. There was little audience to be had, what with James off at final football practice ahead of her year-end tournament and Peter visiting with Moira for her birthday, for which he'd prepared a lovely portrait of her as a gift. But none of that mattered; all Remus had needed was Sirius.

Sirius and his final report, that was.

As he sat in the middle of their dorm room, scanning their reports from top to bottom, he found himself practically vibrating out of happiness. He'd really only been aiming for one, but there it was, printed in solid black and plain as day.

"Three?" He echoed. "I beat you in three classes?"

Sirius shrugged, acting startlingly fine. "It would seem so, my good Moons."

Remus lowered the reports. "Oh my god—three!"

"Congratulations." Smiling, Sirius held out his hand. "You're either a certifiable genius, or a slave to your textbooks."

"It's called hard work, Black. You should try it sometime," Remus gloated, before taking his hand and shaking it firmly. "Thanks."

"You did good," he told him again. "And as luck would have it, I've already prepared the perfect reward for you."

Remus felt his heart jump. “And what’s that?”

Taking a second to tuck the cigarette he’d been fiddling with behind his ear, Sirius plucked his marks from Remus’ hands and began folding them up into a paper airplane. “You get to play the part of the most crucial piece in our final pièce de résistance. And all you have to do to succeed is distract my dear little brother for a few measly minutes.”

Remus sighed. “You mean you actually want to do that?"

“Of course.”

"I thought we were over this. It's almost end of school, why bother?"

"Because it's the end of school!" Sirius cried. "We can't just leave without pulling the greatest prank this school's ever seen!"

"We didn't pull one last year?!"

"We were busy last year. We found the Shrieking Shack and then fancied ourselves a killer concert—but since there's nothing halfway decent going on right now..." Letting the paper plane fly, Sirius watched as it soared across the room toward his bed, and by an inexplicable chance, flew straight out the open window. “Aw man, did you see that?” He cried in delight, rushing the window and sticking his head out.

Remus didn’t bother to join him, thinking back to the way Sirius had returned to their dorm after the lake and declared that Regulus’ stoic reaction to the prank still wasn’t enough. To appease him, they’d come up with the same sort of stunt they’d pulled on Snape the year before—only this time the plan was to rig a bucket of water above the stairs of Salazar House and soak Regulus on his way out. It was Peter’s idea to dye the water Godric red with food colouring, which Sirius had loved, naturally. But they hadn’t talked about the prank since that night, and as a result Remus had stupidly let himself believe that Sirius was over it.

“Wouldn’t you be the best one to distract Reg?” He asked, as Sirius leaned back from the window.

“Nah, he’ll never give me the time of day, but you—you’re more neutral.”

“So you want me to be the one to lure him under the bucket?”

“Yup. And that’s not all.” Smirking, Sirius turned toward the bathroom, disappearing inside and reappearing a few moments later with a large mop bucket in his hands. “ We may have made a few upgrades to the plan. Ta-da!”

Remus looked into the bucket, but instead of water like they’d agreed upon, he found the same syrupy blood they’d used back on Halloween. It'd been innocent enough then, since the only people they'd chosen to soak in it were each other, but pouring a bucket of fake blood on someone who wasn't expecting it...

“You gave me the idea actually,” Sirius grinned, “or should I say, our dear friend Stephen King did. 'Carrie' was full of prime pranking ideas.”

“You can’t be serious..." Remus snapped his head up; “You can’t dump fake blood on your little brother—this isn’t a horror novel!”

Staring at him like he’d been slapped, Sirius stepped back and set the bucket down. “Oh c’mon, don't be such a wuss. It’s just a step up from the food colouring. I thought you would’ve loved it.”

“This is definitely more than a step up! We agreed on water! The was that he would get wet, not scarred for life!”

“Yeah—was! And then we decided that hosing the tosser down wasn’t enough!”

“We?”

“Yes, we! James and Pete agreed—this is funnier. Imagine the reaction.”

“It’s not funny,” Remus told him sternly; “Did you even read the book?”

Sirius rolled his eyes. “As if my brother had suddenly gained the supernatural ability to snap all our necks with a flick of his wrist. Just think of it, Moony—this’ll be legendary!”

“This is mean.”

“No, mean was telling everyone your mum killed herself and that you’re next.”

“Barty did that.”

“And Reg just sat back and let him. Didn't say a single word. Know who does that? Cowards.”

Remus couldn’t believe his ears. “You’re taking this too far, Sirius. You’re becoming obsessed with hurting them even worse than they hurt you.”

“They hurt you, Moony!"

"And I told you, I'm over it! Barty couldn't make me feel any worse than I make myself feel! Soon it won't even matter anyway, it'll be summer and we'll be all be going away. Barty can't touch us then."

"You mean you'll be away. I'll be going there."

Oh... damn it.

"Sirius... if this is about all of us going home... then maybe—"

"It's not!" Sirius snapped. "It’s about the pranks—the fun! Watching ‘em squirm! We do something big at the end of year so we’re remembered the next—that's how it works! And you’re either in or out.”

Remus’ blood ran cold. “In or out, huh? That easy?”

“It can be. That depends on you.”

“You don’t mean that.”

“Stop telling me what I do and don't mean. You're not my fucking conscience. You're supposed to be my friend.”

"I am your friend!"

"You're not acting like it! You're supposed to be on my side, not theirs."

Remus bit down hard on his bottom lip. “I am on your side, Sirius, but why does it have to be this?”

“You just don’t get it.”

“Then explain it to me!”

“I can’t!”

“Why not? Since when can we not talk to one another?”

Pausing, a nerve jumped in Sirius’ jaw as he ground his teeth together. “Look, I know you’re still new here and all—”

“Fuck you, Black,” Remus snarled.

“Fine, you don’t get it then. You want out, that it?”

“No, but—”

“Brilliant, then we finish this tomorrow and the little brat learns his lesson.”

“Which is what, Sirius?”

“That not picking a side makes you just as guilty as the rest of ‘em!”

“Why can’t he learn that lesson with water?!”

Sirius stepped back, shaking his head, but Remus wasn’t finished. He reached out, grabbing his friend by the shoulders and forcing him to look at him. “Sirius, please. I’ll help you and it’ll be enough, I promise.”

“Why aren’t you angrier?” Sirius asked, eyes cold and grey.

“I’m always angry,” Remus confessed, “but that’s not anyone else’s problem but mine.”

“That can’t be true. You deserve someone to blame.” His words felt like a confession.

“I know you’re angry too, but... things won’t be like this forever.”

“How do you know?” Sirius spat. “They’ve stayed the same for the last seventeen years, why would tomorrow be any different?”

Now Remus knew it was a confession.

“Because," he told him, "we get to choose what tomorrow means. Not anyone else.”

Sirius turned his head, looking at Remus’ hands as they clutched his shoulder. For a split second Remus thought he might pull away and that would be the end, but thankfully, all he did was sigh, deep and heavy, and close his eyes.

“Alright. Fine Moony, we’ll do it your way.”

Remus slumped in relief, and squeezed tighter. “Okay... Thank you, Sirius.”

“Don’t thank me, idiot,” Sirius scoffed, rolling his shoulders and pulling away. Remus instantly cracked a smirk.

“Oh, I’m the idiot? You forget I’ve seen your marks—they’re abysmal. You might be losing your touch, Black.”

It was the spark they needed to bring them back. At his words, Sirius’ eyes flashed devilishly. “You sure about that, Lupin? That I'm losing my touch? Mm, no... I’m pretty sure I know at least a few ways to convince you otherwise.”

For a split second Remus forgot how to breathe. A muscle jumped in his neck and he forced a laugh before clearing his throat and picking up the bucket of fake blood, glancing down at his murky reflection. “I’ll… get—get rid of this then...”

Saying nothing, Sirius turned away. He crossed the room to his bed, plucking the cigarette from behind his ear and pulling his zippo from his pocket.

Remus couldn’t help it; he called after him.

“Sirius?”

Sirius turned around instantly. “Yeah?”

“You… You said it yourself, right? It’s about fun?”

Usually Remus was able to discern what people were thinking by their expressions, but the look that Sirius gave him next was both vague and all too open. Licking his lips first, Sirius set the cigarette between his teeth and clicked his lighter to life, breathing in deeply and then out, filling the air in front of his faze with a soft haze.

“Yeah, Moony. Fun...”

Chapter End Notes

AS-Levels are taken at the end of year 12.

I headcanon Regulus as a Gemini so his birthday would've fallen on June 3rd within this fic ^^

Next update: Dec 22/23 (depending on your timezone).

Xoxo

Chapter 63: Memory

Chapter Summary

The bucket tips.

Chapter Notes

CW: Swearing, mentions of child abuse. Sad times, but happier endings!

(also lmk if you spot any glaring mistakes. I'm posting this while sleep-deprived xx)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Oh no, not me,
I never lost control;
You're face to face,
With the man who sold the world…

- "The Man Who Sold the World" David Bowie, 1971

He probably should've been angrier with Sirius. Much angrier. It should've been easy—Remus was an angry person after all. For the last several years of his life, his anger had left him feeling as though he were on an ever-revolving merry-go-round with no way to get off. Every now and then he would fool himself into thinking that he had escaped it—that the memories had finally stopped chasing and hounding his sleep—but then he'd go home again, or get a letter, or someone would say things like his mother had killed herself, and the entire thing would start up again; round and round.

Out of all of it, the one thing Remus could never allow himself to be, was angry with his friends. It just didn't come naturally. He was annoyed by them often, sometimes livid even, but anger... true anger... now that was something reserved for people far worse than friends.

It was probably the reason why he'd believed Sirius would never not be true to his word. Stupid. Sirius was just as angry as he was, he simply... showed it in different ways. Remus had used to believe that James and Sirius were two different sides of the same coin, but even as close as they were, all it would've taken was the slightest bit of foresight to realise how wrong he'd been. There was no room on a coin like that for someone as good as James.

"Shall we flip a coin, eh Moony?" Sirius had suggested once. "Heads you, tails me."

It was over something stupid, like who got the last fag in the box, but as the ten pence glittered through the air in slow motion, Remus found himself praying that it would turn up heads. He'd still share the fag of course, but it would be his and that would be more than enough reason to gloat.

Heads. Heads. Let it be me. Me. Me. Me. Me. Me.

He'd felt the same way as he watched their final prank unfold—after agreeing to play the key piece in the plan, granting him a front-row seat to Sirius' revenge. Just... *me. Me. Me. Me. Let it be me. Look at me —watch me! But then reality finally dawned.

Sirius wasn't looking at him at all. He couldn't. There wasn't the space for him. Sirius was lost in his own memories—busy with a never-ending merry-go-round of his own. He had no time to think of Remus, or anyone else for that matter. In Sirius' mind it was the exact same. Me. Me. Me. Please, let it be me.

And really... who could hardly blame him for that?

* * *

“Sirius, I still don’t understand what I’m supposed to say to him!”

“Anything! Tell him you want violin lessons."

Remus gaped at him; “Violin lessons? Are you insane?!”

“You could always challenge him to a duel instead.”

“Could you try not being an utter dickhead for two seconds?!”

“Just say you wanna talk,” James supplied, looking quite giddy—a far cry from how nervous he’d been after they’d hauled themselves out of bed early to set everything up. James had always been an early-bird, but between football and pranking, he looked about ready to pass out on his feet most days.

“And then what?” Remus demanded. "Shall I suggest knitting to pass the time?"

“If you really want,” Sirius shrugged. "But c'mon, Moons, you’re smart—get creative with him. Just make sure he's on target before the first bell goes. And don’t worry, we’ll give ya a little whistle right before so you have time to get out of the way.”

Remus glowered. Lure Regulus away from his friends and breakfast with little-to-no bait—no small feat then.

“We’ll be around the side of the building with Pete,” James said, checking his watch. “It’s on you now, Moony. You got five minutes.”

While Sirius raised an enthusiastic thumbs-up, James gave Remus' shoulder a final comforting squeeze and then the both of them slipped out the dining hall's backdoors. Remus tried not to immediately throw in the towel, but his confidence was weaning. It was easy for the rest of them to be optimistic—they'd given themselves the easy job. They'd left him with the task of remaining inconspicuous and yet intriguing enough to guide Regulus into the very heart of their prank, which knowing the eternal stubbornness of the Blacks, was certainly easier said than done. Remus was starting to think that it was just as much a punishment for him as it was Regulus.

But ah well, not much else to do but get to work then.

As he made his way across the dining hall, he noticed the girls waving at him from their usual table, but instead of going to meet them, Remus rubbed his clammy palms against his trousers and strode straight toward Regulus with a stern expression. He gave the boys no time to be surprised by his presence, shutting down their breakfast conversation with a severe; “I need to talk to you.”

Looking unnervingly unsurprised to see him, Regulus looked up with a dismissive glare. “I really hope this ‘I need to talk’ business doesn’t become a habit of yours. Because I. Don’t. Care.”

Remus swallowed. “You—You might if you heard what I had to say.”

“Oh Reg, you’re really so popular,” Barty started, “even dogs chase you now.”

Remus had been expecting this. Intervention from friends was Sirius' reason #2 factor in letting the prank fail (the first being the stick Regulus had stuffed a mile up his arse—fuddy-duddy) which meant it was important to get them to fuck off.

“Hey Bart, didn’t see you there," he sneered; "How’s the teddy bear? Not too waterlogged I hope?”

Barty scowled, but Remus looked past him, bending down toward Regulus slightly. “I need to talk to you,” he said again; “it’s about… erm... Sirius.”

Regulus made a frustrated face, like he wanted to tell him to stuff it and fuck off, but finally, after much teeth-grinding, he pushed back from the table and stood.

“Reg!” Barty called; “What are you doing? Don't listen to this wanker —he's mental!”

“I’ll be right back,” Regulus said. “Just wait here.”

Yes, success! It'd been easier than he thought even. Perhaps he was cut out for this. Insides positively buzzing, Remus led Regulus from the dining room and into the hall. He kept walking, his pace perhaps a little too quick in his desperation to make it outside, and finally Regulus snapped at him.

“Where are you going, Lupin? I thought you wanted to talk!”

“Uhm... Too many people—this way!”

He heard Regulus give a huff, but he was still following so the plan hadn’t failed yet. Though that didn't mean the universe was letting him off that easy.

Almost to the front doors, Remus rounded a corner and nearly ran head-long into somebody, only to realise at the last second that it was his biology partner, Jillian. As he fell back, she gave gave a little squeak of surprise which quickly became a beaming grin, showing off her braces and a deep pair of dimples.

“Oh—! It's just you, Remus. Hello!"

"Er... hey Jill. Sorry for almost running into you. Was in a bit a bit of a hurry."

"That's alright." She peeked past him. "You and your friend on your way somewhere then?"

"Yeah, actually we—"

"We're not friends," Regulus cut-in.

Jillian smiled awkwardly. "Oh, well I was just looking for you actually, Remus. Are you all ready for our final presentation today? The wonders of cell mitosis, right?"

“Yeah, totally!” Remus scrambled. "It's just, right now I'm a bit—"

“Oh, good! I was thinking we could go over our parts at breakfast together, that is if you're not too busy...?" Jillian’s gaze turned to Regulus again, who was standing a few feet behind them, arms crossed and glaring like the devil.

"Lupin, are we talking or are you going on your date?" He snapped impatiently.

Remus' heart gave a little start; "Ah—no! We're definitely not—"

"Date," Jillian giggled, biting her lip as she tucked her hair behind her ear; "Remus and I aren't—heh!—dating."

Simultaneously tired of being talked over and also worried about the prank, Remus cleared his throat and Jillian's attention whipped back to him. “Sorry, Jill, I got something going on right now. Maybe we could chat about the presentation during next break?”

“Oh yeah, sure. Biology isn't until last period anyway. Shall I meet you ‘the spot’ then?”

Remus hated how she’d dubbed the back row of the biology room ‘the spot’, but she’d already winked clumsily at him and judging by Regulus’ expression, he had about four seconds to get moving again.

“Sure, see you.”

Slipping around her, Remus looked back only to make sure Regulus was with him before finally emerging out onto the front steps of the dining hall. He glanced around, but found no sight of his friends, only the plastic bucket looming several feet over their heads. There'd been no way to disguise it, but Sirius hadn't wanted to just wait for Regulus to come walking out on his own and risk missing him—therefore: Remus, distraction-extraordinaire.

“Okay, spit it out. And this better not be another stupid prank,” Regulus snapped.

Remus couldn't help it; he laughed.

"What's so damn funny?"

Quickly he clapped a hand over his mouth. "Nothing! Just... thanks for agreeing to meet with me."

"I'm not meeting with you," Regulus scowled, "you're interrupting my breakfast. Now spit it out before you actually start acting like the lunatic everyone says you are."

It was hard not to rise to the bait and react, but doing so would just ruin the prank. Regulus had stopped just in front of the doors, several feet off-target, and with no time or patience left to scramble for something to say, Remus took Sirius' advice and rattled off the first thing that came to mind;

"Er—the violin!"

Regulus pulled back, nearly affronted. "Pardon me?"

"You play the violin!"

"Are you trying to be funny or are you actually this stupid?"

Remus gave a nervous laugh. "Ha—funny. No, I only meant that you play the violin well. And so I… thought that maybe you could… teach me?"

"You brought me out here to ask me that?"

"I guess so…?"

Regulus turned back to the door.

"Wait!" Remus cried. "You're right, I was just playing—I really do have to talk to you though."

"I've already entertained enough rubbish to do with my brother," Regulus spat scathingly. A pair of students passed them, walking into the hall all while quizzically murmuring to each other and pointing up at the sky. Regulus stepped aside for them and went to look up, but before he could spot the bucket, Remus threw his hands up.

"But you still followed me!" He half-shouted. The freakish gesture at least got Regulus' attention again. He straightened up to his full height, which was not much shorter than Sirius' these days, and drew back from the door, crossing his arms. Remus watched him, keenly aware of the few feet between him and the chalk 'x' marker Peter had left on the ground.

“I’m not going to help you,” Regulus said. “Sirius has made his own bed. Even if he doesn’t know it yet.”

The vague statement caught Remus by surprise. “What are you talking about?”

“Well, I assume he’s figured it out and told you, but it was only a matter of time before she did it anyway.”

“Do what? You mean your mum?”

“Who else?”

“I don’t… What do you—”

Regulus took a step forward, almost menacing. “I told him to stop pushing her, that it was just gonna make things worse, but he never listens. Did he even tell you about Easter?"

"Only that you had a row," Remus shot. "How hard could it be to get along as brothers for one week?"

"We didn't have the row," Regulus hissed. "All he was supposed to do was give one stupid concert, and he couldn't even do that!"

Concert?

"It's just a bloody piano!"

Piano?

"He could've refused—ran off somewhere and avoided the entire thing, but no—what does he do? He smashes an entire bottle of vodka on it and lights the whole thing on fire in the middle of the bloody ballroom! Our entire family was there! Plus half of the British parliament and a member from every affluent family from here to Australia—and he burns an eighteenth century heirloom right in front of them! What did you idiots think she would do?!"

For a moment Remus was without words. Regulus' explosion had surprised him, not because Sirius had done, but because he'd neglected to mention it at all. Remus was pretty sure arson was on Sirius' bucket list for Christ's sake. And his mother... What was Regulus even saying?

"You're saying he did this, because they... tried to force him to play?"

Regulus puckered. "One song wouldn't have killed him. But he always has to make a scene. It's impossible for him to keep his head down, and he's not the only one who pays for it."

It was as though a boxing bell had gone off inside Remus' mind. Regulus' words had driven a spark down his throat, and instantly his hackles were up, gearing for a fight.

" 'Not the only one'?" He snarled. "You're always on him for fighting back but I've seen his scars, you little coward! The ones he got when you were in the way—when he was defending you!"

A horrified look came over Regulus, and he faltered immediately, gritting his teeth as though he too were feeling the leftover burn of Sirius' injury. "He's not the only one who doesn't always want to go home," Regulus ground out, "but if he just shut up for a little while longer, then maybe things would be fine!"

"I—" Remus drew up short. It was at that moment that he began to realise just how similar the two Black brothers were. Both of them had put up a wall, but where Sirius' was sarcastic and aloof, Regulus' was withdrawn and stoic. They were both dealing with their pain the only way they knew how. For as long as Remus had known him, Sirius had been counting down the seconds until the day he'd be free from his family, and maybe Regulus was doing the same.

"I don't think you want to hate your brother," Remus said quietly. He shot a quick glance around the corner, where the lads would be waiting. Can you hear this, Sirius?

"I do hate him," Regulus said bitterly.

"No... No, you don't. In fact, I don't think any piece of you hates him, not really."

"You don't know anything about me."

"You're right," Remus agreed. "I don't know you at all, Regulus. I have no idea what it's like being you. I can tell you don't like that place though—home. Neither does Sirius. And that's just one thing in common, but I'll bet there are more. You are brothers, and if you just agreed to talk to one another, then I think you could be on the same side.”

“And what side is that?" Regulus sneered. "You don’t exactly look like winners to me.”

Remus almost laughed. “That might be true, and I may not have any brothers, but I can tell you one thing—being on a side with friends feels a whole lot better than one without.”

Regulus looked down at the ground. It felt dismissive at first, but the longer Remus watched him, the softer his expression became.

“You should talk to Sirius, Reg," Remus pleaded. "This back and forth doesn’t have to go on forever. It can end.”

“He won’t talk to me," Regulus said in a small voice.

“Then we’ll make him talk. We could find some common ground and get it all out in the open. It’ll feel better, I promise. And hey, if he doesn’t want to listen, then we can tie him to a tree—and if he tries to talk over us, we can muzzle him. We have options.”

A smile flickered across Regulus’ face. It was so quick Remus almost thought he’d imagined it. “Stupid,” he murmured, “ 'common ground', what pish…”

"Better than a battle ground."

Absent-mindedly, Regulus began dragging the toe of his shoe ahead of him, blurring the chalked 'x' on the ground until it was little more than a smudge. Remus stared at it, and suddenly the reality of their situation came back to him.

Oh no.

Then, with all the terror of an air-raid siren, a single whistle cut through the air.

No... No, no, no, no, no, no—no!

Regulus glanced up; “Okay, Lupin, where’s my brother?”

Remus surged forward. “REGULUS, WATCH OUT!”

Overhead, the first bell of the morning blared above them, drowning out his desperate cry. He grabbed onto Regulus’ surprised shoulders just as the bucket tipped—yanked furiously and with sure glee. He had tried, but not fast enough, and down came their revenge to splatter over the both of them. Only it was much thicker than water.

Sirius, you damn liar.

The blood was in his hair, his eyes—everywhere—it was as thick and warm as though it'd been drained from a real animal only moments before. It was all he could taste and see and smell. He scooped the red cornstarch from his eyes and shook it from his hands, spattering the front steps even more. The space around him was a crime scene, the front doors and stone steps soaked with gore, deep rivers running down into the grass. Dancing around it, Remus' friends emerged from around the side of the building, whooping with victory and only stopping to gape in horror once they'd spotted him.

"Moony, you were supposed to get out of the way!" Sirius wailed. "Didn't you hear the whistle?!"

Remus had no words. It only took a few seconds for students on their way out of the dining hall to begin gathering. They appeared at the doors behind them, whipping the open and going cross-eyed with shock as others crowded around to get a look. He felt disgusted and horrified, but not because of the blood. Watching Regulus was like taking a punch to the gut from an elephant. He simply stood there on the front steps, mouth open and breathing shakily as though he were afraid to move. Blood soaked his dark hair, dripping down the side of his face and staining his fine features. Seeing him stunned and covered head-to-toe in gore was a million times worse than watching Carrie.

"Christ—out of the way already!" Remus heard someone shout, and a moment later Lily had muscled her way to the front of the crowd, stopping just shy of the puddled blood. Marlene was with her, and as they came to sudden halt, both girls whipped their heads up, having gone as white as sheets.

"Oh my god," Lily shrieked. "Remus!"

"Don't worry," Peter called, maybe more for the crowd's benefit; "it's not real blood!"

Looking past them, Lily gaped at the three boys. "You lunatics!"

Sirius bent down and stuck his fingers into the blood dripping down the hall's steps, sticking them back into his mouth. "S'just sugar," he grinned, teeth stained red.

Some kids laughed, but a few moaned in disgust, hardly believing the truth. Sirius didn't care—the prank had worked. Remus wanted to scream at him—You promised!—but there wasn't time.

"Is this what you meant?" Regulus asked in the barest whisper, one only Remus could hear. "Is this what you meant by 'finding a common ground'?"

"Reg..."

"You're all the same," he spat, his voice a mixture of anger and betrayal. "And I hate you both."

Turning away, Regulus tore down the cafeteria's steps. He passed Sirius, who spun around to watch him go, leaving behind bloody footprints in his wake.

"Just back up, don't step in it!" Lily was shouting, trying her best to usher students back into the dining hall. Some would not be deterred, and as they began skirting around the muck, Sirius started up the steps, walking right through it until he reached Remus' side.

"Sorry, Moons, didn't mean to sacrifice you! But you didn't get out of the splash zone fast enough."

Smiling, Sirius clapped a hand over Remus' back before withdrawing it, grimacing at the sight of the sticky blood now staining his palm. Remus was too numb to yell at him; he was still watching Regulus. As the youngest Black brother turned a corner and disappeared out of sight, it occurred to him that Sirius had sacrificed a lot more than just a friend.

* * *

It took longer than expected for Remus to scrub the fake blood from his skin. Longer even, to rid it from his hair. The sugar soaked into his scalp and stained his face, leaving him red-washed like some sad circus clown. He supposed that for someone who'd been in on the prank in the first place, he'd almost gotten off easy. While Lily had ordered the other three to stay behind and clean up their mess, he'd staggered back to their dorm room like a true victim. Though generally victims weren't supposed to feel so guilty. Even if Sirius hadn't broken his promise, and the bucket had been filled with water, it still would've ruined everything. He couldn't help but think that Regulus must've hated him even more than his brother now. After all, he was expecting a stunt like that from Sirius, but Remus had lulled him into a sense of security and then betrayed his trust. It really was the epitome of a mess.

As Remus made his way out of the bathroom, scrubbing his hair with a towel, he found Sirius waiting for him on his bed. Up until that moment it'd been easy to ignore all other feelings thanks to the guilt he felt over Regulus, but as Sirius sat up and smiled ruefully at him, Remus began to sense a heedless rage well up within him.

"Glad to see the dye came off your face," Sirius said, as Remus pulled the towel from his head and stiffly marched to his wardrobe.

"What are you doing here?" He ground out.

"Evans ordered the other tossers back to class, but I thought one of us ought to check in on you so I snuck away. Good thing too—looks like you missed a spot."

Getting up, Sirius reached for the side of his face and Remus ripped away, startling the both of them. "Don't!" He snarled.

Sirius' smile waned, and he bit his lip. "Ah, Moons, I'm sorry. I didn't mean for you to get covered in muck. I'll buy you new clothes."

Remus couldn't help his huff of incredulous laughter; "That's what you're sorry for—that I got hit too? You lied, Sirius! You said it'd just be water!"

"I know, and we filled it with that first. Just—didn't feel like enough."

"It never does, does it, you stupid wanker?!" Remus spat. "Nothing's ever enough for you! You always have to take it too far!"

Sirius stepped away, looking sore. "Look, I know you're mad but—"

"Actually, I'm furious! You should've heard what Regulus was saying, if you had you never would've pulled that rope!"

"Well, whatever it was must've been real eye-opening if it's prompted this sort of reaction."

"You prompted this reaction, Sirius! You did when you decided to lie to me! Regulus was ready to try and make up—he was gonna talk to you and you ruined it!"

“Oh I did, did I?” Sirius barked. “That’s funny ‘cause I was totally trying to fix things in the first place!”

Remus flung his towel at the wall with an angry cry. “AUGH—You’re insane!”

“Fine—I’m insane, whatever! But I was only doing this for you!”

Remus rounded on him. “Oh my god—are you actually for real?”

“Friends don’t let friends get utterly walked over!" Sirius hollered. "We were protecting you! No one else—just us! Those shits deserved everything they got! And we did it for you!”

“I NEVER BLOODY ASKED YOU TO!”

Sirius drew back, a vein bulging in his neck. Remus returned his glare, almost panting. He waited for Sirius to whip out another stinging response—one that would leave him feeling raw for days on end—but instead Sirius just walked out of their bedroom, slamming the door behind himself.

* * *

Remus did not see Sirius in forms. Remus did not see Sirius in first period. Remus did not see Sirius at break or lunch or even biology, which he’d promised not to skip only to ensure that he’d get to watch him squirm during the song Jillian had written for their presentation on cell mitosis; If you fall down and scrap your knee, if your nails grow long and strong inexplicably, if you wake up in the morning as tall as a tree, have no fear, that's just cell mitosis, baby!

Because they deserved some punishment too, Remus avoided James and Peter as well. They tried to keep up, apologised profusely every chance they got, but Remus told himself that it wasn't enough. Freezing out his friends made him feel bad, but not that bad. After all, they only thought they were apologising for dousing him in fake gore. He doubted that even Sirius, despite their argument, understood what had really happened.

Arguing with Sirius always felt good in the moment—well, not good, more like a release—it was the bit that came after that was harder. In the absence of others all he could think about was how things could’ve gone differently—gone better—just like Sheila had said. He'd resented plenty of people: his parents, teachers, doctors, anyone dumb enough to think they had a hope in hell of "changing him for the better"—but those were all different. Sirius was his friend. Tomny was his friend too, and though he still held some sense of a grudge, really he just missed him. And now that they were so close to going home for the summer, he couldn't afford to miss Sirius too.

He tried the astronomy building first, then a few other hiding spots, but still no Sirius. He hadn't shown up for any of his other classes either, and none of the girls had any idea, though Lily was trying to track him down herself to slap him with a detention slip. Even James and Peter didn't know where he was, and Remus refused to let them help look.

Finding him in the music room had been a coincidence. He'd left one of his books under the risers that morning and was returning to fetch it when he stumbled upon Sirius in a place he hadn't seen him in a very long time—sitting at Sheila's grand piano. He hadn't noticed him yet, and unable to help himself, Remus paused in the doorway, waiting to see what he'd do. But Sirius just sat.

Sat and stared, in utter silence.

"Fuck man—just make it for you already," Remus said finally, making Sirius spin around as though he'd been caught doing something he shouldn't. When he saw it was only him, he deflated, turning back to the instrument.

"What are you doing here?" Sirius asked, hunched over on the piano bench. Remus could see the entire shape of his shoulder blade outlined underneath his school shirt.

"Just... looking around," he mumbled from the doorway.

"We don't even have class today."

"Classes are over anyway. And I forgot my book in forms."

"Oh." Sirius began rubbing his fingers like an arthritic old man. "Want to... Want to sit?"

At the offer, a sliver of hope lodged itself in Remus' chest and he shuffled into the room. Sirius made room for him on the bench and he sat, though it felt awkward; his legs stuck out past the pedals and the keys felt too low to the ground to be within comfortable reach. Next to him, Sirius was the picture of a perfect musician. He sat with his back straight and his hands neatly tucked into his lap like it'd been drilled into him, which of course it had. For a while they just existed there, staring down at the open piano without a word. Sirius regarded the ivory keys like they were the fangs of a cobra ready to strike, but to Remus they were only ghosts.

“Are you… still mad, Moony?”

Remus looked to his right, where Sirius was watching him with tepid eyes.

“I should be, shouldn't I?” He said; then, “But no, not really... You?”

Sirius shook his head. “No. I'm mostly just sorry for lying. And for breaking my promise.”

“Well, I'm mostly sorry for yelling.”

"And I'm mostly sorry for upsetting you."

"I'm mostly sorry for calling you a stupid wanker."

“Nah... I deserved it.”

“You're right, you did.”

